
BOSTON PUBLIC LIBRARY

BOSTON
PUBLIC LIBRARY

The Norton Anthology of World Masterpieces

FOURTH EDITION

VOLUME 1

VOLUME 1

MASTERPIECES OF THE ANCIENT WORLD • Knox

MASTERPIECES OF THE MIDDLE AGES • McGalliard

MASTERPIECES OF THE RENAISSANCE • Pasinetti

VOLUME 2

MASTERPIECES OF NEOCLASSICISM • Hugo

MASTERPIECES OF ROMANTICISM • Hugo

MASTERPIECES OF REALISM AND NATURALISM • Wellek

MASTERPIECES OF THE MODERN WORLD • Douglas / Lawall

A COMPANION VOLUME

MASTERPIECES OF THE ORIENT
Edited by G. L. Anderson
Available in Enlarged and Shorter Editions

The Norton Anthology of World Masterpieces

FOURTH EDITION

Maynard Mack, General Editor
Yale University

Bernard M. W. Knox
Center for Hellenic Studies

John C. McGalliard
The University of Iowa

P. M. Pasinetti
University of California, Los Angeles

Howard E. Hugo
Late of the University of California, Berkeley

René Wellek
Yale University

Kenneth Douglas
Late of Yale University

Sarah Lawall
University of Massachusetts, Amherst

VOLUME 1
Literature of Western Culture through the Renaissance

W•W• NORTON & COMPANY• NEW YORK • LONDON

BRIGHTON

Copyright © 1979, 1973, 1965, 1956 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
All rights reserved. Printed in the United States of America.

BOOK DESIGN BY JOHN WOODLOCK

Since this page cannot legibly accommodate all the copyright notices, the following page constitutes an extension of the copyright page.

Library of Congress Cataloging in Publication Data
Main entry under title:
The Norton anthology of world masterpieces.
Fourth ed. edited by M. Mack published in 1973 under title: World masterpieces.
Includes indexes.
CONTENTS: v. 1. Literature of Western culture through the Renaissance.—v. 2. Literature of Western culture since the Renaissance.
1. Literature—Collections. I. Mack, Maynard, 1909– II. Mack, Maynard, 1909– ed.
World masterpieces.
PN6014.M1382 1979 808.8 78–26744

ISBN 0 393 95036 0 cloth edition
ISBN 0 393 95045 x paper edition

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0

Aeschylus: "Agamemnon," reprinted by permission of Faber and Faber Ltd from The Agamemnon of Aeschylus translated by Louis MacNeice.
Dante Alighieri: "Inferno" from Dante's Inferno, translated with notes and commentary by Mark Musa. Copyright, 1971, by Indiana University Press, Bloomington and London. Reprinted by permission of Indiana University Press. "Purgatorio" and "Paradiso" translated, with headnotes, by Lawrence Binyon. Diagrams and footnotes from La divina commedia di Dante Alighieri edited and annotated by C. H. Grandgent. Reprinted courtesy of the heirs of C. H. Grandgent.
Aristophanes: "Lysistrata" translated by Charles T. Murphy, from Greek Literature in Translation; edited by Whitney J. Oates and Charles T. Murphy. Copyright © 1944 by Longman Inc. Previously published by David McKay Company, Inc. Reprinted by permission of Longman Inc.
Aristotle: From Poetics, translated by S. H. Butcher and published by The Macmillan Company of London and Basingstoke.
Aucussin and Nicolette: From Aucussin and Nicolette translated by Edward Francis Moyer and Carey DeWitt Eldridge. Copyright 1937 by Robert Linker.
Calderón de la Barca: "Life is a Dream" translated by Roy Campbell, from Six Spanish Plays, vol. 3 in The Classic Theater edited by Eric Bentley. Copyright © 1959 by Eric Bentley. Reprinted by permission of Eric Bentley.
Giovanni Boccaccio: Selections from The Decameron, edited and translated by Mark Musa and Peter E. Bondanella. Copyright © 1977 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
Baldesar Castiglione: From The Book of the Courtier by Count Baldesar Castiglione, translated by Leonard E. Opdycke. Copyright 1901 by Charles Scribner's Sons, 1929 by Leonard E. Opdycke; published by Charles Scribner's Sons.
Miguel de Cervantes: From Don Quixote by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra, translated by Samuel Putnam. Copyright 1949 by The Viking Press, Inc.; copyright © renewed 1978 by Hilary Putnam. Reprinted by permission of Viking Penguin, Inc.
Geoffrey Chaucer: From The Portable Chaucer edited and translated by Theodore Morrison. Copyright 1949, © 1977 by Theodore Morrison. Reprinted by permission of Viking Penguin Inc.
John Donne: Text and notes by Robert M. Adams; copyright © 1962, 1968 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
A Dream of the Rood: From Anthology of Old English Poetry translated by Charles W. Kennedy. Copyright © 1960 by Oxford University Press, Inc. Reprinted by permission.
Desiderius Erasmus: "The Praise of Folly" abridged from Erasmus: In Praise of Folly, a new translation by Leonard F. Dean, Hendricks House Farrar Straus, 1946.
Euripides: "Medea" and "Hippolytus" from Three Great Plays of Euripides, translated by Rex Warner. Copyright © 1958 by Rex Warner. Reprinted by arrangement with The New American Library, Inc., New York, N.Y., reproduced by permission of The Bodley Head, London.
Homer: Excerpts from The Iliad, translated by Robert Fitzgerald. Copyright © 1974 by Robert Fitzgerald. Used by permission of Doubleday & Company, Inc. Excerpts from The Odyssey, translated by Robert Fitzgerald. Copyright © 1961 by Robert Fitzgerald. Used by permission of Doubleday & Company, Inc. and William Heinemann, Ltd.
Lucretius: From The Way Things Are, translated by Rolfe Humphries. Copyright © 1968 by Indiana University Press. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.
Niccolò Machiavelli: From Machiavelli: The Prince and Other Works, a new translation by Allan H. Gilbert. Reprinted by permission of Hendricks House, Inc.
Christopher Marlowe: From Dr. Faustus, modernized and annotated by Hallett Smith; copyright © 1962, 1968 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
John Milton: From Paradise Lost, text and notes by Robert McAdams, copyright © 1962, 1968 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
Michel de Montaigne: From The Essays of Montaigne translated by E. J. Trechmann (2 vols. 1927). Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press.
Petronius: "Dinner With Trimalchio" from The Satyricon and the Fragments by Petronius translated by J. P. Sullivan, © 1965, 1969, 1974 by J. P. Sullivan. Reprinted by permission of the translator and Penguin Books, Ltd.
François Rabelais: From The Five Books of Gargantua and Pantagruel, translated by Jacques Le Clercq. Copyright 1936 by The Limited Editions Club. Reprinted by permission.
St. Augustine: From Confessions of St. Augustine in the translation of F. J. Sheed, copyright, 1943, Sheed & Ward, Inc., N.Y., renewed 1970. Reprinted by permission of Sheed and Ward, Inc. and Sheed and Ward, Ltd.
Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: A new verse translation by Marie Borroff. Copyright © 1967 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. Reprinted by permission of the publisher.
The Song of Roland: Abridged from The Song of Roland, translated by Dorothy L. Sayers. Copyright 1957 by the Executors of Dorothy L. Sayers. Reprinted by permission of David Higham Associates Ltd.
Sophocles: "Antigone" from Three Theban Plays translated by Theodore Howard Banks. Copyright © 1956 by Theodore Howard Banks. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press, Inc. "Oedipus Tyrannus" translated by Lusi Berkowitz and Theodore F. Brunner. Copyright © 1970 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc.
Virgil: From The Aeneid of Virgil, A Verse Translation by Allen Mandelbaum. Copyright © 1971 by Allen Mandelbaum. Used by permission of Bantam Books, Inc. and Allen Mandelbaum.

ISBN 0 393 95036 0 cloth edition

ISBN 0 393 95045 x paper edition

1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 0

Contents

PREFACE TO THE FOURTH EDITION xiii
PREFACE xvii

Masterpieces of the Ancient World

INTRODUCTION 1
LIVES, WRITINGS, AND CRITICISM 43

THE OLD TESTAMENT
Genesis 1-3. [The Creation—The Fall] 47
Genesis 4. [The First Murder] 51
Genesis 6-9. [The Flood] 51
Genesis 11. [The Origin of Languages] 55
Genesis 37-46. [The Story of Joseph] 56
Job 70
Ecclesiastes, or The Preacher 90
Psalm 8 95
Psalm 19 95
Psalm 23 96
Psalm 104 96
Psalm 137 98
Jonah 98
Isaiah 52-53. [The Song of the Suffering Servant] 101

HOMER
The Iliad
Book I. [The Quarrel of Akhilleus and Agamémnon] 102
Book VI. [The Meeting of Hektor and Andrómakhê] 122
Book VIII. [The Eve of Battle] 131
Book IX. [The Embassy to Akhilleus] 132
Book XVIII. [The Arming of Akhilleus] 154
Book XIX. [Akhilleus Prepares for Battle] 172

Book XXII. [The Death of Hektor] 184 Book XXIV. [Akhilleus and Priam] 199
The Odyssey
Book VI. [Odysseus Meets Nausikaa] 224
Book VIII. [The Hospitality of the Phaiakians] 233
Book IX. [Odysseus' Travels: The Kyklopes] 249 Book X. [Aiolos and Kirkê] 264
Book XI. [Odysseus Speaks with the Dead] 279

AESCHYLUS (524?–456 B.C.)
Agamemnon 299

THUCYDIDES
History of the Peloponnesian War
[Athenian Democracy—The Athenians from the Enemy's Point of View] 341
[Athenian Democracy—The Athenians, a Self-Portrait] 342

SOPHOCLES (495–406 B.C.)
Oedipus Tyrannus 349
Antigone 378

THUCYDIDES
History of the Peloponnesian War—The Melian Dialogue 408

EURIPIDES (480–406 B.C.)
Medea 415
Hippolytus 449

ARISTOPHANES (448?–380? B.C.)
Lysistrata 485

PLATO (429?–347 B.C.)
The Apology of Socrates 521
Crito 539
Phaedo. [The Death of Socrates] 556

ARISTOTLE (384–322 B.C.)
Poetics 559

LUCRETIUS (99?–55 B.C.)
On the Nature of Things
Book III. [Against the Fear of Death] 564

CICERO (106–43 B.C.)
On the Republic: The Dream of Scipio 572

VIRGIL (70–19 B.C.)
The Aeneid
Book I. [Aeneas Arrives in Carthage] 579
Book II. [The Fall of Troy] 589
Book IV. [Aeneas Abandons Dido] 615
Book V. [The Death of Palinurus] 636
Book VI. [Aeneas in the Underworld] 637
Book VIII. [The Shield of Aeneas] 645
Book XII. [The Death of Turnus] 650

THE NEW TESTAMENT
Luke 2. [The Birth and Youth of Jesus] 656
Matthew 5-7. [The Teaching of Jesus] 658
Luke 15. [Parables of Jesus] 663
Matthew 26. [The Betrayal of Jesus] 664
Matthew 27. [The Trial and Crucifixion of Jesus] 667
Matthew 28. [The Resurrection] 670

PETRONIUS (died A.D. 65)
Satyricon: Dinner with Trimalchio 671

ST. AUGUSTINE (A.D. 354–430)
Confessions
Book I. [Childhood] 691
Book II. [The Pear Tree] 696
Book III. [Student at Carthage] 698
Book IV. [Death of a Friend] 700
Book V. [Professor at Milan] 702
Book VI. [Worldly Ambitions] 707
Book VIII. [Conversion] 710
Book IX. [Death of His Mother] 713

Masterpieces of the Middle Ages

INTRODUCTION 729

LIVES, WRITINGS, AND CRITICISM 765

The Dream of the Rood 768
The Song of Roland 771
Aucassin and Nicolette 826

DANTE ALIGHIERI (1265–1321)
The Divine Comedy
Inferno 855
Purgatorio 991
Paradiso 1013

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO (1313–1375)
The Decameron
The First Day 1032
The Second Tale of the Fourth Day 1046
The Ninth Tale of the Fifth Day 1053

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight 1057

GEOFFREY CHAUCER (1340?–1400)
Chaucer in Modern English 1111
The Canterbury Tales
General Prologue 1112
Prologue to the Miller's Tale 1130
The Miller's Tale 1132
Prologue to the Pardoner's Tale 1145
The Pardoner's Tale 1149
The Knight's Interruption of the Monk's Tale 1160
The Nun's Priest's Tale 1161

Everyman (ca. 1485) 1176

Masterpieces of the Renaissance

INTRODUCTION 1199

LIVES, WRITINGS, AND CRITICISM 1237

FRANCIS PETRARCH (1304–1374)
Sonnet 3: It Was the Morning 1244
Sonnet 61: Blest Be the Day 1245
Sonnet 62: Father in Heaven 1245
Sonnet 90: She Used to Let Her Golden Hair Fly Free 1246
Sonnet 292: The Eyes That Drew from Me 1246
Sonnet 300: Great Is My Envy of You 1246
Sonnet 333: Go, Grieving Rimes of Mine 1247
Letter to Dionisio da Borgo San Sepolcro 1247

DESIDERIUS ERASMUS (1466?–1536)
The Praise of Folly 1254

BALDESAR CASTIGLIONE (1478–1529)
The Book of the Courtier
[The Setting] 1278
["Everything He May Do or Say Shall Be Stamped with Grace"] 1281

NICCOLÒ MACHIAVELLI (1469–1527)
Letter to Francesco Vettori ["That Food Which Alone Is Mine"] 1290
The Prince
[Princely Virtues] 1292
["Fortune Is a Woman"] 1299
[The Roman Dream] 1302

FRANCOIS RABELAIS (1494?–1553)
Gargantua and Pantagruel, Book I [Education of a Giant Humanist] 1305
[The Abbey of Thélème] 1320
Gargantua and Pantagruel, Book II
[Pantagruel: Birth and Education] 1330
[Father's Letter from Home] 1333
Of the Character and Condition of Panurge 1337
How Panurge Fell in Love with a Parisienne of High Degree 1341
How Panurge Played a None Too Pleasant Trick on the Parisienne of High Degree 1344

MICHEL DE MONTAIGNE (1533–1592)
Essays
Of Cannibals 1346
Of the Inconsistency of Our Actions 1358
Apology for Raimond Sebond 1364
Of Repentance 1375

MIGUEL DE CERVANTES (1547–1616)
Don Quixote, Part I
["I Know Who I Am, and Who I May Be, If I Choose"] 1378
[Fighting the Windmills] 1402
[Fighting the Sheep] 1406
["To Right Wrongs and Come to the Aid of the Wretched"] 1411 ["Set Free at Once That Lovely Lady . . ."] 1421
Don Quixote, Part II
["Put into a Book"] 1427
[A Victorious Duel] 1434
["For I Well Know the Meaning of Valor"] 1465
[Last Duel] 1473
[Homecoming and Death] 1478

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE (1564–1593)
The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Doctor Faustus 1487

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE (1564–1616)
Hamlet, Prince of Denmark 1538

JOHN DONNE (1572–1631)
The Good-Morrow 1641
Song 1641
The Indifferent 1642
The Canonization 1643
The Apparition 1644
The Funeral 1645
Holy Sonnets
Sonnet 7: "At the round earth's imagined corners, blow" 1645
Sonnet 10: "Death, be not proud, though some have called thee" 1646

CALDERÓN DE LA BARCA (1600–1681)
Life Is a Dream 1647

JOHN MILTON (1608–1674)
Paradise Lost
Book IX. [The Fall] 1706
Book X. [Consequences of the Fall] 1734

A NOTE ON TRANSLATION 1741

INDEX 1749

Preface to the Fourth Edition

This fourth edition is, we think, the best to date. Notable additions to the selections from the ancient world, the middle ages, the romantic poets, and the moderns combine with the introduction of important new authors and several brilliant new translations to make the volumes now before you an immensely flexible, practical, and attractive instrument for teaching the literature of the western world. (For those who wish to extend their courses to include Eastern literatures, we recommend a companion anthology, Masterpieces of the Orient, edited by G. L. Anderson, available from the publisher in 397- and 846-page versions.)

Our representation of the twentieth century has been particularly enriched. In this edition there appear for the first time no fewer than eight major modern writers: Wallace Stevens (eleven poems); Virginia Woolf (a short story); Anna Akhmatova (a lyric sequence); Katherine Anne Porter (a short novel); Bertolt Brecht (a full-length play); Jorge Luis Borges and Vladimir Nabokov (a short story by each); and Richard Wright (the chilling first story from Uncle Tom's Children, "Big Boy Leaves Home"). And though the canon of authentic masters is better established for earlier periods, and our additions to these periods have therefore mostly been enlargements of existing selections rather than additions of previously unrepresented writers, there have also been a few of the latter: the anonymous authors of the Anglo-Saxon Dream of the Rood and the Middle English Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, the latter in the incomparable translation by Marie Borroff, and Emily Dickinson (fifteen poems).

We have also made a handful of substitutions. The replacement of Euripides' The Trojan Women by his Hippolytus permits interesting crossweavings when Racine's Phaedra is reached. Ibsen's Hedda Gabler, replacing his The Wild Duck, invites some fascinating comparisons not only with Euripides' and Racine's Phaedra but (for those with an eye to representative cultural symbols) with Emma Bovary, Mother Courage, and the heroine of Katherine Anne Porter's Pale Horse, Pale Rider. The long opening chapter of Proust's Remembrance of Things Past, which we have substituted for his account of the soirée at the Marquise de Saint-Euverte's, affords a more concise entry into the author's themes and methods while supplying at the same time a psychological wellhead in the evolution of the modern American novel, to be placed beside its other sources in the self-enclosed linguistic game-worlds of Borges and the often almost unmediated transcriptions of raw experience in Wright. The two other substitutions have a similar intent. Mann's Tonio Kröger replaces his Felix Krull because it comments so poignantly on the deep cleavage between life and art, action and contemplation, which characterizes modern culture generally; and Faulkner's Old Man replaces his "Delta Autumn" because it is painted on so much broader a canvas of American life and experience. For the teacher who thrives on experiment and exploration, as most of us do, these exchanges are transparent gains.

To the selections from authors already represented, we have been able to add in this edition substantial new portions of the Odyssey and the Aeneid, two complete books of Wordsworth's The Prelude in the preferred 1805 text, further poems by Shelley (all the Shelley poems in World Masterpieces are now given in the definitive text lately edited from the manuscripts by Donald Reiman), Keats, Tennyson (not only additional poems but a selection from In Memoriam preserving the shape and progression of the whole), and Whitman.

To make this expansion possible we have been obliged to forgo a scattering of works for which our teacher-users assure us they lack time and inclination. Partly in the same interest, we have returned to first principles, and have excluded from this edition most lyric poetry in translation. We have always held (see the Note on Translation which concludes this volume) that lyric poetry loses too much in translation to warrant extensive treatment in either a survey anthology or a survey course; and the reports from our experiment with a large infusion of such poetry in the third edition confirm us in our original conviction. (By way of compensation, we have increased the quantity and variety of lyric poetry in English.)

Finally, our translations. We have always been vigilant about these, as our long-time users know, and have tried with each successive edition to make improvements. We believe we have succeeded in doing so again. A long consideration of the two great modern verse translations of the Iliad has persuaded us to give our vote in this edition to Robert Fitzgerald, whose unmatched Odyssey we have already used for several years. With less reluctance but some regret, we have also let go Dryden's elegant rendering of Lucretius in favor of Rolfe Humphries' version, unquestionably more comfortable for a twentieth-century eye and ear. Allen Mandelbaum's fine Aeneid, winner of the National Book Award, has replaced C. Day Lewis's on somewhat similar grounds, and Joseph Sheed's Confessions of St. Augustine brings a vernacular lucidity where Elizabethan syntax reigned before. To all our translators new and old, not forgetting Rex Warner for our new Hippolytus, Robin Kemball for our version of Akhmatova's Requiem, and Ralph Manheim for our Mother Courage and Her Children, we offer hearty thanks, and to their publishers as well.

In conclusion, we welcome a new colleague, Professor Sarah Lawall of the Comparative Literature department of the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, to our collegium of editors. The revisions in the current Introduction to the Modern World, and the texts, notes, introductions, and bibliographies for the authors and works newly added are all hers, and we look forward to her further collaboration in editions yet to come. We must, unhappily, at this same time record the grievous losses of Kenneth Douglas by accidental death, and Howard E. Hugo, taken from us prematurely by illness. Kenneth and Howard were among the original seven editors of this anthology, and by their judicious choices they probably brought more recalcitrant students to an appreciation of neoclassic, romantic, and modern world writing than any other anthologists in history. We applaud their work and honor their memory. Si monumentum requiris, circumspice.

The Editors

Preface

World Masterpieces is an anthology of Western literature, based on principles which we believe to be sound, but which have not always been sufficiently observed, we feel, in the existing anthologies in this field.

We have sought to make the range of readings in this collection unusually wide and varied. Its contents reach in time from Genesis and the Iliad to Nabokov and Camus, and the literatures represented include English, Irish, American, Russian, German, Scandinavian, French, Italian, Spanish, Argentine, Latin, Hebrew, and Greek. The literatures of the Far East have been omitted, on the ground that the principal aim of a course in world literature is to bring American students into living contact with their own Western tradition, and that this aim cannot be adequately realized in a single course if they must also be introduced to a very different tradition, one requiring extended treatment to be correctly understood. (We refer those who wish to incorporate Eastern literatures into their courses to a companion anthology, Masterpieces of the Orient, edited by G. L. Anderson.) Twentieth-century literature has been represented with particular fullness, because we feel that it is important for students to grasp the continuity of literature.

World Masterpieces is predominantly an anthology of imaginative literature. We have not tried to cover the entire history of the West in print, and have avoided filling our pages with philosophy, political theory, theology, historiography, and the like. This principle was adopted not because we disapprove of coming at the history of an epoch by way of literature, but because imaginative literature, in our view, itself best defines the character of its epoch: great monuments of art, we would be inclined to say, furnish the best documents for history. They lead us deeper into the meaning of a past age than other modes of writing do, because they convey its unformulated aspirations and intuitions as well as its conscious theorems and ideals; and yet, being timeless, they have also an unmatched appeal to our own age. For this reason, we have admitted into World Masterpieces only works which have something important to say to modern readers, and we have made it a point to interpret them with reference not only to their time but to ours. Teacher and student will find here a number of selections which they have not encountered before in a text of this kind.

We are convinced that effective understanding of any author depends upon studying an autonomous and substantial piece of his work: a whole drama, a whole story, at least a whole canto or book of a long poem. Our anthology therefore contains no snippets. Where it has been necessary to represent a long work by extracts, they are large extracts, forming a coherent whole. These considerations have also affected our treatment of lyric poems. Experience leads us to the conclusion that lyric poetry cannot be taught with full success in translation, and that very short poems, in whatever language, are nearly useless in a survey of these dimensions. We have accordingly excluded almost all short lyrics, and, with rare exceptions, all lyric poetry in foreign languages. We have preferred to represent the romantic movement, in which the lyric becomes a dominant form, with selections in English from the major English and American poets. This is not a flawless solution to the problem, but it seems to us better than printing many pages of inferior translations.

Since nothing has so deterred students from enjoying the great masterpieces of the classical and modern foreign languages as translations in an English idiom that is no longer alive, we have done our best to use translations which show a feeling for the English language as it is written and spoken today. Thus we offer here, with some pride, Robert Fitzgerald's Iliad and Odyssey; Louis MacNeice's Agamemnon and his Faust; Rex Warner's Medea and Hippolytus; Allen Mandelbaum's Aeneid; Mark Musa's Inferno (with selections from Purgatorio and Paradiso in Lawrence Binyon's translation); Samuel Putnam's Don Quixote; and many other renderings of equal quality.

Our introductions—in consonance with the scheme of the book —emphasize criticism rather than history. While providing all that seems to us necessary in the way of historical background (and supplying biographical summaries in the appendix following each introduction), we aim to give the student primarily a critical and analytical discussion of the works themselves. We try to suggest what these works have to say to us today, and why they should be valued now. In every instance, we seek to go beneath the usual generalizations about periods and philosophies, and to focus on men and books.

Our annotations of the texts are, we believe, exceptionally full and helpful. In a number of cases, these texts are annotated in this anthology for the first time. In one instance, we have been able to supply for a work the best-known notes on it in English, those of C. H. Grandgent to the Divine Comedy. Every care has been taken to furnish accurate and generous bibliographies as a guide to further reading.

In sum, we have sought to compile a new anthology, a text new in every sense—new in its emphasis on imaginative literature, on major authors, on wholes and large excerpts, on modern translations, on critical rather than historical treatment of texts, and, pervasively, on the tastes and values of our own time.

The Editors

The Norton Anthology of World Masterpieces

FOURTH EDITION

VOLUME 1

The Norton Anthology of World Masterpieces

FOURTH EDITION

VOLUME I

Masterpieces of the Ancient World

EDITED BY

BERNARD M. W. KNOX

Director of the Center for Hellenic Studies

This section represents, not the ancient world as a whole, but the most significant area and period of ancient man's development. The area is the Mediterranean basin, and the period the twelve hundred years from, roughly, 800 B.C. to A.D. 400. In this place and time ancient man laid the intellectual and religious foundations of the modern Western outlook.

The literature of the ancient world, which, whether or not we are acquainted with it, is still the background of our institutions, attitudes, and thought, was written in three languages —Hebrew, Greek, and Latin. The peoples who spoke these languages created their civilizations independently in place and time, but the development of the Mediterranean area into one economic and political unit brought these civilizations into contact with each other and produced a fusion of their typical attitudes which is the basis of all subsequent Western thought. This process of independent development, interaction, and final fusion is represented in the arrangement of this section: In the last part of it the three separate lines converge, and they finally meet in the figure of St. Augustine, who had the intellectual honesty and curiosity of the Greek at his best, the social seriousness and sense of order of the Roman, and the Hebrew's feeling of man's inadequacy and God's omnipotent justice.

PALESTINE

The territory of the Hebrews was of no particular strategic importance, and their record is not that of an imperial people. In their period of independence, from their beginnings as a pastoral tribe to their high point as a kingdom with a splendid capital in Jerusalem, they accomplished little of note in the political or military spheres; their later history was a bitter and unsuccessful struggle for freedom against a series of foreign masters—Babylonian, Greek, and Roman. They left no painting or sculpture behind them, no drama, no epic poetry. What they did leave is a religious literature, probably written down between the eighth and second centuries B.C., which is informed by an attitude different from that of all the peoples surrounding them, a conception of divine power and of the government of the universe so simple that to us, who have inherited it from them, it seems obvious, yet in its time so revolutionary that it made them a nation apart, sometimes laughed at, sometimes feared, but always alien.

THE CREATION—THE FALL

The typical attitudes of the Hebrews appear in the story which they told of the creation of the world and of man. This creation is the work of one God, who is omnipotent and omniscient, and who creates a perfect and harmonious order. The disorder which we see all around us, physical and moral, is not God's creation but Adam's; it is the consequence of man's disobedience. The story not only reconciles the undeniable existence of evil and disorder in the world with the conception of God's infinite justice, it also attributes to man himself an independence of God, free will, which in this case he has used for evil. The Hebrew God is not limited in His power by other deities, who oppose His will (as in the Greek stories of Zeus and his undisciplined family); His power over inanimate nature is infinite; in all the range of His creation there is only one being able to resist Him—man.

Since God is all-powerful, even this resistance on Adam's part is in some mysterious way a manifestation of God's will; how this can be is not explained by the story, and we are left with the mystery that still eludes us, the coexistence of God's prescient power and man's unrestricted free will.

The story of the Fall of Man ends with a situation in which Adam has earned for himself and his descendants a short life of sorrow relieved only by death. It was the achievement of later Hebrew teachers to carry the story on and develop a concept of a God who is as merciful as He is just, who watches tenderly over the destinies of the creatures who have rebelled against Him, and brings about the possibility of atonement and full reconciliation.

Adam's son Cain is the first man to shed human blood, but though God drives him out to be a wanderer on the face of the earth, He does not kill him, and the brand on Cain's forehead, while it marks him as a murderer, also protects his life—no man is to touch him. Later when the descendants of Adam grow so wicked that God is sorry He has created the human race, He decides to destroy it by sending a universal flood. But He spares one man, Noah, with his family, to beget a new human race, on which God pins His hopes. His rainbow in the sky reminds men of His promise that He will never again let loose the waters. But men do not learn their lesson: they start to build a tower high enough to reach to Heaven, and God is afraid that if they succeed they will then recognize no limit to their ambitions. Yet He does not destroy them; He merely frustrates their purpose by depriving them of their common language.

And yet Man must eventually atone for Adam's act; human guilt must be wiped out by sacrifice. The development of this idea was extended over centuries of thought and suffering; it reached its highest expression in the figure of Christ, the Son of God, who as a man pays the full measure due in human suffering and human death. Before this event, the idea of the one who suffers for all was a major theme in Hebrew literature; not only did there emerge slowly a concept of the Hebrews as a chosen nation which suffers for the rest, but individual figures of Hebrew history and imagination embodied this theme in the form of the story of the suffering servant whose suffering brings relief to his fellow men and ultimate glory to himself. This is the idea behind the story of Joseph.

JOSEPH

Joseph, his father's favorite son, has a sense of his own great destiny, confirmed by his dreams, which represent him as the first of all his race. He is indeed to be the first, but to become so he must also be the last. He is sold into slavery by his brothers; the savior is rejected by those whom he is to save, as the Hebrews were rejected by their neighbors and as they rejected their own prophets.

With the loss of his liberty, Joseph's trials have only begun. In Egypt after making a new and successful life for himself, he is thrown into prison on a false accusation. He interprets the dream of Pharaoh's butler, who promises, if his interpretation is correct, to secure his release; the butler is restored to freedom and royal favor, but, as is the way of the world, forgets his promise and leaves his comforter in jail. Joseph stays in prison two more years but finally obtains his freedom and becomes Pharaoh's most trusted adviser. When his brothers come from starving Palestine and bow down before him asking for help, he saves them; not only does he give them grain but he also provides a home for his people in Egypt. "I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt," he says to them when he reveals his identity. "God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance."

One of the essential points of this story, and the whole conception of the suffering servant, is the distinction which it emphasizes between an external, secular standard of good and a spiritual, religious standard. In the eyes of the average man, prosperity and righteousness are connected, if not identified; he tends to think of the sufferer as one whose misfortune must be explained as a punishment for his wickedness. This feeling is strong in ancient (especially in Greek) literature, but modern man should not be unduly complacent about his superiority to the ancients in this respect, for the attitude is still with us. It is in fact a basic assumption of the competitive society—the view, seldom expressed but strongly rooted, that the plight of the unfortunate is the result of their own laziness, the wealth of the rich the reward of superior virtue.

The writer of the Joseph story sees in the unfortunate sufferer the savior who is the instrument of God's will; it is because of what he suffers that the sun and the moon and the eleven stars will bow down to Joseph. Yet the story does not emphasize the sufferings of Joseph; he is pictured rather as the man of action who through native ability and divine protection turns the injuries done him into advantages. We are not made to feel the torment in his soul; when he weeps it is because of the memory of what he has suffered and his yearning for his youngest brother, and he is in full control of the situation. And his reward in the things of this world is great. Not only does he reveal himself as the savior of his nation, but he becomes rich and powerful beyond his brothers' dreams, and in a greater kingdom. The spiritual and secular standards are at the end of the story combined; Joseph's suffering is neatly balanced by his worldly reward.

JOB

Later Hebrew writers developed a sadder and profounder view. The greatest literary masterpiece of the Old Testament, the Book of Job, is also concerned with the inadequacy of worldly standards of happiness and righteousness, but the suffering of Job is so overwhelming and so magnificently expressed, that even with our knowledge of its purpose and its meaning it seems excessive. Joseph suffered slavery, exile, and imprisonment, but turned them all to account; Job loses his family and wealth in a series of calamities, which strike one on the other like hammer blows, and is then plagued with a loathsome disease. Unlike Joseph, he is old; he cannot adapt himself and rise above adverse circumstances, and he no longer wishes to live. Except for one thing. He wishes to understand the reason for his suffering.

For his friends the explanation is simple. With the blindness of men who know no standards other than those of this world, they are sure that Job's misfortune must be the result of some wickedness on his part. But Job is confident in his righteousness; his torture is as much mental as physical; he cannot reconcile the fact of his innocence with the calamities that have come upon him with all the decisive suddenness of the hand of God.

The full explanation is never given to him, but it is given to the reader in the two opening chapters of the book. This prologue to the dramatic section of the work gives us the knowledge which is hidden from the participants in the ensuing dialogue; the writer uses the method characteristic of Greek tragedy—irony, the deeper understanding of the dramatic spoken word which is based on the superior knowledge of the audience. The prologue explains God's motive in allowing Job to suffer. It is an important one: God intends to use Job as a demonstration to His skeptical subordinate, Satan, of the fact that a human being can retain faith in God's justice in the face of the greatest imaginable suffering. This motive, which Job does not know and which is never revealed to him, gives to the dialogue between Job and his friends its suspense and its importance; God has rested His case, that humanity is capable of keeping faith in divine justice, against all appearances to the contrary, on this one man.

The arguments of Job's friends are based on the worldly equation, success = virtue. They attempt to undermine Job's faith, not in God, but in himself. ". . . who ever perished, being innocent?" asks Eliphaz, "or where were the righteous cut off?" Job's misfortune is a proof that he must have sinned; all he has to do is to admit his guilt and ask God for pardon, which he will surely receive. He refuses to accept this easy way out, and we know that he is right. In fact, we know from the prologue that he has been selected for misfortune not because he has sinned, but precisely because of his outstanding virtue. "There is none like him in the earth," God says, "a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil." What Job must do is to persevere not only in his faith in God's justice but also in the conviction of his own innocence. He must believe the illogical, accept a paradox. His friends are offering him an easy way out, one which seems to be the way of humility and submission. But it is a false way. And God finally tells them so. "The Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath."

Job's confidence in his own righteousness is not pride, but intellectual honesty. He sees that the problem is much harder than his friends imagine; to let them persuade him of his own guilt would lighten his mental burden by answering the question which tortures him, but his intelligence will not let him yield. Like Oedipus, he refuses to stop short of the truth; he even uses the same words: "let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will." He finally expresses his understanding and acceptance of the paradox involved in the combination of his suffering with his innocence, but he does so with a human independence and dignity. "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him." He sums up his case with a detailed account of the righteousness of his ways, and it is clear that this account is addressed not only to his three friends but also to God. "My desire is, that the Almighty would answer me," he says. His friends are silenced by the majesty and firmness of his statement, they "ceased to answer Job, because he was righteous in his own eyes," but God is moved to reply.

The magnificent poetry of that reply, the voice out of the whirlwind, still does not give Job the full explanation, God's motive in putting him to the torture. It is a triumphant proclamation of God's power and also of His justice, and it silences Job, who accepts it as a sufficient answer. That God does not reveal the key to the riddle even to the man who has victoriously stood the test and vindicated His faith in humanity is perhaps the most significant point in the poem. It suggests that there is not and never will be an explanation of human suffering that man's intelligence can comprehend. The sufferer must, like Job, cling to his faith in himself and in God; he must accept the inexplicable fact that his own undeserved suffering is the working of God's justice.

ECCLESIASTES

But there were some whose questions about the justice of God were not satisfied by a voice from the whirlwind. In the book known as Ecclesiastes (which claims it is the work of King Solomon but almost certainly comes from a much later time) the impermanence of all things human, the certainty of death, and the prevalence of injustice on earth produce in the writer a mood which at first sight seems a philosophy of despair: life is short, rewards transient—best to enjoy each moment for what it offers, enjoy one's work for the doing of it, without thought of results. But the book is informed throughout by a profoundly religious spirit; the moral that man "should make his soul enjoy good in his labour" is "from the hand of God" and the somberly magnificent evocation of old age and death, with which the book concludes, opens with the words: "Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth . . ."

THE PROPHETS

In the last days of Israel's independence, before conquerors overran the land and transported the population to captivity in the East (an exile mourned in Psalm 137—"By the rivers of Babylon . . ."), a series of prophets reproved the children of Israel for their transgressions and foretold the wrath to come, the end of the kingdom of Israel, and, beyond that, the overthrow of the neighboring kingdoms. The prophet was a man who believed himself to be the spokesman of God, the messenger of a terrifying vision. The horror of the vision of destruction was often too heavy a load for the human mind, and the disbelief and mockery of his hearers tipped the precarious balance so that what might have been merely a strange urgency came often close to madness. The vision of things to come was expressed in magnificent but disconnected images which to the workaday mind of the man in the street seemed only to confirm the suspicion that the prophet was deranged. Amos, Nahum, Jeremiah, and many another poured out their charged and clotted imagery of catastrophe to an unbelieving people.

But the story of Jonah shows us a prophet who was believed. When they heard his message, the people and ruler of Nineveh repented of their sins and made amends to God. They were spared, but Jonah objected and God had to rebuke him; God was more forgiving to sinners than the human prophet to his fellow man.

The prophets were not always messengers of doom; it is in the words of an unnamed prophet (whose writings are included in the Book of Isaiah) that the theme of the one who suffers for others finds its most profound and moving expression. In the earlier versions the sufferer has it all made up to him in the end: Job, like Joseph, has his reward. Job's suffering is greater than Joseph's and it is clear that the writer of the Book of Job shows, alike in the speeches and in the ironic framework of the whole, a profounder understanding of the nature and meaning of suffering than the narrator of the story of Joseph, but like Joseph, Job lives to see the end of his troubles and has his material reward. "The Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. . . . After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations."

But in the Song of the Suffering Servant there is no recompense in this life: the suffering ends in death. In this deeper vision there is no reconciliation between the standards of this world and the standards of the higher authority behind the suffering. The one who is to save Israel and the world is not well favored like Joseph: "he hath no form nor comeliness." Nor is he, like Job, "the greatest of all the men of the east"; he is "despised and rejected of men." He suffers for his fellow men: "the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all." His suffering knows no limit but death; he is oppressed and afflicted, imprisoned and executed. "He was cut off out of the land of the living" and "he made his grave with the wicked."

The circumstances described here are familiar from other cultures than the Hebrew; they are found in the primitive ritual of many peoples, and ceremonial relics of them still existed in civilized fifth-century Athens. In certain primitive societies, to rid the group of guilt a scapegoat was chosen, who was declared responsible for the misdeeds of all, and who was then mocked, beaten, driven out of the community, and killed. The scapegoat was hated and despised as the embodiment of the guilt of the whole community; his death was the most ignominious imaginable. The memory of some such primitive ritual is unmistakable in the Hebrew song; but its meaning has been utterly changed. It is precisely in the figure of the hated and suffering scapegoat that the Hebrew prophet sees the savior of mankind—an innocent sufferer, "he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth"—and he sees this without visible confirmation; there is no recognition by the brothers, no vindication by a voice out of the whirlwind. It is the highest expression of the Hebrew vision at its saddest and most profound. this portrayal of the savior who comes not in pomp and power but in suffering and meekness, who dies rejected and despised, and who atones for human sin and makes "intercession for the transgressors." It implies the complete rejection of all worldly standards, a rejection which is to be made explicit later in the words of Christ, the embodiment of the suffering servant: "No man can serve two masters . . . God and Mammon."

GREECE

HOMER

Greek literature begins with two masterpieces, the Iliad and the Odyssey, which cannot be accurately dated (the conjectural dates range over three centuries), and which are attributed to a poet, Homer, about whom nothing is known except his name. They were probably fixed in something like their present form before the art of writing was in general use in Greece; it is certain that they were intended not for reading but for oral recitation. The earliest stages of their composition date from long before the beginnings of literacy in Greece (the late eighth century B.C.): the poems bear unmistakable traces of oral composition. The oral poet had at his disposal not reading and writing, but a vast and intricate system of metrical formulas—phrases which would fit in at different places in the line—and a repertoire of standard scenes (the arming of the warrior, the battle of two champions) as well as the known outline of the story. Of course he could and did invent new phrases and scenes as he recited—but his base was the immense poetic reserve created by many generations of singers before him. When he told again for his hearers the old story of Akhilleus and his wrath, he was recreating a traditional story which had been recited, with differences, additions, and improvements, by a long line of predecessors: the poem was not, in the modern sense, his creation, still less an expression of his personality. Consequently there is no trace of his identity to be found in it: the poet remains as hidden behind the action and speech of his characters as if he were a dramatist.

The poems as we have them, however, are unlike most of the oral literature we know from other times and places. The poetic organization of each of the two epics, the subtle interrelationship of the parts which creates their structural and emotional unity, suggests that they owe their present form to the shaping hand of a single poet, the architect who selected from the enormous wealth of the oral tradition and fused what he took with original material to create the two magnificently ordered poems known as the Iliad and the Odyssey.

Of these two the Iliad is perhaps the earlier; it is generally agreed that it is the greater poem. Its subject is war; its characters are men in battle and women whose fate depends on the outcome. The war is fought by the Akhaians* against the Trojans for the recovery of Helen, the wife of the Akhaian chieftain Menelaos; the combatants are heroes who in their chariots engage in individual duels before the supporting lines of infantry and archers. This romantic war aim and the outmoded military technique suggest to the modern reader a comparison with chivalrous engagements between medieval knights

* Like the translator, we transliterate the original Greek names—Akhaians, Menelaos, Akhilleus, and so on; in discussing Virgil's Aeneid we use the more familiar Latin forms—Achaeans, Menelaus, Achilles.

—a vision of individual prowess in combat which the nostalgia of our mechanized age contrasts sentimentally with the mass slaughter of modern war. But there is no sentimentality in Homer's description of battle. "Patroclus went up to him and drove a spear into his right jaw; he thus hooked him by the teeth and the spear pulled him over the rim of his car. As one who sits at the end of some jutting rock and draws a strong fish out of the sea with a hook and line —even so with his spear did he pull Thestor all gaping from his chariot; he threw him down on his face and he died while falling." This is meticulously accurate; there is no attempt to suppress the ugliness of Thestor's death. The bare, careful description creates the true nightmare quality of battle, in which men perform monstrous actions with the same matter-of-fact efficiency they display in their normal occupations; and the simile reproduces the grotesque appearance of violent death—the simple spear thrust takes away Thestor's dignity as a human being even before it takes his life. He is gaping, like a fish on the hook.

The simile does something else too. The comparison of Patroklos to an angler emphasizes another aspect of battle, its excitement. Homer's lines here combine two contrary emotions, the human revulsion from the horror of violent death and the human attraction to the excitement of violent action. This passage is typical of the poem as a whole. Everywhere in it we are conscious of these two poles, of war's ugly brutality and its "terrible beauty." The poet accepts violence as a basic factor in human life, and accepts it without sentimentality; for it is equally sentimental to pretend that war is not ugly and to pretend that it does not have its beauty. Three thousand years have not changed the human condition in this respect; we are still both lovers and victims of the will to violence, and as long as we are, Homer will be read as its greatest interpreter.

The Iliad describes the events of a few weeks in the ten-year siege of Troy. The particular subject of the poem, as its first line announces, is the anger of Akhilleus, the bravest of the Akhaian chieftains encamped outside the city. Akhilleus is a man who lives by and for violence, who is creative and alive only in violent action. He knows that he will be killed if he stays before Troy, but rather than decay, as he would decay, in peace, he accepts that certainty. His inadequacy for peace is shown by the fact that even in war the violence of his temper makes him a man apart and alone. His anger cuts him off from his commander and his fellow princes; to spite them he withdraws from the fighting, the only context in which his life has any meaning. He is brought back into it at last by the death of his one real friend, Patroklos; the consequences of his wrath and withdrawal fall heavily on the Akhaians, but most heavily on himself.

The great champion of the Trojans, Hektor, fights bravely, but reluctantly; war, for him, is a necessary evil, and he thinks nostalgically of the peaceful past, though he has little hope of peace to come. His pre-eminence in peace is emphasized by the tenderness of his relations with his wife and child and also by his kindness to Helen, the cause of the war which he knows in his heart will bring his city to destruction. We see Hektor always against the background of the patterns of civilized life—the rich city with its temples and palaces, the continuity of the family. Akhilleus' background is the discord of the armed camp on the shore, his loneliness, and his certainty of early death. The duel between these two men is the inevitable crisis of the poem, and just as inevitable is Hektor's defeat and death. For against Akhilleus in his native element of violence nothing can stand.

At the climactic moment of Hektor's death, as everywhere in the poem, Homer's firm control of his material preserves the balance in which our contrary emotions are held; pity for Hektor does not entirely rob us of sympathy for Akhilleus. His brutal words to the dying Hektor and the insults he inflicts on his corpse are the mark of the savage, but we are never allowed to forget that this inflexible hatred is the expression of his love for Patroklos. And the final book of the poem shows us an Akhilleus whose iron heart is moved at last; he is touched by the sight of Hektor's father clasping in suppliance the terrible hands that have killed so many of his sons. He remembers that he has a father, and that he will never see him again; Akhilleus and Priam, the slayer and the father of the slain, weep together:

> Then both were overborne as they remembered:
> the old King huddled at Akhilleus' feet
> wept, and wept for Hektor, killer of men,
> while great Akhilleus wept for his own father > as for Patroklos once again: and sobbing > filled the room.

Akhilleus gives Hektor's body to Priam for honorable burial. His anger has run its full course and been appeased; it has brought death, first to the Akhaians and then to the Trojans, to Patroklos and to Hektor, and so to Akhilleus himself, for his death is fated to come "soon after Hektor's." The violence to which he is dedicated will finally destroy him too.

This tragic action is the center of the poem, but it is surrounded by scenes which remind us that the organized destruction of war, though an integral part of human life, is only a part of it. Except for Akhilleus, whose worship of violence falters only in the final moment of pity for his enemy's father and his own, the yearning for peace and its creative possibilities is never far below the surface. This is most poignantly expressed by the scenes which take place in Troy, especially the farewell between Hektor and Andromakhe; but it is made clear that the Akhaians too are conscious of what they have sacrificed. Early in the poem, when Agamemnon, the Akhaian commander, tests the morale of his troops by suggesting that the war be abandoned, they rush for the ships so eagerly and with such heartfelt relief that their commanders are hard put to it to stop them. These two poles of the human condition, war and peace, with their corresponding aspects of human nature, the destructive and the creative, are implicit in every situation and statement of the poem, and they are put before us, in symbolic form, on the shield which the god Hephaistos makes for Akhilleus. Its emblem is an image of human life as a whole. Here are two cities, one at peace and one at war. In one a marriage is celebrated and a quarrel settled by process of law; the other is besieged by a hostile army and fights for its existence. Scenes of violence—peaceful shepherds slaughtered in an ambush, Death dragging away a corpse by its foot—are balanced by scenes of plowing, harvesting, work in the vineyard and on the pasture, a green on which youths and maidens dance. And around the outermost rim of the shield runs "the might of the Ocean stream," a river which is at once the frontier of the known and the imagined world and the barrier between the quick and the dead. The shield of Akhilleus is the total background for the tragic violence of the central figures; it provides a frame which gives the wrath of Akhilleus and the death of Hektor their just proportion and true significance.

THE ODYSSEY

The other Homeric epic, the Odyssey, is concerned with the peace which followed the war, and in particular with the return of the heroes who survived. Its subject is the long drawn out return of one of the heroes, Odysseus of Ithaka, who had come farther than most (all the way from western Greece) and who was destined to spend ten years wandering in unknown seas before he returned to his rocky kingdom. When Odysseus' wanderings began, Akhilleus had already received, at the hands of Apollo, the death which he had chosen, and which was the only appropriate end for his fatal and magnificent violence. Odysseus chose life, and his outstanding quality is a probing and versatile intelligence, which, combined with long experience, keeps him safe and alive through the trials and dangers of twenty years of war and seafaring. To stay alive he has to do things that Akhilleus would never have done, and use an ingenuity and experience that Akhilleus did not possess; but his life is just as much a struggle. Troy has fallen, but "there is no discharge in the war." The way back is as perilous as the ten-year siege.

The opening lines of the poem state the theme:

Sing in me, Muse, and through me tell the story of that man skilled in all ways of contending the wanderer, harried for years on end, after he plundered the stronghold on the proud height of Troy.
He saw the townlands and learned the minds of many distant men, and weathered many bitter nights and days in his deep heart at sea, while he fought only to save his life. . . .

In this world it is a struggle even to stay alive, and it is a struggle for which Odysseus is naturally endowed. But his objective is not life at any price. Where honor demands, he can be soberly courageous in the face of death (as on Kirke's island, where he goes alone and against his mate's advice to save his sailors), and he can even be led into foolhardiness by his insatiable curiosity (as in the expedition to see the island of the Kyklopes). Much as he clings to life, it must be life with honor; what he is trying to preserve is not just existence but a world-wide reputation. His name has become a byword for successful courage and intelligence, and he must not betray it. When he reveals his identity at the palace of the Phaiakians, he speaks of his fame in an objective manner, as if it were something apart from himself.

I am Laertes' son, Odysseus.
Men hold me
formidable for guile in peace and war:
this fame has gone abroad to the sky's rim.

This is not boasting, but a calm recognition of the qualities and achievements for which he stands, and to which he must be true.

Ironically enough, to be true to his reputation, he is often forced to conceal his name. In the Kyklopes' cave, he calls himself "Nobody," in order to assure his escape, and it is clear how hard he finds this denial of his reputation when, out of the cave and on board ship, he insists on telling Polyphemos his name. Not only does this reassertion of his identity bring himself, his ship, and his crew back within reach of Polyphemos' arm, but it also enables the blinded giant to call down on his enemy the wrath of his father Poseidon, who, from this point on, musters the full might of the sea against Odysseus' return. Warned by the consequences of this boastful revelation of his name, he conceals his identity even from the hospitable Phaiakians, until his emotional reaction to the singer's tale of Troy gives him away. And when he finally returns home, to a palace full of violent suitors for his wife's hand who think that he is dead and who have presumed so far that they will kill him if they now find out that he is alive, he has to become Nobody again; he disguises himself as an old dirty beggar, to flatter and fawn on his enemies for bread in his own house.

The trials of the voyage home are not just physical obstacles to his return, they are also temptations. Odysseus is tempted, time after time, to forget his identity, to secede from the life of struggle and constant vigilance for which his name stands. The lotus flower which makes a man forget home and family is the most obvious form of temptation; it occurs early in the voyage and is easily resisted. But he is offered more attractive bait. Kirke gives him a life of ease and self-indulgence on an enchanted island; his resistance has by this time been lowered, and he stays a full year before his sailors remonstrate with him and remind him of his home. At the Phaiakian palace where he tells the story of his voyages, he is offered the love of a young princess, Nausikaa, and her hand in marriage by her father Alkinoös —a new life in a richer kingdom than his rocky Ithaka. The Sirens tempt him to live in the memory of the glorious past. "Come here, famous Odysseus," they sing, "great glory of the Akhaians, and hear our song. . . . For we know all that at broad Troy the Argives and the Trojans suffered by the will of the gods." If he had not been bound to the mast, he would have gone to hear and join the dead men whose bones rot on the Sirens' island. Kalypso, the goddess with whom he spent seven years, longing all the time to escape, offers him the greatest temptation of all, immortality. If he will stay as her husband, he will live forever, a life of ease and tranquility, like that of the gods. Odysseus refuses this too; he prefers the human condition, with all its struggle, its disappointments, and its inevitable end. And the end, death, is an ever-present temptation. It is always near him; at the slightest slackening of effort, the smallest failure of intelligence, the first weakness of will, death will bring him release from his trials. But he hangs on tenaciously, and, toward the end of his ordeals, he is sent living to the world of the dead to see for himself what death means. It is dark and comfortless; Homer's land of the dead is the most frightening picture of the afterlife in European literature. Odysseus talks to the dead and any illusion he had about death as repose is shattered when he talks to the shade of Akhilleus and hears him reply.

> Let me hear no smooth talk > of death from you, Odysseus, light > of councils.
> Better, I say, to break sod as a farm > hand > for some poor country man, on iron > rations, > than lord it over all the exhausted > dead.

When he hears these words Odysseus does not yet understand their full significance (that he, the living man, will taste the depths of degradation, not as a serf, but as a despised beggar, mocked and manhandled in his own palace), but he is prepared now to face everything that may be necessary, to push on without another look behind.

In this scene Homer brings his two great prototypes face to face, and poses the tragic fury of Akhilleus against the mature intelligence of Odyssues. There can be little doubt where his sympathy lies. Against the dark background of Akhilleus' regret for life lost the figure of Odysseus shines more warmly: a man dedicated to life, accepting its limitations and making full use of its possibilities, a man who is destined to endure to the end and be saved. He finds in the end the home and the peace he fought for, his wife faithful, a son worthy of his name ready to succeed him, and the knowledge that the death which must come at last will be gentle.

> Then a seaborne death > soft as this hand of mist will come > upon you

when you are wearied out with rich old age,
your country folk in blessed peace around you.

THE HOMERIC GODS

The Homeric poems played in the subsequent development of Greek civilization the same role that the Old Testament writings had played in Palestine: they became the basis of an education and therefore of a whole culture. Not only did the great characters of the epic serve as models of conduct for later generations of Greeks, but the figures of the Olympian gods retained, in the prayers, poems, and sculpture of the succeeding centuries, the shapes and attributes set down by Homer. The difference between the Greek and the Hebrew hero, between Akhilleus and Joseph, for example, is remarkable, but the difference between "the God of Abraham and of Isaac" and the Olympians who interfere capriciously in the lives of Hektor and Akhilleus is an unbridgeable chasm. The two conceptions of the power which governs the universe are irreconcilable; and in fact the struggle between them ended, not in synthesis, but in the complete victory of the one and the disappearance of the other. The Greek conception of the nature of the gods and of their relation to man is so alien to us that it is difficult for the modern reader to take it seriously. The Hebrew basis of European Christianity has made it almost impossible for us to imagine a god who can be feared and laughed at, blamed and admired, and still sincerely worshiped. Yet all these are proper attitudes toward the gods on Olympus; they are all implicit in Homer's poem.

The Hebrew conception of God is clearly an expression of an emphasis on those aspects of the universe which imply a harmonious order. The elements of disorder in the universe are, in the story of Creation, blamed on man, and in all Hebrew literature the evidences of disorder are something the writer tries to reconcile with an a priori assumption of an all-powerful, just God; he never tampers with the fundamental datum. Just as clearly, the Greeks conceived their gods as an expression of the disorder of the world in which they lived; the Olympian gods, like the natural forces of sea and sky, follow their own will even to the extreme of conflict with each other, and always with a sublime disregard for the human beings who may be affected by the results of their actions. It is true that they are all subjects of a single more powerful god, Zeus, but his authority over them is based only on superior strength; though he cannot be openly resisted, he can be temporarily deceived (as he is, in comic circumstances, in the fourteenth book of the Iliad). And Zeus, although in virtue of his superior power his will is finally accomplished in the matter of Akhilleus' wrath, knows limits to his power too; he cannot save the life of his son, the Lycian hero Sarpedon. Behind Zeus stands the mysterious power of Fate, to which even he must bow.

Such gods as these, representing as they do the blind forces of the universe which man cannot control, are not thought of as connected with morality. Morality is a human creation, and though the gods may approve of it, they are not bound by it. And violent as they are, they cannot feel the ultimate consequence of violence; death is a human fear, just as the courage to face it is a human quality. There is a double standard, one for gods, one for men, and the inevitable consequence is that our real admiration and sympathy is directed not toward the gods but toward the men. With Hektor, and even with Akhilleus at his worst, we can sympathize; but the gods, though they may excite terror or laughter, can never have our sympathy; we could as easily sympathize with the blizzard or the force of gravity. Homer imposed on Greek literature the anthropocentric emphasis which is its distinguishing mark and its great contribution to the Western mind; though the gods are ever-present characters in the incidents of his poem, his true concern, first and last, is with men.

THE CITY-STATES OF GREECE

The stories told in the Homeric poems are set in the age of the Trojan War, which archaeologists (those, that is, who believe that it happened at all) date to the twelfth century B.C. Though the poems do perhaps preserve some blurred and faded memory of that time (the Mycenaean period, as it has been known since archaeologists uncovered the golden treasures in the royal tombs at Mycenae) there is no doubt that the poems as we have them are the creation of later centuries, the ninth to the seventh, the so-called Dark Age which succeeded the collapse (or destruction) of Mycenaean civilization. This was the time of the final settlement of the Greek peoples, an age of invasion and migration, which saw the foundation and growth of many small independent cities. The geography of the Greek peninsula and its scattered islands encouraged this fragmentation: the Greek cities never lost sight of their common Hellenic heritage but it was not enough to unite them except in the face of unmistakable and overwhelming danger, and even then only partially and for a short time. They differed from each other in custom, political constitution, and even dialect: their relations with each other were those of rivals and fierce competitors.

In these cities, constantly at war with each other in the pursuit of more productive land for growing populations, the kings of Homeric society gave way to aristocratic oligarchies, which maintained a strangle hold on the land and the economy of which it was the base. An important safety valve was colonization; in the eighth and seventh centuries B.C. landless men founded new cities (always near the sea and generally owing little or no allegiance to the home base) all over the Mediterranean coasts—in Spain, southern France (Marseilles, Nice, and Antibes were all Greek cities), in South Italy (Naples), Sicily (Syracuse), North Africa (Cyrene), all along the coast of Asia Minor (Smyrna, Miletus), and even on the Black Sea as far as Russian Crimea.

Many of these new outposts of Greek civilization experienced a faster economic and cultural development than the older cities of the mainland. It was in the cities founded on the Asian coast that the Greeks adapted to their own language the Phoenician system of writing (adding signs for the vowels to create the first efficient alphabet); its first use was probably for commercial records and transactions, but as literacy became a general condition all over the Greek world in the course of the seventh century B.C. treaties and political decrees were inscribed on stone and literary works written on rolls of paper made from the Egyptian papyrus plant.

ATHENS AND SPARTA

By the beginning of the fifth century B.C. the two most prominent city-states were Athens and Sparta; these two cities led the combined Greek resistance to the Persian invasion of Europe in the years 490 to 479 B.C. The defeat of the solid Persian power by the divided and insignificant Greek cities surprised the world and inspired in Greece, and particularly in Athens, a confidence that knew no bounds.

Athens was at this time a democracy, the first in Western history. It was a direct, not a representative, democracy, for the number of free citizens was small enough to permit the exercise of power by a meeting of the citizens as a body in assembly. Athens' power lay in the fleet with which she had played her decisive part in the struggle against Persia, and with this fleet she rapidly became the leader of a naval alliance which included most of the islands of the Aegean Sea and many Greek cities on the coast of Asia Minor. Sparta, on the other hand, was a totalitarian state, rigidly conservative in government and policy, in which the individual citizen was reared and trained by the state for the state's business, war. The Spartan land army was consequently superior to any other in Greece, and the Spartans controlled, by direct rule or by alliance, the majority of the city-states of the Peloponnese.

These two cities, allies for the war of liberation against Persia, became enemies when the external danger was eliminated. The middle years of the fifth century were disturbed by indecisive hostilities between them and haunted by the probability of full-scale war to come; as the years went by this war came to be accepted as "inevitable" by both sides, and in 431 B.C. it began. It was to end in 404 B.C. with the total defeat of Athens.

Before the beginning of this disastrous war, Athenian democracy provided its citizens with a cultural and political environment which was without precedent in the ancient world. The institutions of Athens encouraged the maximum development of the individual's capacities and at the same time inspired the maximum devotion to the interests of the community. It was a moment in history of delicate and precarious balance between the freedom of the individual and the demands of the state. Its uniqueness was emphasized by the complete lack of balance in Sparta, where the necessities of the state annihilated the individual as a creative and independent being. It was the proud boast of the Athenians that without sacrificing the cultural amenities of civilized life they could yet when called upon surpass in policy and war their adversary, whose citizen body was an army in constant training. The Athenians were, in this respect as in others, a nation of amateurs. "The individual Athenian," said Pericles in the speech which is at once the panegyric of Athenian democracy and its epitaph, "in his own person seems to have the power of adapting himself to the most varied forms of action with the utmost versatility and grace." But the freedom of the individual did not, in Athens' great days, produce anarchy. "While we are . . . unconstrained in our private intercourse," Pericles had observed earlier in his speech, "a spirit of reverence pervades our public acts."

This balance of individual freedom and communal unity was not destined to outlast the century. It went down, with Athens, in the war. The process of disintegration, and the forces behind it, are described and analyzed in the tragic pages of the Athenian historian of the Peloponnesian War, Thucydides. With an apparent dispassionateness which increases the somber effect of his writing, he shows how his countrymen, under the mounting pressure of the long conflict, lost the "spirit of reverence" which Pericles saw as the stabilizing factor in Athenian democracy. They subordinated all considerations to the immediate interest of the city and surpassed their enemy in the logical ferocity of their actions; they finally fell victims to leaders who carried the process one step further and subordinated all considerations to their own private interest. The most brilliant and dangerous of these new statesmen, Alcibiades, carried his personal freedom to the point of betraying his own city in her critical hour. His career is symptomatic of the decay of the freedom in unity described in Pericles' speech; by the end of the fifth century Athens was divided internally as well as defeated externally. The individual citizen no longer thought of himself and Athens as one and the same; the balance was gone forever.

While it lasted, it provided an atmosphere for the artist which has rarely, if ever, existed since. The dramatic poet, whose play was performed, in competition against two other dramatists for a prize, at a religious festival attended by most of the free citizens, addressed an audience of quick-thinking and keenly critical minds which were yet culturally and politically homogeneous; he spoke to the whole city, at a city festival, and in the city's name. Shakespeare had to please the groundlings as well as the court wits, but the Athenian dramatist speaks with the same emphasis and in the same tone to the entire audience.

THE DRAMA

European drama begins in Athens in the fifth century B.C. Its origins are shrouded in obscurity into which the researches of many scholars, especially those who have drawn on comparative anthropology, have brought a certain amount of light, though what has been illuminated is the general nature of the development rather than any particular aspects of it. What no one has explained (and it is perhaps inexplicable) is why the religious dances which are to be found in practically all primitive cultures, gave rise in Greece, and in Greece alone, to what we know as tragedy and comedy.

TRAGEDY—AESCHYLUS

Tragedy developed from the dance and song of a chorus performing on a circular dancing floor. An actor, whose medium was speech, not song, and who performed outside the circle, was introduced by some unknown innovator (his name was probably Thespis), and as the number of actors was increased to two and then to three, the spoken part of the performance grew in importance. In the Agamemnon of Aeschylus, produced in 458 B.C., an equilibrium between the two elements of the performance has been established; the actors, with their speeches, create the dramatic situation and its movement, the plot; the chorus, while contributing to dramatic suspense and illusion, ranges free of the immediate situation in its odes, which extend and amplify the significance of the action.

The Agamemnon is the first play of a trilogy; that is, it was followed at its performance by two more plays, the Choephoroe and the Eumenides, which carried on its story and its theme to a conclusion. The theme of the trilogy is justice; and its story, like that of almost all Greek tragedies, is a legend which was already well-known to the audience which saw the first performance of the play. This particular legend, the story of the house of Atreus, was rich in dramatic potential, for it deals with a series of retributive murders which stained the hands of three generations of a royal family, and it has also a larger, a social and historical significance, of which Aeschylus took full advantage. The legend preserves the memory of an important historical process through which the Greeks had passed, the transition from tribal institutions of justice to communal justice, from a tradition which demanded that a murdered man's next of kin avenge his death, to a system requiring settlement of the private quarrel by the court of law, the typical institution of the city-state which replaced the primitive tribe. When Agamemnon returns victorious from Troy, he is killed by his wife, Clytemnestra, and her lover, Aegisthus, who is Agamemnon's cousin. Clytemnestra kills her husband to avenge her daughter Iphigenia, whom Agamemnon sacrificed to the goddess Artemis when he had to choose between his daughter's life and his ambition to conquer Troy. Aegisthus avenges the crime of a previous generation, the hideous murder of his brothers by Agamemnon's father, Atreus. The killing of Agamemnon is, by the standards of the old system, justice; but it is the nature of this justice that the process can never be arrested, that one act of violence must give rise to another. Agamemnon's murder must be avenged too, as it is in the second play of the trilogy by Orestes, his son, who kills both Aegisthus and his own mother, Clytemnestra. Orestes has acted justly according to the code of tribal society based on blood relationship, but in doing so he has violated the most sacred blood relationship of all, the bond between mother and son. The old system of justice has produced an insoluble dilemma; it can be surmounted only by the institution of a new system, and this is accomplished in the final play of the trilogy, in which a court of law is set up by the goddess Athene to try the case of Orestes. He is acquitted, but more important than the decision is the nature of the body which makes it. This is the end of an old era and the beginning of a new. The existence of the court is a guarantee that the tragic series of events which drove Orestes to the murder of his mother will never be repeated. The system of communal justice, which allows consideration of circumstance and motive, and which punishes impersonally, has at last replaced the inconclusive anarchy of individual revenge.

But the play is concerned with much more than the history of human institutions, with more even than the general problem of violence between man and man for which the particular instances of the trilogy stand. It is also a religious statement. The whole sequence of events, stretching over many generations, is presented as the working out of the will of Zeus. The tragic action of the Iliad was also the expression of the will of Zeus (though it is characteristic of Homer that Achilles was at least equally responsible), but for Aeschylus the will of Zeus means something new. In this trilogy the working out of Zeus's will proceeds intricately through three generations of bloodshed to the creation of a human institution which will prevent any repetition of the cycle of murder that produced it. Agamemnon dies, and Clytemnestra dies in her turn, and Orestes is hounded over land and sea to his trial, but out of all this suffering comes an important advance in human understanding and civilization. The chorus of the Agamemnon, celebrating the power of Zeus, tells how he

> . . . setting us on the road
> Made this a valid law—
> "That men must learn by suffering."

From the suffering comes wisdom, whereas in the Iliad nothing at all comes out of the suffering, except the certainty of more. ". . . far from the land of my fathers," says Achilles to Priam. "I sit here in Troy, and bring nothing but sorrow to you and your children"; but his last words to Priam are a reminder that this interval of sympathy is only temporary. After Hector's burial the war will go on as before. This is Zeus's will; Homer does not attempt to explain it. But the Aeschylean trilogy is nothing less than an attempt to justify the ways of God to man; the suffering is shown to us as the fulfillment of a purpose we can understand, a purpose beneficent to man.

The full scope of Zeus's will is apparent only to the audience, which follows the pattern of its execution through the three plays of the trilogy; as in the Book of Job, the characters who act and suffer are in the dark. They claim a knowledge of Zeus's will and boast that their actions are its fulfillment (it is in these terms that Agamemnon speaks of the sack of Troy, and Clytemnestra of Agamemnon's murder), and they are, of course, in one sense, right. But their knowledge is limited; Agamemnon does not realize that Zeus's will includes his death at the hands of Clytemnestra, nor Clytemnestra that it demands her death at the hands of her son. The chorus has, at times, a deeper understanding; in its opening ode it announces the law of Zeus, that men must learn by suffering, and at the end it recognizes the responsibility of Zeus in the death of Agamemnon—"Brought by Zeus, by Zeus, / Cause and worker of all." But the chorus cannot interpret the event in any way it can accept, for it can see no further than the immediate present; its knowledge of Zeus's law is an abstraction which it cannot relate to the terrible fact.

In this murky atmosphere (made all the more terrible by the beacon fire of the opening lines, which brings not light, but deeper darkness), one human being sees clear; she possesses the concrete vision of the future which complements the chorus' abstract knowledge of the law. This is the prophet Cassandra, Priam's daughter, brought from Troy as Agamemnon's share of the spoils. She has been given the power of true prophecy by the god Apollo, but the gift is nullified by the condition that her prophecies will never be believed. Like the Hebrew prophets, she sees reality—past, present, and future—so clearly that she is cut off from ordinary human beings by the clarity of her vision and the terrible burden of her knowledge; like them she expresses herself in poetic figures, and like them she is rejected by her hearers. To the everyday world, represented by the chorus, she appears to be mad, the fate of prophets in all ages; and it is only as she goes into the palace to the death she foresees that the old men of the chorus begin to accept, fearfully and hesitantly, the truth which she has been telling them.

The great scene in which she mouths her hysterical prophecies at them delays the action for which everything has been prepared—the death of Agamemnon. Before we hear his famous cry off stage, Cassandra presents us with a mysterious vision in which she combines cause, effect, and result: the murders which have led to this terrible moment, the death of Agamemnon (which will not take place until she leaves the stage), and the murders which will follow. We do not see Agamemnon's death—we see much more. The past, present, and future of Clytemnestra's action and Agamemnon's suffering are fused into a timeless unity in Cassandra's great lines, an unearthly unity which is dissolved only when Agamemnon, in the real world of time and space, screams in mortal agony.

The tremendous statement of the trilogy is made in a style which for magnificence and richness of suggestion can be compared only with the style of Shakespeare at the height of his poetic power, the Shakespeare of King Lear and Antony and Cleopatra. The language of the Agamemnon is an oriental carpet of imagery in which combinations of metaphor, which at first seem bombastic in their violence, take their place in the ordered pattern of the poem as a whole. An image, once introduced, recurs, and reappears again, to run its course verbally and visually through the whole length of the trilogy, richer in meaning with each fresh appearance. In the second choral ode, for example, the chorus, welcoming the news of Agamemnon's victory at Troy, sings of the net which Zeus and Night threw over the city, trapping the inhabitants like animals. The net is here an image of Zeus's justice, a retributive justice, since Troy is paying for the crime of taking Helen, and the image identifies Zeus's justice with Agamemnon's action in sacking the city. This image occurs again, with a different emphasis, in the hypocritical speech of welcome which Clytemnestra makes to her husband on his return. She tells how she feared for his safety at Troy, how she trembled at the rumors of his death:

> ... If Agamemnon
> Had had so many wounds as those reported ...
> Then he would be gashed fuller than a net has holes!

This vision of Agamemnon dead she speaks of as her fear, but we know that it represents her deepest desire, and more, the purpose which she is now preparing to execute. When, later, she stands in triumph over her husband's corpse, she uses the same image to describe the robe which she threw over his limbs to blind and baffle him before she stabbed him—"Inextricable like a net for fishes/I cast about him a vicious wealth of raiment" —and this time the image materializes into an object visible on stage. We can see the net, the gashed robe still folded round Agamemnon's body. We shall see it again, for in the second play Orestes, standing over his mother's body as she now stands over his father's, will display the robe before us, with its holes and bloodstains, as a justification for what he has just done. Elsewhere in the Agamemnon the chorus compares Cassandra to a wild animal caught in the net, and later Aegisthus exults to see Agamemnon's body lying "in the nets of Justice." For each speaker the image has a different meaning, but not one realizes the terrible sense in which it applies to them all. They are all caught in the net, the system of justice by vengeance which only binds tighter the more its captives struggle to free themselves. Clytemnestra attempts to escape, to arrest the process of the chain of murders and the working out of the will of Zeus. "I am ready to make a contract/With the Evil Genius of the House of Atreus," she says, but Agamemnon's body and the net she threw over him are there on the stage to remind us that her appeal will not be heard; one more generation must act and suffer before the net will vanish, never to be seen again.

THE INTELLECTUAL REVOLUTION OF THE FIFTH CENTURY

Aeschylus belonged to the generation which fought at Marathon; his manhood and his old age were passed in the heroic period of the Persian defeat on Greek soil and the war which Athens fought to liberate her kinsmen in the islands of the Aegean and on the Asiatic coast. Sophocles, his younger contemporary, lived to see an Athens which had advanced in power and prosperity far beyond the city that Aeschylus knew, but it was an Athens in which it became clearer every year that something had gone wrong. The league of free Greek cities against Persia which Athens had led to victory in the Aegean had become an empire, in which Athens taxed and coerced the subject cities that had once been her allies; and inside the city a new and dangerous spirit was abroad. Democratic institutions had created a demand for an education which would prepare men for public life, especially by training them in the art of public speaking. The demand was met by the appearance of the professional teacher, the Sophist, as he was called, who taught, for a handsome fee, not only the techniques of public speaking but also the subjects which gave a man something to talk about —government, ethics, literary criticism, even astronomy. The curriculum of the Sophists, in fact, marks the first appearance in European civilization of the liberal education, just as they themselves were the first professors.

The Sophists were great teachers, but like most teachers they had little or no control over the results of their teaching. Their methods placed an inevitable emphasis on effective presentation of a point of view, to the detriment, and if necessary the exclusion, of anything which might make it less convincing. They produced a generation which had been trained to see both sides of any question and to argue the weaker side as effectively as the stronger, the false as effectively as the true; to argue inferentially from probability in the absence of concrete evidence; to appeal to the audience's sense of its own advantage rather than to accepted moral standards; and to justify individual defiance of general prejudice and even of law by the distinction between "nature" and "convention." These methods dominated the thinking of the Athenians of the last half of the century. The emphasis on the technique of effective presentation of both sides of any case encouraged a relativistic point of view and finally produced a cynical mood which denied the existence of any absolute standards. The canon of probability (which implies an appeal to human reason as the supreme authority) became a critical weapon for an attack on myth and on traditional conceptions of the gods; it had its constructive aspect too, for it is the basis of Thucydides' magnificent guesswork about early Greek history. The appeal to the self-interest of the audience, to expediency, became the method of new political leaders and the fundamental doctrine of a new school of political theory; this theory and its practice, stripped to their terrifying essentials, are set down as an example to future ages in Thucydides' account of the negotiations between Athens and Melos. The distinction between "nature" and "convention" is the source of the doctrine of the superman, who breaks free of the conventional restraints of society and acts according to the law of his own "nature," as Alcibiades did when he betrayed his country in the Peloponnesian War. The new spirit in Athens has magnificent achievements to its credit, but it brought disaster. At its roots was a supreme confidence in the human intelligence and a secular view of man's position in the universe that is best expressed in the statement of Protagoras, the most famous of the Sophists: "Man is the measure of all things."

TRAGEDY—SOPHOCLES

It was in this atmosphere of critical re-evaluation of accepted standards that Sophocles produced his masterpiece, Oedipus Tyrannus, probably performed for the first time in the opening years of the Peloponnesian War, which began in 431 B.C. This tragedy of a man of high principles and probing intelligence who follows the prompting of that intelligence to the final consequence of true self-knowledge, which makes him put out his eyes, was as full of significance for Sophocles' contemporaries as it is for us. Unlike a modern dramatist, Sophocles used for his tragedy a story well known to the audience and as old as their own history, a legend told by father to son, handed down from generation to generation because of its implicit wealth of meaning, learned in childhood and rooted deep in the consciousness of every member of the community. Such a story the Greeks called a myth, and the use of it presented Sophocles, as it did Aeschylus in his trilogy, with material which, apart from its great inherent dramatic potential, already possessed the significance and authority which the modern dramatist must create for himself. It had the authority of history, for the history of ages which leave no records is myth —that is to say, the significant event of the past, stripped of irrelevancies and imaginatively shaped by the oral tradition. It had a religious authority, for the Oedipus story, like the story of the house of Atreus, is concerned with the relation between man and god. Lastly, and this is especially true of the Oedipus myth, it had the power, because of its subject matter, to arouse the irrational hopes and fears which lie deep and secret in the human consciousness.

The use of the familiar myth enabled the dramatist to draw on all its wealth of unformulated meaning, but it did not prevent him from striking a contemporary note. Oedipus, in Sophocles' play, is at one and the same time the mysterious figure of the past who broke the most fundamental human taboos and a typical fifth-century Athenian. His character contains all the virtues for which the Athenians were famous and the vices for which they were notorious. The best commentary on Oedipus' character is the speech which Thucydides put into the mouth of the Corinthian spokesman at Sparta, a hostile but admiring assessment of the Athenian genius. "Athenians . . . [are] equally quick in the conception and in the execution of every new plan . . ."—so Oedipus has already sent to Delphi when the priest advises him to do so, and has already sent for Tiresias when the chorus suggests this course of action. "They are bold beyond their strength; they run risks which prudence would condemn . . ."—as Oedipus risked his life to answer the riddle of the Sphinx and later, in spite of the oracle about his marriage, accepted the hand of the queen. ". . . in the midst of misfortune they are full of hope. . . ."—so Oedipus, when he is told that he is not the son of Polybus and Merope, and Jocasta has already realized whose son he is, claims that he is the "child of Fortune." "When they do not carry out an intention which they have formed, they seem to have sustained a personal bereavement . . ."—so Oedipus, shamed by Jocasta and the chorus into sparing Creon's life, yields sullenly and petulantly.

The Athenian devotion to the city, which received the main emphasis in Pericles' praise of Athens, is strong in Oedipus; his answer to the priest at the beginning of the play shows that he is a conscientious and patriotic ruler. His sudden unreasoning rage is the characteristic fault of Athenian democracy, which in 406 B.C., to give only one instance, condemned and executed the generals who had failed, in the stress of weather and battle, to pick up the drowned bodies of their own men killed in the naval engagement at Arginusae. Oedipus is like the fifth-century Athenian most of all in his confidence in the human intelligence, especially his own. This confidence takes him in the play through the whole cycle of the critical, rationalist movement of the century, from the piety and orthodoxy he displays in the opening scene, through his taunts at oracles when he hears that Polybus is dead, to the despairing courage with which he accepts the consequences when he sees the abyss opening at his feet. "Ah master, do I have to speak?" asks the herdsman from whom he is dragging the truth. "You have to," Oedipus replies. "And I have to hear." And hear he does. He learns that the oracle he had first fought against and then laughed at has been fulfilled; that every step his intelligence prompted was one step nearer to disaster; that his knowledge was ignorance, his clear vision blindness. Faced with the reality which his determined probing finally reveals, he puts out his eyes.

The relation of Oedipus' character to the development of the action is the basis of the most famous attempt to define the nature of the tragic process, Aristotle's theory that pity and terror are aroused most effectively by the spectacle of a man who is "not eminently good and just, yet whose misfortune is brought about not by vice or depravity, but by some error or frailty. He must be one who is highly renowned and prosperous —a personage like Oedipus. . . ." Other references by Aristotle to this play make it clear that this influential critical canon is based particularly on Sophocles' masterpiece, and the canon has been universally applied to the play. But the great influence (and validity) of the Aristotelian theory should not be allowed to obscure the fact that Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus is more highly organized and economical than Aristotle implies. The fact that the critics have differed about the nature of Oedipus' error or frailty (his errors are many and his frailties include anger, impiety and self-confidence) is a clue to the real situation. Oedipus falls not through "some vicious mole of nature" or some "particular fault," but because he is the man he is, because of all aspects of his character, good and bad alike; and the development of the action right through to the catastrophe shows us every aspect of his character at work in the process of self-revelation and self-destruction. His first decision in the play, to hear Creon's message from Delphi in public rather than, as Creon suggests, in private, is evidence of his kingly solicitude for his people and his trust in them, but it makes certain the full publication of the truth. His impetuous proclamation of a curse on the murderer of Laius, an unnecessary step prompted by his civic zeal, makes his final situation worse than it need have been. His anger at Tiresias forces a revelation which drives him on to accuse Creon; this in turn provokes Jocasta's revelations. And throughout the play his confidence in the efficacy of his own action, his hopefulness as the situation darkens, and his passion for discovering the truth, guide the steps of the investigation which is to reveal the detective as the criminal. All aspects of his character, good and bad alike, are equally involved; it is no frailty or error that leads him to the terrible truth, but his total personality.

The character of Oedipus as revealed in the play does something more than explain the present action, it also explains his past. In Oedipus' speeches and actions on stage we can see the man who, given the circumstances in which Oedipus was involved, would inevitably do just what Oedipus has done. Each action on stage shows us the mood in which he committed some action in the past; his angry death sentence on Creon reveals the man who killed Laius because of an insult on the highway; his impulsive proclamation of total excommunication for the unknown murderer shows us the man who, without forethought, accepted the hand of Jocasta; his intelligent, persistent search for the truth shows us the brain and the courage which solved the riddle of the Sphinx. The revelation of his character in the play is at once a re-creation of his past and an interpretation of the oracle which predicted his future.

This organization of the material is what makes it possible for us to accept the story as tragedy at all, for it emphasizes Oedipus' independence of the oracle. When we first see Oedipus, he has already committed the actions for which he is to suffer, actions prophesied, before his birth, by Apollo. But the dramatist's emphasis on Oedipus' character suggests that although Apollo has predicted what Oedipus will do, he does not determine it; Oedipus determines his own conduct, by being the man he is. Milton's explanation of a similar situation, Adam's fall and God's foreknowledge of it, may be applied to Oedipus; foreknowledge had no influence on his fault. The relationship between Apollo's prophecy and Oedipus' actions is not that of cause and effect. It is the relationship of two independent entities which are equated.

This correspondence between his character and his fate removes the obstacle to our full acceptance of the play which an external fate governing his action would set up. Nevertheless, we feel that he suffers more than he deserves. He has served as an example of the inadequacy of the human intellect and a warning that there is a power in the universe which humanity cannot control, nor even fully understand, but Oedipus the man still has our sympathy. Sophocles felt this too, and in a later play, his last, the Oedipus at Colonus, he dealt with the reward which finally balanced Oedipus' suffering. In Oedipus Tyrannus itself there is a foreshadowing of this final development; the last scene shows us a man already beginning to recover from the shock of the catastrophe and reasserting a natural superiority. "I shall go—on this condition," he says to Creon when ordered back into the house, and a few lines later Creon has to say bluntly to him, "Do not presume that you are still in power." This renewed imperiousness is the first expression of a feeling on his part that he is not entirely guilty, a beginning of the reconstitution of the magnificent man of the opening scenes; it reaches its fulfillment in the final Oedipus play, the Oedipus at Colonus, in which he is a titanic figure, confident of his innocence and more masterful than he has ever been.

ANTIGONE

Oedipus was expelled from Thebes, to wander as a blind beggar, accompanied only by his daughter Antigone. His sons, Eteocles and Polynices, raised no hand to help him and after he died at Athens (where, in death, he became a guardian spirit of the Attic soil), they fought each other for the throne of Thebes. Eteocles expelled his brother, who recruited supporters in Argos; seven champions attacked the seven gates of Thebes. The assault was beaten off; but Polynices and Eteocles killed each other in the battle. The rule of Thebes fell to Creon, the same Creon we have seen in Oedipus Tyrannus. His first decision is to forbid burial to the corpse of Polynices, the traitor who brought foreign troops against his own city. Antigone disobeys the decree by scattering dust on the body; captured and brought before Creon, she defies him in the name of the eternal unwritten laws. In the struggle between them it is the king who in the end surrenders; he buries the body of Polynices and orders Antigone's release. But she has already killed herself in her underground prison, thus bringing about the two deaths which crush her enemy, the suicides of his son Haemon and of his wife Eurydice.

Antigone, as a heroine of the resistance to tyrannical power, has deservedly become one of the Western world's great symbolic figures; she is clearly presented, in her famous speech, as a champion of a higher morality against the overriding claims of state necessity, which the Sophist intellectuals of Sophocles' time had begun to formulate in philosophical terms. But Creon, too, is given his due; he is no mere melodramatic tyrant but a ruler whose action stems from political and religious attitudes which were probably shared by many of the audience. Antigone and Creon clash not only as individuals, shaped with all Sophocles' dramatic genius (the ancient anonymous biography of Sophocles says truly that he could "match the moment with the action so as to create a whole character out of half a line or even a single word"), but also as representatives of two irreconcilable social and religious positions.

Antigone's chief loyalty is clearly to the family. She makes no distinction between the brothers though one was a patriot and the other a traitor, and when her sister Ismene refuses to help her defy the state to bury a brother she harshly disowns her. The denial of burial to Polynices strikes directly at her family loyalty, for it was the immemorial privilege and duty of the women of the house to mourn the dead man in unrestrained sorrow, sing his praises, wash his body, and consign him to the earth. Creon, on the other hand, sees loyalty to the state as the only valid criterion, and in his opening speech expressly repudiates "one whose friend has stronger claims upon him than his country" (the Greek word translated "friend" also means "relative"). This inaugural address of Creon repeats many concepts and even phrases that are to be found in the speeches of the democratic leader Pericles; and in fact, there was an ancient antagonism between the new democratic institutions which stressed the equal rights and obligations of all citizens and the old powerful families which through their wide influence had acted as separate factions in the body politic. The nature of Creon's assertion of state against family, refusal of burial to a corpse, is repellent, but the principle behind it was one most Athenians would have accepted as valid.

These opposing social viewpoints have their corresponding religious sanctions. For Antigone, the gods, especially the gods below, demand equality for all the dead, the common inalienable right of burial. But Creon's gods are the gods who protect the city; how, he asks, could those gods have any feeling for Polynices, a traitor who raised and led a foreign army against the city they protect and which contains their temples? Here again, there must have been many in the audience who saw merit in this argument.

But as the action develops, whatever validity Creon's initial position may have had is destroyed, and by Creon himself.

For like all holders of absolute power, he proceeds, when challenged, to equate loyalty to the community with loyalty to himself—"the city is the King's" he tells his son Haemon. And in the end the prophet Tiresias tells him plainly that Antigone was right—the gods are on her side. He swallows his pride and surrenders, but too late. Antigone's suicide brings him to disaster in that institution, the family, which he subordinated to reasons of state; his son spits in his face before killing himself, and his wife dies cursing him as the murderer of his son.

Creon is punished, but Antigone is dead. "Wisdom we learn at last, when we are old" the chorus sings as the play ends, but the price of wisdom is high: the Antigone, like so many of the Shakespearean tragedies, leaves us with a poignant sense of loss.

TRAGEDY—EURIPIDES

Euripides' Medea, produced in 431 B.C., the year that brought the beginning of the Peloponnesian War, appeared earlier than the Oedipus Tyrannus of Sophocles, but it has a bitterness that is more in keeping with the spirit of a later age. If the Oedipus is, in one sense, a warning to a generation which has embarked on an intellectual revolution, the Medea is the ironic expression of the disillusion that comes after the shipwreck. In this play we are conscious for the first time of an attitude characteristic of modern literature, the artist's feeling of separation from his audience, the isolation of the poet. "Often previously," says Medea to the king,

> Through being considered clever
> I have suffered much....
> If you put new ideas before the eyes of fools
> They'll think you foolish and worthless into the bargain;
> And if you are thought superior to those who have
> Some reputation for learning, you will become hated.

The common background of audience and poet is disappearing, the old certainties are being undermined, the city divided. Euripides is the first Greek poet to suffer the fate of so many of the great modern writers: rejected by most of his contemporaries, he became universally loved and admired after his death.

The change in atmosphere is clear even in Euripides' choice of subject and central character. He still dramatizes myth, but the myth he chooses is exotic and disturbing, and the protagonist is not a man but a woman. Medea is both woman and foreigner; that is to say, in terms of the audience's prejudice and practice she is a representative of the two free-born groups in Athenian society which had almost no rights at all (though the male foreign resident had more rights than the native woman). The tragic hero is no longer a king, "one who is highly renowned and prosperous—a personage like Oedipus," but a woman, who, because she finds no redress for her wrongs in society, is driven by her passion to violate that society's most sacred laws in a rebellion against its typical representative, Jason, her husband. She is not just a woman and a foreigner; she is also a person of great intellectual power. Compared to her the credulous king and her complacent husband are children, and once her mind is made up, she moves them like pawns to their proper places in her barbaric game. The myth is used for new purposes, to shock the members of the audience, attack their deepest prejudices, and shake them out of their complacent pride in the superiority of Greek masculinity.

But the play is more than a feminist melodrama. Before it is over, our sympathies have come full circle; the contempt with which we regard the Jason of the opening scenes turns to pity as we feel the measure of his loss and the ferocity of Medea's revenge. Medea's passion has carried her too far; the death of Creon and his daughter we might have accepted, but the murder of the children is too much. It was, of course, meant to be. Euripides' theme, like Homer's, is violence, but this is the unspeakable violence of the oppressed, which is greater than the violence of the oppressor and which, because it has been long pent up, cannot be controlled.

In this, as in the other plays, the gods have their place. In the Agamemnon the will of Zeus is manifested in every action and implied in every word; in the Oedipus Tyrannus the gods bide their time and watch Oedipus fulfill the truth of their prophecy, but in the Medea, the divine will, which is revealed at the end, is enigmatic and, far from bringing harmony, concludes the play with a terrifying discord. All through the Medea the human beings involved call on the gods; two especially are singled out for attention, Earth and Sun. It is by these two gods that Medea makes Aegeus swear to give her refuge in Athens, the chorus invokes them to prevent Medea's violence against her sons, and Jason wonders how Medea can look upon earth and sun after she has killed her own children. These emphatic appeals clearly raise the question of the attitude of the gods, and the answer to the question is a shock. We are not told what Earth does, but Sun sends the magic chariot on which Medea makes her escape. His reason, too, is stated; it is not any concern for justice, but the fact that Medea is his granddaughter. Euripides is here using the letter of the myth for his own purposes. This jarring detail emphasizes the significance of the whole. The play creates a world in which there is no relation whatsoever between the powers which rule the universe and the fundamental laws of human morality. It dramatizes disorder, not just the disorder of the family of Jason and Medea, but the disorder of the universe as a whole. It is the nightmare in which the dream of the fifth century was to end, the senseless fury and degradation of permanent violence. "Flow backward to your sources, sacred rivers," the chorus sings, "And let the world's great order be reversed."

HIPPOLYTUS

Three years after the Medea, in 428 B.C., Euripides staged the Hippolytus; this was one of the rare occasions on which he was awarded the first prize. Like the Medea (and unlike Agamem- non, Antigone, and Oedipus) the play deals with a private, domestic situation: the action and suffering of the characters does not affect the fate of a city. As in Medea, the driving force of the plot is love turned to hatred, but this time it is a guilty love, the passion a wife has conceived for her stepson. But no single character (like Medea) dominates the stage from beginning to end. The Hippolytus presents the tangled skein of relationships between four principal characters.

In another version of the play staged some years before, Euripides had included a scene in which Phaedra attempted to seduce Hippolytus and was rejected. In the present version the two never meet face to face, and the proposition is made by a go-between, Phaedra's old nurse. The scenes which lead up to this fatal step are masterly in their delineation of human psychology. We are shown how Phaedra's resolve to save her honor and to die in silence is broken down by her nurse's persistence, ending in her distracted, vaguely worded acquiescence in the nurse's thinly disguised intention to approach Hippolytus directly, an action which seals the fate of both principals. Phaedra, in telling of her struggles to overcome her passion, sums up her dilemma (and it is not hers alone) in a dispairing confession of human weakness: "We understand and recognize what things are good / but do not do them. . . ."

Hippolytus' furious, disgusted reaction to the nurse's proposal springs from a deep religious feeling, for his sexual abstinence is motivated by his devotion to the virgin huntress, the goddess Artemis. But his denunciation of women in general goes beyond what the circumstances call for; there is a pathological note in this violent diatribe. For Phaedra who overhears it there is now no recourse but suicide. To protect her honor, however, she must now silence Hippolytus. Her letter to Theseus, which accuses his son of an attempt on her virtue, will effectively counter any accusation he may make, and will also result in his punishment, to which Phaedra, her love now turned to hate, looks forward exultantly.

Hippolytus had been sworn to silence by the nurse before she revealed the secret of Phaedra's love; now, exposed defenseless to his father's anger, he respects his oath—he is, as he says, a man of religious reverence. His only defense is his reputation, but for Theseus the corpse of his wife and her letter accusing Hippolytus are proof enough, and he calls for the sea-god Poseidon to destroy his son.

This is a domestic tragedy, a dark tale of inbred passion and its bloody outcome, but it has also a larger dimension, not political but theological. On the stage throughout, at the door of the stage building which represents the palace of Theseus, stand the statutes of two goddesses, the two who open and close the play. Aphrodite, the divine personification and essence of sexual passion, speaks the prologue; what follows, Phaedra's delirium, her weakening and final numb acquiescence in the nurse's initiative, is the working of Aphrodite in her. And Hippolytus, his body shattered and his life almost at an end, is visited at the play's end by Artemis, Aphrodite's polar opposite, to whom he has dedicated his life. She comes to tell Theseus the truth and clear Hippolytus' honor, but she can bring no comfort to these broken men, father and son, who learn from Artemis that they are the victims, as Phaedra is too, of Aphrodite's terrible revenge. The only consolation Artemis can offer Hippolytus is the announcement that he will be the focus of an Athenian religious cult. Abandoned by the goddess he has served—"Easily now you leave our long companionship"—Hippolytus with his dying breath absolves his father of responsibility, an act of forgiveness of which human beings are capable but the gods are not, a purely human gesture in an inhuman universe.

COMEDY

By the fifth century both tragedy and comedy were regularly produced at the winter festivals of the god Dionysus in Athens. Comedy, like tragedy, employed a chorus, that is to say, a group of dancers (who also sang) and actors, who wore masks; its tone was burlesque and parodic, though there was often a serious theme emphasized by the crude clowning and the free play of wit. The only comic poet of the fifth century whose work has survived is Aristophanes; in his thirteen extant comedies, produced over the years 425-388 B.C., the institutions and personalities of his time are caricatured and criticized in a brilliant combination of poetry and obscenity, of farce and wit, which has no parallel in European literature. It can be described only in terms of itself, by the adjective "Aristophanic."

LYSISTRATA

Lysistrata, which is outstanding among the Aristophanic comedies in its coherence of structure and underlying seriousness of theme, was first produced in 411 B.C. In 413 the news of the total destruction of the Athenian fleet in Sicily had reached Athens, and though heroic efforts to carry on the war were under way, the confidence in victory with which Athens had begun the war had gone forever. It is a recurring feature of Aristophanic comedy that the comic hero upsets the status quo, to produce a series of extraordinary results which are exploited to the full for their comic potential. In this play the Athenian women, who had no political rights, seize the Acropolis and leave the men without women. At the same time similar revolutions take place in all the Greek cities according to a coordinated plan. The men are eventually "starved" into submission and the Spartans come to Athens to end the war.

Aristophanes does not miss a trick in his exploitation of the possibilities for ribald humor inherent in this situation, a female sex-strike against war; Myrrhine's teasing game with her husband Cinesias, for example, is rare fooling and the final appearance of the uncomfortably rigid

Spartan ambassadors and their equally tense Athenian hosts is a visual and verbal climax of astonishing brilliance. But underneath all the fooling real issues are pursued, and they come to the surface with telling effect in the argument between Lysistrata and the magistrate who has been sent to suppress the revolt. Reversing the words of Hector to Andromache, which had become proverbial, Lysistrata claims that "War shall be the concern of Women!"—it is too important a matter to be left to men, for women are its real victims. And when asked what the women will do, she explains that they will treat politics just as they do wool in their household tasks: "when it's confused and snarled . . . draw out a thread here and a thread there . . . we'll unsnarl this war. . . ."

We do not know how the Athenians welcomed the play. All we know is that they were not impressed by its serious undertone; the war continued for seven more exhausting years, until Athens' last fleet was defeated, the city laid open to the enemy, the empire lost.

SOCRATES

In the last half of the fifth century the whole traditional basis of individual conduct was undermined, gradually at first by the critical approach of the Sophists and their pupils, and then rapidly, as the war accelerated the process of moral disintegration. "In peace and prosperity," says Thucydides, "both states and individuals are actuated by higher motives . . . but war, which takes away the comfortable provision of daily life, is a hard master, and tends to assimilate men's characters to their conditions." The war brought to Athens the rule of the new politicians, who reckoned only in terms of power, who carried out the massacre of Melos, and many of whom, like Alcibiades and Critias, betrayed their city for their own ends. Community and individual were no longer one, and the individual, cast on his own resources for guidance, found only conflicting attitudes which he could not refer to any absolute standards. The mood of postwar Athens oscillated between a fanatic, unthinking reassertion of traditional values and a weary cynicism which wanted only to be left alone. The only thing common to the two extremes was a distrust of intelligence.

In the disillusioned gloom of the years of defeat the Athenians began to feel more and more exasperation with a voice they had been listening to for many years, the voice of Socrates, a stonemason who for most of his adult life had made it his business to discuss with his fellow citizens the great issues of which the Athenians were now so weary—the nature of justice, of truth, of piety. Unlike the Sophists, he did not lecture nor did he charge a fee; his method was dialectic, the search for truth by a process of questions and answers, and his dedication to his mission had kept him poor. But the initial results of his discussions were often infuriatingly like the results of sophistic teaching. By questions and answers he succeeded in exposing the illogicality of his opponent's position, but Socrates did not often provide a substitute for the erroneous belief he had destroyed. Yet it is clear that he did believe in absolute standards, and what is more, he believed they could be discovered by a process of logical inquiry and supported by logical proof. His ethics rested on an intellectual basis. The resentment against him, which came to a head in 399 B.C., is partly explained by the fact that he satisfied neither extreme of the postwar mood. He questioned the old standards in order to establish new, and he refused to let the Athenians live in peace, for he preached that it was every man's duty to think his way through to the truth. In this last respect he was the prophet of the new age; for him the city and the accepted code were no substitute for the task of self-examination which each individual must set himself and carry through to a conclusion. The characteristic statement of the old Athens was public, in the assembly or the theater; Socrates proclaimed the right and duty of each individual to work out his own salvation and made clear his distrust of public life: "he who will fight for the right . . . must have a private station and not a public one."

Socrates himself wrote nothing; we know what we do about him mainly from the writings of his pupil Plato, a philosophical and literary genius of the first rank. It is very difficult to distinguish between what Socrates actually said and what Plato put into his mouth, but there is general agreement that the Apology, which Plato wrote as a representation of what Socrates said at his trial, is the clearest picture we have of the historical Socrates. He is on trial for impiety and "corrupting the youth." He deals with these charges, but he also takes the opportunity to present a defense and explanation of the mission to which his life has been devoted.

The Apology is a defiant speech; Socrates rides roughshod over legal forms and seems to neglect no opportunity of outraging his hearers. But this defiance is not stupidity (as he hints himself, he could, if he had wished, have made a speech to please the court), nor is it a deliberate courting of martyrdom. It is the only course possible for him in the circumstances if he is not to betray his life's work, for Socrates knows as well as his accusers that what the Athenians really want is to silence him without having to take his life. What Socrates is making clear is that there is no such easy way out; he will have no part of any compromise that would restrict his freedom of speech or undermine his moral position. The speech is a sample of what the Athenians will have to put up with if they allow him to live; he will continue to be the gadfly which stings the sluggish horse. He will go on persuading them not to be concerned for their persons or their property, but first and chiefly to care about the improvement of the soul. He has spent his life denying the validity of worldly standards, and he will not accept them now.

He was declared guilty, and condemned to death. While in prison awaiting execution, he was approached by a wealthy friend, Crito, who had made arrangements for his escape from Athens. In the dialogue Crito, Plato reconstructs the discussion between the two men. Socrates refused to escape, and the arguments put into his mouth in this dialogue show that although he rejected the political life and the unwavering adherence to one political system which it demanded, he still felt himself bound by the laws of the city. Unlike Alcibiades, the typical representative of the sophistic spirit, who betrayed his country when it had found him guilty of a crime, Socrates refused to disobey the laws even when they demanded his own death.

The sentence was duly carried out. And in Plato's account of the execution we can see the calmness and kindness of a man who has led a useful life and who is secure in his faith that, contrary to appearances, "no evil can happen to a good man, either in life or after death."

THE DIFFUSION OF GREEK CULTURE

The century that followed the death of Socrates saw the exhaustion of the Greek city-states in constant internecine warfare. Politically and economically bankrupt, they fell under the power of the semibarbarous kingdom of Macedon, in the north, whose king, Philip, combined a ferocious energy with a cynicism which enabled him to take full advantage of the corrupt governments of the city-states. Greek liberty ended at the battle of Chaeronea in 338 B.C., and Philip's son Alexander inherited a powerful army and the political control of all Greece. He led his Macedonian and Greek armies against Persia, and in a few brilliant campaigns became master of an empire which extended into Egypt in the south and to the borders of India in the east. He died at Babylon in 323 B.C., and his empire broke up into a number of independent kingdoms ruled by his generals; but the results of his fantastic achievements were more durable than might have been expected. Into the newly conquered territories came thousands of Greeks who wished to escape from the political futility and economic crisis of the homeland. Wherever they went they took with them their language, their culture, and their typical buildings, the gymnasium and the theater. At Alexandria in Egypt, for example, a Greek library was formed to preserve the texts of Greek literature for the scholars who edited them, a school of Greek poetry flourished, Greek mathematicians and geographers made new advances in science. The Middle East became, as far as the cities were concerned, a Greek-speaking area; and when, some two or three centuries later, the first accounts of Christ's life and teaching were written down, they were written in Greek, the language on which the cultural homogeneity of the whole area was based.

ROME

When Alexander died at Babylon in 323 B.C., the Italian city of Rome, situated on the Tiber in the western coastal plain, was engaged in a struggle for the control of central Italy. Less than a hundred years later (269 B.C.) Rome, in control of the whole Italian peninsula, was drawn into a hundred-year war against the Phoenician city of Carthage, on the West African coast, from which she emerged mistress of the western Mediterranean. At the end of the first century B.C., in spite of a series of civil wars fought with savage vindictiveness and on a continental scale, Rome was the capital of an empire which stretched from the Straits of Gibraltar to the frontiers of Palestine. This empire gave peace and orderly government to the Mediterranean area for the next two centuries, and for two centuries after that maintained a desperate but losing battle against the invading savage tribes moving in from the north and east. When it finally went down, it left behind it the ideal of the world-state, an ideal which was to be reconstituted as a reality by the medieval church, which ruled from the same center, Rome, and with a spiritual authority as great as the secular authority it replaced.

The achievements of the Romans, not only their conquests but also their success in consolidating the conquests and organizing the conquered, are best understood in the light of the Roman character. Unlike the Greek, the Roman was above all a practical man. He might have no aptitude for pure mathematics, but he could build an aqueduct to last two thousand years; he was not notable as a political theorist, but he organized a complicated yet stable federation which held Italy loyal to him in the presence of invading armies. He was conservative to the core; his strongest authority was mos maiorum, the custom of his predecessors; a monument of this conservatism, the great body of Roman law, is one of his greatest contributions to Western civilization. The quality he most admired was gravitas, seriousness of attitude and purpose, and his highest words of commendation were "manliness," "industry," "discipline." Pericles, in his funeral speech, praised the Athenian for his adaptability, versatility, and grace; this would have seemed strange praise to a Roman, whose idea of personal and civic virtue was different. "By her ancient custom and her men the Roman state stands," says Ennius the Roman poet, in a line which by its metrical heaviness emphasizes the stability implied in the key word "stands": moribus antiquis res stat Romana virisque.

LATIN LITERATURE— LUCRETIUS AND CICERO

Greek history begins, not with a king, a battle, or the founding of a city, but with an epic poem; the literary achievement preceded the political by many centuries. The Romans, on the other hand, had conquered half the world before they began to write. The stimulus to the creation of Latin literature was the Greek literature which the Romans discovered when, in the second century B.C., they assumed political responsibility for Greece and the Near East. Latin literature began with a translation of the Odyssey, made by a Greek prisoner of war, and with the exception of satire, until Latin literature became Christian, the model was always

Greek. The Latin writer (especially the poet) borrowed wholesale from his Greek original, not furtively, but openly and proudly, as a tribute to the master from whom he had learned. But this frank acknowledgment of indebtedness should not blind us to the fact that Latin literature is original, and sometimes profoundly so. Writing in the first century B.C., both Lucretius and Cicero, the one a poet and the other an orator and philosopher, followed Greek models in the works by which they are represented in this volume. Yet the results were not slavish imitations; each made what he borrowed peculiarly his own.

Lucretius' poem On the Nature of Things (De rerum natura) is a Latin presentation of the philosophical system of Epicurus, a Greek philosopher of the fourth century B.C. Epicurus had reacted to the hopelessness of his age, which saw the breakdown of the Greek city-states, by propounding a philosophy that described the universe as the result of blind combinations of atoms. With Epicurus the philosophy was not completely materialistic, for it allowed the existence of the gods, though it denied them any role in the government of the universe and asserted that they had no interest in human affairs. But in Lucretius' version, especially in his thoroughly materialistic account (in Book V) of the development of human civilization from primitive savagery, the gods play no part; far from creating man or his civilization, the gods are themselves created by humanity out of its dreams and ignorance.

The ethical precepts of Epicurus' philosophy are summed up in his famous admonition to pursue pleasure, which according to his definition, however, consisted in living a virtuous life. It is a philosophy which encourages a withdrawal from public life, and is in this respect a typical product of the political chaos of the fourth century. This is probably one of the reasons why it attracted Lucretius, for he too lived in an age of social conflict which every twenty years or so erupted in revolution and civil war. But it did not attract many Romans; their respect for action and their deep-rooted worship of duty were obstacles too great to be overcome even by Lucretius' great poetic power.

How great that power is can be seen in the conclusion of his third book, in which he draws the moral from his exposition of the atomic basis of phenomena, and proclaims that death is not to be feared. Death is merely not-being, a rearrangement of the atoms of which we are composed, the dead feel neither pleasure nor pain—so runs his argument, and if it were no more complicated than that it would be just a restatement, though admittedly a magnificent one, of an Epicurean commonplace. But as he develops the argument, we can detect beneath the authoritative calm of the teacher the cry of a man in an agony of doubt and fear. As we read Nature's speech to the coward who is afraid to die, we become increasingly aware that no one is more afraid of death than the poet himself. The vehemence and passion of these famous lines is the mark of a man trying to convince himself rather than his audience; the fears of the unenlightened, animal, part of the human being, which in the face of death will abandon everything except the will to live, are too vividly evoked to be stilled by Nature's argument. And the argument itself, that death is no more than the extinction of consciousness, is a frightening one, especially for an Epicurean, who narrows his ethical and intellectual concern to the restricted scope of his individual self, who "cultivates his garden," and who by his withdrawal from society rejects the corporate immortality of family, city, or race. Lucretius believes in the Epicurean system, but on this central point of the fear of death it brings him little comfort. The disturbance in the poet's own soul, expressed in the tension and violence of these great lines, has turned a philosophical sermon into great poetry.

Much more acceptable to the Roman temperament is the vision of a future life of happiness for those who have been outstanding in their service to the state which is the subject of Cicero's "Dream of Scipio." This is the final chapter of his great work On the Republic (De republica), the myth which concludes the philosophical discussion. The work as a whole is an imitation of Plato's Republic, which is also rounded off by a myth, the story told by Er, who returns from the dead and describes to the living the life of the souls, "the just going up the heavenly way to their reward, the unjust going down to the place of punishment." But Cicero's imitation is characteristically Roman. Instead of imagining, as Plato did, the ideal city, Cicero deals with the Roman republic, its birth, growth, and maturity, and his myth shows the same practical, social viewpoint that is the hallmark of Roman philosophy at its best. "But hold fast to this," says Scipio, Cicero's spokesman: "For all those who have guarded, aided, and increased the welfare of their fatherland there is a place reserved in heaven, where they shall dwell in happiness forever." Lucretius' desperate assertion that the individual must live for himself and accept the obliteration of his personality in death is counterpoised by a vision of an eternal heaven for those who devote themselves to the supreme duty, which, for the Roman, is the public duty.

LATIN LITERATURE—VIRGIL

When Cicero wrote "The Dream of Scipio" the republican form of government which was his larger subject still existed, but its days were numbered. The institutions of the city-state proved inadequate for world government. The civil conflict which had disrupted the republic for more than a hundred years ended finally in the establishment of a powerful executive. Although the Senate, which had been the controlling body of the republic, retained an impressive share of the power, the new arrangement developed inevitably toward autocracy, the rule of the executive, the emperor, as he was called once the system was stabilized. The first of the long line of Roman emperors who gave stable government to the Roman world during the first two centuries A.D. was Octavius, known generally by his title, Augustus. He had made his way cautiously through the intrigues and bloodshed that followed the murder of his uncle Julius Caesar in 44 B.C., until by 31 B.C., he controlled the western half of the empire. In that year he fought a decisive battle with the ruler of the eastern half of the empire, Mark Antony, who was supported by Cleopatra, queen of Egypt. Octavius' victory at Actium united the empire under one authority and ushered in an age of peace and reconstruction. It was in the opening years of the new age that Virgil wrote (and left unfinished at his early death) the great Roman epic, the Aeneid.

Like all the Latin poets, Virgil built on the solid foundations of his Greek predecessors. The story of Aeneas, the Trojan prince who came to Italy and whose descendants founded Rome, combines the themes of the Odyssey (the wanderer in search of home) and the Iliad (the hero in battle). Virgil borrows Homeric turns of phrase, similes, sentiments, whole incidents: his Aeneas, like Achilles, sacrifices prisoners to the shade of a friend and, like Odysseus, descends alive to the world of the dead. But unlike Achilles, Aeneas does not satisfy the great passion of his life, nor, like Odysseus, does he find a home in which to end his days in peace. The personal objectives of both of Homer's heroes are sacrificed by Aeneas for a greater objective. There is something greater than himself. His mission, imposed on him by the gods, is to found a city, from which, in the fullness of time, will spring the Roman state.

Homer presents us in the Iliad with the tragic pattern of the individual will, Achilles' wrath. But Aeneas is more than an individual. He is the prototype of the ideal Roman ruler; his qualities are the devotion to duty and the seriousness of purpose which were to give the Mediterranean world two centuries of ordered government. Aeneas' mission begins in disorder in the burning city of Troy, but he leaves it carrying his father on his shoulders and leading his little son by the hand. This famous picture emphasizes the fact that, unlike Achilles, he is securely set in a continuity of generations, the immortality of the family group, just as his mission to found a city, a home for the gods of Troy whose statues he carries with him, places him in a political and religious continuity. Achilles has no future. When he mentions his father and son, neither of whom he will see again, he emphasizes for us the loneliness of his short career; the brilliance of his life is that of a meteor which burns itself out to darkness. Odysseus has a father, wife, and son, and his heroic efforts are directed toward re-establishing himself in his proper context, that home in which he will be no longer man in a world of magic and terror, but man in an organized and continuous community. But he fights for himself. Aeneas, on the other hand, suffers and fights, not for himself but for the future; his own life is unhappy and his death miserable. Yet he can console himself with the glory of his sons to come, the pageant of Roman achievement which he is shown by his father in the world below and which he carries on his shield. Aeneas' future is Virgil's present; the consolidation of the Roman peace under Augustus is the reward of Aeneas' unhappy life of effort and suffering.

Summarized like this, the Aeneid sounds like propaganda, which, in one sense of the word, it is. What saves it from the besetting fault of even the best propaganda—the partial concealment of the truth—is the fact that Virgil maintains an independence of the power which he is celebrating and sees his hero in the round. He knows that the Roman ideal of devotion to duty has another side, the suppression of many aspects of the personality; that the man who wins and uses power must sacrifice much of himself, must live a life which, compared with that of Achilles or Odysseus, is constricted. In Virgil's poem Aeneas betrays the great passion of his life, his love for Dido, queen of Carthage. He does it reluctantly, but nevertheless he leaves her, and the full realization of what he has lost comes to him only when he meets her ghost in the world below. He weeps (as he did not at Carthage) and he pleads, in stronger terms than he did then, the overriding power which forced him to depart: "It was not of my own will, Dido, I left your land." She leaves him without a word, her silence as impervious to pleas and tears as his at Carthage once, and he follows her weeping as she goes back to join her first love, her husband Sychaeus. He has sacrificed his love to something greater, but this does not insulate him from unhappiness. The limitations upon the dedicated man are emphasized by the contrasting figure of Dido, who follows her own impulse always, even in death. By her death, Virgil tells us expressly, she forestalls fate, breaks loose from the pattern in which Aeneas remains to the bitter end.

The angry reactions which this part of the poem has produced in many critics are the true measure of Virgil's success. Aeneas does act in such a way that he forfeits much of our sympathy, but this is surely exactly what Virgil intended. The Dido episode is not, as many critics have supposed, a flaw in the great design, a case of Virgil's sympathy outrunning his admiration for Aeneas; it is Virgil's emphatic statement of the sacrifice which the Roman ideal of duty demands. Aeneas' sacrifice is so great that few of us could make it ourselves, and none of us can contemplate it in another without a feeling of loss. It is an expression of the famous Virgilian sadness which informs every line of the Aeneid and which makes a poem that was in its historical context a command performance into the great epic which has dominated Western literature ever since.

JESUS OF NAZARETH

In the last years of Augustus' life, in the Roman province of Judea, there was born to Joseph, a carpenter of Nazareth, and his wife, Mary, a son who was at once the final product of an old tradition and the starting point of a new. He was the last of the Hebrew prophets, but his message, unlike theirs, was to spread outside the boundaries of Palestine until it became the religion of the Roman Empire. His life on earth was short; it ended in the agony of crucifixion at about his thirty-third year. This event is a point of intersection of the three main lines of development of the ancient world—Hebrew, Greek, and Latin—for this Hebrew prophet was executed by a Roman governor, and his life and teachings were written down in the Greek language. These documents, which eventually, with some additions, constituted what we now know as the New Testament, circulated in the Greek-speaking half of the Roman Empire and later, in a Latin translation, in the West. They became the sacred texts of a church which, at first persecuted by and then triumphantly associated with Roman imperial power, outlasted the destruction of the empire and ruled over a spiritual kingdom which still exists.

The teaching of Christ was revolutionary not only in terms of Greek and Roman feeling but also in terms of the Hebrew religious tradition. The Hebrew idea of a personal God who is yet not anthropomorphic, who is omnipotent, omniscient, and infinitely just, was now broadened to include an infinite mercy which tempered the justice. Greek and Roman religion was outward and visible, the formal practice of ritual acts in a social context; Christianity was inward and spiritual, the important relationship was that between the individual soul and God. All human beings were on an equal plane in the eyes of their Creator. This idea ran counter to the theory and practice of an institution basic to the economy of the ancient world, slavery. Christ was rejected by his own people, as prophets have always been, and his death on the cross and his resurrection provided his followers and the future converts with an unforgettable symbol of a new dispensation, the son of God in human form suffering to atone for the sins of humanity, the supreme expression of divine mercy. This conception is the basis of the teaching of Paul, the apostle to the gentiles, who in the middle years of the first century A.D. changed Christianity from a Jewish sect to a world-wide movement with flourishing churches all over Asia Minor and Greece, and even in Rome. The burden of his teaching was the frailty and corruption of this life and world, and the certainty of resurrection. "For this corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality." To those who had accepted this vision the secular materialism which was the dominant view in the new era of peace and progress guaranteed by the stabilization of Roman rule was no longer tenable.

LATIN LITERATURE—PETRONIUS

The pragmatic outlook which Christianity was to supplant is to be seen most clearly portrayed in the satiric masterpiece of the Roman aristocrat Petronius. The work which is attributed to him, the Satyricon, was probably written during the principate of Nero (A.D. 54-68), a period in which the material benefits and the spiritual weakness of the new order had already become apparent. The Satyricon itself has survived only in fragments; we know nothing certain about the scope of the work as a whole, but from the fragments it is clear that this book is the work of a satiric genius, perhaps the most original genius of Latin literature.

"Dinner with Trimalchio," one of the longer fragments, selections from which are included here, shows us a tradesman's world. The narrator, a student of literature, and his cronies may have an aristocratic disdain for the businessmen at whose tables they eat, but they know that Trimalchio and his kind have inherited the earth. Trimalchio began life as a foreign slave, but he is now a multimillionaire. The representative of culture, Agamemnon the teacher, drinks his wine and praises his fatuous remarks; he is content to be the court jester, the butt of Trimalchio's witticisms. Trimalchio knows no god but Mercury, the patron of business operations, but the gold bracelet, a percentage of his income which he has dedicated to Mercury, he wears on his own arm. He identifies himself with the god, and worships himself, the living embodiment of the power of money. The conversation at his table is a sardonic revelation of the temper of a whole civilization. Written in brilliantly humorous and colloquial style it exposes mercilessly a blindness to spiritual values of any kind, a distrust of the intellect, and a ferocious preoccupation with the art of cheating one's neighbor. The point is made more effective by the conscious evocation of the epic tradition throughout the work. The names alone of the teacher, Agamemnon, and his assistant in instruction, Menelaus; the wall paintings which show "the Iliad and the Odyssey and the gladiator's show given by Laenas"; Trimalchio's exhibition of monstrous ignorance of Homer (which nobody dares to correct); the Nestorian tone of Ganymede, who regrets the old days when men were men (he is talking of the time when Safinius forced the bakers to lower the price of bread)—one touch after another reminds us that these figures are the final product of a tradition that began with Achilles and Odysseus.

The satire is witty, but it is nonetheless profound. All of them live for the moment, in material enjoyment, but they know that it cannot last. "Let us remember the living" is their watchword, but they cannot forget the dead. And as the banquet goes on, the thought of death, suppressed beneath the debased Epicureanism of Trimalchio and his associates, emerges slowly to the surface of their consciousness and comes to dominate it completely. The last arrival at the banquet is Habinnas the undertaker, and his coming coincides with the last stage of Trimalchio's drunkenness, the maudlin exhibition of his funeral clothes and the description of his tomb. "I would that I were dead," says the Sibyl in the story Trimalchio tells early in the evening; at its end he himself acts out his own funeral, complete with ointment, robes, wine, and trumpet players. The fact of death, the one fact which the practical materialism of Trimalchio and his circle can neither deny nor assimilate, asserts itself triumphantly as the supreme fact in the emptiness of Trimalchio's mind.

ST. AUGUSTINE

When Augustine was born in North Africa in A.D. 354, the era of Roman peace was already over. The invading barbarians had pierced the empire's defenses and were increasing their pressure every year. The economic basis of the empire was cracking under the strain of the enormous taxation needed to support the army; the land was exhausted. The empire was Christian, but the Church was split, beset by heresies and organized heretical sects. The empire was about to go down to destruction, and there was every prospect that the Church would go down with it.

Augustine, one of the men responsible for the consolidation of the Church in the West, especially for the systematization of its doctrine and policy, was not converted to Christianity until he had reached middle life. "Late have I loved Thee, O Beauty so ancient and so new," he says in his Confessions (A.D. 399), written long after his conversion. The lateness of his conversion and his regret for his wasted youth were among the sources of the energy which drove him to assume the intellectual leadership of the Western Church and to guarantee, by combating heresy on the one hand and laying new ideological foundations for Christianity on the other, the Church's survival through the dark centuries to come. Augustine had been brought up in the literary and philosophical tradition of the classical world, and it is partly because of his assimilation of classical literature and method to Christian training and teaching that the literature of the ancient world survived at all when Roman power collapsed in a welter of bloodshed and destruction which lasted for generations.

In his Confessions he set down, for the benefit of others, the story of his early life and his conversion to Christianity. This is, as far as we know, the first authentic ancient autobiography, and that fact itself is a significant expression of the Christian spirit, which proclaims the value of the individual soul and the importance of its relation with God. Throughout the Confessions Augustine talks directly to God, in humility, yet conscious that God is concerned for him personally. At the same time he comes to an understanding of his own feelings and development as a human being which marks his Confessions as one of the great literary documents of the Western world. His description of his childhood is the only detailed account of the childhood of a great man which antiquity has left us, and his accurate observation and keen perception are informed by the Hebrew and Christian idea of the sense of sin. "So small a boy and so great a sinner"—from the beginning of his narrative to the end Augustine sees man not as the Greek at his most optimistic tended to see him, the center and potential master of the universe, but as a child, wandering in ignorance, capable of reclamation only through the divine mercy which waits eternally for him to turn to it.

In Augustine are combined the intellectual tradition of the ancient world at its best and the religious feeling which was characteristic of the Middle Ages. The transition from the old world to the new can be seen in his pages; his analytical intellect pursues its Odyssey through strange and scattered islands—the mysticism of the Manichees, the skepticism of the Academic philosophers, the fatalism of the astrologers—until he finds his home in the Church, to which he was to render such great service. His account of his conversion in the garden at Milan records the true moment of transition from the ancient to the medieval world. The innumerable defeats and victories, the burning towns and ravaged farms, the bloodshed, dates, and statistics of the end of an era are all illuminated and ordered by this moment in the history of the human spirit. Here is the point of change itself.

LIVES, WRITINGS, AND CRITICISM

Biographical and critical works are listed only if they are available in English.

THE BIBLE

Our selections are from the Authorized (King James) version which was published in 1611. In spite of its archaisms and occasional obscurities, it is one of the greatest monuments of English prose, and its influence on all subsequent writers of English is incalculable. For a modern version (which incorporates the findings of modern scholarship and discoveries), see The New English Bible (1970).

For background: S. Cook, An Introduction to the Bible (1950); The Cambridge History of the Bible, edited by R. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans, Vol I (1970); R. H. Rowley, The Growth of the Old Testament (1950); M. S. Enslin, Christian Beginnings (1938); and C. K. Barrett, The New Testament Background: Selected Documents (1956).

GREECE—GENERAL

Sir Alfred Zimmern, The Greek Commonwealth (1922; frequently re-issued) is a stimulating account of Greek geography, economy, and political practice. For a good one-volume history see J. B. Bury, History of Greece, revised by R. Meiggs (4th edition 1975). See also H. D. F. Kitto, The Greeks (1951); C. M. Bowra, The Greek Experience (1957); M. I. Finley, The Ancient Greeks (1963); and A. Andrewes, The Greeks (1967).

HOMER

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Nothing whatsoever is known about Homer's life. The traditional date for the composition of the poems is ca. 850 B.C., though the tendency of modern scholarship is to prefer a much later date. On the "Homeric problem," see The Making of Homeric Verse, edited by A. Parry (1971); The Songs of Homer, G. S. Kirk (1962); Homer and the Epic, G. S. Kirk (1965)—a shortened version of The Songs; M. I. Finley The World of Odysseus (Revised edition 1978); C. M. Bowra, Homer (1972).

CRITICISM. Iliad. J. P. Shephard, The Pattern of the Iliad (1922); C. M. Bowra, Tradition and Design in the Iliad (1930); C. H. Whitman, Homer and the Heroic Tradition (1958); G. Steiner and R. Fagles, Homer, A Collection of Critical Essays (1962); James M. Redfield, Nature and Culture in the Iliad (1975); Essays on the Iliad, edited by J. Wright (1978); D. L. Page, History and the Homeric Iliad (1959). See also Richmond Lattimore's introduction to his translation, The Iliad of Homer (1951).

Odyssey. Essays on the Odyssey, edited by C. H. Taylor, Jr. (1963); H. W. Clarke, The Art of the Odyssey (1967).

GREEK THEATER

For information about the theater—scenery, machinery, actors, audience, etc.—see A. W. Pickard-Cambridge, The Theatre of Dionysus (1946) and The Dramatic Festivals of Athens, 2d ed., revised by J. Gould and D. M. Lewis (1968); M. Bieber, The History of the Greek and Roman Theater, 2d ed. (1961); T. B. L. Webster, Greek Thea- tre Production (1956); and P. Arnott, Greek Scenic Conventions (1962). Illustrations of Greek Drama. A. D. Trendall and T. B. L. Webster (1971). Critical works on the plays: H. D. F. Kitto, Greek Tragedy, A Literary Study, 3d ed. (1961); D. W. Lucas, The Greek Tragic Poets, 2d ed. (1959); T. G. Rosenmeyer, The Masks of Tragedy (1963); R. Lattimore, The Poetry of Greek Tragedy (1958). John Jones, Aristotle and Greek Tragedy (1962). The Greek Tragic Theatre, H. C. Baldry (1971). Greek Drama in its Theatrical and Social Context, P. Walcot (1976).

AESCHYLUS

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Born in 524? B.C. He fought at Marathon against the Persians in 490 B.C. Among his plays are The Persians (472 B.C.); The Seven against Thebes (467 B.C.); the Oresteia (Agamemnon, Choephoroe, Eumenides, 458 B.C.). He died in Sicily in 456 B.C. His other surviving plays are The Suppliants and Prometheus Bound.

For a translation of the whole trilogy and an excellent introduction see Richmond Lattimore's Oresteia of Aeschylus (1953). A more recent translation is by R. Fagles. Aeschylus. The Oresteia (1977). Also noteworthy are Seven Against Thebes, Anthony Hecht and Helen Bacon and Suppliants, Janet Lembke.

CRITICISM. H. Weir Smith, Aeschylean Tragedy (1924); Gilbert Murray, Aeschylus, Creator of Tragedy (1940); and E. T. Owen, The Harmony of Aeschylus (1952). Aeschylus. A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by M. H. McCall (1972).

THUCYDIDES

LIFE AND WRITINGS. The only certain date in his biography is 424 B.C., the year in which he was exiled from Athens because of a failure as general in the north of Greece. He gives an account of his unsuccessful campaign in Book IV, Chapters 103-109, of his History of the Peloponnesian War, and mentions his exile in Book V, Chapter 26. He probably returned to Athens after the defeat in 404 B.C., but he did not live long enough to complete his history of the war; his book ends with the events of the year 411 B.C.

A translation by Benjamin Jowett of the complete work is included in The Greek Historians, edited by F. R. B. Godolphin, Vol. I (1942). There are also translations by R. Crawley (1876, reprinted 1934) and R. Warner (1954).

CRITICISM. J. H. Finley, Jr., Thucydides (1947); and F. E. Adcock, Thucydides and his History (1963).

SOPHOCLES

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Born in 495 B.C. He was victorious over Aeschylus in the dramatic contest in 468 B.C. In 440 B.C. he was appointed one of ten generals for the expedition against Samos. He died in 406 B.C. His plays are Antigone (441? B.C.); Ajax; King Oedipus (Oedipus Tyrannus); Electra; Trachiniae; Philoctetes (409 B.C.); Oedipus at Colonus (produced after his death, 401 B.C.).

The standard edition in English, by Sir Richard C. Jebb, consists of seven separate volumes (1884-1896), each containing a careful prose translation. More recent translations are to be found in The Complete Greek Tragedies, edited by D. Grene and R. Lattimore (1957–); H. D. F. Kitto, Sophocles, Three Tragedies (1962); T. H. Banks, Three Theban Plays (1956); B. M. W. Knox, Oedipus the King (1959). L. Berkowitz and T. Brunner, Oedipus Tyrannus (1970); and S. Berg and D. Clay, Oedipus the King (1978).

CRITICISM. C. M. Bowra, Sophoclean Tragedy (1944); C. H. Whitman, Sophocles, A Study in Heroic Humanism (1951); S. M. Adams, Sophocles the Playwright (1957); A. J. A. Waldock, Sophocles the Dramatist (1951); B. M. W. Knox, Oedipus at Thebes (1957) and The Heroic Temper (1964); L. Berkowitz and T. Brunner, Oedipus Tyrannus (1970); T. B. L. Webster, An Introduction to Sophocles (2nd edition 1969); H. D. F. Kitto, Sophocles: Dramatist and Philosopher (1958); G. M. Kirkwood, A Study of Sophoclean Drama (1958); V. Ehrenberg, Sophocles and Pericles (1954); Sophocles: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by T. Woodward (1966); and G. H. Gellie, Sophocles: A Reading (1972).

EURIPIDES

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Born in 480 B.C. His first dramatic victory was in 441 B.C. Among his plays are Alcestis, 438 B.C.; Medea, 431 B.C.; Hippolytus, 428 B.C.; Trojan Women, 415 B.C.; Orestes, 408 B.C. Some time after this he left Athens for Macedonia, where he died in 406 B.C. The Bacchae and Iphigenia at Aulis were produced at Athens after his death. Eighteen of his plays have been preserved. For translations see The Complete Greek Tragedies (1957–) and the versions by P. Vellacott in the Penguin Series. Also R. Warner, Three Great Plays of Euripides (1958).

CRITICISM. G. M. A. Grube, The Drama of Euripides (1941); D. J. Conacher, Euripidean Drama (1967); Euripides, A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by E. Segal (1968); B. M. W. Knox, 'The Medea of Euripides' and P. E. Easterling "The Infanticide in Euripides Medea' both in Yale Classical Studies 25 (1977).

ARISTOPHANES

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Born around 450 B.C. Eleven of his comedies have survived; among the most famous are The Clouds (423 B.C.), The Birds (414 B.C.), and The Frogs (405 B.C.). He died around 385 B.C.

CRITICISM. G. Murray Aristophanes, A Study (1933); G. Norwood, Greek Comedy (1931) K. Lever, The Art of Greek Comedy (1956); C. H. Whitman, Aristophanes and the Comic Hero (1964); and K. J. Dover Aristophanic Comedy (1972).

PLATO

LIFE. Born in Athens in 429 or 428 B.C. He was present at the trial of Socrates, his teacher, in 399 B.C. After this he traveled widely, eventually returning to Athens to found his philosophical school, the Academy. He made two visits to Sicily to act as philosophical and political tutor to the younger Dionysius, tyrant of Syracuse, but both of these interventions in practical affairs were unfortunate. He died in 347 B.C.

WRITINGS. The whole of his work is preserved; all of his writings except the last, The Laws, are dialogues in which Socrates is the chief speaker. A complete translation is Benjamin Jowett, The Dialogues of Plato (1925). The best translation of Plato's most famous work, The Republic, is by F. M. Cornford (1945). Translations by Percy Bysshe Shelley of the Ion and Symposium are to be found in Five Dialogues of Plato, Everyman's Library (1952).

CRITICISM. A. E. Taylor, Plato, The Man and His Work (1927); G. M. A. Grube, Plato's Thought (1935); R. S. Brumbaugh, Plato for the Modern Age (1962).

ARISTOTLE

LIFE. Born at Stagira (Macedonia) in 384 B.C. In 367 B.C. he went to Athens and became a pupil of Plato at the Academy. He left Athens in 347 B.C. (the year Plato died), spent some years in the Greek cities of Asia Minor, and in 342 B.C. went to Macedonia as tutor to the young Alexander, then thirteen years of age. In 335 B.C., when Alexander succeeded to the throne of Macedonia, Aristotle returned to Athens, where he founded a school, the Lyceum. He directed the school, lecturing and writing, until 323 BC.., the year of Alexander's death at Babylon. Aristotle himself died at Chalcis, in Euboea, in the next year.

WRITINGS. His writings cover almost the whole field of human knowledge. Among the subjects he treated are logic, rhetoric, literary criticism, physics, metaphysics, politics, mathematics, meteorology, zoology, and history. For the complete works see the Oxford translation, completed in 1931. For the Poetics, see Ingram Bywater, Aristotle on the Art of Poetry (1909); and S. H. Butcher, Aristotle's Theory of Poetry and the Fine Arts (1907).

CRITICISM. Werner Jaeger, Aristotle, (1936); Aristotle's Poetics, with an introductory essay by Francis Fergusson (1961); and H. House, Aristotle's Poetics (1961).

ROME—GENERAL

For a good one-volume history of Rome see M. Cary, History of Rome (1938); and R. H. Barrow, The Romans (1949).

LUCRETIUS

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Titus Lucretius Carus, born about 99 B.C. He died in 55 B.C., a suicide, according to rumor. His only work is the didactic poem On the Nature of Things (De rerum natura), a philosophical poem in six books The best edition (with prose translation) is by C. Bailey, 3 vol. (1946). For a verse translation of the whole poem see Lucretius, The Way Things Are, R. Humphries (1969).

CRITICISM. E. E. Sikes, Lucretius, Poet and Philosopher (1936).

CICERO

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Marcus Tullius Cicero, born in 106 B.C. He studied at Athens, went into law, and soon became prominent in politics. In 70 B.C. he successfully pleaded the case of the Sicilians against Verres, a corrupt governor. In 63 B.C. he attained the highest republican office, the consulate, and during his term put down forcibly an insurrection led by Catiline. Later, a reaction against his policies caused him to retire from Rome; he returned in 55 B.C. When the civil war broke out in 49 B.C., he took sides with Pompey against Julius Caesar: after Pompey's defeat and death he was pardoned and returned to Rome. After Caesar's murder in 44 B.C. Cicero led the opposition against Caesar's lieutenant, Antony, and he was murdered in 43 B.C. at Antony's orders. He has left a great number of speeches, both forensic and political, which have served as models for Western oratory ever since; philosophical works, in which he made available to the Latin-speaking (and medieval) world the achievements of Greek philosophy; works on rhetoric; and a huge collection of private letters, which give a fascinating and uncensored picture of his life and times. Translations of almost all of his works are to be found in the Loeb Classical Library.

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICISM. D. R. Shacketon Bailey, Cicero (1971) and M. Grant, Cicero: Selected Works (1960).

VIRGIL

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Publius Virgilius Maro, born in 79 B.C. in the north of Italy. Very little is known about his life. The earliest work which is certainly his is the Bucolics, a collection of poems in the pastoral genre which have had enormous influence. These were followed by the Georgics, a didactic poem on farming, in four books, which many critics consider his finest work. The Aeneid, the Roman epic, was left unfinished at his early death in 19 B.C. Translations: C. Day Lewis, The Georgics (1940) and The Aeneid (1952) and A. Mandelbaum, The Aeneid (1971).

CRITICISM. W. F. J. Knight, Roman Vergil (1944); V. Pöschl, The Art of Vergil (1962); B. Otis, Virgil, A Study in Civilized Poetry (1963); M. C. J. Putnam, The Poetry of the Aeneid (1965); W. A. Camps, An Introduction to Virgil's Aeneid (1969); and Virgil: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by Steele Commager (1966).

PETRONIUS

LIFE AND WRITINGS. It is not certain that Titus Petronius (Arbiter) was the author of the Satyricon, but he is the best candidate. A friend of Nero's, he committed suicide at the imperial order after becoming involved in the Pisonian conspiracy against the emperor in 65 A.D. A brilliant account of Petronius' character and death is given by Tacitus in the eighteenth and nineteenth chapters of Book XVI of the Annals.

For another recent translation with a critical introduction, see W. Arrowsmith, The Satyricon of Petronius (1959).

ST. AUGUSTINE

LIFE AND WRITINGS. Aurelius Augustinus, born in 354 A.D. at Tagaste, in North Africa. He was baptized as a Christian in 387 A.D. and ordained bishop of Hippo, in North Africa, in 395 A.D. When he died there in 430 A.D., the city was besieged by Gothic invaders. Besides the Confessions (Confessiones, written in 397 A.D.) he wrote The City of God (De civitate dei, finished in 426 A.D.) and many polemical works against schismatics and heretics. Translations of The City of God may be found in Everyman's Library and also in the Loeb Classical Library, which also includes some of his letters. For criticism and biography, see P. Brown, Augustine of Hippo (1967).

The Old Testament*

Genesis 1–3. [The Creation—The Fall]

1. In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

And God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters,[1] and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good. And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness: and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day. And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl[2] that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth,

* The text of these selections from the Holy Bible is that of the King James, or Authorized, Version.

1. The firmament is the sky, which seen from below has the appearance of a ceiling; the waters above it are those which come down in the form of rain.

2. winged creatures of all kinds.

which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind: and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and everything that creepeth upon the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good.

And God said, Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

2. Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth when they were created,[3] in the day that the Lord God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for the Lord God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground. But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground. And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

3. This is the beginning of a different account of the Creation, which does not agree in all respects with the first.

And the Lord God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates. And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him. And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; and the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed.

3. Now the serpent was more subtil than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. And he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: but of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die: for God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil. And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat. And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons. And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden in the cool of the day: and Adam and his wife hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God amongst the trees of the garden. And the Lord God called unto Adam, and said unto him, Where art thou? And he said, I heard thy voice in the garden, and I was afraid, because I was naked; and I hid myself. And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat? And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the woman, What is this that thou hast done? And the woman said, The serpent beguiled me, and I did eat. And the Lord God said unto the serpent, Because thou hast done this, thou art cursed above all cattle, and above every beast of the field; upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: and I will put enmity between thee and the woman, and between thy seed and her seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel. Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy conception; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee. And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field; in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living. Unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them.

And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live forever: therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.

Genesis 4. [The First Murder]

4. And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man from the Lord. And she again bare his brother Abel. And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground. And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord. And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering: But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth,[1] and his countenance fell. And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door. And unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shall rule over him.[2] And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper? And he said, What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground. And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand; When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth. And Cain said unto the Lord, My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me. And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

1. wroth: angry.
2. an obscure sentence. It seems to mean something like: "It (i.e., sin) shall be eager for you, but you must master it."

Genesis 6–9. [The Flood]

6. . . . And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them. But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

These are the generations of Noah: Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations, and Noah walked with God. And Noah begat three sons, Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence. And God looked upon the earth, and, behold, it was corrupt; for all flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me; for the earth is filled with violence through them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. Make thee an ark of gopher[1] wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits,[2] the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits. A window[3] shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shall thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it. And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die. But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee. And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female. Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind, two of every sort shall come unto thee, to keep them alive. And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be for food for thee, and for them. Thus did Noah; according to all that God commanded him, so did he.

7. . . . And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth. And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him, into the ark, because of the waters of the flood. Of clean beasts, and of beasts that are not clean,[4] and of fowls, and of everything that creepeth upon the earth, There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah. And it came to pass after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth. In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the

1. gopher: cypress.
2. cubit: a Hebrew measure of length, about one and a half feet.
3. window: The text is obscure; it may refer to a skylight in the roof.
4. not clean: Certain animals were forbidden food to the Hebrews. For a list of them see Leviticus 11.

seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights. In the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark; They, and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort. And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life. And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded him, and the Lord shut him in. And the flood was forty days upon the earth; and the waters increased, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth. And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters. And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered. Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered. And all flesh died that moved upon the earth, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of beast, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth, and every man: All in whose nostrils was the breath of life, of all that was in the dry land, died. And every living substance was destroyed which was upon the face of the ground, both man, and cattle, and the creeping things, and the fowl of the heaven; and they were destroyed from the earth, and Noah only remained alive, and they that were with him in the ark. And the waters prevailed upon the earth an hundred and fifty days.

8. And God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuaged; The fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained; And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated. And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.[5] And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen.

And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made: And he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth. Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth: then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark. And he stayed yet another seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark; And the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. And he stayed yet other seven days; and sent forth the dove; which returned not again unto him any more.

5. Ararat: a mountain in the eastern part of Asia Minor.

And it came to pass in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and, behold, the face of the ground was dry. And in the second month, on the seven and twentieth day of the month, was the earth dried.

And God spake unto Noah, saying, Go forth of the ark, thou, and thy wife, and thy sons, and thy sons' wives with thee. Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all flesh, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth. And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him: Every beast, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatsoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark. And Noah builded an altar unto the Lord; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar. And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done. While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.

9. And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered. Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things. But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat.[6] And surely your blood of your lives will I require; at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man. Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man. And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.

6. This sentence refers to the dietary laws: blood was drained from the slaughtered animal.

And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying, And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you; And with every living creature that is with you, of the fowl, of the cattle, and of every beast of the earth with you; from all that go out of the ark, to every beast of the earth. And I will establish my covenant with you; neither shall all flesh be cut off any more by the waters of a flood; neither shall there any more be a flood to destroy the earth. And God said, This is the token of the covenant which I make between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for perpetual generations: I do set my bow in the cloud, and it shall be for a token of a covenant between me and the earth. And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud: And I will remember my covenant, which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh. And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth. And God said unto Noah, This is the token of the covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

Genesis 11. [The Origin of Languages]

11. And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech. And it came to pass, as they[1] journeyed from the east, that they found a plain in the land of Shinar;[2] and they dwelt there. And they said one to another, Go to, let us make brick, and burn them throughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime[3] had they for mortar. And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and a tower,[4] whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth. And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded. And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to

1. they: the human race.
2. Shinar: in Mesopotamia.
3. slime: bitumen.
4. tower: This story is based on the Babylonian practice of building temples in the form of terraced pyramids (ziggurats).

do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech. So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. Therefore is the name of it called Babel;[5] because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth.

5. Babel: Babylon.

Genesis 37–46. [The Story of Joseph]

37. . . . Joseph, being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives: and Joseph brought unto his father[1] their evil report.[2] Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age: and he made him a coat of many colours. And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him.

And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more. And he said unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed: for, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to[3] my sheaf. And his brethren said to him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words.

And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me. And he told it to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth? And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying.

And his brethren went to feed their father's flock in Shechem. And Israel said unto Joseph, Do not thy brethren feed the flock in Shechem? come, and I will send thee unto them. And he said to him, Here am I. And he said to him, Go, I pray thee, see whether it be well with thy brethren, and well with the flocks; and bring me word again. So he sent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem.

1. Israel.
2. Joseph reported their misdeeds.
3. bowed down to.

And a certain man found him, and, behold, he was wandering in the field: and the man asked him, saying, What seekest thou? And he said, I seek my brethren: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks. And the man said, They are departed hence; for I heard them say, Let us go to Dothan. And Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan. And when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conspired against him to slay him. And they said one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh. Come now therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit, and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him: and we shall see what will become of his dreams. And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands; and said, Let us not kill him. And Reuben said unto them, Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they stripped Joseph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him; and they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it. And they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and, behold, a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt. And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmeelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother and our flesh. And his brethren were content. Then there passed by Midianites merchantmen;[4] and they[5] drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver: and they[6] brought Joseph into Egypt.

And Reuben returned unto the pit; and, behold, Joseph was not in the pit; and he rent his clothes. And he returned unto his brethren, and said, The child is not; and I, whither shall I go? And they took Joseph's coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood; and they sent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and said, This have we found: know now whether it be thy son's coat or no. And he knew it, and said, It is my son's coat; an evil beast hath devoured him; Joseph is without doubt rent in pieces. And Jacob[7] rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days. And all his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to

4. The confusion in this passage may be due to the fact that the version we have is a composite of two different versions.
5. the brothers.
6. the Ishmeelites.
7. Israel.

be comforted; and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning. Thus his father wept for him. . . .

39. And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh,[8] captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmeelites, which had brought him down thither. And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. And his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all he did to prosper in his hand. And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him: and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand. And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field. And he left all that he had in Joseph's hand; and he knew not ought he had, save the bread which he did eat. And Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured.[9]

And it came to pass after these things, that his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me. But he refused, and said unto his master's wife, Behold, my master wotteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand; there is none greater in this house than I; neither hath he kept back any thing from me but thee, because thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? And it came to pass, as she spake to Joseph day by day, that he hearkened not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her. And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business; and there was none of the men of the house there within. And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled and got him out. And it came to pass, when she saw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth, that she called unto the men of her house, and spoke unto them, saying, See, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us; he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice: and it came to pass, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out. And she laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home. And she spake unto him according to these words, saying, The Hebrew servant, which thou hast brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me: and it came to pass, as I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out. And it came to pass, when his master heard the words of his wife, which she spake unto him, saying, After this manner did thy servant to me; that his wrath was kindled. And Joseph's master took him, and put him into the prison, a place where the king's prisoners were bound: and he was there in the prison.

8. the Egyptian king. 9. handsome.

But the Lord was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. And the keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. The keeper of the prison looked not to any thing that was under his[10] hand; because the Lord was with him,[11] and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper.

40. And it came to pass after these things that the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt. And Pharaoh was wroth against two of his officers, against the chief of the butlers, and against the chief of the bakers. And he put them in ward in the house of the captain of the guard, into the prison, the place where Joseph was bound. And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them: and they continued a season in ward.

And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, each man according to the interpretation of his dream, the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the prison. And Joseph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and, behold, they were sad. And he asked Pharaoh's officers that were with him in the ward of his lord's house, saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to day? And they said unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joseph said unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? tell me them, I pray you. And the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, In my dream, behold, a vine was before me; and in the vine were three branches: and it was as though it budded, and her blossoms shot forth; and the clusters thereof brought forth ripe grapes: and Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and I gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand. And Joseph said unto him, This is the interpretation of it: the three branches are three days: yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and restore thee unto thy place: and thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. But think on me when it shall be well with thee, and shew kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house: for indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon. When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he said unto Joseph, I also was in my dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head: and in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bakemeats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head. And Joseph answered and said, This is the interpretation thereof: the three baskets are three days: yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and shall hang thee on a tree; and the birds shall eat thy flesh from off thee.

10. Joseph's. 11. Joseph.

And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants: and he lifted up the head of the chief butler and of the chief baker among his servants. And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again; and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand. But he hanged the chief baker: as Joseph had interpreted to them. Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgat him.

41. And it came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed: and, behold, he stood by the river. And, behold, there came up out of the river seven well favoured kine[12] and fatfleshed; and they fed in a meadow. And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill favoured and leanfleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river. And the ill favoured and leanfleshed kine did eat up the seven well favoured and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke. And he slept and dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, rank[13] and good. And, behold, seven thin ears and blasted with the east wind sprung up after them. And the seven thin ears devoured the seven rank and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and, behold, it was a dream. And it came to pass in the morning that his spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

Then spake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, saying, I do remember my faults this day: Pharaoh was wroth with his servants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guard's house, both me and the chief baker: and we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he; we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream. And there was there with us a young man, an Hebrew, servant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he interpreted to us our dreams; to each man according to his dream he did interpret. And it came to pass, as he interpreted to us, so it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged.

12. cattle. 13. fat.

Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they brought him hastily out of the dungeon: and he shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it: and I have heard say of thee that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it. And Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river: and, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fatfleshed and well favoured; and they fed in a meadow: and, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill favoured and leanfleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness: and the lean and the ill favoured kine did eat up the first seven fat kine; and when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill favoured, as at the beginning. So I awoke. And I saw in my dream, and, behold, seven ears came up in one stalk, full and good: and, behold, seven ears, withered, thin, and blasted with the east wind, sprung up after them: and the thin ears devoured the seven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me.

And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do. The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven goods ears are seven years: the dream is one. And the seven thin and ill favoured kine that came up after them are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine. This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: what God is about to do he sheweth unto Pharaoh. Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt: and there shall arise after them seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land; and the plenty shall not be known in the land by reason of that famine following; for it shall be very grievous. And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass. Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt. Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land[14] of Egypt in the seven plenteous years. And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities. And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine.

14. i.e., of the crop.

And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants. And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is? And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art: thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt. And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt.

And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt. And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls. And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same. And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number. And unto Joseph were born two sons before the years of famine came, which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On bare unto him. And Joseph called the name of the first born Manasseh:[15] For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house. And the name of the second called he Ephraim:[16] For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction.

And the seven years of plenteousness, that was in the land of Egypt, were ended. And the seven years of dearth[17] began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do. And the famine was over all the face of the earth. And Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians;

15. meaning "causing to forget."
16. meaning "fruitfulness."
17. scarcity.

and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt. And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

42. Now when Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do ye look one upon another? And he said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die.

And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt. But Benjamin,[18] Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him. And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan. And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land: and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth. And Joseph saw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himself strange unto them, and spake roughly unto them; and he said unto them, Whence come ye? And they said, From the land of Canaan to buy food. And Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him. And Joseph remembered the dreams which he dreamed of them, and said unto them, Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. And they said unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy servants come. We are all one man's sons; we are true men, thy servants are no spies. And he said unto them, Nay, but to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. And they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with our father, and one is not. And Joseph said unto them, That is it that I spake unto you, saying, Ye are spies: Hereby ye shall be proved: By the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither. Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you: or else by the life of Pharaoh surely ye are spies. And he put them all together into ward three days. And Joseph said unto them the third day, This do, and live; for I fear God: if ye be true men, let one of your brethren be bound in the house of your prison: go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houses: but bring your youngest brother unto me; so shall your words be verified, and ye shall not die. And they did so.

And they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. And Reuben answered them, saying, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child; and ye would not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required. And they knew not that Joseph understood them; for he spake unto them by an interpreter. And he turned himself about from them, and wept; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.

18. more closely related than the other ten since he is the son of the same mother.

Then Joseph commanded to fill their sacks with corn, and to restore every man's money into his sack, and to give them provision for the way: and thus did he unto them. And they laded their asses with the corn, and departed thence. And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money; for, behold, it was in his sack's mouth. And he said unto his brethren, My money is restored; and, lo, it is even in my sack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

And they came unto Jacob their father unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befell unto them; saying, The man, who is lord of the land, spake roughly to us, and took us for spies of the country. And we said unto him, We are true men; we are no spies: we be twelve brethren, sons of our father; one is not, and the youngest is this day with our father in the land of Canaan. And the man, the lord of the country, said unto us, Hereby shall I know that ye are true men; leave one of your brethren here with me, and take food for the famine of your households, and be gone: and bring your youngest brother unto me: then shall I know that ye are no spies, but that ye are true men: so will I deliver you your brother, and ye shall traffick in the land.

And it came to pass as they emptied their sacks, that, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack: and when both they and their father saw the bundles of money, they were afraid. And Jacob their father said unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me.

And Reuben spake unto his father, saying, Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again. And he said, My son shall not go down with you; for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if mischief befall him by the way in the which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

43. And the famine was sore in the land. And it came to pass, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt,their father said unto them, Go again, buy us a little food. And Judah spake unto him, saying, The man did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food: but if thou wilt not send him, we will not go down: for the man said unto us, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. And Israel said, Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother? And they said, The man asked us straitly[19] of our state, and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother? and we told him according to the tenor of these words: could we certainly know that he would say, Bring your brother down? And Judah said unto Israel his father, Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go; that we may live, and not die, both we, and thou, and also our little ones. I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever: for except we had lingered, surely now we had returned this second time. And their father Israel said unto them, If it must be so now, do this; take of the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts, and almonds: and take double money in your hand; and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your sacks, carry it again in your hand; peradventure it was an oversight: take also your brother, and arise, go again unto the man: and God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother, and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved.

And the men took that present, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin; and rose up, and went down to Egypt, and stood before Joseph. And when Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay,[20] and make ready; for these men shall dine with me at noon. And the man did as Joseph bade; and the man brought the men into Joseph's house. And the men were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house; and they said, Because of the money that was returned in our sacks at the first time are we brought in; that he may seek occasion against us, and fall upon us, and take us for bondmen,[21] and our asses. And they came near to the steward of Joseph's house, and they communed with him at the door of the house, and said, O sir, we came indeed down at the first time to buy food; and it came to pass, when we came to the inn, that we opened our sacks, and, behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight: and we have brought it again in our hand. And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food: we cannot tell who put our money in our sacks. And he said, Peace be to you, fear not: your God, and the God of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them. And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, and gave them water, and they washed their feet; and he gave their asses provender. And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon: for they heard that they should eat bread there.

19. strictly, precisely.
20. kill an animal for meat.
21. slaves.

And when Joseph came home, they brought him the present which was in their hand into the house, and bowed themselves to him to the earth. And he asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spoke? Is he yet alive? And they answered, Thy servant our father is in good health, he is yet alive. And they bowed down their heads, and made obeisance. And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spoke unto me? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son. And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother: and he sought where to weep; and he entered into his chamber, and wept there. And he washed his face, and went out, and refrained himself and said, Set on bread. And they set on for him by himself, and for them by themselves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians. And they sat before him, the firstborn according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth: and the men marvelled one at another. And he took and sent messes[22] unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs. And they drank, and were merry with him.

44. And he commanded the steward of his house, saying, Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put every man's money in his sack's mouth. And put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth of the youngest, and his corn money. And he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken. As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away, they and their asses. And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good? Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth?[23] ye have done evil in so doing.

And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words.

22. portions.

23. Joseph's servant is to claim that this is the cup Joseph uses for clairvoyance; the diviner stared into a cup of water and foretold the future.

And they said unto him, Wherefore saith my lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing: behold, the money, which we found in our sacks' mouths, we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then should we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold? With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen. And he said, Now also let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; and ye shall be blameless. Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack. And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest: and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his ass, and returned to the city.

And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph's house; for he was yet there: and they fell before him on the ground. And Joseph said unto them, What deed is this that ye have done? wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine? And Judah said, What shall we say unto my lord? what shall we speak? or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants: behold, we are my lord's servants, both we, and he also with whom the cup is found. And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh. My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother? And we said unto my lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Bring him down unto me, that I may set mine eyes upon him. And we said unto my lord, The lad cannot leave his father: for if he should leave his father, his father would die. And thou saidst unto thy servants, Except your youngest brother come down with you, ye shall see my face no more. And it came to pass when we came up unto thy servant my father, we told him the words of my lord. And our father said, Go again, and buy us a little food. And we said, We cannot go down: if our youngest brother be with us, then will we go down: for we may not see the man's face, except our youngest brother be with us. And thy servant my father said unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two sons; and the one went out from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces; and I saw him not since: and if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. Now therefore when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be not with us; seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life; it shall come to pass, when he seeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy servants[24] shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave. For thy servant[25] became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant[26] abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? lest peradventure I see the evil that shall come on my father.

45. Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me. And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren. And he wept aloud: and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard. And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence. And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they came near. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt. Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. For these two years hath the famine been in the land: and yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest. And God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance. So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt. Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt: come down unto me, tarry not: and thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, thou, and thy children, and thy children's children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all thou hast: and there will I nourish thee; for yet there are five years of famine; lest thou, and thy household, and all that thou hast, come to poverty. And, behold, your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you. And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither. And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck, and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. Moreover he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them: and after that his brethren talked with him.

24. we.
25. I.
26. me.

And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's house, saying, Joseph's brethren are come: and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants. And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; lade[27] your beasts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan; and take your father and your households, and come unto me: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land. Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come. Also regard not your stuff; for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours. And the children of Israel did so: and Joseph gave them wagons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way. To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver, and five changes of raiment. And to his father he sent after this manner; ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she-asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way. So he sent his brethren away, and they departed: and he said unto them, See that ye fall not out by the way.

And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, and told him, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not. And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them: and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived. And Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die.

46. And Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices unto the God of his father Isaac. And God spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, and said, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am I. And he said, I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation: I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes. And Jacob rose up from Beer-sheba: and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him. And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt, Jacob, and all his seed with him: his sons, and his sons' sons with him, his daughters, and his sons' daughters, and all his seed brought he with him into Egypt.

27. load.

*Job

1. There was a man in the land of Uz whose name was Job, and that man was perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and eschewed[1] evil. And there were born unto him seven sons and three daughters. His substance also was seven thousand sheep, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household; so that this man was the greatest of all the men of the east. And his sons went and feasted in their houses, every one his day;[2] and sent and called for their three sisters to eat and to drink with them. And it was so, when the days of their feasting were gone about, that Job sent and sanctified them,[3] and rose up early in the morning, and offered burnt offerings according to the number of them all: for Job said, It may be that my sons have sinned, and cursed God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

Now there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan[4] came also among them. And the Lord said unto Satan, Whence comest thou? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? Then Satan answered the Lord, and said, Doth Job fear God for nought? Hast not thou made an hedge about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side? thou hast blessed the work of his hands, and his substance is increased in the land. But put forth thine hand now, and touch all that he hath, and he will curse thee to thy face. And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only upon himself put not forth thine hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord.

And there was a day when his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: and there came a messenger unto Job, and said, The oxen were plowing, and the asses feeding beside them: and the Sabeans fell upon them, and took them away; yea, they have slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The fire of God is fallen from heaven, and hath burned up the sheep, and the servants,

* Chapters 1–14, 29–31, 38–42.
1. avoided.
2. in rotation at each son's house.
3. by ritual purification.
4. His name means "the accuser," "the opposer."

and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, The Chaldeans made out three bands,[5] and fell upon the camels, and have carried them away, yea, and slain the servants with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee. While he was yet speaking, there came also another, and said, Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in their eldest brother's house: and, behold, there came a great wind from the wilderness, and smote the four corners of the house, and it fell upon the young men, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

Then Job arose and rent[6] his mantle,[7] and shaved his head, and fell down upon the ground, and worshipped, and said, Naked came I out of my mother's womb, and naked shall I return thither: the Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord. In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God foolishly.

2. Again there was a day when the sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord, and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord. And the Lord said unto Satan, From whence comest thou? And Satan answered the Lord, and said, From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. And the Lord said unto Satan, Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man, one that feareth God, and escheweth evil? and still he holdeth fast his integrity, although thou movedst me against him, to destroy him without cause. And Satan answered the Lord, and said, Skin for skin, yea, all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thine hand now, and touch his bone and his flesh, and he will curse thee to thy face. And the Lord said unto Satan, Behold, he is in thine hand; but save his life.

So went Satan forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with sore boils from the sole of his foot unto his crown. And he took him a potsherd to scrape himself withal;[8] and he sat down among the ashes.

Then said his wife unto him, Dost thou still retain thine integrity? curse God, and die. But he said unto her, Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh. What? shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil? In all this did not Job sin with his lips.

Now when Job's three friends heard of all this evil that was come upon him, they came every one from his own place; Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite:

5. split up into three groups.
6. tore.
7. cloak.
8. with.

for they had made an appointment together to come to mourn with him and to comfort him. And when they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not, they lifted up their voice, and wept; and they rent every one his mantle, and sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven. So they sat down with him upon the ground seven days and seven nights, and none spake a word unto him: for they saw that his grief was very great.

3. After this opened Job his mouth, and cursed his day. And Job spake, and said, Let the day perish wherein I was born, and the night in which it was said, There is a man child conceived. Let that day be darkness; let not God regard it from above, neither let the light shine upon it. Let darkness and the shadow of death stain it; let a cloud dwell upon it; let the blackness of the day terrify it. As for that night, let darkness seize upon it; let it not be joined unto the days of the year, let it not come into the number of the months. Lo, let that night be solitary, let no joyful voice come therein. Let them curse it that curse the day,[9] who are ready to raise up their mourning. Let the stars of the twilight thereof be dark; let it look for light, but have none; neither let it see the dawning of the day: because it shut not up the doors of my mother's womb, nor hid sorrow from mine eyes. Why died I not from the womb? Why did I not give up the ghost when I came out of the belly? Why did the knees prevent[10] me? or why the breasts that I should suck? For now should I have lain still and been quiet, I should have slept: then had I been at rest, with kings and counsellors of the earth, which built desolate places for themselves; or with princes that had gold, who filled their houses with silver: or as an hidden untimely birth I had not been; as infants which never saw light. There the wicked cease from troubling; and there the weary be at rest. There the prisoners rest together; they hear not the voice of the oppressor. The small and great are there; and the servant is free from his master. Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life unto the bitter in soul; which long for death, but it cometh not; and dig for it more than for hid treasures; which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad, when they can find the grave? Why is light given to a man whose way is hid, and whom God hath hedged in? For my sighing cometh before I eat, and my roarings are poured out like the waters. For the thing which I greatly feared is come upon me, and that which I was afraid of is come unto me. I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet;[11] yet trouble came.

9. sorcerers, magicians. A more literal translation of the next clause would read, "who are ready to rouse up leviathan." Leviathan was a dragon that was thought to produce darkness.

10. receive.

11. For was, had, and was, read, "am," "have," and "am."

4. Then Eliphaz the Temanite answered and said, If we assay to commune with thee, wilt thou be grieved? But who can withhold himself from speaking? Behold, thou hast instructed many, and thou hast strengthened the weak hands. Thy words have upholden him that was falling, and thou hast strengthened the feeble knees. But now it is come upon thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art troubled. Is not this thy fear, thy confidence, thy hope, and the uprightness of thy ways?[12] Remember, I pray thee, who ever perished, being innocent? or where were the righteous cut off? Even as I have seen, they that plow iniquity, and sow wickedness, reap the same. By the blast of God they perish, and by the breath of his nostrils are they consumed. The roaring of the lion, and the voice of the fierce lion, and the teeth of the young lions, are broken. The old lion perisheth for lack of prey, and the stout lion's whelps are scattered abroad. Now a thing was secretly brought to me, and mine ear received a little[13] thereof. In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake. Then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up: It stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice, saying, Shall mortal man be more just than God? Shall a man be more pure than his maker? Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly: How much less[14] in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, which are crushed before the moth? They are destroyed from morning to evening: they perish for ever without any regarding it. Doth not their excellency which is in them go away? They die, even without wisdom.

5. Call now, if there be any that will answer thee; and to which of the saints wilt thou turn? For wrath killeth the foolish man, and envy slayeth the silly one. I have seen the foolish taking root: but suddenly I cursed his habitation. His children are far from safety, and they are crushed in the gate, neither is there any to deliver them. Whose harvest the hungry eateth up, and taketh it even out of the thorns,[15] and the robber swalloweth up their substance. Although affliction cometh not forth of the dust, neither doth trouble spring out of the ground; yet man is born unto trouble, as the sparks fly upward. I would seek unto God, and unto God would I commit my cause: which doeth great things and unsearchable; marvellous things without number: who giveth rain upon the earth, and

12. A more literal translation of this sentence would read, "Is not thy fear of God thy confidence, and thy hope the uprightness of thy ways?"

13. a whisper.

14. how much less does he trust.

15. perhaps a hedge of thorn.

sendeth waters upon the fields: to set up on high those that be low; that those which mourn may be exalted to safety. He disappointeth the devices of the crafty, so that their hands cannot perform their enterprise. He taketh the wise in their own craftiness: and the counsel of the froward is carried headlong. They meet with darkness in the daytime, and grope in the noonday as in the night. But he saveth the poor from the sword, from their mouth, and from the hand of the mighty. So the poor hath hope, and iniquity stoppeth her mouth. Behold, happy is the man whom God correcteth: therefore despise not thou the chastening of the Almighty: for he maketh sore, and bindeth up: he woundeth, and his hands make whole. He shall deliver thee in six troubles: yea, in seven there shall no evil touch thee. In famine he shall redeem thee from death: and in war from the power of the sword. Thou shalt be hid from the scourge of the tongue: neither shalt thou be afraid of destruction when it cometh. At destruction and famine thou shalt laugh: neither shalt thou be afraid of the beasts of the earth. For thou shalt be in league with the stones of the field: and the beasts of the field shall be at peace with thee. And thou shalt know that thy tabernacle[16] shall be in peace; and thou shalt visit thy habitation, and shalt not sin. Thou shalt know also that thy seed shall be great, and thine offspring as the grass of the earth. Thou shalt come to thy grave in a full age, like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season. Lo this, we have searched it, so it is; hear it, and know thou it for thy good.

6. But Job answered and said, Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed, and my calamity laid in the balances together! For now it would be heavier than the sand of the sea: therefore my words are swallowed up.[17] For the arrows of the Almighty are within me, the poison whereof drinketh up my spirit: the terrors of God do set themselves in array against me. Doth the wild ass bray when he hath grass? or loweth the ox over his fodder?[18] Can that which is unsavoury be eaten without salt? or is there any taste in the white of an egg? The things that my soul refused to touch are as my sorrowful meat.[19] Oh that I might have my request; and that God would grant me the thing that I long for! Even that it would please God to destroy me; that he would let loose his hand, and cut me off! Then should I yet have comfort; yea, I would harden myself in

16. tent.

17. A more literal translation of this clause would read, "therefore have my words been rash." Job recognizes the exaggeration of his first outburst.

18. Animals do not complain without reason; therefore when a rational man complains, he must have some justification for it.

19. more literally, "My soul refuseth to touch them, they are as loathsome meat to me." He is referring to the statements of his friends.

sorrow: let him not spare; for I have not concealed[20] the words of the Holy One. What is my strength, that I should hope? and what is mine end, that I should prolong my life? Is my strength the strength of stones? or is my flesh of brass? Is not my help in me? and is wisdom driven quite from me?[21] To him that is afflicted pity should be shewed from his friend; but he forsaketh the fear of the Almighty. My brethren have dealt deceitfully as a brook, and as the stream of brooks they pass away; which are blackish by reason of the ice, and wherein the snow is hid: what time they wax warm, they vanish: when it is hot, they are consumed out of their place. The paths of their way are turned aside; they go to nothing, and perish. The troops of Tema looked, the companies of Sheba waited for them. They were confounded because they had hoped;[22] they came thither, and were ashamed. For now ye are nothing; ye see my casting down, and are afraid. Did I say, Bring unto me? or, Give a reward for me of your substance? or, Deliver me from the enemy's hand? or, Redeem me from the hand of the mighty? Teach me, and I will hold my tongue: and cause me to understand wherein I have erred. How forcible are right words! But what doth your arguing reprove? Do ye imagine to reprove words, and the speeches of one that is desperate, which are as wind? Yea, ye overwhelm the fatherless, and ye dig a pit for your friend. Now therefore be content, look upon me; for it is evident unto you if I lie. Return, I pray you, let it not be iniquity;[23] yea, return again, my righteousness is in it.[24] Is there iniquity in my tongue? Cannot my taste discern perverse things?

7. Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? Are not his days also like the days of an hireling? As a servant earnestly desireth the shadow,[25] and as an hireling looketh for the reward of his work: so am I made to possess months of vanity, and wearisome nights are appointed to me. When I lie down, I say, When shall I arise, and the night be gone? and I am full of tossings to and fro unto the dawning of the day. My flesh is clothed with worms and clods of dust; my skin is broken, and become loathsome. My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle, and are spent without hope. O remember that my life is wind: mine eye shall no more see good. The eye of him that hath seen me shall see me no more: thine eyes are upon me, and I am not. As the cloud is consumed and vanisheth away: so he that goeth down to the grave shall come up no more.

20. more literally, "denied."
21. more literally, "Is not my help within me gone, and is not wisdom driven quite away from me?"
22. The caravans reached the springs they had counted on and found them dry.
23. let there be no injustice.
24. my cause is righteous.
25. evening, the end of the working day.

He shall return no more to his house, neither shall his place know him any more. Therefore I will not refrain my mouth; I will speak in the anguish of my spirit; I will complain in the bitterness of my soul. Am I a sea, or a whale, that thou settest a watch over me?[26] When I say, My bed shall comfort me, my couch shall ease my complaint; then thou scarest me with dreams, and terrifiest me through visions: so that my soul chooseth strangling, and death rather than my life. I loathe it; I would not live alway: let me alone; for my days are vanity. What is man, that thou shouldest magnify him? and that thou shouldest set thine heart upon him? and that thou shouldest visit him every morning, and try him every moment? How long wilt thou not depart from me, nor let me alone till I swallow down my spittle?[27] I have sinned; what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver[28] of men? Why hast thou set me as a mark[29] against thee, so that I am a burden to myself? And why dost thou not pardon my transgression, and take away mine iniquity? For now shall I sleep in the dust; and thou shalt seek me in the morning, but I shall not be.

8. Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said, How long wilt thou speak these things? and how long shall the words of thy mouth be like a strong wind? Doth God pervert judgment? or doth the Almighty pervert justice? If thy children have sinned against him, and he have cast them away for their transgression; if thou wouldest seek unto God betimes,[30] and make thy supplication to the Almighty; if thou wert pure and upright; surely now he would awake for thee, and make the habitation of thy righteousness prosperous. Though thy beginning was small, yet thy latter end should greatly increase. For enquire, I pray thee, of the former age, and prepare thy self to the search of their fathers: (For we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon earth are a shadow:) shall not they teach thee, and tell thee, and utter words out of their heart? Can the rush[31] grow up without mire? Can the flag grow without water? Whilst it is yet in his greenness, and not cut down, it withereth before any other herb. So are the paths of all that forget God; and the hypocrite's hope shall perish: whose hope shall be cut off, and whose trust shall be a spider's web. He shall lean upon his house, but it shall not stand: he shall hold it fast, but it shall not endure. He is green before the sun, and his branch shooteth

26. Job, now addressing God directly, compares his situation with that of the sea monster whom a god fought against in the Babylonian myth. He reproves God for exerting His power against anything as small as himself.

27. even for a moment.

28. A more literal translation would read, "watcher."

29. target.

30. early.

31. the papyrus, which grows rapidly when the Nile is high, but withers at once when the waters go down.

forth in his garden. His roots are wrapped about the heap, and seeth the place of stones. If he destroy him from his place, then it shall deny him, saying, I have not seen thee. Behold, this is the joy of his way, and out of the earth shall others grow. Behold, God will not cast away a perfect man, neither will he help the evil doers: till he fill thy mouth with laughing, and thy lips with rejoicing. They that hate thee shall be clothed with shame; and the dwelling place of the wicked shall come to nought.

9. Then Job answered and said, I know it is so of a truth: but how should man be just with God? If he will contend with him, he cannot answer him one of a thousand.[32] He is wise in heart, and mighty in strength: who hath hardened himself against him, and hath prospered? Which removeth the mountains, and they know not: which overturneth them in his anger. Which shaketh the earth out of her place, and the pillars thereof tremble. Which commandeth the sun, and it riseth not; and sealeth up the stars. Which alone spreadeth out the heavens, and treadeth upon the waves of the sea. Which maketh Arcturus, Orion, and Pleiades, and the chambers of the south. Which doeth great things past finding out; yea, and wonders without number. Lo, he goeth by me, and I see him not: he passeth on also, but I perceive him not. Behold, he taketh away, who can hinder him? Who will say unto him, What doest thou? If[33] God will not withdraw his anger, the proud helpers do stoop under him. How much less shall I answer him, and choose out my words to reason with him? Whom, though I were righteous, yet would I not answer, but I would make supplication to my judge. If I had called, and he had answered me; yet would I not believe that he had hearkened unto my voice. For he breaketh me with a tempest, and multiplieth my wounds without cause. He will not suffer me to take my breath, but filleth me with bitterness. If I speak of strength, lo, he is strong: and if of judgment, who shall set me a time to plead? If I justify myself, mine own mouth shall condemn me: if I say, I am perfect, it shall also prove me perverse. Though I were perfect, yet would I not know my soul: I would despise my life.[34] This is one thing, therefore I said it, He destroyeth the perfect and the wicked. If the scourge slay suddenly, he will laugh at the trial of the innocent. The earth is given into the hand of the wicked: he covereth the faces of the judges thereof; if not,[35] where, and who is he? Now my days are swifter than a post:[36] they flee away, they see no good. They are passed away as the swift ships:

32. one of a thousand questions.
33. In a more literal translation, If would be omitted.
34. In a more literal translation this sentence would read, "I am perfect, I regard not myself. I despise my life."
35. if not he.
36. courier.

as the eagle that hasteth to the prey. If I say, I will forget my complaint, I will leave off my heaviness, and comfort myself: I am afraid of all my sorrows, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent. If I be wicked, why then labour I in vain? If I wash myself with snow water, and make my hands never so clean; yet shalt thou plunge me in the ditch, and mine own clothes abhor me.[37] For he is not a man, as I am, that I should answer him, and we should come together in judgment. Neither is there any daysman[38] betwixt us, that might lay his hand upon us both. Let him take his rod away from me, and let not his fear terrify me: then would I speak, and not fear him; but it is not so with me.

10. My soul is weary of my life; I will leave[39] my complaint upon[40] myself; I will speak in the bitterness of my soul. I will say unto God, Do not condemn me; shew me wherefore thou contendest with me. Is it good unto thee that thou shouldest oppress, that thou shouldest despise the work of thine hands, and shine upon the counsel of the wicked? Hast thou eyes of flesh? or seest thou as man seeth?[41] Are thy days as the days of man? Are thy years as man's days,[42] that thou enquirest after mine iniquity, and searchest after my sin? Thou knowest that I am not wicked; and there is none that can deliver out of thine hand. Thine hands have made me and fashioned me together round about; yet thou dost destroy me. Remember, I beseech thee, that thou hast made me as the clay; and wilt thou bring me into dust again? Hast thou not poured me out as milk and curdled me like cheese? Thou hast clothed me with skin and flesh, and hast fenced me with bones and sinews. Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit. And these things hast thou hid in thine heart: I know that this is with thee.[43] If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity. If I be wicked, woe unto me; and if I be righteous, yet will I not lift up my head. I am full of confusion; therefore see thou mine affliction; for it increaseth. Thou huntest me as a fierce lion: and again thou shewest thyself marvellous upon me. Thou renewest thy witnesses[44] against me, and increasest thine indignation upon me; changes and war are against me. Wherefore then hast thou brought me forth out of the womb? Oh that I had given up the ghost, and no eye had seen me! I should have been as though I had not been; I should

37. shall abhor me.
38. arbitrator.
39. give free course to.
40. on behalf of.
41. Are you capable of mistakes, of seeing as a man sees?
42. Is your time, like man's, short, so that you have to judge hastily?
43. The meaning is, "My destruction (this) is your purpose." Job accuses God of planning his destruction while showing favor to him.
44. his afflictions, which prove (to his friends) his guilt.

have been carried from the womb to the grave. Are not my days few? Cease then, and let me alone, that I may take comfort a little, before I go whence I shall not return, even to the land of darkness and the shadow of death: a land of darkness, as darkness itself; and of the shadow of death, without any order, and where the light is as darkness.

11. Then answered Zophar the Naamathite, and said, Should not the multitude of words be answered? And should a man full of talk be justified? Should thy lies make men hold their peace? And when thou mockest, shall no man make thee ashamed? For thou hast said, My doctrine is pure, and I am clean in thine eyes. But oh that God would speak, and open his lips against thee; and that he would shew thee the secrets of wisdom, that they are double to that which is![45] Know therefore that God exacteth of thee less than thine iniquity deserveth. Canst thou by searching find out God? Canst thou find out the Almighty unto perfection? It is as high as heaven; what canst thou do? Deeper than hell; what canst thou know? The measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea. If he cut off, and shut up, or gather together,[46] then who can hinder him? For he knoweth vain men: he seeth wickedness also; will he not then consider it? For vain man would be wise, though man be born like a wild ass's colt. If thou prepare thine heart, and stretch out thine hands toward him; if iniquity be in thine hand, put it far away, and let not wickedness dwell in thy tabernacles. For then shalt thou lift up thy face without spot; yea, thou shalt be stedfast, and shalt not fear: because thou shalt forget thy misery, and remember it as waters that pass away: and thine age shall be clearer than the noonday; thou shalt shine forth, thou shalt be as the morning. And thou shalt be secure, because there is hope; yea, thou shalt dig[47] about thee, and thou shalt take thy rest in safety. Also thou shalt lie down, and none shall make thee afraid; yea, many shall make suit unto thee. But the eyes of the wicked shall fail, and they shall not escape, and their hope shall be as the giving up of the ghost.

12. And Job answered and said, No doubt but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you. But I have understanding as well as you; I am not inferior to you: yea, who knoweth not such things as these? I am as one mocked of his neighbour, who calleth upon God, and he answered him: the just upright man is laughed to scorn. He that is ready to slip with his feet is as a lamp despised in the thought of him that is at ease. The tabernacles of robbers prosper, and they that provoke God are secure; into whose hand God bringeth abundantly. But ask now the beasts, and they shall teach thee; and the fowls of the air, and they shall tell thee: or speak to the earth, and it shall teach thee: and the fishes of the sea shall declare unto thee. Who knoweth not in all these that the hand of the Lord hath wrought this? In whose hand is the soul of every living thing, and the breath of all mankind. Doth not the ear try words? and the mouth taste his meat? With the ancient is wisdom; and in length of days understanding. With him is wisdom and strength, he hath counsel and understanding. Behold, he breaketh down, and it cannot be built again: he shutteth up a man, and there can be no opening. Behold, he withholdeth the waters, and they dry up: also he sendeth them out, and they overturn the earth. With him is strength and wisdom: the deceived and the deceiver are his. He leadeth counsellors away spoiled, and maketh the judges fools. He looseth the bond of kings, and girdeth their loins with a girdle. He leadeth princes away spoiled, and overthroweth the mighty. He removeth away the speech of the trusty, and taketh away the understanding of the aged. He poureth contempt upon princes, and weakeneth the strength of the mighty. He discovereth deep things out of darkness, and bringeth out to light the shadow of death. He increaseth the nations, and destroyeth them: he enlargeth the nations, and straiteneth[48] them again. He taketh away the heart of the chief of the people of the earth, and causeth them to wander in a wilderness where there is no way. They grope in the dark without light, and he maketh them to stagger like a drunken man.

45. double to that which is: obscure in the original, usually taken to mean simply "manifold," "various."

46. for judgment.

47. search. The master inspects his property before retiring.

13. Lo, mine eye hath seen all this, mine ear hath heard and understood it. What ye know, the same do I know also: I am not inferior unto you. Surely I would speak to the Almighty, and I desire to reason with God. But ye are forgers of lies, ye are all physicians of no value. O that ye would altogether hold your peace! and it should be your wisdom. Hear now my reasoning, and hearken to the pleadings of my lips. Will ye speak wickedly for God? and talk deceitfully for him? Will ye accept[49] his person? Will ye contend for God? Is it good that he should search you out? or as one man mocketh another, do ye so mock him? He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons.[50] Shall not his excellency make you afraid? and his dread fall upon you? Your remembrances[51] are like unto ashes, your bodies to bodies of clay. Hold your peace, let me alone, that I may speak, and let come on me what will. Where-

48. contracts their boundaries.
49. respect.
50. This phrase seems to mean something like, "back the winning side for personal reasons."
51. memorable sayings.

fore do I take my flesh in my teeth,[52] and put my life in mine hand? Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him: but I will maintain mine own ways before him. He also shall be my salvation: for an hypocrite shall not come before him. Hear diligently my speech, and my declaration with your ears. Behold now, I have ordered my cause; I know that I shall be justified. Who is he that will plead with me?[53] for now, if I hold my tongue, I shall give up the ghost.[54] Only do not two things unto me: then will I not hide myself from thee.[55] Withdraw thine hand far from me: and let not thy dread make me afraid. Then call thou, and I will answer: or let me speak, and answer thou me. How many are mine iniquities and sins? Make me to know my transgression and my sin. Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and holdest me for thine enemy? Wilt thou break a leaf driven to and fro? and wilt thou pursue the dry stubble? For thou writest bitter things against me, and makest me to possess[56] the iniquities of my youth. Thou puttest my feet also in the stocks, and lookest narrowly unto all my paths; thou settest a print upon[57] the heels of my feet. And he,[58] as a rotten thing, consumeth, as a garment that is moth eaten.

14. Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of trouble. He cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down: he fleeth also as a shadow, and continueth not. And dost thou open thine eyes upon such an one, and bringest me into judgment with thee? Who can bring a clean thing out of an unclean? not one. Seeing his days are determined, the number of his months are with thee, thou hast appointed his bounds that he cannot pass; turn from him, that he may rest, till he shall accomplish, as an hireling, his day. For there is hope of a tree, if it be cut down, that it will sprout again, and that the tender branch thereof will not cease. Though the root thereof wax old in the earth, and the stock thereof die in the ground; yet through the scent of water it will bud, and bring forth boughs like a plant. But man dieth, and wasteth away: yea, man giveth up the ghost, and where is he? As the waters fail from the sea, and the flood decayeth and drieth up: so man lieth down, and riseth not: till the heavens be no more, they shall not awake, nor be raised out of their sleep. O that thou wouldest hide me in the grave, that thou wouldest keep me secret, until thy wrath be past, that thou wouldest appoint me a set time, and remember me! If a man die, shall he live again? All the days of my appointed time will

52. like a wild beast at bay, defending its life with its teeth.
53. accuse me.
54. In a more literal translation this would read, "If anyone does accuse me I shall hold my tongue and die."
55. He now addresses himself directly to God.
56. inherit.
57. drawest a line about.
58. the prisoner in the stocks, Job.

I wait, till my change[59] come. Thou shalt call, and I will answer thee: thou wilt have a desire to[60] the work of thine hands. For now thou numberest my steps: dost thou not watch over my sin? My transgression is sealed up in a bag, and thou sewest up mine iniquity. And surely the mountain falling cometh to nought, and the rock is removed out of his place. The waters wear the stones: thou washest away the things which grow out of the dust of the earth; and thou destroyest the hope of man. Thou prevailest for ever against him, and he passeth. thou changest his countenance, and sendest him away. His sons come to honour, and he knoweth it not; and they are brought low, but he perceiveth it not of them. But his flesh upon him shall have pain, and his soul within him shall mourn.

29. Moreover Job continued his parable, and said, Oh that I were as in months past, as in the days when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness; as I was in the days of my youth, when the secret of God was upon my tabernacle; when the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me; when I washed my steps with butter and the rock poured me out rivers of oil; when I went out to the gate[61] through the city, when I prepared my seat in the street! The young men saw me, and hid themselves: and the aged arose, and stood up. The princes refrained talking, and laid their hand on their mouth. The nobles held their peace, and their tongue cleaved to the roof of their mouth. When the ear heard me, then it blessed me; and when the eye saw me, it gave witness to me: because I delivered the poor that cried, and the fatherless, and him that had none to help him. The blessing of him that was ready to perish came upon me: and I caused the widow's heart to sing for joy. I put on righteousness, and it clothed me: my judgment was as a robe and a diadem. I was eyes to the blind, and feet was I to the lame. I was a father to the poor: and the cause which I knew not I searched out. And I brake the jaws of the wicked, and plucked the spoil out of his teeth. Then I said, I shall die in my nest, and I shall multiply my days as the sand. My root was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch. My glory was fresh in me, and my bow was renewed in my hand. Unto me men gave ear, and waited, and kept silence at my counsel. After my words they spake not again; and my speech dropped upon them. And they waited for me as for the rain; and they opened their mouth wide as for the latter rain. If I laughed on them, they believed it not;[62]

59. release.
60. for.
61. The town meeting place and law court was just inside the gate.
62. obscure in the original; perhaps, "I smiled on them and they were confident."

and the light of my countenance they cast not down. I chose out their way, and sat chief, and dwelt as a king in the army, as one that comforteth the mourners.

30. But now they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my flock. Yea, whereto might the strength of their hands profit me,[63] in whom old age was perished? For want and famine they were solitary; fleeing into the wilderness in former time desolate and waste. Who cut up mallows by the bushes, and juniper roots for their meat. They were driven forth from among men, (they cried after them as after a thief;) to dwell in the cliffs of the valleys, in caves of the earth, and in the rocks. Among the bushes they brayed; under the nettles they were gathered together. They were children of fools, yea, children of base men: they were viler than the earth. And now am I their song, yea, I am their byword. They abhor me, they flee far from me, and spare not to spit in my face. Because he hath loosed my cord, and afflicted me, they have also let loose the bridle before me. Upon my right hand rise the youth; they push away my feet, and they raise up against me the ways of their destruction. They mar my path, they set forward my calamity, they have no helper.[64] They came upon me as a wide breaking in of waters: in the desolation they rolled themselves upon me. Terrors are turned upon me: they pursue my soul as the wind: and my welfare passeth away as a cloud. And now my soul is poured out upon[65] me; the days of affliction have taken hold upon me. My bones are pierced in me in the night season: and my sinews take no rest. By the great force of my disease is my garment changed: it bindeth me about as the collar of my coat. He hath cast me into the mire, and I am become like dust and ashes. I cry unto thee, and thou dost not hear me: I stand up, and thou regardest me not. Thou art become cruel to me: with thy strong hand thou opposest thyself against me. Thou liftest me up to the wind; thou causest me to ride upon it, and dissolvest my substance. For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living. Howbeit he will not stretch out his hand to the grave, though they cry in his destruction.[66] Did not I weep for him that was in trouble? Was not my soul grieved for the poor? When I looked for good, then evil came unto me: and when I waited for light, there came darkness. My bowels boiled, and rested not: the days of affliction prevented me.[67] I went mourning without the sun: I stood up,

63. They were too old to work.
64. they have no helper: The text is uncertain at this point.
65. within.
66. This sentence is unintelligible in the original.
67. came upon me.

and I cried in the congregation. I am a brother to dragons, and a companion to owls. My skin is black upon me, and my bones are burned with heat. My harp also is turned to mourning, and my organ[68] into the voice of them that weep.

31. I made a covenant with mine eyes; why then should I think upon a maid? For what portion of God is there from above? and what inheritance of the Almighty from on high? Is not destruction to the wicked? and a strange punishment to the workers of iniquity? Doth not he see my ways, and count all my steps? If I have walked with vanity, or if my foot hath hasted to deceit; let me be weighed in an even balance, that God may know mine integrity. If my step hath turned out of the way, and mine heart walked after mine eyes, and if any blot hath cleaved to mine hands; then let me sow, and let another eat; yea, let my offspring be rooted out. If mine heart have been deceived by a woman, or if I have laid wait at my neighbour's door; then let my wife grind unto another, and let others bow down upon her. For this is an heinous crime; yea, it is an iniquity to be punished by the judges. For it is a fire that consumeth to destruction, and would root out all mine increase.

If I did despise the cause of my manservant or of my maidservant, when they contended with me; what then shall I do when God riseth up? and when he visiteth, what shall I answer him? Did not he that made me in the womb make him? and did not one fashion us in the womb? If I have withheld the poor from their desire, or have caused the eyes of the widow to fail; or have eaten my morsel myself alone, and the fatherless hath not eaten thereof; (For from my youth he was brought up with me, as with a father, and I have guided her from my mother's womb;) if I have seen any perish for want of clothing, or any poor without covering; if his loins have not blessed me, and if he were not warmed with the fleece of my sheep; if I have lifted up my hand against the fatherless, when I saw my help in the gate:[69] then let mine arm fall from my shoulder blade, and mine arm be broken from the bone. For destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure. If I have made gold my hope, or have said to the fine gold, Thou art my confidence; if I rejoiced because my wealth was great, and because mine hand had gotten much; if I beheld the sun when it shined, or the moon walking in brightness; and my heart hath been secretly enticed, or my mouth hath kissed my hand:[70] this also were an iniquity to be punished by the judge: for I should have denied the God that is above.

68. pipe.

69. The gate is the court; the clause means, "when I had influence in the court."

70. my heart . . . my hand: idolatrous acts of worship of the sun and moon.

If I rejoiced at the destruction of him that hated me, or lifted up myself when evil found him: neither have I suffered my mouth to sin by wishing a curse to his soul. If the men of my tabernacle said not, Oh that we had of his flesh! We cannot be satisfied.[71] The stranger did not lodge in the street: but I opened my doors to the traveller. If I covered my transgressions as Adam, by hiding mine iniquity in my bosom: did I fear a great multitude, or did the contempt of families terrify me, that I kept silence, and went not out of the door? Oh that one would hear me! Behold, my desire is, that the Almighty would answer me, and that mine adversary had written a book. Surely I would take it upon my shoulder, and bind it as a crown to me. I would declare unto him the number of my steps; as a prince would I go near unto him. If my land cry against me, or that the furrows likewise thereof complain; if I have eaten the fruits thereof without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life: let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley. The words of Job are ended.

. . .

38. Then the Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind, and said, Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge? Gird up now thy loins like a man; for I will demand of thee, and answer thou me. Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding. Who hath laid the measures thereof, if thou knowest? or who hath stretched the line upon it? Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? or who laid the corner stone thereof; when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy? Or who shut up the sea with doors, when it brake forth, as if it had issued out of the womb? When I made the cloud the garment thereof, and thick darkness a swaddlingband for it, and brake up for it my decreed place,[72] and set bars and doors, and said, Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further: and here shall thy proud waves be stayed? Hast thou commanded the morning since thy days; and caused the dayspring[73] to know his place; that it might take hold of the ends of the earth, that the wicked might be shaken out of it? It is turned as clay to the seal;[74] and they[75] stand as a garment. And from the wicked their light is withholden, and the high arm shall be broken. Hast thou entered into the springs of the sea? or hast thou walked in the search of the depth? Have the gates of death been opened unto

71. Translated literally, the statement of the men of the tabernacle should probably read, "Who can find one that hath not been satisfied with his flesh?" i.e., with meat from his flocks.

72. the broken coastline.

73. dawn.

74. A more literal translation would read, "changed as clay under the seal."

75. all things. God is describing the moment of the creation of the universe.

thee? or hast thou seen the doors of the shadow of death? Hast thou perceived the breadth of the earth? Declare if thou knowest it all. Where is the way where light dwelleth? And as for darkness, where is the place thereof, that thou shouldest take it to the bound thereof, and that thou shouldest know the paths to the house thereof? Knowest thou it, because thou wast then born? or because the number of thy days is great? Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail, which I have reserved against the time of trouble, against the day of battle and war? By what way is the light parted, which scattereth the east wind upon the earth?[76] Who hath divided a watercourse for the overflowing of waters, or a way for the lightning of thunder; to cause it to rain on the earth, where no man is; on the wilderness, wherein there is no man; to satisfy the desolate and waste ground; and to cause the bud of the tender herb to spring forth? Hath the rain a father? or who hath begotten the drops of dew? Out of whose womb came the ice? And the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it? The waters are hid as with a stone, and the face of the deep is frozen. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion? Canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth[77] in his season? or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons? Knowest thou the ordinances of heaven? Canst thou set the dominion thereof in the earth? Canst thou lift up thy voice to the clouds, that abundance of waters may cover thee? Canst thou send lightnings, that they may go, and say unto thee, Here we are? Who hath put wisdom in the inward parts? or who hath given understanding to the heart? Who can number the clouds in wisdom? or who can stay the bottles of heaven, when the dust groweth into hardness, and the clods cleave fast together? Wilt thou hunt the prey for the lion? or fill the appetite of the young lion, when they couch in their dens, and abide in the covert to lie in wait? Who provideth for the raven his food? when his young ones cry unto God, they[78] wander for lack of meat.

39. Knowest thou the time when the wild goats of the rock bring forth? or canst thou mark when the hinds do calve? Canst thou number the months that they fulfil? or knowest thou the time when they bring forth? They bow themselves, they bring forth their young ones, they cast out their sorrows. Their young ones are in good liking, they grow up with corn; they go forth, and return not unto them. Who hath sent out the wild ass free? or who hath loosed the bands of the wild ass? Whose house I have made the wilderness, and the barren land his dwellings. He scorneth the

76. more literally, "and the east wind scattered upon the earth."

77. meaning disputed; it may be a name for the signs of the zodiac, or for some particular constellation.

78. more literally, "and."

multitude of the city, neither regardeth he the crying of the driver. The range of the mountains is his pasture, and he searcheth after every green thing. Will the unicorn[79] be willing to serve thee, or abide by thy crib? Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee? Wilt thou trust him, because his strength is great? or wilt thou leave thy labour to him? Wilt thou believe him, that he will bring home thy seed, and gather it into thy barn? Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings and feathers unto the ostrich? Which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and warmeth them in dust, and forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them. She is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not her's: her labour is in vain without fear;[80] because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding. What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider. Hast thou given the horse strength? Hast thou clothed his neck with thunder? Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper? The glory of his nostrils is terrible. He paweth in the valley, and rejoiceth in his strength: he goeth on to meet the armed men. He mocketh at fear, and is not affrighted; neither turneth he back from the sword. The quiver rattleth against him, the glittering spear and the shield. He swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage: neither believeth he that it is the sound of the trumpet. He saith among the trumpets, Ha, ha; and he smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains, and the shouting. Doth the hawk fly by thy wisdom, and stretch her wings toward the south? Doth the eagle mount up at thy command, and make her nest on high? She dwelleth and abideth on the rock, upon the crag of the rock, and the strong place. From thence she seeketh the prey, and her eyes behold afar off. Her young ones also suck up blood: and where the slain are, there is she.

40. Moreover the Lord answered Job, and said, Shall he that contendeth with the Almighty instruct him? He that reproveth God, let him answer it.

Then Job answered the Lord, and said, Behold, I am vile; what shall I answer thee? I will lay mine hand upon my mouth. Once have I spoken; but I will not answer: yea, twice; but I will proceed no further.

Then answered the Lord unto Job out of the whirlwind, and said, Gird up thy loins now like a man: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. Wilt thou also disannul my judgment? Wilt thou condemn me, that thou mayest be righteous? Hast thou an arm like God? or canst thou thunder with a voice like him? Deck thyself now with majesty and excellency; and array thyself with glory and beauty. Cast abroad the rage of thy wrath: and behold every one that is proud, and abase him. Look on every one that is proud, and bring him low; and tread down the wicked in their place. Hide them in the dust together; and bind their faces in secret. Then will I also confess unto thee that thine own right hand can save thee.

79. a mythical beast with one horn in the center of his forehead. The Hebrew is less imaginative; it says, "wild ox."

80. though her labor is in vain, she is without fear.

Behold now behemoth,[81] which I made with thee; he eateth grass as an ox. Lo now, his strength is in his loins, and his force is in the navel of his belly. He moveth his tail like a cedar: the sinews of his stone[82] are wrapped together. His bones are as strong pieces of brass; his bones are like bars of iron. He is the chief of the ways of God: he that made him can make his sword to approach unto him. Surely the mountains bring him forth food, where all the beasts of the field play. He lieth under the shady trees, in the covert of the reed, and fens. The shady trees cover him with their shadow; the willows of the brook compass him about. Behold, he drinketh up a river, and hasteth not: he trusteth that he can draw up Jordan into his mouth. He taketh it with his eyes:[83] his nose pierceth through snares.

41. Canst thou draw out leviathan[84] with an hook?[85] or his tongue with a cord which thou lettest down? Canst thou put an hook into his nose? or bore his jaw through with a thorn? Will he make many supplications unto thee? will he speak soft words unto thee? Will he make a covenant with thee? wilt thou take him for a servant for ever? Wilt thou play with him as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens? Shall the companions make a banquet of him? Shall they part him among the merchants? Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons? or his head with fish spears? Lay thine hand upon him, remember the battle, do no more. Behold, the hope of him is in vain: shall not one be cast down even at the sight of him? None is so fierce that dare stir him up: who then is able to stand before me? Who hath prevented[86] me, that I should repay him? Whatsoever is under the whole heaven is mine. I will not conceal his parts, nor his power, nor his comely proportion. Who can discover[87] the face of his garment?[88] or who can come to him with his double bridle? Who can open the doors of his face? His teeth are terrible round about. His scales are his pride, shut up together as with a close seal. One is so near to another, that

81. generally identified with the hippopotamus.
82. A more literal translation would read, "thighs."
83. obscure in the original; probably, "None can attack him in the eyes."
84. here probably the crocodile.
85. The Greek historian Herodotus tells how the Egyptians captured the crocodile with a hook.
86. given anything to me first.
87. strip off.
88. his scales.

no air can come between them. They are joined one to another, they stick together, that they cannot be sundered. By his neesings[89] a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eyelids of the morning. Out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out. Out of his nostrils goeth smoke, as out of a seething pot or caldron. His breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth. In his neck remaineth strength, and sorrow is turned into joy before him. The flakes of his flesh are joined together: they are firm in themselves; they cannot be moved. His heart is as firm as a stone; yea, as hard as a piece of the nether millstone. When he raiseth up himself, the mighty are afraid: by reason of breakings they purify themselves.[90] The sword of him that layeth at him cannot hold: the spear, the dart, nor the habergeon. He esteemeth iron as straw, and brass as rotten wood. The arrow cannot make him flee: slingstones are turned with him into stubble. Darts are counted as stubble: he laugheth at the shaking of a spear. Sharp stones are under him: he spreadeth sharp pointed things upon the mire. He maketh the deep to boil like a pot: he maketh the sea like a pot of ointment. He maketh a path to shine after him; one would think the deep to be hoary.[91] Upon earth there is not his like, who is made without fear. He beholdeth all high things: he is a king over all the children of pride.

42. Then Job answered the Lord, and said, I know that thou canst do every thing, and that no thought can be withholden from thee. Who is he that hideth counsel without knowledge? Therefore have I uttered that I understood not; things too wonderful for me, which I knew not. Hear, I beseech thee, and I will speak: I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me. I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear: but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes.

And it was so, that after the Lord had spoken these words unto Job, the Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite, My wrath is kindled against thee, and against thy two friends: for ye have not spoken of me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath. Therefore take unto you now seven bullocks and seven rams, and go to my servant Job, and offer up for yourselves a burnt offering; and my servant Job shall pray for you: for him will I accept: lest I deal with you after your folly, in that ye have not spoken of me the thing which is right, like my servant Job. So Eliphaz the Temanite and Bildad the Shuhite and Zophar the Naamathite went, and did according as the Lord commanded them: the Lord also accepted Job. And

89. his breath (compare, "sneeze"). The vapor exhaled by the crocodile appears luminous in the sunlight.

90. a corrupt text. The clause probably should read, "in consternation they are beside themselves."

91. white (with foam).

the Lord turned the captivity[92] of Job, when he prayed for his friends: also the Lord gave Job twice as much as he had before. Then came there unto him all his brethren, and all his sisters, and all they that had been of his acquaintance before, and did eat bread with him in his house: and they bemoaned him, and comforted him over all the evil that the Lord had brought upon him: every man also gave him a piece of money, and every one an earring of gold. So the Lord blessed the latter end of Job more than his beginning: for he had fourteen thousand sheep, and six thousand camels, and a thousand yoke of oxen, and a thousand she asses. He had also seven sons and three daughters. And he called the name of the first, Jemima; and the name of the second, Kezia; and the name of the third, Kerenhappuch. And in all the land were no women found so fair as the daughters of Job: and their father gave them inheritance among their brethren. After this lived Job an hundred and forty years, and saw his sons, and his sons' sons, even four generations. So Job died, being old and full of days.

92. changed the fortune.

Ecclesiastes
*or, The Preacher

1. . . . Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher, vanity of vanities; all is vanity.[1] What profit hath a man of all his labour which he taketh under the sun? One generation passeth away, and another generation cometh: but the earth abideth for ever. The sun also ariseth, and the sun goeth down and hasteth to his place where he arose. The wind goeth toward the south, and turneth about unto the north; it whirleth about continually, and the wind returneth again according to his circuits. All the rivers run into the sea; yet the sea is not full; unto the place from whence the rivers come, thither they return again. All things are full of labour; man cannot utter it; the eye is not satisfied with seeing, nor the ear filled with hearing. The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be; and that which is done is that which shall be done: and there is no new thing under the sun. Is there any thing whereof it may be said, See, this is new? it hath been already of old time, which was before us. There is no remembrance of former things; neither shall there be any remembrance of things that are to come with those that shall come after.

I the Preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem. And I gave my heart to seek and search out by wisdom concerning all things that are done under heaven: this sore travail hath God given to the sons of man to be exercised therewith. I have seen all the works that are done under the sun; and, behold, all is vanity and vexation of spirit. That which is crooked cannot be made straight: and that which is wanting cannot be numbered. I communed with mine own heart, saying, Lo, I am come to great estate, and have gotten more wisdom than all they that have been before me in Jerusalem: yea, my heart had great experience of wisdom and knowledge. And I gave my heart to know wisdom, and to know madness and folly: I perceived that this also is vexation of spirit. For in much wisdom is much grief: and he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow.

* Selections (1:2–18; 2:1–24; 3; 9:2–12; 11; 12:1–8).

1. vanity: emptiness.

2. I said in mine heart, Go to now, I will prove thee with mirth,[2] therefore enjoy pleasure: and, behold, this also is vanity. I said of laughter, It is mad: and of mirth, What doeth it? I sought in mine heart to give myself unto wine, yet acquainting mine heart with wisdom; and to lay hold on folly, till I might see what was that good for the sons of men, which they should do under the heaven all the days of their life. I made me great works; I builded me houses; I planted me vineyards: I made me gardens and orchards, and I planted trees in them of all kinds of fruits: I made me pools of water, to water therewith the wood that bringeth forth trees; I got me servants[3] and maidens, and had servants born in my house; also I had great possessions of great and small cattle above all that were in Jerusalem before me: I gathered me also silver and gold, and the peculiar treasure of kings and of the provinces: I gat me men singers and women singers, and the delights of the sons of men, as musical instruments, and that of all sorts. So I was great, and increased more than all that were before me in Jerusalem: also my wisdom remained with me. And whatsoever mine eyes desired I kept not from them, I withheld not my heart from any joy; for my heart rejoiced in all my labour: and this was my portion of all my labour. Then I looked on all the works that my hands had wrought, and on the labour that I had laboured to do: and, behold, all was vanity and vexation of spirit, and there was no profit under the sun.

And I turned myself to behold wisdom, and madness, and folly: for what can the man do that cometh after the king? even that which hath been already done. Then I saw that wisdom excelleth folly, as far as light excelleth darkness. The wise man's eyes are in his head; but the fool walketh in darkness: and I myself perceived also that one event happeneth to them all. Then said I in my heart, As it happeneth to the fool, so it happeneth even to me; and why was I then more wise? Then I said in my heart, that this also is vanity. For there is no remembrance of the wise more than of the fool for ever; seeing that which now is in the days to come shall all be forgotten. And how dieth the wise man? as the fool. Therefore I hated life; because the work that is wrought under the sun is grievous unto me: for all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

2. prove thee with mirth: i.e., I will try pleasure.

3. servants: slaves.

Yea, I hated all my labour which I had taken under the sun: because I should leave it unto the man that shall be after me. And who knoweth whether he shall be a wise man or a fool? yet shall he have rule over all my labour wherein I have laboured, and wherein I have shewed myself wise under the sun. This is also vanity. Therefore I went about to cause my heart to despair of all the labour which I took under the sun. For there is a man whose labour is in wisdom, and in knowledge, and in equity; yet to a man that hath not laboured therein shall he leave it for his portion. This also is vanity and a great evil. For what hath man of all his labour, and of the vexation of his heart, wherein he hath laboured under the sun? For all his days are sorrows, and his travail grief; yea, his heart taketh not rest in the night. This is also vanity.

There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his soul enjoy good in his labour. This also I saw, that it was from the hand of God.

3. To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven: A time to be born, and a time to die; a time to plant, and a time to pluck up that which is planted; A time to kill, and a time to heal; a time to break down, and a time to build up; A time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance; A time to cast away stones, and a time to gather stones together; a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing; A time to get, and a time to lose; a time to keep, and a time to cast away; A time to rend, and a time to sew; a time to keep silence, and a time to speak; A time to love, and a time to hate; a time of war, and a time of peace. What profit hath he that worketh in that wherein he laboureth? I have seen the travail,[4] which God hath given to the sons of men to be exercised in it. He hath made every thing beautiful in his time; also he hath set the world in their heart, so that no man can find out the work that God maketh from the beginning to the end. I know that there is no good in them, but for a man to rejoice, and to do good in his life. And also that every man should eat and drink, and enjoy the good of all his labour, it is the gift of God. I know that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it; and God doeth it, that men should fear before him. That which hath been is now; and that which is to be hath already been; and God requireth[5] that which is past.

And moreover I saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there; and the place of righteousness, that iniquity was there. I said in mine heart, God shall judge the righteous and the wicked: for there is a time there for every purpose and for every work. I said in mine heart concerning the estate of the sons of men,

4. travail: labor.

5. requireth: calls back.

that God might manifest[6] them and that they might see that they themselves are beasts. For that which befalleth the sons of men befalleth beasts; even one thing befalleth them; as the one dieth, so dieth the other; yea, they have all one breath; so that a man hath no preeminence above a beast: for all is vanity. All go unto one place; all are of the dust, and all turn to dust again. Who knoweth the spirit of man that goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast that goeth downward to the earth?[7] Wherefore I perceive that there is nothing better, than that a man should rejoice in his own works; for that is his portion; for who shall bring him to see what shall be after him?

9. . . . All things come alike to all: there is one event to the righteous and to the wicked; to the good and to the clean, and to the unclean; to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not; as is the good, so is the sinner; and he that sweareth, as he that feareth[8] an oath. This is an evil among all things that are done under the sun, that there is one event unto all: yea, also the heart of the sons of men is full of evil, and madness is in their heart while they live, and after that they go to the dead.

For to him that is joined to all the living there is hope: for a living dog is better than a dead lion. For the living know that they shall die: but the dead know not any thing, neither have they any more a reward; for the memory of them is forgotten. Also their love, and their hatred, and their envy, is now perished; neither have they any more a portion for ever in any thing that is done under the sun.

Go thy way, eat thy bread with joy, and drink thy wine with a merry heart; for God now accepteth thy works. Let thy garments be always white; and let thy head lack no ointment. Live joyfully with the wife whom thou lovest all the days of the life of thy vanity, which he hath given thee under the sun, all the days of thy vanity; for that is thy portion in this life, and in thy labour which thou takest under the sun. Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom, in the grave, whither thou goest.

I returned, and saw under the sun, that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill; but time and chance happeneth to them all. For man also knoweth not his time: as the fishes that are taken in an evil net, and as the birds that are caught in the snare; so are the sons of men snared in an evil time, when it falleth suddenly upon them.

6. manifest: make clear.
7. Who knows whether the spirit of man goes upward or whether . . . ?
8. feareth: dares not take the oath (that he is innocent).

11. Cast thy bread upon the waters: for thou shalt find it after many days. Give a portion to seven, and also to eight; for thou knowest not what evil shall be upon the earth. If the clouds be full of rain, they empty themselves upon the earth: and if the tree fall toward the south, or toward the north, in the place where the tree falleth, there shall it be. He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap. As thou knowest not what is the way of the spirit, nor how the bones do grow in the womb of her that is with child: even so thou knowest not the works of God who maketh all. In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thine hand: for thou knowest not whether shall prosper, either this or that, or whether they both shall be alike good.

Truly the light is sweet, and a pleasant thing it is for the eyes to behold the sun: But if a man live many years, and rejoice in them all; yet let him remember the days of darkness; for they shall be many. All that cometh is vanity.

Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth; and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes: but know thou, that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment. Therefore remove sorrow from thy heart, and put away evil from thy flesh, for childhood and youth are vanity.

12. Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth, while the evil days come not, nor the years draw nigh, when thou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them; While the sun, or the light, or the moon, or the stars, be not darkened, nor the clouds return after the rain: In the day when the keepers of the house shall tremble, and the strong men shall bow themselves, and the grinders[9] cease because they are few, and those that look out of the windows be darkened, And the doors shall be shut in the streets, when the sound of the grinding is low, and he shall rise up at the voice of the bird, and all the daughters of musick shall be brought low; Also when they shall be afraid of that which is high, and fears shall be in the way, and the almond tree shall flourish, and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desire shall fail: because man goeth to his long home, and the mourners go about the streets: Or ever the silver cord be loosed, or the golden bowl be broken, or the pitcher be broken at the fountain, or the wheel broken at the cistern. Then shall the dust return to the earth as it was: and the spirit shall return unto God who gave it.

Vanity of vanities, saith the preacher; all is vanity.

9. grinders: the servants grinding the wheat at the mill.

Psalm 8

1. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth! who hast set thy glory above the heavens.
2. Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings hast thou ordained strength because of thine enemies, that thou mightest still the enemy and the avenger.
3. When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained;
4. What is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?
5. For thou hast made him a little lower than the angels, and hast crowned him with glory and honour.
6. Thou madest him to have dominion over the works of thy hands; thou hast put all things under his feet:
7. All sheep and oxen, yea, and the beasts of the field;
8. The fowl of the air, and the fish of the sea, and whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas.
9. O Lord our Lord, how excellent is thy name in all the earth!

Psalm 19

1. The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handywork.
2. Day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night sheweth knowledge.
3. There is no speech nor language, where their voice is not heard.
4. Their line is gone out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world. In them hath he set a tabernacle for the sun,
5. Which is as a bridegroom coming out of his chamber, and rejoiceth as a strong man to run a race.
6. His going forth is from the end of the heaven, and his circuit unto the ends of it: and there is nothing hid from the heat thereof.
7. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, making wise the simple.
8. The statutes of the Lord are right. rejoicing the heart: the commandment of the Lord is pure, enlightening the eyes.
9. The fear of the Lord is clean, enduring for ever: the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether.
10. More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold: sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.
11. Moreover by them is thy servant warned: and in keeping of them there is great reward.

12. Who can understand his errors? cleanse thou me from secret faults.

13. Keep back thy servant also from presumptuous sins; let them not have dominion over me: then shall I be upright, and I shall be innocent from the great transgression.

14. Let the words of my mouth, and the meditation of my heart, be acceptable in thy sight, O Lord, my strength, and my redeemer.

Psalm 23

1. The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want.

2. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures: he leadeth me beside the still waters.

3. He restoreth my soul: he leadeth me in the paths of righteousness for his name's sake.

4. Yea, though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil: for thou art with me; thy rod and thy staff they comfort me.

5. Thou preparest a table before me in the presence of mine enemies: thou anointest my head with oil; my cup runneth over.

6. Surely goodness and mercy shall follow me all the days of my life: and I will dwell in the house of the Lord for ever.

Psalm 104

1. Bless the Lord, O my soul. O Lord my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty.

2. Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:

3. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: who maketh the clouds his chariot: who walketh upon the wings of the wind:

4. Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire:

5. Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever.

6. Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains.

7. At thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away.

8. They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them.

9. Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not again to cover the earth.

10. He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills.

11. They give drink to every beast of the field: the wild asses quench their thirst.

12. By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches.

13. He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.

14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth;

15. And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

16. The trees of the Lord are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted;

17. Where the birds make their nests: as for the stork, the fir trees are her house.

18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats; and the rocks for the conies.

19. He appointed the moon for seasons: the sun knoweth his going down.

20. Thou makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.

21. The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God.

22. The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens.

23. Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening.

24. O Lord, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches.

25. So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts.

26. There go the ships: there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein.

27. These wait all upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season.

28. That thou givest them they gather: thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good.

29. Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust.

30. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth.

31. The glory of the Lord shall endure for ever: the Lord shall rejoice in his works.

32. He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: he toucheth the hills, and they smoke.

33. I will sing unto the Lord as long as I live: I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.

34. My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the Lord.

35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the Lord, O my soul. Praise ye the Lord.

Psalm 137

1. By the rivers of Babylon,[1] there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

2. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof.

3. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4. How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?

5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

6. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

7. Remember, O Lord, the children of Edom[2] in the day of Jerusalem; who said, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof.

8. O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be, that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us.

9. Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.

1. on the river Euphrates. Jerusalem was captured and sacked by the Babylonians in 586 B.C. The Jews were taken away into captivity in Babylon.
2. The Edomites helped the Babylonians to capture Jerusalem.

Jonah

1. Now the word of the Lord came unto Jonah the son of Amittai, saying, Arise, go to Nineveh,[1] that great city, and cry against it; for their wickedness is come up before me. But Jonah rose up to flee unto Tarshish[2] from the presence of the Lord, and went down to Joppa;[3] and he found a ship going to Tarshish: so he paid the fare thereof, and went down into it, to go with them unto Tarshish from the presence of the Lord. But the Lord sent out a great wind into the sea, and there was a mighty tempest in the sea, so that the ship was like to be broken. Then the mariners were afraid, and cried every man unto his god, and cast forth the wares that were in the ship into the sea, to lighten it of them. But Jonah was gone down into the sides of the ship; and he lay, and was fast asleep. So the shipmaster came to him, and said unto him, What meanest thou, O sleeper? arise, call upon thy God, if so be that God will think upon us, that we perish not. And they said every one to his fellow, Come, and let us cast lots, that we may know for whose cause this

1. Nineveh: on the river Tigris, the capital city of the Assyrians.
2. Tarshish: probably Tartessus, in Spain. Jonah intends to go west (instead of east to Nineveh) and as far away as he can.
3. Joppa: seaport on the coast of Palestine.

evil is upon us. So they cast lots, and the lot fell upon Jonah. Then said they unto him, Tell us, we pray thee, for whose cause this evil is upon us; What is thine occupation? and whence comest thou? what is thy country? and of what people art thou? And he said unto them, I am an Hebrew; and I fear the Lord, the God of heaven, which hath made the sea and the dry land. Then were the men exceedingly afraid, and said unto him, Why hast thou done this? For the men knew that he fled from the presence of the Lord, because he had told them. Then said they unto him, What shall we do unto thee, that the sea may be calm unto us? for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous. And he said unto them, Take me up, and cast me forth into the sea; so shall the sea be calm unto you: for I know that for my sake this great tempest is upon you. Nevertheless the men rowed hard to bring it to the land; but they could not: for the sea wrought, and was tempestuous against them. Wherefore they cried unto the Lord, and said, We beseech thee, O Lord, we beseech thee, let us not perish for this man's life, and lay not upon us innocent blood: for thou, O Lord, hast done as it pleased thee. So they took up Jonah, and cast him forth into the sea: and the sea ceased from her raging. Then the men feared the Lord exceedingly, and offered a sacrifice unto the Lord, and made vows.

Now the Lord had prepared a great fish to swallow up Jonah. And Jonah was in the belly of the fish three days and three nights.

2. Then Jonah prayed unto the Lord his God out of the fish's belly, And said, I cried by reason of mine affliction unto the Lord, and he heard me; out of the belly of hell cried I, and thou heardest my voice. For thou hadst cast me into the deep, in the midst of the seas; and the floods compassed me about; all thy billows and thy waves passed over me. Then I said, I am cast out of thy sight; yet I will look again toward thy holy temple. The waters compassed me about, even to the soul: the depth closed me round about, the weeds were wrapped about my head. I went down to the bottoms of the mountains; the earth with her bars was about me for ever: yet hast thou brought up my life from corruption, O Lord my God. When my soul fainted within me I remembered the Lord: and my prayer came in unto thee, into thine holy temple. They that observe lying vanities forsake their own mercy.[4] But I will sacrifice unto thee with the voice of thanksgiving; I will pay that that I have vowed. Salvation is of the Lord. And the Lord spake unto the fish, and it vomited out Jonah upon the dry land.

4. The general sense is: "those that worship false gods forfeit their claim to mercy."

3. And the word of the Lord came unto Jonah the second time, saying, Arise, go unto Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee. So Jonah arose, and went unto Nineveh, according to the word of the Lord. Now Nineveh was an exceeding great city of three days' journey. And Jonah began to enter into the city a day's journey, and he cried, and said. Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.

So the people of Nineveh believed God, and proclaimed a fast, and put on sackcloth, from the greatest of them even to the least of them. For word came unto the king of Nineveh, and he arose from his throne, and he laid his robe from him, and covered him with sackcloth, and sat in ashes. And he caused it to be proclaimed and published through Nineveh by the decree of the king and his nobles, saying, Let neither man nor beast, herd nor flock, taste any thing: let them not feed, nor drink water: But let man and beast be covered with sackcloth, and cry mightily unto God: yea, let them turn every one from his evil way, and from the violence that is in their hands. Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not?

And God saw their works, that they turned from their evil way; and God repented of the evil, that he had said that he would do unto them; and he did it not.

4. But it displeased Jonah exceedingly, and he was very angry. And he prayed unto the Lord, and said, I pray thee, O Lord, was not this my saying, when I was yet in my country? Therefore I fled before unto Tarshish: for I knew that thou art a gracious God, and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil.[5] Therefore now, O Lord, take, I beseech thee, my life from me; for it is better for me to die than to live. Then said the Lord, Doest thou well to be angry? So Jonah went out of the city, and sat on the east side of the city, and there made him a booth,[6] and sat under it in the shadow, till he might see what would become of the city. And the Lord God prepared a gourd,[7] and made it to come up over Jonah, that it might be a shadow over his head, to deliver him from his grief. So Jonah was exceeding glad of the gourd. But God prepared a worm when the morning rose the next day, and it smote the gourd that it withered. And it came to pass, when the sun did arise, that God prepared a vehement east wind; and the sun beat upon the head of Jonah, that he fainted, and wished in himself to die, and said, It is better for me to die than to live. And God said to Jonah, Doest thou well to be angry for the gourd? And he said, I do well to be angry, even unto death.

5. a gracious God . . . evil: Jonah is quoting Scripture (Exodus 34:6).

6. booth: a tent shelter.

7. gourd: some kind of climbing plant.

Then said the Lord, Thou hast had pity on the gourd, for the which thou hast not laboured, neither madest it grow; which came up in a night, and perished in a night: And should not I spare Nineveh, that great city, wherein are more than sixscore thousand persons that cannot discern between their right hand and their left hand;[8] and also much cattle?

8. i.e., children.

Isaiah 52–53. [The Song of the Suffering Servant]

52:13. Behold, my servant shall deal prudently, he shall be exalted and extolled, and be very high.

14. As many were astonied at thee; his visage was so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men:

15. So shall he sprinkle many nations; the kings shall shut their mouths at him: for that which had not been told them shall they see; and that which they had not heard shall they consider.

53:1. Who hath believed our report? and to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?

2. For he shall grow up before him as a tender plant, and as a root out of a dry ground: he hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see him, there is no beauty that we should desire him.

3. He is despised and rejected of men; a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief: and we hid as it were our faces from him; he was despised, and we esteemed him not.

4. Surely he hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows: yet we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted.

5. But he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed.

6. All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.

7. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth.

8. He was taken from prison and from judgment: and who shall declare his generation? for he was cut off out of the land of the living: for the transgression of my people was he stricken.

9. And he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich[1] in his death; because he had done no violence, neither was any deceit in his mouth.

1. Some editors emend the Hebrew to give the meaning, "evildoers."

10. Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise him; he hath put him to grief: when thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin, he shall see his seed, he shall prolong his days, and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in his hand.

11. He shall see the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied: by his knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many; for he shall bear their iniquities.

12. Therefore will I divide him a portion with the great, and he shall divide the spoil with the strong; because he hath poured out his soul unto death: and he was numbered with the transgressors; and he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors.

HOMER
The Iliad *

Book I

[The Quarrel of Akhilleus and Agamemnon]

Anger be now your song, immortal one,
Akhilleus' anger, doomed and ruinous, that caused the Akhaians loss on bitter loss and crowded brave souls into the undergloom, leaving so many dead men—carrion for dogs and birds, and the will of Zeus was done.
Begin it when the two men first contending broke with one another—the Lord Marshal
Agamémnon, Atreus' son, and Prince Akhilleus.

Among the gods, who brought this quarrel on?
The son of Zeus by Lêto. Agamémnon angered him, so he made a burning wind

* Abridged; translated by Robert Fitzgerald.

1. immortal one: The Muse, inspiration for epic poetry.

2. Akhilleus: The translator has transliterated from the Greek rather than use familiar Latinized forms: Akhilleus for Achilles, Akhaians for Achaeans, and so on. In some cases the stress is marked: Agamémnon, for example, is pronounced with the stress on mém, Ténedos with stress on Tén. The sign over the e in Lêto indicates a long vowel—Leeto; so Khrysês is pronounced Kriseez and Athêna Atheena. The dieresis (¨) indicates that two adjacent vowels are pronounced distinctly: Danáäns is Danayans, Laërtês is Layertees, Eëtiôn is Ee-yeh-ti-own.

3. Akhaians: Greeks. Léto: A goddess loved by Zeus.

9. Atreus: See the title note to Aeschylus, Agamemnon, p. 299.

6. Zeus: King of the gods.

11. son of Zeus: Apollo, god of prophecy, medicine, music, and archery. The strongest protector of the Trojans.

of plague rise in the army: rank and file sickened and died for the ill their chief had done in despising a man of prayer.
This priest, Khrysês, had come down to the ships with gifts, no end of ransom for his daughter;
on a golden staff he carried the god's white bands and sued for grace from the men of all Akhaia,
the two Atreidai most of all:

"O captains
Meneláos and Agamémnon, and you other Akhaians under arms!
The gods who hold Olympos, may they grant you plunder of Priam's town and a fair wind home, but let me have my daughter back for ransom
as you revere Apollo, son of Zeus!"

Then all the soldiers murmured their assent:
"Behave well to the priest. And take the ransom!"

But Agamémnon would not. It went against his desire,
and brutally he ordered the man away:

"Let me not find you here by the long ships loitering this time or returning later, old man; if I do,
the staff and ribbons of the god will fail you.
Give up the girl? I swear she will grow old at home in Argos, far from her own country, working my loom and visiting my bed.
Leave me in peace and go, while you can, in safety."

So harsh he was, the old man feared and obeyed him, in silence trailing away
by the shore of the tumbling clamorous whispering sea, and he prayed and prayed again, as he withdrew,
to the god whom silken-braided Lêto bore:

"O hear me, master of the silver bow, protector of Tenedos and the holy towns,

16. Khrysês: His daughter is called Khryseis and the place where he lives, Khrysê.

18. white bands: Of wool. Attached to a branch they marked the bearer as a suppliant, usually to a god, here to the Atreidai.

20. Atreidai: Sons of Atreus, i.e., Agamémnon and Meneláos.

24. Priam's town: Priam was then King of Troy.

45. Ténedos: An island off the Trojan coast.

Apollo, Sminthian, if to your liking ever in any grove I roofed a shrine or burnt thighbones in fat upon your altar—bullock or goat flesh—let my wish come true:
your arrows on the Danáäns for my tears!"

Now when he heard this prayer, Phoibos Apollo walked with storm in his heart from Olympos' crest, quiver and bow at his back, and the bundled arrows clanged on the sky behind as he rocked in his anger, descending like night itself. Apart from the ships he halted and let fly, and the bowstring slammed as the silver bow sprang, rolling in thunder away.
Pack animals were his target first, and dogs,
but soldiers, too, soon felt transfixing pain from his hard shots, and pyres burned night and day.
Nine days the arrows of the god came down broadside upon the army. On the tenth, Akhilleus called all ranks to assembly. Hêra, whose arms are white as ivory, moved him to it,
as she took pity on Danáäns dying.
All being mustered, all in place and quiet, Akhilleus, fast in battle as a lion,
rose and said:

"Agamémnon, now I take it,
the siege is broken, we are going to sail,
and even so may not leave death behind:
if war spares anyone, disease will take him . . .
We might, though, ask some priest or some diviner, even some fellow good at dreams—for dreams come down from Zeus as well—why all this anger of the god Apollo?

Has he some quarrel with us for a failure in vows or hekatombs? Would mutton burned or smoking goat flesh make him lift the plague?"

46. Sminthian: A cult-title of Apollo; it probably refers to his role as the destroyer of field-mice (Greek sminthos, mouse).

50. Danáäns: Another name for the Greek army, equivalent to Akhaians, Argives.

52. Olympos: The mountain in northern Greece which was thought of as the home of the gods.

63. Hêra: Wife and sister of Zeus, patron goddess of marriage and of the Greek city of Argos. She was bitterly hostile to the Trojans.

77. hekatombs: Strictly, the word denotes a sacrifice of one hundred animals, but it is often used to describe smaller offerings.

Putting the question, down he sat. And Kalkhas, Kalkhas Thestórides, came forward, wisest
by far of all who scanned the flight of birds,
He knew what was, what had been, what would be,
Kalkhas, who brought Akhaia's ships to Ilion by the diviner's gift Apollo gave him.
Now for their benefit he said:

"Akhilleus,
dear to Zeus, it is on me you call to tell you why the Archer God is angry.
Well, I can tell you. Are you listening? Swear by heaven that you will back me and defend me, because I fear my answer will enrage
a man with power in Argos, one whose word Akhaian troops obey.
A great man in his rage is formidable for underlings: though he may keep it down, he cherishes the burning in his belly until a reckoning day. Think well if you will save me."

Said Akhilleus:

"Courage.
Tell what you know, what you have light to know.
I swear by Apollo, the lord god to whom you pray when you uncover truth, never while I draw breath, while I have eyes to see,
shall any man upon this beachhead dare lay hands on you—not one of all the army, not Agamémnon, if it is he you mean,
though he is first in rank of all Akhaians."

The diviner then took heart and said:

"No failure
in hekatombs or vows is held against us.
It is the man of prayer whom Agamémnon treated with contempt: he kept his daughter, spurned his gifts: for that man's sake the Archer visited grief upon us and will again.
Relieve the Danáäns of this plague he will not until the girl who turns the eyes of men shall be restored to her own father—freely,

80. Thestórides: Son of Thestor. 83. Ilion: Troy.

with no demand for ransom—and until we offer up a hekatomb at Khrysê.
Then only can we calm him and persuade him."

He finished and sat down. The son of Atreus, ruler of the great plain, Agamémnon, rose, furious. Round his heart resentment welled, and his eyes shone out like licking fire.
Then, with a long and boding look at Kalkhas,
he growled at him:

"You visionary of hell,
never have I had fair play in your forecasts.
Calamity is all you care about, or see,
no happy portents; and you bring to pass nothing agreeable. Here you stand again before the army, giving it out as oracle
the Archer made them suffer because of me, because I would not take the gifts and let the girl Khrysêis go; I'd have her mine, at home. Yes, if you like, I rate her higher than Klytaimnestra, my own wife!
She loses nothing by compariosn in beauty or womanhood, in mind or skill.

For all of that, I am willing now to yield her if it is best; I want the army saved and not destroyed. You must prepare, however, a prize of honor for me, and at once,
that I may not be left without my portion—
I, of all Argives. It is not fitting so.
While every man of you looks on, my girl goes elsewhere."

Prince Akhilleus answered him:

"Lord Marshal, most insatiate of men,
how can the army make you a new gift?
Where is our store of booty? Can you see it?
Everything plundered from the towns has been distributed, should troops turn all that in?
Just let the girl go, in the god's name, now;
we'll make it up to you, twice over, three times over, on that day Zeus gives us leave to plunder Troy behind her rings of stone."

128. as oracle: I.e., as if it were a pronouncement by a god.

Agamémnon answered:

"Not that way
will I be gulled, brave as you are, Akhilleus.
Take me in, would you? Try to get around me?
What do you really ask? That you may keep your own winnings, I am to give up mine and sit here wanting her? Oh, no:
the army will award a prize to me and make sure that it measures up, or if they do not, I will take a girl myself, your own, or Aías', or Odysseus' prize!
Take her, yes, to keep. The man I visit may choke with rage; well, let him.
But this, I say, we can decide on later.

Look to it now, we launch on the great sea
a well-found ship, and get her manned with oarsmen, load her with sacrificial beasts and put aboard Khrysêis in her loveliness. My deputy, Aías, Idómeneus, or Prince Odysseus, or you, Akhilleus, fearsome as you are,
will make the hekatomb and quiet the Archer."

Akhilleus frowned and looked at him, then said:

"You thick-skinned, shameless, greedy fool!
Can any Akhaian care for you, or obey you,
after this on marches or in battle?
As for myself, when I came here to fight,
I had no quarrel with Troy or Trojan spearmen:
they never stole my cattle or my horses, never in the black farmland of Phthía ravaged my crops. How many miles there are of shadowy mountains, foaming seas, between!
No, no, we joined for you, you insolent boor, to please you, fighting for your brother's sake and yours, to get revenge upon the Trojans.
You overlook this, dogface, or don't care,
and now in the end you threaten to take my girl,
a prize I sweated for, and soldiers gave me!

Never have I had plunder like your own from any Trojan stronghold battered down

163. Aías: (Ajax) the bravest of the Greeks after Akhilleus. Odysseus: The most subtle and crafty of the Greeks.

171. Idómeneus: A prince from Crete.

181. Phthía: Akhilleus' home in northern Greece.

by the Akhaians. I have seen more action hand to hand in those assaults than you have, but when the time for sharing comes, the greater share is always yours. Worn out with battle
I carry off some trifle to my ships.
Well, this time I make sail for home.
Better to take now to my ships. Why linger, cheated of winnings, to make wealth for you?"

To this the high commander made reply:

"Desért, if that's the way the wind blows. Will I beg you to stay on my account? I will not.
Others will honor me, and Zeus who views the wide world most of all.

No officer

is hateful to my sight as you are, none given like you to faction, as to battle—rugged you are, I grant, by some god's favor.
Sail, then, in your ships, and lord it over your own battalion of Myrmidons. I do not give a curse for you, or for your anger.
But here is warning for you:

Khrysêis

being required of me by Phoibos Apollo,
she will be sent back in a ship of mine, manned by my people. That done, I myself will call for Brisêis at your hut, and take her, flower of young girls that she is, your prize,
to show you here and now who is the stronger and make the next man sick at heart—if any think of claiming equal place with me."

A pain like grief weighed on the son of Pêleus, and in his shaggy chest this way and that the passion of his heart ran: should he draw longsword from hip, stand off the rest, and kill in single combat the great son of Atreus, or hold his rage in check and give it time?
And as this tumult swayed him, as he slid

209. Myrmidons: Akhilleus' troops, disciplined and merciless in battle.

220. son of Pêleus: Akhilleus. His father Peleus, now an old man, had been married in his youth to the sea-goddess Thetis, Akhilleus' mother, who has now returned to the sea and lives there with her old father Nereus.

the big blade slowly from the sheath, Athêna came to him from the sky. The white-armed goddess, Hêra, sent her, being fond of both, concerned for both men. And Athêna, stepping up behind him, visible to no one except Akhilleus, gripped his red-gold hair.

Startled, he made a half turn, and he knew her upon the instant for Athêna: terribly her gray eyes blazed at him. And speaking softly but rapidly aside to her he said:

"What now, O daughter of the god of heaven who bears the stormcloud, why are you here? To see the wolfishness of Agamémnon?
Well, I give you my word: this time, and soon,
he pays for his behavior with his blood."

The gray-eyed goddess Athêna said to him:

"It was to check this killing rage I came from heaven, if you will listen. Hêra sent me, being fond of both of you, concerned for both.
Enough: break off this combat, stay your hand upon the sword hilt. Let him have a lashing with words, instead: tell him how things will be.
Here is my promise, and it will be kept:
winnings three times as rich, in due season,
you shall have in requital for his arrogance.
But hold your hand. Obey."

The great runner,
Akhilleus, answered:

"Nothing for it, goddess,
but when you two immortals speak, a man complies, though his heart burst. Just as well.
Honor the gods' will, they may honor ours."

On this he stayed his massive hand upon the silver pommel, and the blade of his great weapon slid back in the scabbard.

227. Athêna: The daughter of Zeus, patron of human ingenuity and resourcefulness, whether exemplified by handicrafts such as spinning or by skill in human relations, such as that possessed by her favorite among the Greeks, Odysseus. Like Hêra, she was implacably hostile to the Trojans, and for the same reason: the Trojan prince Paris had judged Aphrodite, goddess of love, to be more beautiful than Hêra and Athêna.

The man had done her bidding. Off to Olympos, gaining the air, she went to join the rest,
the powers of heaven in the home of Zeus.

But now the son of Pêleus turned on Agamémnon and lashed out at him, letting his anger ride in execration:

"Sack of wine,
you with your cur's eyes and your antelope heart!
You've never had the kidney to buckle on armor among the troops, or make a sortie with picked men—oh, no; that way death might lie.
Safer, by god, in the middle of the army—is it not?—to commandeer the prize of any man who stands up to you! Leech!
Commander of trash! If not, I swear, you never could abuse one soldier more!

But here is what I say: my oath upon it by this great staff: look: leaf or shoot it cannot sprout again, once lopped away from the log it left behind in the timbered hills;
it cannot flower, peeled of bark and leaves;
instead, Akhaian officers in council take it in hand by turns, when they observe by the will of Zeus due order in debate:
let this be what I swear by then: I swear
a day will come when every Akhaian soldier will groan to have Akhilleus back. That day you shall no more prevail on me than this dry wood shall flourish—driven though you are,
and though a thousand men perish before the killer, Hektor. You will eat your heart out, raging with remorse for this dishonor done by you to the bravest of Akhaians."

He hurled the staff, studded with golden nails, before him on the ground. Then down he sat, and fury filled Agamémnon, looking across at him.
But for the sake of both men Nestor arose,
the Pylians' orator, eloquent and clear;

268. Sortie: Sudden emergence of attacking troops from a defensive position.
289. Hektor: Son of King Priam, the foremost warrior on the Trojan side.
295. Nestor: The aged King of Pylos, on the western coast of mainland Greece.

argument sweeter than honey rolled from his tongue.
By now he had outlived two generations of mortal men, his own and the one after,
in Pylos land, and still ruled in the third.
In kind reproof he said:

"A black day, this.
Bitter distress comes this way to Akhaia.
How happy Priam and Priam's sons would be,
and all the Trojans—wild with joy—if they got wind of all these fighting words between you, foremost in council as you are, foremost in battle. Give me your attention. Both are younger men than I, and in my time men who were even greater have I known and none of them disdained me. Men like those I have not seen again, nor shall: Peiríthoös,
the Lord Marshal Dryas, Kaineus, Exádios, Polyphêmos, Theseus—Aigeus' son, a man like the immortal gods. I speak of champions among men of earth, who fought with champions, with wild things of the mountains, great centaurs whom they broke and overpowered.
Among these men I say I had my place when I sailed out of Pylos, my far country, because they called for me. I fought for my own hand among them. Not one man alive now upon earth could stand against them.
And I repeat: they listened to my reasoning, took my advice. Well, then, you take it too.
It is far better so.

Lord Agamémnon,
do not deprive him of the girl, renounce her.
The army had allotted her to him.
Akhilleus, for your part, do not defy your King and Captain. No one vies in honor with him who holds authority from Zeus.
You have more prowess, for a goddess bore you;
his power over men surpasses yours.

But, Agamémnon, let your anger cool.
I beg you to relent, knowing Akhilleus

311. Peiríthoös . . . Theseus: Names of heroes of an older generation. The most important is Theseus, King of Athens (who plays a role in Euripides' Hippolytus; see p. 449).

317. centaurs: Mythical creatures, half man, half horse, noted for their ferocity.

a sea wall for Akhaians in the black waves of war."

Lord Agamémnon answered:

"All you say is fairly said, sir, but this man's ambition, remember, is to lead, to lord it over everyone, hold power over everyone, give orders to the rest of us! Well, one will never take his orders! If the gods who live forever made a spearman of him, have they put insults on his lips as well?"

Akhilleus interrupted:

"What a poltroon,
how lily-livered I should be called, if I knuckled under to all you do or say!
Give your commands to someone else, not me!
And one more thing I have to tell you: think it over: this time, for the girl, I will not wrangle in arms with you or anyone, though I am robbed of what was given me;
but as for any other thing I have alongside my black ship, you shall not take it against my will. Try it. Hear this, everyone:
that instant your hot blood blackens my spear!"

They quarreled in this way, face to face, and then broke off the assembly by the ships. Akhilleus made his way to his squadron and his quarters, Patróklos by his side, with his companions.

Agamémnon proceeded to launch a ship, assigned her twenty oarsmen, loaded beasts for sacrifice to the god, then set aboard Khrysêis in her loveliness. The versatile Odysseus took the deck, and, all oars manned, they pulled out on the drenching ways of sea.
The troops meanwhile were ordered to police camp and did so, throwing refuse in the water;
then to Apollo by the barren surf they carried out full-tally hekatombs, and the savor curled in crooked smoke toward heaven.

359. Patróklos: Akhilleus' closest friend.

That was the day's work in the army.
Agamémnon
had kept his threat in mind, and now he acted, calling Eurýbatês and Talthýbios, his aides and criers:
"Go along," he said,
"both of you, to the quarters of Akhilleus and take his charming Brisêis by the hand to bring to me. And if he balks at giving her I shall be there myself with men-at-arms in force to take her—all the more gall for him."

So, ominously, he sent them on their way, and they who had no stomach for it went along the waste sea shingle toward the ships and shelters of the Myrmidons. Not far from his black ship and hut they found the prince in the open, seated. And seeing these two come was cheerless to Akhilleus. Shamefast, pale with fear of him, they stood without a word;
but he knew what they felt and called out:
"Peace to you,
criers and couriers of Zeus and men!
Come forward. Not one thing have I against you:
Agamémnon is the man who sent you for Brisêis. Here then, my lord Patróklos, bring out the girl and give her to these men.
And let them both bear witness before the gods who live in bliss, as before men who die, including this harsh king, if ever hereafter a need for me arises to keep the rest from black defeat and ruin.
Lost in folly,
the man cannot think back or think ahead
how to come through a battle by the ships."

Patróklos did the bidding of his friend, led from the hut Brisêis in her beauty and gave her to them. Back along the ships they took their way, and the girl went, loath to go.

Leaving his friends in haste, Akhilleus wept, and sat apart by the gray wave, scanning the endless sea.

374. criers: Heralds.

Often he spread his hands in prayer to his mother:

"As my life came from you, though it is brief, honor at least from Zeus who storms in heaven
I call my due. He gives me precious little.
See how the lord of the great plains, Agamémnon, humiliated me! He has my prize, by his own whim, for himself."

Eyes wet with tears,
he spoke, and her ladyship his mother heard him
in green deeps where she lolled near her old father.
Gliding she rose and broke like mist from the inshore gray sea face, to sit down softly before him, her son in tears; and fondling him she said:

"Child, why do you weep? What grief is this?
Out with it, tell me, both of us should know."
Akhilleus, fast in battle as a lion,
groaned and said:

"Why tell you what you know?
We sailed out raiding, and we took by storm that ancient town of Eëtíôn called Thêbê plundered the place, brought slaves and spoils away.
At the division, later,
they chose a young girl, Khrysêis, for the king.
Then Khrysês, priest of the Archer God, Apollo, came to the beachhead we Akhaians hold,
bringing no end of ransom for his daughter;
he had the god's white bands on a golden staff and sued for grace from the army of Akhaia, mostly the two Atreidai, corps commanders.
All of our soldiers murmured in assent:
'Behave well to the priest. And take the ransom!'
But Agamémnon would not. It went against his desire,
and brutally he ordered the man away.
So the old man withdrew in grief and anger.
Apollo cared for him: he heard his prayer and let black bolts of plague fly on the Argives.

One by one our men came down with it and died hard as the god's shots raked the army

424. Eëtíôn: King of the Kilikians, and father of Hektor's wife Andrómakhê. Thêbê was the Kilikian capital city.

broadside. But our priest divined the cause and told us what the god meant by the plague.

I said, 'Appease the god!' but Agamémnon could not contain his rage; he threatened me, and what he threatened is now done—one girl the Akhaians are embarking now for Khrysê beach with gifts for Lord Apollo;
the other, just now, from my hut—the criers came and took her, Briseus' girl, my prize, given by the army.

If you can, stand by me:

go to Olympos, pray to Zeus, if ever by word or deed you served him—and so you did, I often heard you tell it in Father's house: that time when you alone of all the gods shielded the son of Krónos from peril and disgrace—when other gods, Pallas Athêna, Hêra, and Poseidon, wished him in irons, wished to keep him bound,
you had the will to free him of that bondage,
and called up to Olympos in all haste Aigaion, whom the gods called Briareus, the giant with a hundred arms, more powerful than the sea-god, his father. Down he sat by the son of Krónos, glorying in that place.
For fear of him the blissful gods forbore to manacle Zeus.

Remind him of these things, cling to his knees and tell him your good pleasure
if he will take the Trojan side and roll the Akhaians back to the water's edge, back on the ships with slaughter! All the troops may savor what their king has won for them, and he may know his madness, what he lost when he dishonored me, peerless among Akhaians."

Her eyes filled, and a tear fell as she answered;

"Alas, my child, why did I rear you, doomed the day I bore you? Ah, could you only be serene upon this beachhead through the siege,

457. son of Krónos: Zeus.
459. Pallas: A title of Athena. Poseidon: Brother of Zeus, god of the earthquake and the sea.

your life runs out so soon.
Oh early death! Oh broken heart! No destiny so cruel! And I bore you to this evil!

But what you wish I will propose To Zeus, lord of the lightning, going up myself into the snow-glare of Olympos with hope for his consent.

Be quiet now

beside the long ships, keep your anger bright against the army, quit the war.

Last night

Zeus made a journey to the shore of Ocean, to feast among the Sunburned, and the gods accompanied him. In twelve days he will come back to Olympos. Then I shall be there to cross his bronze doorsill and take his knees.
I trust I'll move him."

Thetis left her son

still burning for the softly belted girl whom they had wrested from him.

Meanwhile Odysseus

with his shipload of offerings came to Khrysê.
Entering the deep harbor there they furled the sails and stowed them, and unbent forestays to ease the mast down quickly aft into its rest, then rowed her to a mooring.
Bow-stones were dropped, and they tied up astern,
and all stepped out into the wash and ebb,
then disembarked their cattle for the Archer,
and Khrysêis from the deepsea ship. Odysseus, the great tactician, led her to the altar,
putting her in her father's hands, and said:

"Khrysês, as Agamémnon's emissary
I bring your child to you, and for Apollo a hekatomb in the Danääns' name.

489. Ocean: The river which was thought of as encircling the world. The Sunburned (the literal meaning of the Greek name Ethiopians) were supposed to live at the end of the world.

495. softly belted: Homeric formulaic epithet for beautiful women.

499–502. unbent forestays . . . astern: Untied the lines from the bow to the top of the mast that hold it upright, so as to "unstep" the mast and lay it on deck. A bow-stone is a primitive anchor made of a stone attached to a rope; the ships were anchored forward and tied up astern with heavy lines or "hawsers" to the moorings.

We trust in this way to appease your lord, who sent down pain and sorrow on the Argives."

So he delivered her, and the priest received her, the child so dear to him, in joy. Then hastening to give the god his hekatomb, they led bullocks to crowd around the compact altar, rinsed their hands and delved in barley baskets,
as open-armed to heaven Khrysês prayed:

"Oh hear me, master of the silver bow, protector of Ténedos and the holy towns,
if while I prayed you listened once before and honored me, and punished the Akhaians, now let my wish come true again. But turn your plague away this time from the Danáäns."

And this petition, too, Apollo heard.
When prayers were said and grains of barley strewn,
they held the bullocks for the knife, and flayed them,
cutting out joints and wrapping these in fat,
two layers, folded, with raw strips of flesh,
for the old man to burn on cloven faggots, wetting it all with wine.

Around him stood young men with five-tined forks in hand, and when the vitals had been tasted, joints consumed, they sliced the chines and quarters for the spits, roasted them evenly and drew them off.
Their meal being now prepared and all work done, they feasted to their hearts' content and made desire for meat and drink recede again, then young men filled their winebowls to the brim,
ladling drops for the god in every cup.
Propitiatory songs rose clear and strong until day's end, to praise the god, Apollo, as One Who Keeps the Plague Afar; and listening the god took joy.

After the sun went down and darkness came, at last Odysseus' men lay down to rest under the stern hawsers.

When Dawn spread out her finger tips of rose
they put to sea for the main camp of Akhaians,

534. chine: Part of an animal's back. quarters: Shoulders and thighs.

and the Archer God sent them a following wind.
Stepping the mast they shook their canvas out, and wind caught, bellying the sail. A foaming dark blue wave sang backward from the bow as the running ship made way against the sea, until they came offshore of the encampment.
Here they put in and hauled the black ship high,
far up the sand, braced her with shoring timbers,
and then disbanded, each to his own hut.

Meanwhile unstirring and with smoldering heart,
the godlike athlete, son of Pêleus, Prince Akhilleus waited by his racing ships.
He would not enter the assembly of emulous men, nor ever go to war, but felt his valor staling in his breast with idleness, and missed the cries of battle.

Now when in fact twelve days had passed, the gods who live forever turned back to Olympos, with Zeus in power supreme among them.
Thetis had kept in mind her mission for her son, and rising like a dawn mist from the sea into a cloud she soared aloft in heaven to high Olympos. Zeus with massive brows she found apart, on the chief crest enthroned, and slapping down before him, her left hand placed on his knees and her right hand held up to cup his chin, she made her plea to him:

"O Father Zeus, if ever amid immortals by word or deed I served you, grant my wish and see to my son's honor! Doom for him of all men came on quickest.
Now Lord Marshal
Agamémnon has been highhanded with him, has commandeered and holds his prize of war.
But you can make him pay for this, profound mind of Olympos!

556. shoring timbers: Beams that hold the ship upright on dry land.

574. on his knees: This passage describes the position assumed by the suppliant who, by this physical pressure emphasized the urgency of the request. Zeus himself was above all other gods the protector of suppliants.

Lend the Trojans power, until the Akhaians recompense my son and heap new honor upon him!"
When she finished,
the gatherer of cloud said never a word
but sat unmoving for a long time, silent.
Thetis clung to his knees, then spoke again:

"Give your infallible word, and bow your head, or else reject me. Can you be afraid to let me see how low in your esteem
I am of all the gods?"
Greatly perturbed,
Lord Zeus who masses cloud said:
"Here is trouble.
You drive me into open war with Hêra sooner or later:
she will be at me, scolding all day long.
Even as matters stand she never rests from badgering me before the gods: I take the Trojan side in battle, so she says.

Go home before you are seen. But you can trust me to put my mind on this; I shall ararange it.
Here let me bow my head, then be content to see me bound by that most solemn act before the gods. My word is not revocable not ineffectual, once I nod upon it."

He bent his ponderous black brows down, and locks ambrosial of his immortal head swung over them, as all Olympos trembled.
After this pact they parted: misty Thetis from glittering Olympos leapt away into the deep sea; Zeus to his hall retired.
There all the gods rose from their seats in deference before their father; not one dared face him unmoved, but all stood up before him, and thus he took his throne.
But Hêra knew
he had new interests; she had seen the goddess Thetis, silvery-footed daughter

607. ambrosial: Divine, from ambrosia, the food of the gods.

of the Old One of the sea, conferring with him,
and, nagging, she inquired of Zeus Kroníon:

"Who is it this time, schemer? Who has your ear?
How fond you are of secret plans, of taking decisions privately! You could not bring yourself, could you, to favor me with any word of your new plot?"

The father of gods and men said in reply:

"Hêra, all my provisions
you must not itch to know.
You'll find them rigorous, consort though you are.
In all appropriate matters no one else,
no god or man, shall be advised before you.
But when I choose to think alone,
don't harry me about it with your questions."

The Lady Hêra answered, with wide eyes:

"Majesty, what a thing to say. I have not 'harried' you before with questions, surely;
you are quite free to tell what you will tell.
This time I dreadfully fear—I have a feeling—Thetis, the silvery-footed daughter of the Old One of the sea, led you astray.
Just now at daybreak, anyway, she came to sit with you and take your knees; my guess is you bowed your head for her in solemn pact that you will see to the honor of Akhilleus—that is, to Akhaian carnage near the ships."

Now Zeus the gatherer of cloud said:

"Marvelous,
you and your guesses; you are near it, too.
But there is not one thing that you can do about it, only estrange yourself still more from me—all the more gall for you. If what you say is true, you may be sure it pleases me.
And now you must sit down, be still, obey me, or else not all the gods upon Olympos can help in the least when I approach your chair

619. Kronión: Son of Kronos.

to lay my inexorable hands upon you."
At this the wide-eyed Lady Hêra feared him, and sat quite still, and bent her will to his.
Up through the hall of Zeus now all the lords of heaven were sullen and looked askance, Hêphaistos, master artificer, broke the silence, doing a kindness to the snowy-armed lady, his mother Hêra.

He began:

"Ah, what a miserable day, if you two raise your voices over mortal creatures!
More than enough already! Must you bring your noisy bickering among the gods?
What pleasure can we take in a fine dinner
when baser matters gain the upper hand?
To Mother my advice is—what she knows—better make up to Father, or he'll start his thundering and shake our feast to bits.
You know how he can shock us if he cares to—out of our seats with lightning bolts!
Supreme power is his. Oh, soothe him, please, take a soft tone, get back in his good graces.
Then He'll be benign to us again."
He lurched up as he spoke, and held a winecup out to her, a double-handed one,
and said:

"Dear Mother, patience, hold your tongue, no matter how upset you are. I would not see you battered, dearest.

It would hurt me,
and yet I could not help you, not a bit.
The Olympian is difficult to oppose.
One other time I took your part he caught me around one foot and flung me into the sky from our tremendous terrace.
I soared all day! Just as the sun dropped down
I dropped down, too, on Lemnos—nearly dead.
The island people nursed a fallen god."

He made her smile—and the goddess, white-armed Hêra, smiling took the winecup from his hand.

657. Hêphaistos: Patron god of craftsmen, especially workers in metal, and of fire.

675. lurched: Hephaistos was lame.

686. Lemnos: An island in the Aegean sea.

Then, dipping from the winebowl, round he went from left to right, serving the other gods nectar of sweet delight.
And quenchless laughter broke out among the blissful gods to see Hêphaistos wheezing down the hall.
So all day long until the sun went down they spent in feasting, and the measured feast matched well their hearts' desire So did the flawless harp held by Apollo and heavenly songs in choiring antiphon that all the Muses sang.
And when the shining sun of day sank in the west, they turned homeward each one to rest, each to that home the bandy-legged wondrous artisan Hêphaistos fashioned for them with his craft.
The lord of storm and lightning, Zeus, retired and shut his eyes where sweet sleep ever came to him, and at his side lay Hêra, Goddess of the Golden Chair.

[The Greeks, in spite of Akhilleus' withdrawal, continued to fight. They did not suffer immoderately from Akhilleus' absence; on the contrary, they pressed the Trojans so hard that Hektor, the Trojan leader, after rallying his men, returned to the city to urge the Trojans to offer special prayers and sacrifices to the gods.]

Book VI

[The Meeting of Hektor and Andrómakhê]

Now, when Hektor reached the Skaian Gates daughters and wives of Trojans rushed to greet him with questions about friends, sons, husbands, brothers.
"Pray to the gods!" he said to each in turn, as grief awaited many. He walked on and into Priam's palace, fair and still, made all of ashlar, with bright colonnades.
Inside were fifty rooms of polished stone one by another, where the sons of Priam slept beside their wives; apart from these

692. nectar: The drink of gods.
700. Muses: The nine Muses were goddesses of the arts, and the source of artistic inspiration.
281. Skaian Gates: One of the principal entrances to Troy.
287. ashlar: Squared stone.

across an inner court were twelve rooms more all in one line, of polished stone, where slept the sons-in-law of Priam and their wives.
Approaching these, he met his gentle mother going in with Laódikê, most beautiful of all her daughters. Both hands clasping his, she looked at him and said:

"Why have you come from battle, child? Those fiends, the Akhaians, fighting around the town, have worn you out; you come to climb our Rock and lift your palms to Zeus!
Wait, and I'll serve you honeyed wine.
First you may offer up a drop to Zeus,
to the immortal gods, then slake your thirst.
Wine will restore a man when he is weary as you are, fighting to defend your own."

Hektor answered her, his helmet flashing:

"No, my dear mother, ladle me no wine;
You'd make my nerve go slack: I'd lose my edge.
May I tip wine to Zeus with hands unwashed?
I fear to—a bespattered man, and bloody,
may not address the lord of gloomy cloud.
No, it is you I wish would bring together our older women, with offerings, and go visit the temple of Athêna, Hope of Soldiers.
Pick out a robe, most lovely and luxurious,
most to your liking in the women's hall;
place it upon Athêna's knees; assure her a sacrifice of heifers, twelve young ones ungoaded ever in their lives, if in her mercy relenting toward our town, our wives and children, she keeps Diomêdês out of holy Troy.
He is a wild beast now in combat and pursuit.
Make your way to her shrine, visit Athêna, Hope of Soldiers.

As for me, I go for Paris to arouse him, if he listens.
If only earth would swallow him here and now!

294. his gentle mother: Hékabê (Hecuba).
300. our Rock: The hill on which Troy was built.
317. on Athêna's knees: On the knees of the cult-statue.
321. Diomêdês: A Greek prince who has led the assault on Troy in the absence of Akhilleus.
325. Paris: Hector's brother. His seduction and abduction of Helen, the wife of Menelâos, is the cause of the war.

What an affliction the Olympian brought up for us in him—a curse for Priam and Priam's children! Could I see that man dwindle into Death's night, I'd feel my soul relieved of its distress!"

So Hektor spoke, and she walked slowly on into the mégaron. She called her maids, who then assembled women from the city.
But Hékabê went down to the low chamber fragrant with cedar, where her robes were kept, embroidered work by women of Sidonia Aléxandros had brought, that time he sailed and ravished Helen, princess, pearl of kings.
Hékabê lifted out her loveliest robe,
most ample, most luxurious in brocade,
and glittering like starlight under all.
This offering she carried to Athêna with a long line of women in her train.
On the Akrópolis, Athêna's shrine was opened for them by Theanô, stately daughter of Kisseus, wife to Antênor, and chosen priestess of Athêna. Now all crying loud stretched out their arms in prayer, while Theanô with grace took up the robe to place it on fair-haired Athêna's knees.
She made petition then to Zeus's daughter:

"Lady,
excellent goddess, towering friend of Troy, smash Diomêdês' lance-haft! Throw him hard below the Skaian Gates, before our eyes!
Upon this altar we'll make offering of twelve young heifers never scarred!
Only show mercy to our town, mercy to Trojan men, their wives and children."

These were Theanô's prayers, her vain prayers.
Pallas Athêna turned away her head.

During the supplication at the shrine,
Hektor approached the beautiful house Aléxandros himself had made, with men who in that time

333. mégaron: The great hall of the palace.
337. Sidonia: A Phoenician city on the coast of what is now Lebanon.
338. Aléxandros: Another name of Paris.
345. Akrópolis: The high place of the city.
347. Antênor: Advisor to Priam.

were master-builders in the land of Troy.
Bedchamber, hall, and court, in the upper town,
they built for him near Priam's hall and Hektor's.
Now Hektor dear to Zeus went in, his hand gripping a spear eleven forearms long, whose bronze head shone before him in the air
as shone, around the neck, a golden ring.
He found his brother in the bedchamber handling a magnificent cuirass and shield and pulling at his bent-horn bow, while Helen among her household women sat nearby, directing needlecraft and splendid weaving.
At sight of him, to shame him, Hektor said:

"Unquiet soul, why be aggrieved in private?
Our troops are dying out there where they fight around our city, under our high walls.
The hue and cry of war, because of you,
comes in like surf upon this town.
You'd be at odds with any other man
you might see quitting your accursèd war.
Up; into action, before torches thrown make the town flare!"

And shining like a god Aléxandros replied:

"Ah, Hektor,
this call to order is no more than just.
So let me tell you something: hear me out.
No pettishness, resentment toward the Trojans, kept me in this bedchamber so long,
but rather my desire, on being routed, to taste grief to the full.

In her sweet way
my lady rouses me to fight again—
and I myself consider it better so.
Victory falls to one man, then another.
Wait, while I put on the wargod's gear,
or else go back; I'll follow, sure to find you."

For answer, Hektor in his shining helm said not a word, but in low tones enticing Helen murmured:

373. cuirass: Armor protecting the torso.

378. aggrieved: Paris (like Akhilleus) was sulking, away from the fighting. He had been worsted in a duel with Meneláos, but Aphrodite, the love-goddess, had saved him from death at Meneláos' hands and brought him to his house in Troy.

"Brother dear—
dear to a whore, a nightmare of a woman!
That day my mother gave me to the world
I wish a hurricane blast had torn me away to wild mountains, or into tumbling sea to be washed under by a breaking wave, before these evil days could come—or, granted terrible years were in the gods' design,
I wish I had had a good man for a lover who knew the sharp tongues and just rage of men.
This one—his heart's unsound, and always will be,
and he will win what he deserves. Come here and rest upon this couch with me, dear brother.
You are the one afflicted most by harlotry in me and by his madness, our portion, all of misery, given by Zeus that we may live in song for men to come."

Great Hektor shook his head, his helmet flashing,
and said:

"No, Helen, offer me no rest;
I know you are fond of me. I cannot rest.
Time presses, and I grow impatient now to lend a hand to Trojans in the field who feel a gap when I am gone. Your part can be to urge him—let him feel the urgency to join me in the city. He has time:
I must go home to visit my own people, my own dear wife and my small son. Who knows if I shall be reprieved again to see them, or beaten down under Akhaian blows as the immortals will."

He turned away
and quickly entered his own hall, but found Princess Andrómakhê was not at home.
With one nursemaid and her small child, she stood upon the tower of Ilion, in tears, bemoaning what she saw.

Now Hektor halted
upon his threshold, calling to the maids:

"Tell me at once, and clearly, please,
my lady Andrómakhê, where has she gone?

416. portion: Destiny.

To see my sisters, or my brothers' wives?
Or to Athêna's temple? Ladies of Troy are there to make petition to the goddess."

The busy mistress of the larder answered:

"Hektor, to put it clearly as you ask,
she did not go to see your sisters, nor your brothers' wives, nor to Athêna's shrine where others are petitioning the goddess.
Up to the great square tower of Ilion she took her way, because she heard our men were spent in battle by Akhaian power.
In haste, like a madwoman, to the wall
she went, and Nurse went too, carrying the child."

At this word Hektor whirled and left his hall, taking the same path he had come by,
along byways, walled lanes, all through the town until he reached the Skaian Gates, whereby before long he would issue on the field.
There his warmhearted lady came to meet him, running: Andrómakhê, whose father, Eëtíôn, once had ruled the land under Mount Plakos, dark with forest, at Thêbê under Plakos—lord and king of the Kilikians. Hektor was her lord now, head to foot in bronze; and now she joined him.
Behind her came her maid, who held the child against her breast, a rosy baby still, Hektoridês, the world's delight, as fresh as a pure shining star. Skamándrios his father named him; other men would say Astýanax, "Lord of the Lower Town," as Hektor singlehanded guarded Troy.
How brilliantly the warrior smiled, in silence, his eyes upon the child! Andrómakhê rested against him, shook away a tear, and pressed his hand in both her own, to say:

"Oh, my wild one, your bravery will be your own undoing! No pity for our child, poor little one, or me in my sad lot—soon to be deprived of you! soon, soon

466. Hektoridês: Son of Hektor.
467. Skamándrios: A name formed from that of the Trojan river Skamandros.

Akhaians as one man will set upon you and cut you down! Better for me, without you, to take cold earth for mantle. No more comfort, no other warmth, after you meet your doom,
but heartbreak only. Father, is dead, and Mother.
My father great Akhilleus killed when he besieged and plundered Thêbê, our high town, citadel of Kilikians. He killed him, but, reverent at least in this, did not despoil him. Body, gear, and weapons forged so handsomely, he burned, and heaped a barrow over the ashes. Elms were planted round by mountain-nymphs of him who bears the stormcloud.
Then seven brothers that I had at home in one day entered Death's dark place. Akhilleus, prince and powerful runner, killed all seven amid their shambling cattle and silvery sheep.
Mother, who had been queen of wooded Plakos, he brought with other winnings home, and freed her, taking no end of ransom. Artemis the Huntress shot her in her father's house.
Father and mother—I have none but you,
nor brother, Hektor; lover none but you!
Be merciful! Stay here upon the tower!
Do not bereave your child and widow me!
Draw up your troops by the wild figtree; that way,
the city lies most open, men most easily could swarm the wall where it is low:
three times, at least, their best men tried it there in company of the two called Aías, with Idómeneus, the Atreidai, Diomêdês—whether someone who had it from oracles had told them, or their own hearts urged them on."

Great Hektor in his shimmering helmet answered:

"Lady, these many things beset my mind no less than yours. But I should die of shame before our Trojan men and noblewomen
if like a coward I avoided battle, nor am I moved to. Long ago I learned how to be brave, how to go forward always and to contend for honor, Father's and mine.

498. Artemis: Virgin goddess of the hunt, also dispenser of natural death to women.

508. two called Aías: Aías (Ajax) son of Telamon, bravest of the Greeks after Akhilleus, and Aías son of Oileus, known as Aías the Lesser.

Honor—for in my heart and soul I know a day will come when ancient Ilion falls, when Priam and the folk of Priam perish.
Not by the Trojans' anguish on that day am I so overborne in mind—the pain of Hékabê herself, or Priam king, or of my brothers, many and valorous, who will have fallen in dust before our enemies—
as by your own grief, when some armed Akhaian takes you in tears, your free life stripped away.
Before another woman's loom in Argos it may be you will pass, or at Messêis or Hypereiê fountain, carrying water, against your will—iron constraint upon you.
And seeing you in tears, a man may say:
'There is the wife of Hektor, who fought best of Trojan horsemen when they fought at Troy.'
So he may say—and you will ache again for one man who could keep you out of bondage.
Let me be hidden dark down in my grave
before I hear your cry or know you captive!"

As he said this, Hektor held out his arms to take his baby. But the child squirmed round on the nurse's bosom and began to wail, terrified by his father's great war helm—
the flashing bronze, the crest with horsehair plume tossed like a living thing at every nod.
His father began laughing, and his mother laughed as well. Then from his handsome head Hektor lifted off his helm and bent to place it, bright with sunlight, on the ground.
When he had kissed his child and swung him high to dandle him, he said this prayer:

"O Zeus
and all immortals, may this child, my son, become like me a prince among the Trojans.
Let him be strong and brave and rule in power at Ilion; then someday men will say
'This fellow is far better than his father!'
seeing him home from war, and in his arms the bloodstained gear of some tall warrior slain—making his mother proud."

531–532. Messêis or Hypereiê: The one in central, the other in northern Greece.

554. a prince among the Trojans: When Troy fell, the child was put to death by the Greeks.

After this prayer,
into his dear wife's arms he gave his baby, whom on her fragrant breast
she held and cherished, laughing through her tears.
Hektor pitied her now. Caressing her,
he said:

"Unquiet soul, do not be too distressed by thoughts of me. You know no man dispatches me into the undergloom against my fate;
no mortal, either, can escape his fate,
coward or brave man, once he comes to be.
Go home, attend to your own handiwork at loom and spindle, and command the maids to busy themselves, too. As for the war, that is for men, all who were born at Ilion,
to put their minds on—most of all for me."

He stooped now to recover his plumed helm as she, his dear wife, drew away, her head turned and her eyes upon him, brimming tears.
She made her way in haste then to the ordered house of Hektor and rejoined her maids, moving them all to weep at sight of her.
In Hektor's home they mourned him, living still but not, they feared, again to leave the war or be delivered from Akhaian fury.

Paris in the meantime had not lingered:
after he buckled his bright war-gear on he ran through Troy, sure-footed with long strides.
Think how a stallion fed on clover and barley, mettlesome, thundering in a stall, may snap his picket rope and canter down a field to bathe as he would daily in the river—glorying in freedom! Head held high with mane over his shoulders flying, his dazzling work of finely jointed knees takes him around the pasture haunts of horses.
That was the way the son of Priam, Paris, ran from the height of Pergamos, his gear ablaze like the great sun, and laughed aloud. He sprinted on, and quickly

571. at loom and spindle: That is, weaving and spinning.

596. Pergamos: The citadel of Troy.

met his brother, who was slow to leave the place where he had discoursed with his lady.
Aléxandros was first to speak:

"Dear fellow,"

he said, "have I delayed you, kept you waiting?
Have I not come at the right time, as you asked?"

And Hektor in his shimmering helm replied:

"My strange brother! No man with justice in him would underrate your handiwork in battle;
you have a powerful arm. But you give way too easily, and lose interest, lose your will.
My heart aches in me when I hear our men, who have such toil of battle on your account, talk of you with contempt. Well, come along.
Someday we'll make amends for that, if ever we drive the Akhaians from the land of Troy—
if ever Zeus permit us, in our hall, to set before the gods of heaven, undying and ever young, our winebowl of deliverance."

[The Trojans rallied successfully and went over to the offensive. They drove the Greeks back to the light fortifications they had built around their beached ships. The Trojans lit their watchfires on the plain, ready to deliver the attack in the morning.]

Book VIII

[The Eve of Battle]

They led from under the yokes their sweating teams, tethering each beside his chariot,
then brought down from the city beeves and sheep in all haste—brought down wine and bread as well out of their halls. They piled up firewood and carried out full-tally hekatombs to the immortals. Off the plain, the wind bore smoke and savor of roasts into the sky.
Then on the perilous open ground of war,
in brave expectancy, they lay all night while many campfires burned. As when in heaven principal stars shine out around the moon

615–616. to set . . . of deliverance: I.e., to make sacrifices to the gods in thanks for the end of the siege.

720. beeves: Cattle.

when the night sky is limpid, with no wind, and all the lookout points, headlands, and mountain clearings are distinctly seen, as though pure space had broken through, downward from heaven, and all the stars are out, and in his heart
the shepherd sings: just so from ships to river shone before Ilion the Trojan fires.
There were a thousand burning in the plain,
and round each one lay fifty men in firelight.
Horses champed white barley, near the chariots, waiting for Dawn to mount her lovely chair.

Book IX

[The Embassy to Akhilleus]

So Trojans kept their watch that night.
To seaward Panic that attends blood-chilling Rout now ruled the Akhaians. All their finest men were shaken by this fear, in bitter throes, as when a shifting gale
blows up over the cold fish-breeding sea, north wind and west wind wailing out of Thrace in squall on squall, and dark waves crest, and shoreward masses of weed are cast up by the surf:
so were Akhaian hearts torn in their breasts.

By that great gloom hard hit, the son of Atreus made his way amid his criers and told them to bid each man in person to assembly but not to raise a general cry. He led them, making the rounds himself, and soon the soldiers grimly took their places. Then he rose, with slow tears trickling, as from a hidden spring dark water runs down, staining a rock wall;
and groaning heavily he addressed the Argives:

"Friends, leaders of Argives, all my captains, Zeus Kronidês entangled me in folly to my undoing. Wayward god, he promised solemnly that I should not sail away before I stormed the inner town of Troy.
Crookedness and duplicity, I see now!

7. Thrace: Region northwest of Troy. 21. Kronidês: Son of Krónos.

He calls me to return to Argos beaten after these many losses. That must be his will and his good pleasure, who knows why?
Many a great town's height has he destroyed and will destroy, being supreme in power.
Enough. Now let us act on what I say:
Board ship for our own fatherland! Retreat!
We cannot hope any longer to take Troy!"

At this a stillness overcame them all, the Akhaian soldiers. Long they sat in silence, hearing their own hearts beat. Then Diomêdês rose at last to speak. He said:

"My lord,

I must contend with you for letting go, for losing balance. I may do so here in assembly lawfully. Spare me your anger.
Before this you have held me up to scorn for lack of fighting spirit; old and young, everyone knows the truth of that. In your case, the son of crooked-minded Krónos gave you one gift and not both: a staff of kingship honored by all men, but no staying power—
the greatest gift of all.
What has come over you, to make you think the Akhaians weak and craven as you say?
If you are in a passion to sail home, sail on: the way is clear, the many ships that made the voyage from Mykênê with you stand near the sea's edge. Others here will stay until we plunder Troy! Or if they, too, would like to, let them sail for their own country!
Sthénelos and I will fight alone until we see the destined end of Ilion.
We came here under god."

When Diomêdês

finished, a cry went up from all Akhaians in wonder at his words. Then Nestor stood and spoke among them:

41. held me up to scorn: This happened during Agamémnon's review of the troops before joining battle, a battle in which Diomedes distinguished himself.
52. Mykênê: (Mycenae) a city near Argos.
56. Sthénelos: The companion of Diomêdês.
61. Son of Tydeus: Diomêdês.

"Son of Tydeus, formidable above the rest in war, in council, too, you have more weight than others of your age.
No one will cry down what you say, no true Akhaian will, or contradict you. Still, you did not push on to the end.
I know you are young; in years you might well be my last-born son, and yet for all of that you kept your head and said what needed saying before the Argive captains. My own part, as I am older, is to drive it home.
No one will show contempt for what I say, surely not Agamémnon, our commander.
Alien to clan and custom and hearth fire is he who longs for war—heartbreaking war—with his own people.

Let us yield to darkness and make our evening meal. But let the sentries take their rest on watch outside the rampart near the moat; those are my orders for them.
Afterward, you direct us, Agamémnon, by right of royal power. Provide a feast for older men, your counselors. That is duty and no difficulty: your huts are full of wine brought over daily in our ships from Thrace across the wide sea, and all provender for guests is yours, as you are high commander.
Your counselors being met, pay heed to him who counsels best. The army of Akhaia bitterly needs a well-found plan of action.
The enemy is upon us, near the ships, burning his thousand fires. What Akhaian could be highhearted in that glare? This night will see the army saved or brought to ruin."

They heeded him and did his will. Well-armed, the sentries left to take their posts, one company formed around Thrasymêdês, Nestor's son, another mustered by Askálaphos and Iálmenos, others commanded by Meríonês, Aphareus, Dêípyros, and Kreion's son, the princely Lykomêdês.
Seven lieutenants, each with a hundred men,

79. the moat: The Greeks, driven back on their ships, have fortified their position with rampart and moat; they are, in effect, besieged. Zeus' promise to Thetis is being fulfilled.

carrying long spears, issued from the camp for outposts chosen between ditch and rampart.
Campfires were kindled, and they took their meal.

The son of Atreus led the elder men together to his hut, where he served dinner, and each man's hand went out upon the meal.
When they had driven hunger and thirst away,
Old Nestor opened their deliberations—Nestor, whose counsel had seemed best before, point by point weaving his argument:

"Lord Marshal of the army, Agamémnon,
as I shall end with you, so I begin,
since you hold power over a great army and are responsible for it: the Lord Zeus put in your keeping staff and precedent that you might gather counsel for your men.
You should be first in discourse, but attentive to what another may propose, to act on it if he speak out for the good of all. Whatever he may initiate, action is yours.
On this rule, let me speak as I think best.
A better view than mine no man can have, the same view that I've held these many days since that occasion when, my lord, for all Akhilleus' rage, you took the girl Brisêis out of his lodge—but not with our consent.
Far from it; I for one had begged you not to.
Just the same, you gave way to your pride, and you dishonored a great prince,
a hero to whom the gods themselves do honor.
Taking his prize, you kept her and still do.
But even so, and even now, we may contrive some way of making peace with him by friendly gifts, and by affectionate words."

Then Agamémnon, the Lord Marshal, answered:

"Sir, there is nothing false in your account of my blind errors. I committed them;
I will not now deny it. Troops of soldiers are worth no more than one man cherished by Zeus as he has cherished this man and avenged him, overpowering the army of Akhaians.
I lost my head, I yielded to black anger,

but now I would retract it and appease him with all munificence. Here before everyone
I may enumerate the gifts I'll give.
Seven new tripods and ten bars of gold,
then twenty shining caldrons, and twelve horses, thoroughbreds, who by their wind and legs have won me prizes: any man who owned what these have brought me could not lack resources, could not be pinched for precious gold—so many prizes have these horses carried home.
Then I shall give him seven women, deft
in household handicraft—women of Lesbos
I chose when he himself took Lesbos town,
as they outshone all womankind in beauty.
These I shall give him, and one more, whom I took away from him then: Briseus' daughter.
Concerning her, I add my solemn oath
I never went to bed or coupled with her,
as custom is with men and women.
These will be his at once. If the immortals grant us the plundering of Priam's town, let him come forward when the spoils are shared and load his ship with bars of gold and bronze.
Then he may choose among the Trojan women
twenty that are most lovely, after Helen.
If we return to Argos of Akhaia, flowing with good things of the earth, he'll be my own adopted son, dear as Orestês,
born long ago and reared in bounteous peace.
I have three daughters now at home, Khrysóthemis, Laódikê, and Iphiánassa.
He may take whom he will to be his bride and pay no bridal gift, leading her home to Pêleus' hall. But I shall add a dowry such as no man has given to his daughter.
Seven flourishing strongholds I'll give him:
Kardamylê and Enopê and Hirê

147. tripods: Here, a three footed kettle. Such metal equipment was rare and highly valued.

155. Lesbos: A large island off the coast of Asia Minor.

169. Argos: Greece.

173–174. Khrysóthemis, Laódikê, and Iphiánassa: Homer's picture of Agamémnon's family is different from that of the later tragic poets. It is possible (but by no means certain) that Iphiánassa is a different form of the name Iphigenia but in that case Homer does not know the story of the sacrifice of Iphigenia at Aulis (though he mentions the gathering of the ships there in Book II). Khrysóthemis appears in Sophocles' play Electra, but Electra herself, who appears in all the Orestes tragedies, is not mentioned in Homer. Laódikê appears only here.

in the wild grassland; holy Phêrai too,
and the deep meadowland of Ántheia,
Aipeia and the vineyard slope of Pêdasos,
all lying near the sea in the far west
of sandy Pylos. In these lands are men who own great flocks and herds; now as his liegemen, they will pay tithes and sumptuous honor to him,
prospering as they carry out his plans.
These are the gifts I shall arrange if he desists from anger. Let him be subdued!
Lord Death indeed is deaf to appeal, implacable;
of all gods therefore he is most abhorrent to mortal men. So let Akhilleus bow to me, considering that I hold higher rank and claim the precedence of age."

To this
Lord Nestor of Gerênia replied:

"Lord Marshal of the army, Agamémnon,
this time the gifts you offer Lord Akhilleus are not to be despised. Come, we'll dispatch our chosen emissaries to his quarters as quickly as possible. Those men whom I may designate, let them perform the mission.
Phoinix, dear to Zeus, may lead the way.
Let Aías follow him, and Prince Odysseus.
The criers, Hódios and Eurýbatês, may go as escorts. Bowls for their hands here!
Tell them to keep silence, while we pray that Zeus the son of Krónos will be merciful."

Nestor's proposal fell on willing ears, and criers came at once to tip our water over their hands, while young men filled the winebowls and dipped a measure into every cup.
They spilt their offerings and drank their fill,
then briskly left the hut of Agamémnon.
Nestor accompanied them with final words and sage looks, especially for Odysseus, as to the effort they should make to bring the son of Pêleus round.

196. Gerênia: The city in southwestern Greece where Nestor was brought up.
203. Phoinix: Especially appropriate for this mission, since he was tutor to the young Akhilleus.

Following Phoinix,
Aías and Odysseus walked together beside the tumbling clamorous whispering sea, praying hard to the girdler of the islands that they might easily sway their great friend's heart.
Amid the ships and huts of the Myrmidons they found him, taking joy in a sweet harp of rich and delicate make—the crossbar set to hold the strings being silver. He had won it when he destroyed the city of Eëtíôn, and plucking it he took his joy: he sang old tales of heroes, while across the room alone and silent sat Patróklos, waiting until Akhilleus should be done with song.
Phoinix had come in unremarked, but when the two new visitors, Odysseus leading, entered and stood before him, then Akhilleus rose in wonderment, and left his chair, his harp still in his hand. So did Patróklos rise at sight of the two men. Akhilleus made both welcome with a gesture, saying:

"Peace! My two great friends, I greet your coming.
How I have needed it! Even in my anger, of all Akhaians, you are closest to me."

And Prince Akhilleus led them in. He seated them on easy chairs with purple coverlets, and to Patróklos who stood near he said:

"Put out an ampler winebowl, use more wine for stronger drink, and place a cup for each.
Here are my dearest friends beneath my roof."

Patróklos did as his companion bade him.
Meanwhile the host set down a carving block within the fire's rays; a chine of mutton and a fat chine of goat he placed upon it, as well as savory pork chine. Automédôn steadied the meat for him, Akhilleus carved,
then sliced it well and forked it on the spits.
Meanwhile Patróklos, like a god in firelight, made the hearth blaze up. When the leaping flame had ebbed and died away, he raked the coals

221. girdler of the islands: Poseidon.
252. Automédôn: The driver of Akhilleus' chariot.

and in the glow extended spits of meat, lifting these at times from the firestones to season with pure salt. When all was done and the roast meat apportioned into platters, loaves of bread were passed round by Patróklos in fine baskets. Akhilleus served the meat.
He took his place then opposite Odysseus, back to the other wall, and told Patróklos to make offering to the gods.
This he did with meat tossed in the fire,
then each man's hand went out upon the meal.
When they had put their hunger and thirst away, Aías nodded silently to Phoinix, but Prince Odysseus caught the nod. He filled a cup of wine and lifted it to Akhilleus, saying:

"Health, Akhilleus. We've no lack of generous feasts this evening—in the lodge of Agamémnon first, and now with you, good fare and plentiful each time.
It is not feasting that concerns us now,
however, but a ruinous defeat.
Before our very eyes we see it coming and are afraid. By a blade's turn, our good ships are saved or lost, unless you arm your valor.
Trojans and allies are encamped tonight in pride before our ramparts, at our sterns, and through their army burn a thousand fires.
These men are sure they cannot now be stopped but will get through to our good ships. Lord Zeus flashes and thunders for them on the right, and Hektor in his ecstasy of power is mad for battle, confident in Zeus, deferring to neither men nor gods. Pure frenzy fills him, and he prays for the bright dawn when he will shear our stern-post beaks away and fire all our ships, while in the shipways amid that holocaust he carries death among our men, driven out by smoke. All this I gravely fear; I fear the gods will make good his threatenings, and our fate will be

292. stern-post beaks: The stern of the Homeric ship ended in an upward projection, handy for dragging it up on the beach. Hektor will "shear them away" to display them as trophies in Troy.

293. shipways: Where the ships have been beached.

to die here, far from the pastureland of Argos.
Rouse yourself, if even at this hour you'll pitch in for the Akhaians and deliver them from Trojan havoc. In the years to come this day will be remembered pain for you if you do not. No remedy, no remedy will come to hand, once the great ill is done.
While there is time, think how to keep this evil day from the Danáäns!

My dear lad,

how rightly in your case your father, Pêleus, put it in his farewell, sending you out from Phthía to make ship with Agamémnon!
'Now as to fighting power, child,' he said,
'if Hêra and Athêna wish, they'll give it.
Control your passion, though, and your proud heart,
for gentle courtesy is a better thing.
Break off insidious quarrels, and young and old,
the Argives will respect you for it more.'
That was your old father's admonition:
you have forgotten. Still, even now, abandon heart-wounding anger. If you will relent, Agamémnon will match this change of heart with gifts. Now listen and let me list for you what just now in his quarters he proposed:
seven new tripods, and ten bars of gold,
then twenty shining caldrons, and twelve horses, thoroughbreds, that by their wind and legs have won him prizes: any man who owned what these have brought him would not lack resources, could not be pinched for precious gold—so many prizes have these horses carried home.
Then he will give you seven women, deft
in household handicraft: women of Lesbos chosen when you yourself took Lesbos town,
as they outshone all womankind in beauty.
These he will give you, and one more, whom he took away from you then: Briseus' daughter, concerning whom he adds a solemn oath never to have gone to bed or coupled with her,
as custom is, my lord, with men and women.
These are all yours at once. If the immortals grant us the pillaging of Priam's town, you may come forward when the spoils are shared and load your ship with bars of gold and bronze.

Then you may choose among the Trojan women
twenty that are most lovely, after Helen.
And then, if we reach Argos of Akhaia, flowing with good things of the earth, you'll be his own adopted son, dear as Orestês,
born long ago and reared in bounteous peace.
He has three daughters now at home, Khrysóthemis, Laódikê, and Iphiánassa.
You may take whom you will to be your bride and pay no gift when you conduct her home to your ancestral hall. He'll add a dowry
such as no man has given to his daughter.
Seven flourishing strongholds he'll give to you:
Kardamylé and Enopé and Hirê
in the wild grassland; holy Phêrai too,
and the deep meadowland of Ántheia,
Aipeia and the vineyard slope of Pêdasos,
all lying near the sea in the far west
of sandy Pylos. In these lands are men who own great flocks and herds; now as your liegemen, they will pay tithes and sumptuous honor to you,
prospering as they carry out your plans.
These are the gifts he will arrange if you desist from anger.

Even if you abhor
the son of Atreus all the more bitterly, with all his gifts, take pity on the rest,
all the old army, worn to rags in battle.
These will honor you as gods are honored!
And ah, for these, what glory you may win!
Think: Hektor is your man this time: being crazed with ruinous pride, believing there's no fighter equal to him among those that our ships brought here by sea, he'll put himself in range!"

Akhilleus the great runner answered him:

"Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master soldier and mariner,
I owe you a straight answer, as to how
I see this thing, and how it is to end.
No need to sit with me like mourning doves making your gentle noise by turns. I hate as I hate Hell's own gate that man who hides one thought within him while he speaks another.

What I shall say is what I see and think.
Give in to Agamémnon? I think not, neither to him nor to the rest. I had small thanks for fighting, fighting without truce against hard enemies here. The portion's equal whether a man hangs back or fights his best;
the same respect, or lack of it, is given brave man and coward. One who's active dies like the do-nothing. What least thing have I to show for it, for harsh days undergone and my life gambled, all these years of war?
A bird will give her fledglings every scrap she comes by, and go hungry, foraging.
That is the case with me.
Many a sleepless night I've spent afield and many a day in bloodshed, hand to hand in battle for the wives of other men.
In sea raids I plundered a dozen towns, eleven in expeditions overland through Trojan country, and the treasure taken out of them all, great heaps of handsome things,
I carried back each time to Agamémnon.
He sat tight on the beachhead, and shared out a little treasure; most of it he kept.
He gave prizes of war to his officers;
the rest have theirs, not I; from me alone of all Akhaians, he pre-empted her.
He holds my bride, dear to my heart. Aye, let him sleep with her and enjoy her!

Why must Argives fight the Trojans? Why did he raise an army and lead it here? For Helen, was it not?
Are the Atreidai of all mortal men
the only ones who love their wives? I think not.
Every sane decent fellow loves his own and cares for her, as in my heart I loved Brisêis, though I won her by the spear.
Now, as he took my prize out of my hands,
tricked and defrauded me, he need not tempt me;
I know him, and he cannot change my mind.
Let him take thought, Odysseus, with you and others how the ships may be defended against incendiary attack. By god, he has achieved imposing work without me,
a rampart piled up overnight, a ditch running beyond it, broad and deep, with stakes implanted in it! All no use!

He cannot hold against the killer's charge.
As long as I was in the battle, Hektor never cared for a fight far from the walls;
his limit was the oak tree by the gate.
When I was alone one day he waited there,
but barely got away when I went after him.
Now it is I who do not care to fight.
Tomorrow at dawn when I have made offering to Zeus and all the gods, and hauled my ships for loading in the shallows, if you like and if it interests you, look out and see my ships on Hellê's waters in the offing, oarsmen in line making the sea-foam scud!
And if the great Earthshaker gives a breeze,
the third day out I'll make it home to Phthía.
Rich possessions are there I left behind when I was mad enough to come here; now
I take home gold and ruddy bronze, and women belted luxuriously, and hoary iron, all that came to me here. As for my prize, he who gave her took her outrageously back.
Well, you can tell him all this to his face, and let the other Akhaians burn if he in his thick hide of shamelessness picks out another man to cheat. He would not look me in the eye, dog that he is!
I will not share one word of counsel with him,
nor will I act with him; he robbed me blind, broke faith with me: he gets no second chance to play me for a fool. Once is enough.
To hell with him, Zeus took his brains away!
His gifts I abominate, and I would give not one dry shuck for him. I would not change, not if he multiplied his gifts by ten,
by twenty times what he has now, and more,
no matter where they came from: if he gave what enters through Orkhómenos' town gate or Thebes of Egypt, where the treasures lie—that city where through each of a hundred gates two hundred men drive out in chariots.

441. Hellê's waters: The Hellespont.
443. Earthshaker: Poseidon.
466. Orkhómenos: Great city north of Athens.
467. Thebes of Egypt: The splendid ancient capital of Upper Egypt.

Not if his gifts outnumbered the sea sands or all the dust grains in the world could Agamémnon ever appease me—not till he pays me back full measure, pain for pain, dishonor for dishonor.
The daughter of Agamémnon, son of Atreus,
I will not take in marriage. Let her be as beautiful as pale-gold Aphrodítê, skilled as Athêna of the sea-gray eyes,
I will not have her, at any price. No, let him find someone else, an eligible Akhaian, kinglier than I.

Now if the gods preserve me and I make it home, my father Pêleus will select a bride for me.
In Hellas and in Phthía there are many daughters of strong men who defend the towns.
I'll take the one I wish to be my wife.
There in my manhood I have longed, indeed, to marry someone of congenial mind and take my ease, enjoying the great estate my father had acquired.

Now I think
no riches can compare with being alive, not even those they say this well-built Ilion stored up in peace before the Akhaians came.
Neither could all the Archer's shrine contains at rocky Pytho, in the crypt of stone.
A man may come by cattle and sheep in raids;
tripods he buys, and tawny-headed horses;
but his life's breath cannot be hunted back or be recaptured once it pass his lips.
My mother, Thetis of the silvery feet, tells me of two possible destinies carrying me toward death: two ways:
if on the one hand I remain to fight around Troy town, I lose all hope of home but gain unfading glory; on the other, if I sail back to my own land my glory fails—but a long life lies ahead for me.
To all the rest of you I say: 'Sail home:
you will not now see Ilion's last hour,'
for Zeus who views the wide world held his sheltering hand over that city, and her troops have taken heart.

494. Pytho: Apollo's shrine at Delphi. The treasure consisted of offerings made to the god by his worshippers.

Return, then, emissaries, deliver my answer to the Akhaian peers—
it is the senior officer's privilege—and let them plan some other way, and better, to save their ships and save the Akhaian army.
This one cannot be put into effect—their scheme this evening—while my anger holds.
Phoinix may stay and lodge the night with us,
then take ship and sail homeward at my side tomorrow, if he wills. I'll not constrain him."

After Akhilleus finished, all were silent, awed, for he spoke with power.
Then the old master-charioteer, Lord Phoinix, answered at last, and let his tears come shining, fearing for the Akhaian ships:

"Akhilleus,
if it is true you set your heart on home and will not stir a finger to save the ships from being engulfed by fire—all for this rage that has swept over you—how, child, could I be sundered from you, left behind alone?
For your sake the old master-charioteer,
Pêleus, made provision that I should come,
that day he gave you godspeed out of Phthía to go with Agamémnon. Still a boy, you knew nothing of war that levels men to the same testing, nothing of assembly where men become illustrious. That is why he sent me, to instruct you in these matters, to be a man of eloquence and action.
After all that, dear child, I should not wish to be left here apart from you—not even if god himself should undertake to smooth my wrinkled age and make me fresh and young, as when for the first time I left the land of lovely women, Hellas. I went north to avoid a feud with Father, Amyntor Orménidês. His anger against me rose over a fair-haired slave girl whom he fancied, without respect for his own wife, my mother.
Mother embraced my knees and begged that I make love to this girl, so that afterward she might be cold to the aging man. I did it.
My father guessed the truth at once, and cursed me, praying the ghostly Furies that no son of mine should ever rest upon his knees:

a curse fulfilled by the immortals—Lord
Zeus of undergloom and cold Perséphonê.
I planned to put a sword in him, and would have,
had not some god unstrung my rage, reminding me of country gossip and the frowns of men;
I shrank from being called a parricide among the Akhaians. But from that time on I felt no tie with home, no love for lingering under the rooftree of a raging father.
Our household and our neighbors, it is true, urged me to stay. They made a handsome feast of shambling cattle butchered, and fat sheep;
young porkers by the litter, crisp with fat,
were singed and spitted in Hêphaistos' fire, rivers of wine drunk from the old man's store.
Nine times they spent the night and slept beside me, taking the watch by turns, leaving a fire to flicker under the entrance colonnade, and one more in the court outside my room.
But when the tenth night came, starless and black,
I cracked the tight bolt on my chamber door, pushed out, and scaled the courtyard wall, unseen
by household men on watch or women slaves.
Then I escaped from that place, made my way through Hellas where the dancing floors are wide, until I came to Phthía's fertile plain,
mother of flocks, and Pêleus the king.
He gave me welcome, treated me with love,
as a father would an only son, his heir to rich possessions. And he made me rich, appointing me great numbers of retainers on the frontier of Phthía, where I lived as lord of Dolopês. Now, it was I who formed your manhood, handsome as a god's, Akhilleus: I who loved you from the heart;
for never in another's company would you attend a feast or dine in hall—never, unless I took you on my knees and cut your meat, and held your cup of wine.
Many a time you wet my shirt, hiccuping wine-bubbles in distress, when you were small.

554. Furies: Avenging spirits, particularly concerned with crimes committed by kinsmen against kinsmen.

557. Zeus of undergloom: The god Hades. Persephone: His wife.

Patient and laborious as a nurse
I had to be for you, bearing in mind that never would the gods bring into being any son of mine. Godlike Akhilleus, you were the manchild that I made my own to save me someday, so I thought, from misery.
Quell your anger, Akhilleus! You must not be pitiless! The gods themselves relent, and are they not still greater in bravery, in honor and in strength? Burnt offerings, courteous prayer, libation, smoke of sacrifice, with all of these, men can placate the gods when someone oversteps and errs. The truth is, prayers are daughters of almighty Zeus—one may imagine them lame, wrinkled things with eyes cast down, that toil to follow after passionate Folly. Folly is strong and swift, outrunning all the prayers, and everywhere arriving first to injure mortal men; still they come healing after. If a man reveres the daughters of Zeus when they come near,
he is rewarded, and his prayers are heard;
but if he spurns them and dismisses them, they make their way to Zeus again and ask that Folly dog that man till suffering has taken arrogance out of him.

Relent,

be courteous to the daughters of Zeus, you too,
as courtesy sways others, and the best.
If Agamémnon had no gifts for you, named none to follow, but inveighed against you still in fury, then I could never say,
'Discard your anger and defend the Argives—' never, no matter how they craved your help.
But this is not so: he will give many things at once; he promised others; he has sent his noblest men to intercede with you,
the flower of the army, and your friends, dearest among the Argives. Will you turn their words, their coming, into humiliation?
Until this moment, no one took it ill that you should suffer anger; we learned this from the old stories of how towering wrath could overcome great men; but they were still amenable to gifts and to persuasion.
Here is an instance I myself remember not from our own time but in ancient days:

I'll tell it to you all, for all are friends.
The Kourêtês were fighting a warlike race, Aitolians, around the walls of Kálydôn, with slaughter on both sides: Aitolians defending their beloved Kálydôn while the Kourêtês longed to sack the town.
The truth is, Artemis of the Golden Chair had brought the scourge of war on the Aitolians;
she had been angered because Oineus made no harvest offering from his vineyard slope.
While other gods enjoyed his hekatombs
he made her none, either forgetful of it or careless—a great error, either way.
In her anger, the Mistress of Long Arrows roused against him a boar with gleaming tusks out of his wild grass bed, a monstrous thing that ravaged the man's vineyard many times and felled entire orchards, roots, blooms, apples and all. Now this great boar Meléagros, the son of Oineus, killed by gathering men and hounds from far and near.
So huge the boar was, no small band could master him,
and he brought many to the dolorous pyre.
Around the dead beast Artemis set on a clash with battlecries between Kourêtês and proud Aitolians over the boar's head and shaggy hide. As long, then, as Meléagros, backed by the wargod, fought, the Kourêtês had the worst of it for all their numbers and could not hold a line outside the walls.
But then a day came when Meléagros was stung by venomous anger that infects the coolest thinker's heart: swollen with rage at his own mother, Althaiê, he languished in idleness at home beside his lady, Kleopátrê.

645. Kálydôn: A city in northwest Greece.

651. Oineus: King of the Aitolians.

665. dolorous pyre: I.e., to their deaths. Cremation was the normal funeral custom.

675–676. rage/at his own mother: Explained below. She had prayed for his death because he killed her brother in the fighting.

678. Kleopátrê: (Cleopatra). This short digression (to line 686) tells, in highly allusive fashion, the story of Kleopátrê's mother Marpessê, daughter of Euênos. The famous archer Idês carried her off and married her. But the god Apollo, who had also been her suitor, overtook Idês and seized Marpessê. Idês defied Apollo to combat, but Zeus decided that the choice should be Marpessê's and she chose Idês. They gave their daughter Kleopátrê the nickname Alkýonê, the name of the sea-bird that was supposed to mourn for its mate, as Marpessê, carried off by Apollo, mourned for Idês.

This lovely girl was born to Marpessê of ravishing pale ankles, Euênos' child, and Idês, who had been most powerful of men on earth. He drew the bow against the Lord Phoibos Apollo over his love, Marpessê, whom her father and gentle mother called Alkýonê, since for her sake her mother gave that seabird's forlorn cry when Apollo ravished her.
With Kleopátrê lay Meléagros, nursing the bitterness his mother stirred,
when in her anguish over a brother slain
she cursed her son. She called upon the gods, beating the grassy earth with both her hands
as she pitched forward on her knees, with cries to the Lord of Undergloom and cold Perséphonê, while tears wetted her veils—in her entreaty that death come to her son. Inexorable in Érebos a vampire Fury listened.
Soon, then, about the gates of the Aitolians tumult and din of war grew loud; their towers rang with blows. And now the elder men implored Meléagros to leave his room, and sent the high priests of the gods, imploring him to help defend the town. They promised him a large reward: in the green countryside of Kálydôn, wherever it was richest, there he might choose a beautiful garden plot of fifty acres, half in vineyard, half in virgin prairie for the plow to cut.
Oineus, master of horsemen, came with prayers upon the doorsill of the chamber, often rattling the locked doors, pleading with his son.
His sisters, too, and then his gentle mother pleaded with him. Only the more fiercely he turned away. His oldest friends, his dearest, not even they could move him—not until his room was shaken by a hail of stones as Kourêtês began to scale the walls and fire the city.

Then at last his lady in her soft-belted gown besought him weeping, speaking of all the ills that come to men whose town is taken: soldiers put to the sword;

696. Érebos: The lower depths of the underworld.

the city razed by fire; alien hands carrying off the children and the women.
Hearing these fearful things, his heart was stirred to action: he put on his shining gear and fought off ruin from the Aitolians.
Mercy prevailed in him. His folk no longer cared to award him gifts and luxuries, yet even so he saved that terrible day.
Oh, do not let your mind go so astray!
Let no malignant spirit turn you that way, dear son! It will be worse to fight for ships already set afire!
Value the gifts; rejoin the war; Akhaians afterward will give you a god's honor.
If you reject the gifts and then, later, enter the deadly fight, you will not be accorded the same honor, even though you turn the tide of war!"

But the great runner
Akhilleus answered:

"Old uncle Phoinix, bless you,
that is an honor I can live without.
Honored I think I am by Zeus's justice, justice that will sustain me by the ships
as long as breath is in me and I can stand.
Here is another point: ponder it well:
best not confuse my heart with lamentation for Agamémnon, whom you must not honor;
you would be hateful to me, dear as you are.
Loyalty should array you at my side in giving pain to him who gives me pain.
Rule with me equally, share half my honor,
but do not ask my help for Agamémnon.
My answer will be reported by these two.
Lodge here in a soft bed, and at first light
we can decide whether to sail or stay."

He knit his brows and nodded to Patróklos to pile up rugs for Phoinix' bed—a sign for the others to be quick about departing.
Aías, however, noble son of Télamôn made the last appeal. He said:

"Odysseus,
master soldier and mariner, let us go.
I do not see the end of this affair achieved by this night's visit. Nothing for it but to report our talk for what it's worth to the Danáäns, who sit waiting there.
Akhilleus hardened his great heart against us, wayward and savage as he is, unmoved by the affections of his friends who made him honored above all others on the beachhead.
There is no pity in him. A normal man will take the penalty for a brother slain or a dead son. By paying much, the one who did the deed may stay unharmed at home.
Fury and pride in the bereaved are curbed when he accepts the penalty. Not you.
Cruel and unappeasable rage the gods put in you for one girl alone. We offer seven beauties, and much more besides!
Be gentler, and respect your own rooftree whereunder we are guests who speak for all Danáäns as a body. Our desire is to be closest to you of them all."

Akhilleus the great runner answered him:

"Scion of Télamôn and gods of old, Aías, lord of fighting men, you seemed to echo my own mind in what you said!
And yet my heart grows large and hot with fury remembering that affair: as though I were some riffraff or camp follower, he taunted me before them all!
Go back, report the news:
I will not think of carnage or of war until Prince Hektor, son of Priam, reaches Myrmidon huts and ships in his attack, slashing through Argives, burning down their ships.
Around my hut, my black ship, I foresee for all his fury, Hektor will break off combat."

That was his answer. Each of the emissaries took up a double-handed cup and poured libation by the shipways. Then Odysseus led the way on their return. Patróklos commanded his retainers and the maids to make at once a deep-piled bed for Phoinix.

Obediently they did so, spreading out fleeces and coverlet and a linen sheet, and down the old man lay, awaiting Dawn.
Akhilleus slept in the well-built hut's recess, and with him lay a woman he had brought from Lesbos, Phorbas' daughter, Diomêdê.
Patróklos went to bed at the other end,
and with him, too, a woman lay—soft-belted Iphis, who had been given to him by Akhilleus when he took Skyros, ringed by cliff, the mountain fastness of Enyéus.

Now the emissaries arrived at Agamémnon's lodge. With cups of gold held up, and rising to their feet on every side, the Akhaians greeted them, curious for the news. Lord Agamémnon put the question first:

"Come, tell me, sir,
Odysseus, glory of Akhaia—will Akhilleus fight off ravenous fire from the ships or does he still refuse, does anger still hold sway in his great heart?"

That patient man,
the Prince Odysseus, made reply:

"Excellency,
Lord Marshal of the army, son of Atreus,
the man has no desire to quench his rage.
On the contrary, he is more than ever full of anger, spurns you and your gifts, calls on you to work out your own defense to save the ships and the Akhaian army.
As for himself, he threatens at daybreak to drag his well-found ships into the surf, and says he would advise the rest as well to sail for home. 'You shall not see,' he says,
'the last hour that awaits tall Ilion,
for Zeus who views the wide world held his sheltering hand over the city, and her troops have taken heart.' That was Akhilleus' answer.
Those who were with me can confirm all this,
Aías can, and the two clearheaded criers.

830. well-found: Solidly built.

As to old Phoinix, he is sleeping there by invitation, so that he may sail to his own country, homeward with Akhilleus, tomorrow, if he wills, without constraint."

When he had finished everyone was still, sitting in silence and in perturbation for a long time. At last brave Diomêdês, lord of the warcry, said:

"Excellency,

Lord Marshal of the army, Agamémnon,
you never should have pled with him, or given so many gifts to him. At the best of times he is a proud man; now you have pushed him far deeper into his vanity and pride.
By god, let us have done with him—whether he goes or stays! He'll fight again when the time comes, whenever his blood is up or the god rouses him. As for ourselves, let everyone now do as I advise and go to rest. Your hearts have been refreshed with bread and wine, the pith and nerve of men.
When the fair Dawn with finger tips of rose makes heaven bright, deploy your men and horses before the ships at once, and cheer them on, and take your place, yourself, in the front line to join the battle."

All gave their assent
in admiration of Diomêdês, breaker of horses. When they had spilt their wine they all dispersed, each man to his own hut, and lying down they took the gift of sleep.

[After Akhilleus' refusal, the situation of the Greeks worsened rapidly. Agamémnon, Diomêdês, and Odysseus were all wounded. The Trojans breached the stockade and fought beside the ships. Patróklos tried to bring Akhilleus to the aid of the Greeks, but the most he could obtain was permission for himself to fight, clad in Akhilleus' armor, at the head of the Myrmidons. He turned the tide of battle and drove the Trojans back to their walls, only to fall himself through the direct intervention of Apollo. Hektor stripped Akhilleus' armor from the body. A fierce fight for the body itself ended in partial success for the Greeks; they took Patróklos' body but had to retreat to their camp, with the Trojans at their heels.]

Book XVIII

[The Arming of Akhilleus]

While they were still in combat, fighting seaward raggedly as fire, Antílokhos ran far ahead with tidings for Akhilleus.
In shelter of the curled, high prows he found him envisioning what had come to pass, in gloom and anger saying to himself:

"Ai! why are they turning tail once more,
unmanned, outfought, and driven from the field back on the beach and ships? I pray the gods this may not be the last twist of the knife!
My mother warned me once that, while I lived,
the most admirable of Myrmidons would quit the sunlight under Trojan blows.
It could indeed be so. He has gone down, my dear and wayward friend!
Push their deadly fire away, I told him,
then return! You must not fight with Hektor!"

And while he called it all to mind, the son of gallant Nestor came up weeping to give his cruel news:

"Here's desolation,

son of Pêleus, the worst news for you—would god it had not happened!—Lord Patróklos fell, and they are fighting over his body, stripped of armor. Hektor has your gear."

A black stormcloud of pain shrouded Akhilleus.
On his bowed head he scattered dust and ash in handfuls and befouled his beautiful face, letting black ash sift on his fragrant khiton.
Then in the dust he stretched his giant length and tore his hair with both hands.

From the hut

the women who had been spoils of war to him and to Patróklos flocked in haste around him, crying loud in grief. All beat their breasts, and trembling came upon their knees.

Antílokhos

wept where he stood, bending to hold the hero's

2. Antílokhos: A son of Nestor. 28. khiton: Tunic.

hands when groaning shook his heart: he feared the man might use sharp iron to slash his throat.
And now Akhilleus gave a dreadful cry.
Her ladyship
his mother heard him, in the depths offshore lolling near her ancient father. Nymphs were gathered round her: all Nêrêïdês who haunted the green chambers of the sea.
Glaukê, Thaleia, and Kymodokê, Nesaiê, Speiô, Thoê, Haliê with her wide eyes; Kymothoê, Aktaiê, Limnôreia, Melitê and Iaira, Amphitoê, Agauê, Dôtô, Prôtô, Pherousa, Dynaménê, Dexaménê, Amphinomê, Kallianeira, Dôris, Panopê, and storied Galateia,
Nêmertês and Apseudês, Kallianassa, Klyméne, Ianeira, Ianassa, Maira, Oreithyia, Amathyia, and other Nêrêïdês of the deep sea, filling her glimmering silvery cave. All these now beat their breasts as Thetis cried in sorrow:

"Sisters, daughters of Nêreus, hear and know how sore my heart is! Now my life is pain for my great son's dark destiny! I bore a child flawless and strong beyond all men.
He flourished like a green shoot, and I brought him to manhood like a blossoming orchard tree,
only to send him in the ships to Ilion
to war with Trojans. Now I shall never see him entering Pêleus' hall, his home, again.
But even while he lives, beholding sunlight,
suffering is his lot. I have no power to help him, though I go to him. Even so, I'll visit my dear child and learn what sorrow came to him while he held aloof from war."

On this she left the cave, and all in tears her company swam aloft with her. Around them a billow broke and foamed on the open sea.
As they made land at the fertile plain of Troy, they went up one by one in line to where,
in close order, Myrmidon ships were beached to right and left of Akhilleus. Bending near

41. Nêrêïdês: Literally, daughters of Nêreus; sea-nymphs.

her groaning son, the gentle goddess wailed and took his head between her hands in pity, saying softly:

"Child, why are you weeping?
What great sorrow came to you? Speak out, do not conceal it. Zeus did all you asked: Akhaian troops, for want of you, were all forced back again upon the ship sterns, taking heavy losses none of them could wish."

The great runner
groaned and answered:

"Mother, yes, the master of high Olympos brought it all about, but how have I benefited? My greatest friend is gone: Patróklos, comrade in arms, whom I held dear above all others—dear as myself—now gone, lost; Hektor cut him down, despoiled him of my own arms, massive and fine, a wonder in all men's eyes. The gods gave them to Pêleus that day they put you in a mortal's bed—how I wish the immortals of the sea had been your only consorts! How I wish Pêleus had taken a mortal queen! Sorrow immeasurable is in store for you as well, when your own child is lost: never again on his homecoming day will you embrace him!
I must reject this life, my heart tells me,
reject the world of men,
if Hektor does not feel my battering spear tear the life out of him, making him pay in his own blood for the slaughter of Patróklos!"

Letting a tear fall, Thetis said:

"You'll be swift to meet your end, child, as you say:
your doom comes close on the heels of Hektor's own."

Akhilleus the great runner ground his teeth
and said:

"May it come quickly. As things were,
I could not help my friend in his extremity.
Far from his home he died; he needed me to shield him or to parry the death stroke.

For me there's no return to my own country.
Not the slightest gleam of hope did I afford Patróklos or the other men whom Hektor overpowered. Here I sat, my weight a useless burden to the earth, and I am one who has no peer in war among Akhaian captains—though in council
there are wiser. Ai! let strife and rancor perish from the lives of gods and men, with anger that envenoms even the wise and is far sweeter than slow-dripping honey, clouding the hearts of men like smoke: just so the marshal of the army, Agamémnon, moved me to anger. But we'll let that go, though I'm still sore at heart; it is all past,
and I have quelled my passion as I must.

Now I must go to look for the destroyer of my great friend. I shall confront the dark drear spirit of death at any hour Zeus and the other gods may wish to make an end.
Not even Hêraklês escaped that terror though cherished by the Lord Zeus. Destiny and Hêra's bitter anger mastered him.
Likewise with me, if destiny like his awaits me, I shall rest when I have fallen!
Now, though, may I win my perfect glory and make some wife of Troy break down, or some deep-breasted Dardan woman sob and wipe tears from her soft cheeks. They'll know then how long they had been spared the deaths of men, while I abstained from war!
Do not attempt to keep me from the fight, though you love me; you cannot make me listen."

Thetis, goddess of the silvery feet, answered:

"Yes, of course, child: very true.
You do no wrong to fight for tired soldiers and keep them from defeat. But still, your gear,

135. Hêraklês: Or Hercules, son of Zeus by a mortal woman. Pursued by the jealousy of Hêra, he was forced to undertake twelve great labors and finally died in agony from the effects of a poisoned garment.

142. Dardan: Another name for the Trojans, from Dárdanos, son of Zeus and ancestor of the Trojan kings.

all shining bronze, remains in Trojan hands.
Hektor himself is armed with it in pride!—
Not that he'll glory in it long, I know, for violent death is near him.

Patience, then.
Better not plunge into the moil of Arês until you see me here once more. At dawn, at sunrise, I shall come with splendid arms for you from Lord Hêphaistos."

She rose at this and, turning from her son, told her sister Nêrêïdês:

"Go down into the cool broad body of the sea to the sea's Ancient; visit Father's hall, and make all known to him. Meanwhile, I'll visit Olympos' great height and the lord of crafts, Hêphaistos, hoping he will give me
new and shining armor for my son."

At this they vanished in the offshore swell, and to Olympos Thetis the silvery-footed went once more, to fetch for her dear son new-forged and finer arms.

Meanwhile, Akhaians, wildly crying, pressed by deadly Hektor,
reached the ships, beached above Hellê's water.
None had been able to pull Patróklos clear of spear- and swordplay: troops and chariots and Hektor, son of Priam, strong as fire, once more gained upon the body. Hektor three times had the feet within his grasp and strove to wrest Patróklos backward, shouting to all the Trojans—but three times the pair named Aías in their valor shook him off.
Still he pushed on, sure of his own power,
sometimes lunging through the battle-din, or holding fast with a great shout: not one step would he give way. As from a fresh carcass herdsmen in the wilds cannot dislodge a tawny lion, famished: so those two with fearsome crests could not affright the son

156. Arês: God of war.

of Priam or repel him from the body.
He might have won it, might have won unending glory, but Iris running on the wind came from Olympos to the son of Pêleus, bidding him gird for battle. All unknown to Zeus and the other gods she came, for Hêra sent her down. And at his side she said:

"Up with you, Pêleidês, who strike cold fear into men's blood! Protect your friend Patróklos, for whom, beyond the ships, desperate combat rages now. They are killing one another on both sides: the Akhaians to defend him, Trojans fighting for that prize to drag to windy Ilion. And Hektor burns to take it more than anyone—to sever and impale Patróklos' head on Trojan battlements. Lie here no longer.
It would be shameful if wild dogs of Troy made him their plaything! If that body suffers mutilation, you will be infamous!"

Prince Akhilleus answered:

"Iris of heaven,
what immortal sent you to tell me this?"

And she who runs upon the wind replied:

"Hêra, illustrious wife of Zeus,
but he on his high throne knows nothing of it.
Neither does any one of the gods undying who haunt Olympos of eternal snows."

Akhilleus asked:

"And now how shall I go into the fighting? Those men have my gear.
My dear mother allows me no rearming until I see her again here.
She promises fine arms from Lord Hêphaistos.
I don't know whose armor I can wear, unless I take Aías' big shield.
But I feel sure he's in the thick of it, contending with his spear over Patróklos."

191. Iris: A messenger of the gods. 192. Pêleidês: Son of Pêleus.

Then she who runs upon the wind replied:

"We know they have your arms, and know it well.
Just as you are, then, stand at the moat; let Trojans take that in; they will be so dismayed they may break off the battle, and Akhaians in their fatigue may win a breathing spell, however brief, a respite from the war."

At this,

Iris left him, running downwind. Akhilleus, whom Zeus loved, now rose. Around his shoulders Athêna hung her shield, like a thunderhead with trailing fringe. Goddess of goddesses, she bound his head with golden cloud, and made his very body blaze with fiery light.
Imagine how the pyre of a burning town will tower to heaven and be seen for miles from the island under attack, while all day long outside their town, in brutal combat, pikemen suffer the wargod's winnowing; at sundown flare on flare is lit, the signal fires shoot up for other islanders to see, that some relieving force in ships may come:
just so the baleful radiance from Akhilleus lit the sky. Moving from parapet to moat, without a nod for the Akhaians, keeping clear, in deference to his mother,
he halted and gave tongue. Not far from him Athêna shrieked. The great sound shocked the Trojans into tumult, as a trumpet blown by a savage foe shocks an encircled town, so harsh and clarion was Akhilleus' cry.
The hearts of men quailed, hearing that brazen voice.
Teams, foreknowing danger, turned their cars and charioteers blanched, seeing unearthly fire, kindled by the gray-eyed goddess Athêna, brilliant over Akhilleus. Three great cries he gave above the moat. Three times they shuddered, whirling backward, Trojans and allies, and twelve good men took mortal hurt from cars and weapons in the rank behind.
Now the Akhaians leapt at the chance to bear Patróklos' body out of range.

241. pikemen: Soldiers armed with long spears.

256. teams: Of horses. cars: Chariots.

They placed it on his bed,
and old companions there with brimming eyes surrounded him. Into their midst Akhilleus came then, and he wept hot tears to see his faithful friend, torn by the sharp spearhead, lying cold upon his cot. Alas, the man he sent to war with team and chariot
he could not welcome back alive.

Her majesty,
wide-eyed Hêra, made the reluctant sun,
unwearied still, sink in the streams of Ocean.
Down he dropped, and the Akhaian soldiers broke off combat, resting from the war.
The Trojans, too, retired. Unharnessing teams from war-cars, before making supper, they came together on the assembly ground, every man on his feet; not one could sit,
each being still in a tremor—for Akhilleus, absent so long, had once again appeared.
Clearheaded Poulýdamas, son of Pánthoös, spoke up first, as he alone could see what lay ahead and all that lay behind.
He and Hektor were companions-in-arms, born, as it happened, on the same night; but one excelled in handling weapons, one with words.
Now for the good of all he spoke among them:

"Think well of our alternatives, my friends.
What I say is, retire upon the town, instead of camping on the field till dawn here by the ships. We are a long way from our stone wall. As long as that man raged at royal Agamémnon, we could fight the Akhaians with advantage. I was happy to spend last night so near the beach and think of capturing ships today. Now, though, I fear the son of Pêleus to my very marrow!
There are no bounds to the passion of that man.
He will not be contained by the flat ground where Trojans and Akhaians share between them raging war: he will strive on to fight to win our town, our women. Back to Troy!
Believe me, this is what we face!
Now, starry night has made Akhilleus pause, but when day comes, when he sorties in arms to find us lingering here, there will be men who learn too well what he is made of. Aye,

I daresay those who get away will reach walled Ilion thankfully, but dogs and kites of Troy will feed on many. May that story never reach my ears! If we can follow my battle plan, though galled by it, tonight we'll husband strength, at rest in the market place.
Towers, high gates, great doors of fitted planking, bolted tight, will keep the town secure.
Early tomorrow we shall arm ourselves and man the walls. Worse luck then for Akhilleus, if he comes looking for a head-on fight on the field around the wall! He can do nothing but trot back, after all, to the encampment, his proud team in a lather from their run,
from scouring every quarter below the town.
Rage as he will, he cannot force an entrance, cannot take all Troy by storm. Wild dogs will eat him first!"

Under his shimmering helmet
Hektor glared at the speaker. Then he said:

"Poulýdamas, what you propose no longer serves my turn.. To go on the defensive inside the town again? Is anyone not sick of being huddled in those towers?
In past days men told tales of Priam's city, rich in gold and rich in bronze, but now those beautiful treasures of our home are lost.
Many have gone for sale to Phrygia and fair Mêïoniê, since Lord Zeus grew hostile toward us.

Now when the son of Krónos Crooked Wit has given me a chance of winning glory, pinning the Akhaians back on the sea—now is no time to publish notions like these to troops, you fool! No Trojan goes along with you, I will not have it!
Come, let each man act as I propose.
Take your evening meal by companies;
remember sentries; keep good watch; and any Trojan tired of his wealth, who wants to lose everything, let him turn it over

312. kites: Scavenger hawks.
340. Crooked Wit: A title of Zeus, referring to his devious and mysterious ways.

to the army stores to be consumed in common!
Better our men enjoy it than Akhaians.
At first light we shall buckle armor on and bring the ships under attack. Suppose the man who stood astern there was indeed Akhilleus, then worse luck for him, if he will have it so. Shall I retreat from him, from clash of combat? No, I will not.
Here I'll stand, though he should win; I might just win, myself: the battle-god's impartial, dealing death to the death-dealing man."

This was Hektor's speech. The Trojans roared approval of it—fools, for Pallas Athêna took away their wits. They all applauded Hektor's poor tactics, but Poulydamas with his good judgment got not one assent.
They took their evening meal now, through the army,
while all night long Akhaians mourned Patróklos.

Akhilleus led them in their lamentation, laying those hands deadly to enemies upon the breast of his old friend, with groans at every breath, bereft as a lioness whose whelps a hunter seized out of a thicket;
late in returning, she will grieve, and roam through many meandering valleys on his track in hope of finding him; heart-stinging anger carries her away. Now with a groan he cried out to the Myrmidons:

"Ah, god,
what empty prophecy I made that day to cheer Menoitios in his mégaron!
I promised him his honored son, brought back to Opoeis, as pillager of Ilion bearing his share of spoils.
But Zeus will not fulfill what men design, not all of it. Both he and I were destined to stain the same earth dark red here at Troy.
No going home for me; no welcome there from Pêleus, master of horse, or from my mother, Thetis. Here the earth will hold me under.
Therefore, as I must follow you into the grave,

379. Menoitios: Father of Patróklos.
381. Opoeis: Ancient city on the eastern coast of the Greek mainland, home of Menoitios.

I will not give you burial, Patróklos, until I carry back the gear and head of him who killed you, noble friend.
Before your funeral pyre I'll cut the throats of twelve resplendent children of the Trojans—that is my murdering fury at your death.
But while you lie here by the swanlike ships, night and day, close by, deep-breasted women of Troy, and Dardan women, must lament and weep hot tears, all those whom we acquired by labor in assault, by the long spear, pillaging the fat market towns of men."

With this Akhilleus called the company to place over the campfire a big tripod and bathe Patróklos of his clotted blood.
Setting tripod and caldron on the blaze
they poured it full, and fed the fire beneath, and flames licked round the belly of the vessel until the water warmed and bubbled up in the bright bronze. They bathed him then, and took sweet oil for his anointing, laying nard in the open wounds; and on his bed they placed him, covering him with fine linen, head to foot,
and a white shroud over it.

So all that night
beside Akhilleus the great runner,
the Myrmidons held mourning for Patróklos.
Now Zeus observed to Hêra, wife and sister:
"You had your way, my lady, after all,
my wide-eyed one! You brought him to his feet,
the great runner! One would say the Akhaian gentlemen were progeny of yours."

And Hêra with wide eyes replied:

"Dread majesty,
Lord Zeus, why do you take this tone? May not an ordinary mortal have his way, though death awaits him, and his mind is dim?
Would anyone suppose that I, who rank in two respects highest of goddesses—by birth and by my station, queen to thee, lord of all gods—that I should not devise ill fortune for the Trojans whom I loathe?"

410. nard: An ointment.

So ran their brief exchange. Meanwhile the silvery-footed Thetis reached Hêphaistos' lodging, indestructible and starry, framed in bronze by the bandy-legged god.
She found him sweating, as from side to side he plied his bellows; on his forge were twenty tripods to be finished, then to stand around his mégaron. And he wrought wheels of gold for the base of each, that each might roll as of itself into the gods' assembly, then roll home, a marvel to the eyes.
The caldrons were all shaped but had no handles.
These he applied now, hammering rivets in;
and as he toiled surehandedly at this,
Thetis arrived.

Grace in her shining veil
just going out encountered her—that Grace the bowlegged god had taken to wife. She greeted Thetis with a warm handclasp and said:

"My lady Thetis, gracious goddess, what has brought you here? You almost never honor us!
Please come in, and let me give you welcome."

Loveliest of goddesses, she led the way to seat her guest on a silver-studded chair, elaborately fashioned, with a footrest.
Then she called to Hêphaistos:

"Come and see!
Thetis is here, in need of something from you!"

To this the Great Gamelegs replied:

"Ah, then we have a visitor I honor.
She was my savior, after the long fall and fractures that I had to bear, when Mother, bitch that she is, wanted to hide her cripple.
That would have been a dangerous time, had not Thetis and Eurýnomê taken me in—Eurýnomê, daughter of the tidal Ocean.
Nine years I stayed, and fashioned works of art, brooches and spiral bracelets, necklaces, in their smooth cave, round which the stream of Ocean flows with a foaming roar: and no one else knew of it, gods or mortals. Only Thetis

444. Grace: In the Odyssey, Hêphaistos is married to Aphrodite.

knew, and Eurýnomê, the two who saved me.
Now she has come to us. Well, what I owe for life to her ladyship in her soft braids
I must repay. Serve her our choicest fare while I put up my bellows and my tools."

At this he left the anvil block, and hobbled with monstrous bulk on skinny legs to take his bellows from the fire. Then all the tools he had been toiling with he stowed in a silver chest.

That done, he sponged himself,
his face, both arms, bull-neck and hairy chest,
put on a tunic, took a weighty staff, and limped out of his workshop. Round their lord came fluttering maids of gold, like living girls:
intelligences, voices, power of motion
these maids have, and skills learnt from immortals.
Now they came rustling to support their lord,
and he moved on toward Thetis, where she sat upon the silvery chair. He took her hand and warmly said:

"My Lady Thetis, gracious goddess, why have you come? You almost never honor us.
Tell me the favor that you have in mind,
for I desire to do it if I can,
and if it is a thing that one may do."

Thetis answered, tear on cheek:

"Hêphaistos,
who among all Olympian goddesses endured anxiety and pain like mine?
Zeus chose me, from all of them, for this!
Of sea-nymphs I alone was given in thrall to a mortal warrior, Pêleus Aiákidês, and I endured a mortal warrior's bed many a time, without desire. Now Pêleus lies far gone in age in his great hall, and I have other pain. Our son, bestowed on me and nursed by me, became a hero unsurpassed. He grew like a green shoot;
I cherished him like a flowering orchard tree,
only to send him in the ships to Ilion
to war with Trojans. Now I shall never see him entering Pêleus' hall, his home, again.

But even while he lives, beholding sunlight,
suffering is his lot. I have no power to help him, though I go to him. A girl, his prize from the Akhaians, Agamémnon took out of his hands to make his own, and ah, he pined with burning heart! The Trojans rolled the Akhaians back on the ship sterns, and left them no escape. Then Argive officers begged my son's help, offering every gift, but he would not defend them from disaster.
Arming Patróklos in his own war-gear,
he sent him with his people into battle.
All day long, around the Skaian Gates,
they fought, and would have won the city, too, had not Apollo, seeing the brave son of Menoitios wreaking havoc on the Trojans, killed him in action, and then given Hektor
the honor of that deed.

On this account
I am here to beg you: if you will, provide for my doomed son a shield and crested helm, good legging-greaves, fitted with ankle clasps, a cuirass, too. His own armor was lost when his great friend went down before the Trojans.
Now my son lies prone on the hard ground in grief."

The illustrious lame god replied:

"Take heart.
No trouble about the arms. I only wish that I could hide him from the power of death in his black hour—wish I were sure of that as of the splendid gear he'll get, a wonder to any one of the many men there are!"

He left her there, returning to his bellows, training them on the fire, crying, "To work!"
In crucibles the twenty bellows breathed every degree of fiery air: to serve him a great blast when he labored might and main, or a faint puff, according to his wish and what the work demanded.

Durable
fine bronze and tin he threw into the blaze with silver and with honorable gold, then mounted a big anvil in his block and in his right hand took a powerful hammer, managing with his tongs in his left hand.

His first job was a shield, a broad one, thick, well-fashioned everywhere. A shining rim he gave it, triple-ply, and hung from this a silver shoulder strap. Five welded layers composed the body of the shield. The maker used all his art adorning this expanse.
He pictured on it earth, heaven, and sea, unwearied sun, moon waxing, all the stars that heaven bears for garland: Plêïadês, Hyadês, Oríôn in his might,
the Great Bear, too, that some have called the Wain, pivoting there, attentive to Oríôn,
and unbathed ever in the Ocean stream.

He pictured, then, two cities, noble scenes:
weddings in one, and wedding feasts, and brides led out through town by torchlight from their chambers amid chorales, amid the young men turning round and round in dances; flutes and harps among them, keeping up a tune, and women coming outdoors to stare as they went by.
A crowd, then, in a market place, and there two men at odds over satisfaction owed for a murder done: one claimed that all was paid, and publicly declared it; his opponent turned the reparation down, and both demanded a verdict from an arbiter, as people clamored in support of each,
and criers restrained the crowd. The town elders sat in a ring, on chairs of polished stone, the staves of clarion criers in their hands,
with which they sprang up, each to speak in turn,
and in the middle were two golden measures to be awarded him whose argument would be the most straightforward.

Wartime then;
around the other city were emplaced
two columns of besiegers, bright in arms, as yet divided on which plan they liked:

559–561. Plêïadês . . . Wain: Constellations. Oríôn: Giant hunter of Greek myth. Great Bear: Also known as the Wain (wagon or chariot) and the Big Dipper, it never descends below the horizon.

whether to sack the town, or treat for half of all the treasure stored in the citadel.
The townsmen would not bow to either: secretly they armed to break the siege-line. Women and children stationed on the walls kept watch, with men whom age disabled. All the rest filed out, as Arês led the way, and Pallas Athêna, figured in gold, with golden trappings, both magnificent in arms, as the gods are,
in high relief, while men were small beside them.
When these had come to a likely place for ambush,
a river with a watering place for flocks,
they there disposed themselves, compact in bronze.
Two lookouts at a distance from the troops took their posts, awaiting sight of sheep and shambling cattle. Both now came in view, trailed by two herdsmen playing pipes, no hidden danger in their minds. The ambush party took them by surprise in a sudden rush; swiftly they cut off herds and beautiful flocks of silvery gray sheep, then killed the herdsmen.
When the besiegers from their parleying ground heard sounds of cattle in stampede, they mounted behind mettlesome teams, following the sound, and came up quickly. Battle lines were drawn, and on the riverbanks the fight began as each side rifled javelins at the other.
Here then Strife and Uproar joined the fray, and ghastly Fate, that kept a man with wounds alive, and one unwounded, and another dragged by the heels through battle-din in death.
This figure wore a mantle dyed with blood, and all the figures clashed and fought like living men, and pulled their dead away.

Upon the shield, soft terrain, freshly plowed, he pictured: a broad field, and many plowmen here and there upon it. Some were turning ox teams at the plowland's edge, and there as one arrived and turned, a man came forward putting a cup of sweet wine in his hands.
They made their turns-around, then up the furrows drove again, eager to reach the deep field's limit; and the earth looked black behind them, as though turned up by plows. But it was gold, all gold—a wonder of the artist's craft.

He put there, too, a king's field. Harvest hands were swinging whetted scythes to mow the grain, and stalks were falling along the swath while binders girded others up in sheaves with bands of straw—three binders, and behind them children came as gleaners, proffering their eager armfuls. And amid them all the king stood quietly with staff in hand, happy at heart, upon a new-mown swath.
To one side, under an oak tree his attendants worked at a harvest banquet. They had killed a great ox, and were dressing it; their wives made supper for the hands, with barley strewn.

A vineyard then he pictured, weighted down with grapes: this all in gold; and yet the clusters hung dark purple, while the spreading vines were propped on silver vine-poles. Blue enamel he made the enclosing ditch, and tin the fence, and one path only led into the vineyard on which the loaded vintagers took their way at vintage time. Lighthearted boys and girls were harvesting the grapes in woven baskets, while on a resonant harp a boy among them played a tune of longing, singing low with delicate voice a summer dirge. The others, breaking out in song for the joy of it, kept time together as they skipped along.

The artisan made next a herd of longhorns, fashioned in gold and tin: away they shambled, lowing, from byre to pasture by a stream that sang in ripples, and by reeds a-sway.
Four cowherds all of gold were plodding after with nine lithe dogs beside them.
On the assault,
in two tremendous bounds, a pair of lions caught in the van a bellowing bull, and off they dragged him, followed by the dogs and men.
Rending the belly of the bull, the two

662. byre: Stable.

gulped down his blood and guts, even as the herdsmen tried to set on their hunting dogs, but failed:
no trading bites with lions for those dogs,
who halted close up, barking, then ran back.

And on the shield the great bowlegged god designed a pasture in a lovely valley, wide, with silvery sheep, and huts and sheds and sheepfolds there.
A dancing floor as well
he fashioned, like that one in royal Knossos Daidalos made for the Princess Ariadnê.
Here young men and the most desired young girls were dancing, linked, touching each other's wrists, the girls in linen, in soft gowns, the men in well-knit khitons given a gloss with oil;
the girls wore garlands, and the men had daggers golden-hilted, hung on silver lanyards.
Trained and adept, they circled there with ease
the way a potter sitting at his wheel will give it a practice twirl between his palms to see it run; or else, again, in lines as though in ranks, they moved on one another:
magical dancing! All around, a crowd stood spellbound as two tumblers led the beat with spins and handsprings through the company.

Then, running round the shield-rim, triple-ply,
he pictured all the might of the Ocean stream.

Besides the densely plated shield, he made a cuirass, brighter far than fire light, a massive helmet, measured for his temples, handsomely figured, with a crest of gold;
then greaves of pliant tin.

Now when the crippled god had done his work, he picked up all the arms and laid them down before Akhilleus' mother, and swift as a hawk from snowy Olympos' height
she bore the brilliant gear made by Hêphaistos.

678. Knossos: In Crete, the site of the great palace excavated by Evans and known as "The palace of Minos."

679. Daidalos: The "fabulous artificer" who built the labyrinth for King Minos. Ariadnê: Daughter of Minos.

Book XIX

[Akhilleus Prepares for Battle]

Dawn in her yellow robe rose in the east out of the flowing Ocean, bearing light for deathless gods and mortal men. And Thetis brought to the beach her gifts from the god of fire.
She found her dear son lying beside Patróklos, wailing, while his men stood by in tears around him. Now amid that throng the lovely goddess bent to touch his shoulder and said to him:

"Ah, child, let him lie dead,
for all our grief and pain, we must allow it;
he fell by the gods' will.
But you, now—take the war-gear from Hêphaistos.
No man ever bore upon his shoulders gear so magnificent."

And she laid the armor down before Akhilleus, clanging loud in all its various glory. Myrmidons began to tremble at the sound, and dared not look straight at the armor; their knees shook.
But anger entered Akhilleus as he gazed,
his eyes grown wide and bright as blazing fire,
with fierce joy as he handled the god's gifts.
After appraising them in his delight
he spoke out to his mother swiftly:

"Mother,
these the god gave are miraculous arms, handiwork of immortals, plainly—far beyond the craft of men. By heaven, I'll wear them!
Only, I feel the dread that while I fight black carrion flies may settle on Patróklos' wounds, where the spearheads marked him, and I fear they may breed maggots to defile the corpse, now life is torn from it. His flesh may rot."

But silvery-footed Thetis answered:

"Child,
you must not let that prey on you. I'll find a way to shield him from the black fly hordes that eat the bodies of men killed in battle.

Though he should lie unburied a long year, his flesh will be intact and firm. Now, though,
for your part, call the Akhaians to assembly.
Tell them your anger against Agamémnon is over and done with!
After that, at once put on your gear, prepare your heart, for war!"

Her promise gave her son wholehearted valor.
Then, turning to Patróklos, she instilled red nectar and ambrosia in his nostrils to keep his body whole.
And Prince Akhilleus passed along the surf-line with a shout that split the air and roused men of Akhaia, even those who, up to now, had stayed amid the massed ships—navigators, helmsmen, men in charge of rations and ship stores.
Aye, even these now headed for assembly,
since he who for so long had shunned the battle,
Akhilleus, now appeared upon the field.
Resolute Diomêdês and Odysseus, familiars of the wargod, limped along,
leaning on spears, for both had painful wounds.
They made their way to the forefront and sat down, and last behind them entered the Lord Marshal Agamémnon, favoring his wound: he too had taken a slash, from Antênor's son, Koôn.
When everyone had crowded in, Akhilleus,
the great battlefield runner, rose and said:

"Agamémnon, was it better for us in any way, when we were sore at heart, to waste ourselves in strife over a girl?
If only Artemis had shot her down among the ships on the day I made her mine, after I took Lyrnessos!
Fewer Akhaians would have died hard at enemy hands, while I abstained in anger—Hektor's gain, the Trojans' gain. Akhaians years hence will remember our high words, mine and yours. But now we can forget them, and, as we must, forego our passion. Aye,
by heaven, I drop my anger now!

No need to smolder in my heart forever! Come, send your long-haired Akhaians into combat,
and let me see how Trojans will hold out,
if camping near the beachhead's their desire!
I rather thank some will be glad to rest, provided they get home, away from danger,
out of my spear's range!"

These were his words, and all the Akhaians gave a roar of joy to hear the prince abjure his rage.
Lord Marshal Agamémnon then addressed them, standing up, not in the midst of them, but where he had been sitting:

"Friends, fighters,
Danáäns, companions of Arês: it is fair to listen to a man when he has risen and not to interrupt him. That's vexation to any speaker, able though he may be.
In a great hubbub how can any man attend or speak? A fine voice will be muffled.
While I open my mind to the son of Pêleus, Argives, attention! Each man weigh my words!
The Akhaians often brought this up against me, and chided me. But I am not to blame.
Zeus and Fate and a nightmare Fury are,
for putting savage Folly in my mind
in the assembly that day, when I wrested Akhilleus' prize of war from him. In truth, what could I do? Divine will shapes these things.
Ruinous Folly, eldest daughter of Zeus, beguiles us all. Her feet are soft, from walking not on earth but over the heads of men to do them hurt. She traps one man or another.
Once indeed she deluded Zeus, most noble of gods and men, they say. But feminine Hêra with her underhanded ways tricked him, the day Alkmênê, in high Thebes, was to have given birth to Hêraklês.
Then glorying Zeus remarked to all the gods;
'Hear me, all gods and goddesses, I'll tell you of something my heart dwells upon. This day the childbirth goddess, Eileithyía, brings

111. Alkmênê: Mortal woman who, though married to Amphitryon, King of Thebes, was pregnant by Zeus.

into the light a man who will command all those around him, being of the race of men who come of my own blood!' But in her guile the Lady Hêra said: 'You may be wrong, unable to seal your word with truth hereafter.
Come, Olympian, swear me a great oath
he will indeed be lord of all his neighbors, the child of your own stock in the race of men who drops between a woman's legs today!'
Zeus failed to see her crookedness: he swore a mighty oath, and mightily went astray, for flashing downward from Olympos crest Hêra visited Argos of Akhaia, aware that the strong wife of Perseus' son, Sthénelos, was big with child, just entering her seventh month. But Hêra brought this child into the world's daylight beforehand by two months, and checked Alkmênê's labor, to delay the birth of hers.
To Zeus the son of Krónos then she said:
'Zeus of the bright bolt, father, let me add a new event to your deliberations.
Even now a superior man is born to be a lord of Argives: Eurýstheus, a son of Sthénelos, the son of Perseus, of your own stock. And it is not unfitting for him to rule the Argives.' This report sharply wounded the deep heart of Zeus.
He picked up Folly by her shining braids in sudden anger—swearing a great oath that never to starred heaven or Olympos
Folly, who tricks us all, should come again.
With this he whirled her with one hand and flung her out of the sky. So to men's earth she came, but ever thereafter made Zeus groan to see his dear son toil at labors for Eurýstheus.

So, too, with me: when in his shimmering helm great Hektor slaughtered Argives near the ships, could I ignore my folly, my delusion?
Zeus had stolen my wits, my act was blind.
But now I wish to make amends, to give all possible satisfaction. Rouse for war,

130. Perseus: A son of Zeus.
140. Eurýstheus: Became King of Argos and taskmaster of Hêraklês, who had to perform the twelve labors for him.

send in your troops! I here repeat my offer of all that Odysseus promised yesterday!
Stay if you will, though the wargod presses you.
Men in my service will unload the gifts from my own ship, that you may see how richly
I reward you!"

Akhilleus answered:

"Excellency,

Lord Marshal Agamémnon, make the gifts
if you are keen to—gifts are due; or keep them.
It is for you to say. Let us recover joy of battle soon, that's all!
No need to dither here and lose our time, our great work still undone. When each man sees Akhilleus in a charge, crumpling the ranks of Trojans with his bronze-shod spear, let each remember that is the way to fight his man!"

Replied Odysseus, the shrewd field commander:

"Brave as you are, and like a god in looks,
Akhilleus, do not send Akhaian soldiers into the fight unfed! Today's mêlée will not be brief, when rank meets rank, and heaven breathes fighting spirit into both contenders.
No, tell all troops who are near the ships to take roast meat and wine, for heart and staying power.
No soldier can fight hand to hand, in hunger,
all day long until the sun goes down!
Though in his heart he yearns for war, his legs go slack before he knows it: thirst and famine search him out, and his knees fail as he moves.
But that man stayed with victualing and wine can fight his enemies all day: his heart is bold and happy in his chest, his legs hold out until both sides break off the battle!
Come, then, dismiss the ranks to make their breakfast.
Let the Lord Marshal Agamémnon bring his gifts to the assembly ground where all may see them; may your heart be warmed.
Then let him swear to you, before the Argives, never to have made love to her, my lord,

197. her: Brisêis.

as men and women by their nature do.
So may your heart be peaceable toward him!
And let him sate your hunger with rich fare in his own shelter, that you may lack nothing due you in justice. Afterward, Agamémnon, you'll be more just to others, too. There is no fault in a king's wish to conciliate a man with whom he has been quick to anger!"

And the Lord Marshal Agamémnon answered:

"Glad I am to hear you, son of Laërtês, finding the right word at the right time for all these matters. And the oath you speak of I'll take willingly, with all my heart, and will not, before heaven, be forsworn.
Now let Akhilleus wait here, though the wargod tug his arm; and all the rest of you wait here assembled till the gifts have come down from our quarters, and our peace is made.
For you, Odysseus, here is my command:
choose the finest young peers of all Akhaia to fetch out of my ship those gifts we pledged Akhilleus yesterday; and bring the women.
Let Talthýbios prepare for sacrifice,
in the army's name, a boar to Zeus and Hêlios."

Replied Akhilleus:

"Excellency, Lord Marshal, another time were better for these ceremonies, some interval in the war, and when I feel less passion in me. Look, those men lie dead whom Hektor killed when Zeus allowed him glory, and yet you two propose a meal! By god, I'd send our soldiers into action now unfed and hungry. Have a feast, I'd say, at sundown, when our shame has been avenged!
Before that, for my part, I will not swallow food or drink—my dear friend being dead, lying before my eyes, bled white by spear-cuts, feet turned to his hut's door, his friends in mourning around him. Your concerns are none of mine.

211. be forsworn: Swear falsely.
220. Talthýbios: Agamémnon's herald.
221. Hêlios: The sun god.

Slaughter and blood are what I crave, and groans of anguished men!"

But the shrewd field commander
Odysseus answered:

"Akhilleus, flower and pride of the Akhaians, you are more powerful than I am—and a better spearman, too—only in sizing matters up I'd say I'm just as far beyond you, being older, knowing more of the world. So bear with me.
Men quickly reach satiety with battle in which the reaping bronze will bring to earth big harvests, but a scanty yield, when Zeus, war's overseer for mankind, tips the scales.
How can a fasting belly mourn our dead?
So many die, so often, every day,
when would soldiers come to an end of fasting?
No, we must dispose of him who dies and keep hard hearts, and weep that day alone.
And those whom the foul war has left unhurt will do well to remember food and drink, so that we may again close with our enemies,
our dangerous enemies, and be tough soldiers, hardened in mail of bronze. Let no one, now, be held back waiting for another summons:
here is your summons! Woe to the man who lingers beside the Argive ships! No, all together, let us take up the fight against the Trojans!"

He took as escort sons of illustrious Nestor:
Phyleus' son Mégês, Thoas, and Meríonês, and the son of Kreion, Lykomêdês, and Melánippos, to Agamémnon's quarters.
No sooner was the work assigned than done:
they brought the seven tripods Agamémnon promised Akhilleus, and the twenty caldrons shining, and the horses, a full dozen;
then they conducted seven women, skilled in housecraft, with Brisêis in her beauty.
Odysseus weighed ten bars of purest gold and turned back, followed by his young Akhaians, bearing the gifts to place in mid-assembly.
Now Agamémnon rose. Talthýbios
the crier, with his wondrous voice, stood near him, holding the boar. The son of Atreus drew the sheath knife that he carried, hung beside the big sheath of his sword, and cut first bristles from the boar. Arms wide to heaven he prayed to Zeus, as all the troops kept still,

all sitting in due order in their places, hearing their king. In prayer he raised his eyes to the broad sky and said:

"May Zeus, all-highest and first of gods, be witness first, then Earth and Hêlios and the Furies underground who punish men for having broken oaths,
I never laid a hand on your Brisêis, proposing bed or any other pleasure;
in my quarters the girl has been untouched.
If one word that I swear is false,
may the gods plague me for a perjured liar!"

He slit the boar's throat with his blade of bronze.
Then Talthýbios, wheeling, flung the victim into the offshore water, bait for fish.
Akhilleus rose amid the Argive warriors,
saying:

"Father Zeus, you send mankind prodigious follies. Never otherwise had Agamémnon stung me through and through; never would he have been so empty-headed as to defy my will and take the girl!
No, for some reason Zeus had death at heart for the Akhaians, and for many.

Well:
go to your meat, then we'll resume the fighting."

Thus he dismissed the assembly. All the men were quick to scatter, each to his own ship.
As for the gifts, the Myrmidons took over and bore them all to Akhilleus' ship, to stow within his shelter. There they left the women and drove the horses to the herd.

The girl

Brisêis, in her grace like Aphrodítê, on entering saw Patróklos lying dead of spear wounds, and she sank down to embrace him with a sharp sobbing cry, lifting her hands to tear her breast, soft throat, and lovely face, this girl, shaped like the goddesses of heaven.

Weeping, she said:

"Patróklos, very dear,
most dear to me, cursed as I am, you were alive still when I left you, left this place!
Now I come back to find you dead, my captain!
Evil follows evil so, for me.
The husband to whom father and mother gave me
I saw brought down by spears before our town, with my three brothers, whom my mother bore.
Dear brothers, all three met their day of wrath.
But when Akhilleus killed my lord, and sacked
the city of royal Mynês, not a tear would you permit me: no, you undertook to see me married to the Prince Akhilleus, conveyed by ship to Phthía, given a wedding among the Myrmidons. Now must I mourn your death forever, who were ever gentle."

She wailed again, and women sobbed about her,
first for Patróklos, then for each one's grief.
Meanwhile Akhaian counselors were gathered begging Akhilleus to take food. He spurned it, groaning:

"No, I pray you, my dear friends,
if anyone will listen!—do not nag me to glut and dull my heart with food and drink!
A burning pain is in me. I'll hold out till sundown without food. I say I'll bear it."

With this he sent the peers away, except the two Atreidai and the great Odysseus, Nestor, Idómeneus, and old Lord Phoinix.
These would have comforted him, but none could quiet or comfort him until he entered the bloody jaws of war. Now pierced by memory, he sighed and sighed again, and said:

"Ah, once
you, too, poor fated friend, and best of friends, would set a savory meal deftly before us in our field shelter, when the Akhaians wished no time lost between onsets against Trojans.

Now there you lie, broken in battle. Ah, lacking you, my heart will fast this day from meat and drink as well. No greater ill could come to me, not news of Father's death—my father, weeping soft tears now in Phthía for want of that son in a distant land who wars on Troy for Helen's sake—that woman who makes the blood run cold. No greater ill, even should my son die, who is being reared on Skyros, Neoptólemos, if indeed he's living still. My heart's desire has been that I alone should perish far from Argos here at Troy; that you should sail to Phthía, taking my son aboard your swift black ship at Skyros, to introduce him to his heritage, my wide lands, my servants, my great hall.
In this late year Pêleus may well be dead and buried, or have few days yet to live, beset by racking age, always awaiting dire news of me, of my own death."

As he said this he wept. The counselors groaned, remembering each what he had left at home;
and seeing them sorrow, Zeus took pity on them, saying quickly to Athêna:

"Daughter,
you seem to have left your fighting man alone.
Should one suppose you care no more for Akhilleus?
There he sits, before the curving prows, and grieves for his dear friend. The other soldiers flock to meat; he thirsts and hungers. Come, infuse in him sweet nectar and ambrosia, that an empty belly may not weaken him."

He urged Athêna to her own desire, and like a gliding sea hawk, shrilling high,
she soared from heaven through the upper air,
while the Akhaians armed throughout the ranks.
Nectar and ambrosia she instilled within Akhilleus, that his knees be not assailed by hollow famine; then she withdrew to her mighty father's house. Meanwhile the troops were pouring from the shipways to the field.

367. Skyros: An island in the North Aegean.

As when cold snowflakes fly from Zeus in heaven, thick and fast under the blowing north wind,
just so, that multitude of gleaming helms and bossed shields issued from the ships, with plated cuirasses and ashwood spears. Reflected glintings flashed to heaven, as the plain in all directions shone with glare of bronze and shook with trampling feet of men. Among them Prince Akhilleus armed. One heard his teeth grind hard together, and his eyes blazed out like licking fire, for unbearable pain had fixed upon his heart. Raging at Trojans, he buckled on the arms Hêphaistos forged.
The beautiful greaves, fitted with silver anklets, first he put upon his legs, and next the cuirass on his ribs; then over his shoulder he slung the sword of bronze with silver scabbard; finally he took up the massive shield whence came a radiance like the round full moon.
As when at sea to men on shipboard comes the shining of a campfire on a mountain in a lone sheepfold, while the gusts of nightwind take them, loath to go, far from their friends over the teeming sea: just so Akhilleus' finely modeled shield sent light into the heavens. Lifting his great helm he placed it on his brows, and like a star
the helm shone with its horsetail blowing free, all golden, that Hêphaistos had set in upon the crest. Akhilleus tried his armor, shrugging and flexing, making sure it fitted, sure that his gleaming legs had play. Indeed the gear sat on him light as wings: it buoyed him!
Now from a spear-case he withdrew a spear—his father's—weighty, long, and tough. No other Akhaian had the strength to handle it, this great Pêlian shaft of ashwood, given his father by the centaur Kheirôn from the crest of Pêlion to be the death of heroes.

Automédôn

and Álkimos with swift hands yoked his team, making firm the collars on the horses,

431. Kheirôn: A centaur famous as a wise teacher. Pêlion: A heavily wooded mountain in central Greece.

placing the bits between their teeth, and pulling reins to the war-car. Automédôn then took in hand the shining whip and mounted the chariot, and at his back Akhilleus mounted in full armor, shining bright as the blinding Lord of Noon. In a clarion voice he shouted to the horses of his father:

"Xánthos and Balíos! Known to the world as foals of great Podargê! In this charge care for your driver in another way!
Pull him back, I mean, to the Danáäns, back to the main body of the army,
once we are through with battle; this time,
no leaving him there dead, like Lord Patróklos!"

To this, from under the yoke, the nimble Xánthos answered, and hung his head, so that his mane dropped forward from the yokepad to the ground—Hêra whose arms are white as ivory
gave him a voice to say:

"Yes, we shall save you,
this time, too, Akhilleus in your strength!
And yet the day of your destruction comes,
and it is nearer. We are not the cause,
but rather a great god is, and mighty Fate.
Nor was it by our sloth or sluggishness
the Trojans stripped Patróklos of his armor.
No, the magnificent god that Lêto bore killed him in action and gave Hektor glory.
We might run swiftly as the west wind blows, most rapid of all winds, they say; but still it is your destiny to be brought low by force, a god's force and a man's!"

On this,
the Furies put a stop to Xánthos' voice;
In anger and gloom Akhilleus said to him:

"Xánthos, why prophesy my death? No need.
What is in store for me I know, know well:
to die here, far away from my dear father,

465. a god's force and a man's: Akhilleus will eventually fall by the hand of Paris but through the intervention of Apollo.

466. Furies: One of the functions of these goddesses was to ensure that all the creatures of the universe observed their proper limits.

my mother, too. No matter. All that matters is that I shall not call a halt today till I have made the Trojans sick of war!"

And with a shout he drove his team of trim-hooved horses into the front line.

[Akhilleus' return to the fighting brought terror to the Trojans, and turned the battle into a rout in which Akhilleus killed every Trojan that crossed his path. As he pursued Agénor, Apollo tricked him by rescuing his intended victim (he spirited him away in a mist) and assumed Agénor's shape to lead Akhilleus away from the walls of Troy. The Trojans took refuge in the city, all except Hektor.]

Book XXII

[The Death of Hektor]

Once in the town, those who had fled like deer wiped off their sweat and drank their thirst away, leaning against the cool stone of the ramparts.
Meanwhile Akhaians with bright shields aslant came up the plain and nearer. As for Hektor, fatal destiny pinned him where he stood before the Skaian Gates, outside the city.

Now Akhilleus heard Apollo calling back to him:

"Why run so hard, Akhilleus, mortal as you are, after a god?
Can you not comprehend it? I am immortal.
You are so hot to catch me, you no longer think of finishing off the men you routed.
They are all in the town by now, packed in while you were being diverted here. And yet you cannot kill me; I am no man's quarry."

Akhilleus bit his lip and said:

"Archer of heaven, deadliest of immortal gods, you put me off the track, turning me from the wall this way. A hundred might have sunk their teeth into the dust before one man took cover in Ilion!
You saved my enemies with ease and stole my glory, having no punishment to fear.

I'd take it out of you, if I had the power."

Then toward the town with might and main he ran, magnificent, like a racing chariot horse that holds its form at full stretch on the plain.
So light-footed Akhilleus held the pace.
And aging Priam was the first to see him sparkling on the plain, bright as that star in autumn rising, whose unclouded rays shine out amid a throng of stars at dusk—
the one they call Oríôn's dog, most brilliant, yes, but baleful as a sign: it brings great fever to frail men. So pure and bright the bronze gear blazed upon him as he ran.
The old man gave a cry. With both his hands thrown up on high he struck his head, then shouted, groaning, appealing to his dear son. Unmoved, Lord Hektor stood in the gateway, resolute to fight Akhilleus.

Stretching out his hands,
old Priam said, imploring him:

"No, Hektor!

Cut off as you are, alone, dear son,
don't try to hold your ground against this man, or soon you'll meet the shock of doom, borne down by the son of Pêleus. He is more powerful by far than you, and pitiless. Ah, were he but dear to the gods as he is dear to me!
Wild dogs and kites would eat him where he lay within the hour, and ease me of my torment.
Many tall sons he killed, bereaving me, or sold them to far islands. Even now
I cannot see two sons of mine, Lykáôn and Polydôros, among the Trojans massed inside the town. A queen, Laóthoê, conceived and bore them. If they are alive amid the Akhaian host, I'll ransom them with bronze and gold: both I have, piled at home, rich treasures that old Altês, the renowned, gave for his daughter's dowry. If they died,

34. Oríôn's dog: The constellation Canis Major. The star (31) is Sirius, the "dog star."

54. Lykáôn and Polydôros: Both already killed by Akhilleus in the fighting outside the city.

56. Laóthoê: Priam, in oriental style, has more than one wife.

60. Altês: Laóthoê's father.

if they went under to the homes of Death, sorrow has come to me and to their mother.
But to our townsmen all this pain is brief,
unless you too go down before Akhilleus.
Come inside the wall, child; here you may fight on to save our Trojan men and women.
Do not resign the glory to Akhilleus, losing your own dear life! Take pity, too, on me and my hard fate, while I live still.
Upon the threshold of my age, in misery,
the son of Krónos will destroy my life after the evil days I shall have seen—my sons brought down, my daughters dragged away, bedchambers ravaged, and small children hurled to earth in the atrocity of war, as my sons' wives are taken by Akhaians' ruinous hands. And at the end, I too—when someone with a sword-cut or a spear has had my life—I shall be torn apart on my own doorstep by the hounds
I trained as watchdogs, fed from my own table.
These will lap my blood with ravenous hearts and lie in the entranceway.

Everything done
to a young man killed in war becomes his glory, once he is riven by the whetted bronze:
dead though he be, it is all fair, whatever happens then. But when an old man falls, and dogs disfigure his gray head and cheek and genitals, that is most harrowing of all that men in their hard lives endure."

The old man wrenched at his gray hair and pulled out hanks of it in both his hands, but moved Lord Hektor not at all. The young man's mother wailed from the tower across, above the portal, streaming tears, and loosening her robe with one hand, held her breast out in the other,
saying:

"Hektor, my child, be moved by this,
and pity me, if ever I unbound a quieting breast for you. Think of these things, dear child, defend yourself against the killer
this side of the wall, not hand to hand.

He has no pity. If he brings you down,
I shall no longer be allowed to mourn you laid out on your bed, dear branch in flower, born of me! And neither will your lady, so endowed with gifts. Far from us both, dogs will devour you by the Argive ships."

With tears and cries the two implored their son, and made their prayers again, but could not shake him.
Hektor stood firm, as huge Akhilleus neared.
The way a serpent, fed on poisonous herbs, coiled at his lair upon a mountainside, with all his length of hate awaits a man and eyes him evilly: so Hektor, grim and narrow-eyed, refused to yield. He leaned his brilliant shield against a spur of wall and in his brave heart bitterly reflected:
"Here I am badly caught. If I take cover, slipping inside the gate and wall, the first to accuse me for it will be Poulýdamas, he who told me I should lead the Trojans back to the city on the cursed night Akhilleus joined the battle. No, I would not, would not, wiser though it woud have been.
Now troops have perished for my foolish pride,
I am ashamed to face townsmen and women.
Someone inferior to me may say:
'He kept his pride and lost his men, this Hektor!'
So it will go. Better, when that time comes, that I appear as he who killed Akhilleus man to man, or else that I went down before him honorably for the city's sake.
Suppose, though, that I lay my shield and helm aside, and prop my spear against the wall, and go to meet the noble Prince Akhilleus, promising Helen, promising with her all treasures that Aléxandros brought home by ship to Troy—the first cause of our quarrel—that he may give these things to the Atreidai?
Then I might add, apart from these, a portion of all the secret wealth the city owns.
Yes, later I might take our counselors' oath to hide no stores, but share and share alike to halve all wealth our lovely city holds,

all that is here within the walls. Ah, no,
why even put the question to myself?
I must not go before him and receive no quarter, no respect! Aye, then and there he'll kill me, unprotected as I am, my gear laid by, defenseless as a woman.
No chance, now, for charms from oak or stone in parley with him—charms a girl and boy might use when they enchant each other talking!
Better we duel, now at once, and see to whom the Olympian awards the glory."

These were his shifts of mood. Now close at hand Akhilleus like the implacable god of war came on with blowing crest, hefting the dreaded beam of Pêlian ash on his right shoulder.
Bronze light played around him, like the glare of a great fire or the great sun rising, and Hektor, as he watched, began to tremble.
Then he could hold his ground no more. He ran, leaving the gate behind him, with Akhilleus hard on his heels, sure of his own speed.
When that most lightning-like of birds, a hawk bred on a mountain, swoops upon a dove, the quarry dips in terror, but the hunter, screaming, dips behind and gains upon it, passionate for prey. Just so, Akhilleus murderously cleft the air, as Hektor ran with flashing knees along the wall.
They passed the lookout point, the wild figtree with wind in all its leaves, then veered away along the curving wagon road, and came to where the double fountains well, the source of eddying Skamánder. One hot spring flows out, and from the water fumes arise as though from fire burning; but the other even in summer gushes chill as hail or snow or crystal ice frozen on water.
Near these fountains are wide washing pools of smooth-laid stone, where Trojan wives and daughters laundered their smooth linen in the days of peace before the Akhaians came. Past these the two men ran, pursuer and pursued, and he who fled was noble, he behind

152. charms: I.e., charming talk.

a greater man by far. They ran full speed, and not for bull's hide or a ritual beast or any prize that men compete for: no,
but for the life of Hektor, tamer of horses.
Just as when chariot-teams around a course go wheeling swiftly, for the prize is great, a tripod or a woman, in the games held for a dead man, so three times these two at full speed made their course round Priam's town, as all the gods looked on. And now the father of gods and men turned to the rest and said:

"How sad that this beloved man is hunted around the wall before my eyes! My heart is touched for Hecktor; he has burned thigh flesh of oxen for me often, high on Ida,
at other times on the high point of Troy.
Now Prince Akhilleus with devouring stride is pressing him around the town of Priam.
Come, gods, put your minds on it, consider whether we may deliver him from death or see him, noble as he is, brought down by Pêleus' son, Akhilleus."

Gray-eyed Athêna
said to him:

"Father of the blinding bolt, the dark stormcloud, what words are these? The man is mortal, and his doom fixed, long ago.
Would you release him from his painful death?
Then do so, but not all of us will praise you."

Zeus who gathers cloud replied:

"Take heart,
my dear and honored child. I am not bent on my suggestion, and I would indulge you.
Act as your thought inclines, refrain no longer."

So he encouraged her in her desire, and down she swept from ridges of Olympos.
Great Akhilleus, hard on Hektor's heels, kept after him, the way a hound will harry a deer's fawn he has startled from its bed to chase through gorge and open glade, and when

203. Ida: The great mountain range near Troy.

the quarry goes to earth under a bush
he holds the scent and quarters till he finds it;
so with Hektor: he could not shake off the great runner, Akhilleus. Every time he tried to sprint hard for the Dardan gates under the towers, hoping men could help him, sending missiles down, Akhilleus loomed to cut him off and turn him toward the plain,
as he himself ran always near the city.
As in a dream a man chasing another cannot catch him, nor can he in flight escape from his pursuer, so Akhilleus could not by his swiftness overtake him, nor could Hektor pull away. How could he run so long from death, had not Apollo for the last time, the very last, come near to give him stamina and speed?
Akhilleus
shook his head at the rest of the Akhaians, allowing none to shoot or cast at Hektor—none to forestall him, and to win the honor.
But when, for the fourth time, they reached the springs,
the Father poised his golden scales.
He placed
two shapes of death, death prone and cold, upon them, one of Akhilleus, one of the horseman, Hektor, and held the midpoint, pulling upward. Down sank Hektor's fatal day, the pan went down toward undergloom, and Phoibos Apollo left him.
Then came Athêna, gray-eyed, to the son of Pêleus, falling in with him, and near him, saying swiftly:
"Now at last I think the two of us, Akhilleus loved by Zeus, shall bring Akhaians triumph at the ships by killing Hektor—unappeased though he was ever in his thirst for war.
There is no way he may escape us now,
not though Apollo, lord of distances, should suffer all indignity for him before his father Zeus who bears the stormcloud, rolling back and forth and begging for him.
Now you can halt and take your breath, while I persuade him into combat face to face."

227. quarters: Criss-crosses.
261. lord of distances: The literal meaning of this title of Apollo is "who works from far off."

These were Athêna's orders. He complied, relieved. and leaning hard upon the spearshaft armed with its head of bronze. She left him there and overtook Lord Hektor—but she seemed Dêíphobos in form and resonant voice, appearing at his shoulder, saying swiftly:

"Ai! Dear brother, how he runs, Akhilleus, harrying you around the town of Priam!
Come, we'll stand and take him on."

To this,
great Hektor in his shimmering helm replied:

"Dêíphobos, you were the closest to me in the old days, of all my brothers, sons of Hékabê and Priam. Now I can say I honor you still more because you dared this foray for my sake, seeing me run. The rest stay under cover."

Again the gray-eyed goddess Athêna spoke:

"Dear brother, how your father and gentle mother begged and begged me to remain! So did the soldiers round me, all undone by fear.
But in my heart I ached for you.
Now let us fight him, and fight hard.
No holding back. We'll see if this Akhilleus conquers both, to take our armor seaward, or if he can be brought down by your spear."

This way, by guile, Athêna led him on.
And when at last the two men faced each other,
Hektor was the first to speak. He said:

"I will no longer fear you as before,
son of Pêleus, though I ran from you round Priam's town three times and could not face you.
Now my soul would have me stand and fight, whether I kill you or am killed. So come, we'll summon gods here as our witnesses, none higher, arbiters of a pact: I swear that, terrible as you are,
I'll not insult your corpse should Zeus allow me victory in the end, your life as prize.

271. Dêíphobos: A brother of Hektor.

Once I have your gear, I'll give your body back to Akhaians. Grant me. too, this grace."

But swift Akhilleus frowned at him and said:

"Hektor, I'll have no talk of pacts with you, forever unforgiven as you are.
As between men and lions there are none, no concord between wolves and sheep, but all hold one another hateful through and through,
so there can be no courtesy between us, no sworn truce, till one of us is down and glutting with his blood the wargod Arês.
Summon up what skills you have. By god, you'd better be a spearman and a fighter!
Now there is no way out. Pallas Athêna will have the upper hand of you. The weapon belongs to me. You'll pay the reckoning in full for all the pain my men have borne, who met death by your spear."

He twirled and cast his shaft with its long shadow. Splendid Hektor, keeping his eye upon the point, eluded it by ducking at the instant of the cast, so shaft and bronze shank passed him overhead and punched into the earth. But unperceived by Hektor, Pallas Athêna plucked it out and gave it back to Akhilleus. Hektor said:

"A clean miss. Godlike as you are,
you have not yet known doom for me from Zeus.
You thought you had, by heaven. Then you turned into a word-thrower, hoping to make me lose my fighting heart and head in fear of you.
You cannot plant your spear between my shoulders while I am running. If you have the gift, just put it through my chest as I come forward.
Now it's for you to dodge my own. Would god you'd give the whole shaft lodging in your body!
War for the Trojans would be eased
if you were blotted out, bane that you are."

With this he twirled his long spearshaft and cast it, hitting his enemy mid-shield, but off and away the spear rebounded. Furious that he had lost it, made his throw for nothing, Hektor stood bemused. He had no other.

Then he gave a great shout to Dêíphobos to ask for a long spear. But there was no one near him, not a soul. Now in his heart the Trojan realized the truth and said:

"This is the end. The gods are calling deathward.
I had thought
a good soldier, Dêíphobos, was with me.
He is inside the walls. Athêna tricked me.
Death is near, and black, not at a distance, not to be evaded. Long ago this hour must have been to Zeus's liking and to the liking of his archer son.
They have been well disposed before, but now the apppointed time's upon me. Still, I would not die without delivering a stroke, or die ingloriously, but in some action memorable to men in days to come."

With this he drew the whetted blade that hung upon his left flank, ponderous and long, collecting all his might the way an eagle narrows himself to dive through shady cloud and strike a lamb or cowering hare: so Hektor lanced ahead and swung his whetted blade.
Akhilleus with wild fury in his heart pulled in upon his chest his beautiful shield—his helmet with four burnished metal ridges nodding above it, and the golden crest
Hêphaistos locked there tossing in the wind.
Conspicuous as the evening star that comes,
amid the first in heaven, at fall of night,
and stands most lovely in the west, so shone in sunlight the fine-pointed spear Akhilleus poised in his right hand, with deadly aim at Hektor, at the skin where most it lay exposed. But nearly all was covered by the bronze gear he took from slain Patróklos.
showing only, where his collarbones divided neck and shoulders, the bare throat where the destruction of a life is quickest.
Here, then, as the Trojan charged, Akhilleus drove his point straight through the tender neck, but did not cut the windpipe, leaving Hektor able to speak and to respond. He fell aside into the dust. And Prince Akhilleus now exulted:

"Hektor, had you thought that you could kill Patróklos and be safe?
Nothing to dread from me; I was not there.
All childishness. Though distant then, Patróklos' comrade in arms was greater far than he—and it is I who had been left behind that day beside the deepsea ships who now have made your knees give way. The dogs and kites will rip your body. His will lie in honor when the Akhaians give him funeral."

Hektor, barely whispering, replied:

"I beg you by your soul and by your parents, do not let the dogs feed on me in your encampment by the ships. Accept the bronze and gold my father will provide as gifts, my father and her ladyship my mother. Let them have my body back, so that our men and women may accord me decency of fire when I am dead."

Akhilleus the great runner scowled and said:

"Beg me no beggary by soul or parents, whining dog! Would god my passion drove me to slaughter you and eat you raw, you've caused such agony to me! No man exists who could defend you from the carrion pack—not if they spread for me ten times your ransom, twenty times, and promise more as well;
aye, not if Priam, son of Dárdanos, tells them to buy you for your weight in gold!
You'll have no bed of death, nor will you be laid out and mourned by her who gave you birth.
Dogs and birds will have you, every scrap."

Then at the point of death Lord Hektor said:

"I see you now for what you are. No chance to win you over. Iron in your breast your heart is. Think a bit, though: this may be a thing the gods in anger hold against you on that day when Paris and Apollo destroy you at the Gates, great as you are."

Even as he spoke, the end came, and death hid him;
spirit from body fluttered to undergloom, bewailing fate that made him leave his youth and manhood in the world. And as he died Akhilleus spoke again. He said:

"Die, make an end. I shall accept my own whenever Zeus and the other gods desire."

At this he pulled his spearhead from the body, laying it aside, and stripped the bloodstained shield and cuirass from his shoulders.
Other Akhaians hastened round to see Hektor's fine body and his comely face, and no one came who did not stab the body.
Glancing at one another they would say:

"Now Hektor has turned vulnerable, softer than when he put the torches to the ships!"

And he who said this would inflict a wound.
When the great master of pursuit, Akhilleus, had the body stripped, he stood among them,
saying swiftly:

"Friends, my lords and captains of Argives, now that the gods at last have let me bring to earth this man who wrought havoc among us—more than all the rest—come, we'll offer battle around the city, to learn the intentions of the Trojans now.
Will they give up their strongpoint at this loss?
Can they fight on, though Hektor's dead?
But wait:
why do I ponder, why take up these questions?
Down by the ships Patróklos' body lies unwept, unburied. I shall not forget him while I can keep my feet among the living.
If in the dead world they forget the dead,
I say there, too, I shall remember him,
my friend. Men of Akhaia, lift a song!
Down to the ships we go, and take this body,

429. the Gates: The Skaian Gates of Troy.

our glory. We have beaten Hektor down, to whom as to a god the Trojans prayed."

Indeed, he had in mind for Hektor's body outrage and shame. Behind both feet he pierced the tendons, heel to ankle. Rawhide cords he drew through both and lashed them to his chariot, letting the man's head trail. Stepping aboard, bearing the great trophy of the arms,
he shook the reins, and whipped the team ahead into a willing run. A dustcloud rose above the furrowing body; the dark tresses flowed behind, and the head so princely once lay back in dust. Zeus gave him to his enemies to be defiled in his own fatherland.
So his whole head was blackened. Looking down, his mother tore her braids, threw off her veil,
and wailed, heartbroken to behold her son.
Piteously his father groaned, and round him lamentation spread throughout the town, most like the clamor to be heard if Ilion's towers, top to bottom, seethed in flames.
They barely stayed the old man, mad with grief, from passing through the gates. Then in the mire he rolled, and begged them all, each man by name:

"Relent, friends. It is hard; but let me go out of the city to the Akhaian ships.
I'll make my plea to that demonic heart.
He may feel shame before his peers, or pity my old age. His father, too, is old, Pêleus, who brought him up to be a scourge to Trojans, cruel to all, but most to me, so many of my sons in flower of youth he cut away. And, though I grieve, I cannot mourn them all as much as I do one, for whom my grief will take me to the grave—and that is Hektor. Why could he not have died where I might hold him? In our weeping, then, his mother, now so destitute, and I might have had surfeit and relief of tears."

These were the words of Priam as he wept, and all his people groaned. Then in her turn.
Hékabê led the women in lamentation:

"Child, I am lost now. Can I bear my life after the death of suffering your death?
You were my pride in all my nights and days, pride of the city, pillar to the Trojans and Trojan women. Everyone looked to you as though you were a god, and rightly so.
You were their greatest glory while you lived.
Now your doom and death have come upon you."

These were her mournful words. But Hektor's lady still knew nothing; no one came to tell her of Hektor's stand outside the gates. She wove upon her loom, deep in the lofty house, a double purple web with rose design.
Calling her maids in waiting,
she ordered a big caldron on a tripod set on the hearthfire. to provide a bath for Hektor when he came home from the fight.
Poor wife, how far removed from baths he was she could not know, as at Akhilleus' hands Athêna brought him down.

Then from the tower
she heard a wailing and a distant moan.
Her knees shook, and she let her shuttle fall,
and called out to her maids again:

"Come here.
Two must follow me, to see this action.
I heard my husband's queenly mother cry.
I feel my heart rise, throbbing in my throat.
My knees are like stone under me. Some blow is coming home to Priam's sons and daughters.
Ah, could it never reach my ears! I die of dread that Akhilleus may have cut off Hektor, blocked my bold husband from the city wall, to drive him down the plain alone! By now he may have ended Hektor's deathly pride.
He never kept his place amid the chariots but drove ahead. He would not be doutdone by anyone in courage."

Saying this, she ran like a madwoman through the mégaron, her heart convulsed. Her maids kept at her side.
On reaching the great tower and the soldiers,

Andrómakhê stood gazing from the wall and saw him being dragged before the city.
Chariot horses at a brutal gallop pulled the torn body toward the decked ships.
Blackness of night covered her eyes; she fell backward swooning, sighing out her life, and let her shining headdress fall, her hood and diadem. her plaited band and veil that Aphrodítê once had given her, on that day when, from Eëtíôn's house,
for a thousand bridal gifts, Lord Hektor led her.
Now, at her side, kinswomen of her lord supported her among them, dazed and faint to the point of death. But when she breathed again and her stunned heart recovered, in a burst of sobbing she called out among the women:

"Hektor! Here is my desolation. Both had this in store from birth—from yours in Troy in Priam's palace, mine by wooded Plakos at Thêbê in the home of Eëtíôn, my father, who took care of me in childhood, a man cursed by fate, a fated daughter.
How I could wish I never had been born!
Now under earth's roof to the house of Death
you go your way and leave me here, bereft, lonely, in anguish without end. The child we wretches had is still in infancy;
you cannot be a pillar to him, Hektor, now you are dead, nor he to you. And should this boy escape the misery of the war, there will be toil and sorrow for him later,
as when strangers move his boundary stones.
The day that orphans him will leave him lonely, downcast in everything, cheeks wet with tears, in hunger going to his father's friends to tug at one man's cloak, another's khiton.
Some will be kindly: one may lift a cup to wet his lips at least, though not his throat;
but from the board some child with living parents gives him a push, a slap, with biting words:
'Outside, you there! Your father is not with us here at our feast!' And the boy Astýanax will run to his forlorn mother. Once he fed

577. move his boundary stones: I.e., confiscate his land.

on marrow only and the fat of lamb, high on his father's knees. And when sleep came to end his play, he slept in a nurse's arms, brimful of happiness, in a soft bed.
But now he'll know sad days and many of them,
missing his father. 'Lord of the lower town'
the Trojans call him. They know, you alone, Lord Hektor, kept their gates and their long walls.
Beside the beaked ships now, far from your kin,
the blowflies' maggots in a swarm will eat you naked, after the dogs have had their fill.
Ah, there are folded garments in your chambers, delicate and fine, of women's weaving.
These, by heaven, I'll burn to the last thread in blazing fire! They are no good to you, they cannot cover you in death. So let them go, let them be burnt as an offering from Trojans and their women in your honor."

Thus she mourned. and the women wailed in answer.

[Akhilleus buried Patróklos, and the Greeks celebrated the dead hero's fame with athletic games, for which Akhilleus gave the prizes.]

Book XXIV

[Akhilleus and Priam]

The funeral games were over. Men dispersed and turned their thoughts to supper in their quarters, then to the boon of slumber. But Akhilleus thought of his friend, and sleep that quiets all things would not take hold of him. He tossed and turned remembering with pain Patróklos' courage, his buoyant heart; how in his company
he fought out many a rough day full of danger, cutting through ranks in war and the bitter sea.
With memory his eyes grew wet. He lay on his right side, then on his back. and then face downward—but at last he rose, to wander distractedly along the line of surf.
This for eleven nights. The first dawn, brightening sea and shore, became familiar to him, as at that hour he yoked his team, with Hektor tied behind, to drag him out, three times around Patróklos' tomb. By day he rested in his own hut, abandoning Hektor's body to lie full-length in dust—though Lord Apollo, pitying the man, even in death,

kept his flesh free of disfigurement.
He wrapped him in his great shield's flap of gold to save him from laceration. But Akhilleus in rage visited indignity on Hektor day after day, and, looking on, the blessed gods were moved. Day after day they urged the Wayfinder to steal the body—
a thought agreeable to all but Hêra, Poseidon, and the gray-eyed one, Athêna.
These opposed it, and held out, since Ilion and Priam and his people had incurred their hatred first, the day Aléxandros made his mad choice and piqued two goddesses, visitors in his sheepfold: he praised a third, who offered ruinous lust.
Now when Dawn grew bright for the twelfth day,
Phoibos Apollo spoke among the gods:

"How heartless and how malevolent you are!
Did Hektor never make burnt offering of bulls' thighbones to you, and unflawed goats?
Even in death you would not stir to save him for his dear wife to see, and for his mother, his child, his father, Priam, and his men:
they'd burn the corpse at once and give him burial.
Murderous Akhilleus has your willing help—
a man who shows no decency, implacable.
barbarous in his ways as a wild lion whose power and intrepid heart sway him to raid the flocks of men for meat.
The man has lost all mercy;
he has no shame—that gift that hinders mortals but helps them, too. A sane one may endure an even dearer loss: a blood brother, a son; and yet, by heaven, having grieved and passed through mourning, he will let it go.
The fates have given patient hearts to men.
Not this one: first he took Prince Hektor's life and now he drags the body, lashed to his car,

28. the Wayfinder: Hermês, messenger of the gods.

34. his mad choice: The judgment of Paris. He was asked to judge which goddess was most beautiful: Hêra, Athêna and Aphroditê all offered him bribes, but Aphroditê offered him the love of Helen, and he therefore chose her.

around the barrow of his friend, performing something neither nobler in report nor better in itself. Let him take care, or, brave as he is, we gods will turn against him,
seeing him outrage the insensate earth!"

Hêra whose arms are white as ivory grew angry at Apollo. She retorted:

"Lord of the silver bow, your words would be acceptable if one had a mind to honor Hektor and Akhilleus equally.
But Hektor suckled at a woman's breast, Akhilleus is the first-born of a goddess—one I nursed myself. I reared her, gave her to Pêleus, a strong man whom the gods loved.
All of you were present at their wedding—you too—friend of the base, forever slippery!— came with your harp and dined there!"

Zeus the stormking answered her:

"Hêra, don't lose your temper altogether. Clearly the same high honor cannot be due both men. And yet Lord Hektor, of all the mortal men in Ilion,
was dearest to the gods, or was to me.
He never failed in the right gift; my altar never lacked a feast of wine poured out and smoke of sacrifice—the share assigned as ours. We shall renounce the theft of Hektor's body; there is no way;
there would be no eluding Akhilleus' eye,
as night and day his mother comes to him.
Will one of you now call her to my presence?
I have a solemn message to impart:
Akhilleus is to take fine gifts from Priam, and in return give back Prince Hektor's body."

At this, Iris who runs on the rainy wind with word from Zeus departed. Midway between Samos and rocky Imbros, down she plunged into the dark gray sea, and the brimming tide

60. barrow: Grave-mound.
95. Samos . . . Imbros: Two islands in the Aegean, off the coast of Asia Minor.

roared over her as she sank into the depth—as rapidly as a leaden sinker, fixed on a lure of wild bull's horn, that glimmers down with a fatal hook among the ravening fish.
Soon Iris came on Thetis in a cave, surrounded by a company of Nereids lolling there, while she bewailed the fate of her magnificent son, now soon to perish on Troy's rich earth, far from his fatherland.
Hating before her, Iris said:

"Come, Thetis,
Zeus of eternal forethought summons you."

Silvery-footed Thetis answered:

"Why?
Why does the great one call me to him now,
when I am shy of mingling with immortals, being so heavyhearted? But I'll go.
Whatever he may say will have its weight."

That loveliest of goddesses now put on a veil so black no garment could be blacker, and swam where windswift Iris led. Before them on either hand the ground swell fell away.
They rose to a beach, then soared into the sky and found the viewer of the wide world, Zeus, with all the blissful gods who live forever around him seated. Athêna yielded place, and Thetis sat down by her father, Zeus, while Hêra handed her a cup of gold and spoke a comforting word. When she had drunk, Thetis held out the cup again to Hêra.
The father of gods and men began:

"You've come to Olympos, Thetis, though your mind is troubled and insatiable pain preys on your heart.
I know, I too. But let me, even so, explain why I have called you here. Nine days of quarreling we've had among the gods concerning Hektor's body and Akhilleus.
They wish the Wayfinder to make off with it.
I, however, accord Akhilleus honor as I now tell you—in respect for you whose love I hope to keep hereafter. Go, now, down to the army, tell this to your son:

the gods are sullen toward him, and I, too,
more than the rest, am angered at his madness,
holding the body by the beaked ships and not releasing it. In fear of me let him relent and give back Hektor's body!
At the same time I'll send Iris to Priam, directing him to go down to the beachhead and ransom his dear son. He must bring gifts to melt Akhilleus' rage."

Thetis obeyed,

leaving Olympos' ridge and flashing down to her son's hut. She found him groaning there, inconsolable, while men-at-arms went to and fro, making their breakfast ready—having just put to the knife a fleecy sheep.
His gentle mother sat down at his side, caressed him, and said tenderly:

"My child,

will you forever feed on your own heart in grief and pain, and take no thought of sleep or sustenance? It would be comforting to make love with a woman. No long time will you live on for me: Death even now stands near you, appointed and all-powerful.
But be alert and listen: I am a messenger from Zeus, who tells me the gods are sullen toward you and he himself most angered at your madness,
holding the body by the beaked ships and not releasing it. Give Hektor back.
Take ransom for the body."

Said Akhilleus:

"Let it be so. Let someone bring the ransom and take the dead away, if the Olympian commands this in his wisdom."

So, that morning,

in camp, amid the ships, mother and son conversed together, and their talk was long.
Lord Zeus meanwhile sent Iris to Ilion.

"Off with you, lightfoot, leave Olympos, take my message to the majesty of Priam at Ilion. He is to journey down and ransom his dear son upon the beachhead.
He shall take gifts to melt Akhilleus' rage,
and let him go alone, no soldier with him,
only some crier, some old man, to drive
his wagon team and guide the nimble wagon, and afterward to carry home the body
of him that Prince Akhilleus overcame.
Let him not think of death, or suffer dread,
as I'll provide him with a wondrous guide,
the Wayfinder, to bring him across the lines
into the very presence of Akhilleus.
And he, when he sees Priam within his hut, will neither take his life nor let another enemy come near. He is no madman,
no blind brute, nor one to flout the gods,
but dutiful toward men who beg his mercy."

Then Iris at his bidding ran on the rainy winds to bear the word of Zeus, until she came to Priam's house and heard voices in lamentation. In the court she found the princes huddled around their father, faces and clothing wet with tears. The old man, fiercely wrapped and hooded in his mantle, sat like a figure graven—caked in filth his own hands had swept over head and neck when he lay rolling on the ground. Indoors his daughters and his sons' wives were weeping, remembering how many and how brave the young men were who had gone down to death before the Argive spearmen.

Zeus's courier,

appearing now to Priam's eyes alone,
alighted whispering, so the old man trembled:

"Priam, heir of Dárdanos, take heart,
and have no fear of me; I bode no evil,
but bring you friendly word from Zeus, who is distressed for you and pities you though distant far upon Olympos. He commands that you shall ransom the Prince Hektor, taking fine gifts to melt Akhilleus' rage.

And go alone; no soldier may go with you,
only some crier, some old man, to drive
your wagon team and guide the nimble wagon,
and afterward to carry home the body
of him that Prince Akhilleus overcame.
Put away thoughts of death, shake off your dread,
for you shall have a wondrous guide,
the Wayfinder, to bring you across the lines
into the very presence of Akhilleus.
He, for his part, seeing you in his quarters, will neither take your life nor let another enemy come near. He is no madman,
no blind brute, nor one to flout the gods,
but dutiful toward men who beg his mercy."

Iris left him, swift as a veering wind.
Then Priam spoke, telling the men to rig
a four-wheeled wagon with a wicker box, while he withdrew to his chamber roofed in cedar,
high and fragrant, rich in precious things.
He called to Hékabê, his lady:

"Princess,

word from Olympian Zeus has come to me to go down to the ships of the Akhaians and ransom our dead son. I am to take gifts that will melt Akhilleus' anger. Tell me how this appears to you, tell me your mind, for I am torn with longing, now, to pass inside the great encampment by the ships."

The woman's voice broke as she answered:

"Sorrow,

sorrow. Where is the wisdom now that made you famous in the old days, near and far?
How can you ever face the Akhaian ships or wish to go alone before those eyes,
the eyes of one who stripped your sons in battle, how many, and how brave? Iron must be the heart within you. If he sees you, takes you, savage and wayward as the man is, he'll have no mercy and no shame. Better that we should mourn together in our hall.
Almighty fate spun this thing for our son

the day I bore him: destined him to feed the wild dogs after death, being far from us when he went down before the stronger man.
I could devour the vitals of that man, leeching into his living flesh! He'd know pain then—pain like mine for my dead son.
It was no coward the Akhaian killed;
he stood and fought for the sweet wives of Troy,
with no more thought of flight or taking cover."

In majesty old Priam said:

"My heart is fixed on going. Do not hold me back, and do not make yourself a raven crying calamity at home. You will not move me.

If any man on earth had urged this on me—reader of altar smoke, prophet or priest—we'd say it was a lie, and hold aloof.
But no: with my own ears I heard the voice,
I saw the god before me. Go I shall,
and no more words. If I must die alongside the ships of the Akhaians in their bronze,
I die gladly. May I but hold my son and spend my grief; then let Akhilleus kill me."

Throwing open the lids of treasure boxes he picked out twelve great robes of state, and twelve light cloaks for men, and rugs, an equal number,
and just as many capes of snowy linen,
adding a dozen khitons to the lot;
then set in order ten pure bars of gold,
a pair of shining tripods, four great caldrons,
and finally one splendid cup, a gift
Thracians had made him on an embassy.
He would not keep this, either—as he cared for nothing now but ransoming his son.

And now, from the colonnade,
he made his Trojan people keep their distance,
berating and abusing them:

"Away,

you craven fools and rubbish! In your own homes have you no one to mourn, that you crowd here, to make more trouble for me? Is this a show, that Zeus has crushed me, that he took the life of my most noble son? You'll soon know what it means, as you become child's play for the Akhaians to kill in battle, now that Hektor's gone.

As for myself, before I see my city taken and ravaged, let me go down blind to Death's cold kingdom!"

Staff in hand,
he herded them, until they turned away and left the furious old man. He lashed out now at his sons, at Hélenos and Paris, Agathôn, Pammôn, Antíphonos, Polítês, Dêíphobos, Hippóthoös, and Dios—to these nine the old man cried:

"Bestir yourselves, you misbegotten whelps, shame of my house! Would god you had been killed instead of Hektor at the line of ships.
How curst I am in everything! I fathered first-rate men, in our great Troy; but now I swear not one is left: Mêstôr, Trôïlos, laughing amid the war-cars; and then Hektor—
a god to soldiers, and a god among them, seeming not a man's child, but a god's.
Arês killed them. These poltroons are left, hollow men, dancers, heroes of the dance, light-fingered pillagers of lambs and kids from the town pens!
Now will you get a wagon ready for me, and quickly? Load these gifts aboard it, so that we can take the road."

Dreading the rough edge of their father's tongue, they lifted out a cart, a cargo wagon, neat and maneuverable, and newly made, and fixed upon it a wicker box; then took a mule yoke from a peg, a yoke of boxwood knobbed in front, with rings to hold the reins.
They brought out, too, the band nine forearms long called the yoke-fastener, and placed the yoke forward at the shank of the polished pole, shoving the yoke-pin firmly in. They looped three turns of the yoke-fastener round the knob and wound it over and over down the pole, tucking the tab end under. Next, the ransom:

bearing the weight of gifts for Hektor's person out of the inner room, they piled them up on the polished wagon. It was time to yoke the mule-team, strong in harness, with hard hooves, a team the Mysians had given Priam.
Then for the king's own chariot they harnessed
a team of horses of the line of Trôs, reared by the old king in his royal stable.
So the impatient king and his sage crier had their animals yoked in the palace yard when Hékabê in her agitation joined them, carrying in her right hand a golden cup of honeyed wine, with which, before they left, they might make offering. At the horses' heads
she stood to tell them:

"Here, tip wine to Zeus,
the father of gods. Pray for a safe return from the enemy army, seeing your heart is set on venturing to the camp against my will.
Pray in the second place to Zeus the stormking, gloomy over Ida, who looks down on all Troy country. Beg for an omen-bird, the courier dearest of all birds to Zeus and sovereign in power of flight, that he appear upon our right in heaven.
When you have seen him with your own eyes, then,
under that sign, you may approach the ships.
If Zeus who views the wide world will not give you vision of his bird, then I at least cannot bid godspeed to your journey, bent on it though you are."

In majesty
Priam replied:

"My lady, in this matter
I am disposed to trust you and agree.
It is an excellent thing and salutary to lift our hands to Zeus, invoking mercy."

The old king motioned to his housekeeper, who stood nearby with a basin and a jug,

336. Mysians: A people of central Asia Minor.
338. Trôs: Ancestor of the Trojan Kings.
353. dearest of all birds to Zeus: The eagle.

to pour clear water on his hands. He washed them, took the cup his lady held, and prayed while standing there, midway in the walled court.
Then he tipped out the wine, looking toward heaven,
saying:

"Zeus, our Father, reigning from Ida, god of glory and power, grant I come to Akhilleus' door as one to be received with kindliness and mercy. And dispatch your courier bird, the nearest to your heart of all birds, and the first in power of flight.
Let him appear upon our right in heaven that I may see him with my own eyes and under that sign journey to the ships."

Zeus all-foreseeing listened to this prayer and put an eagle, king of winged creatures, instantly in flight:
a swamp eagle, a hunter, one they call the duskwing. Wide as a doorway in a chamber spacious and high, built for a man of wealth, a door with long bars fitted well, so wide spread out each pinion. The great bird appeared winging through the town on their right hand, and all their hearts lifted with joy to see him.
In haste the old king boarded his bright car and clattered out of the echoing colonnade.
Ahead, the mule-team drew the four-wheeled wagon, driven by Idaíos, and behind the chariot rolled, with horses that the old man whipped into a fast trot through the town.
Family and friends all followed weeping
as though for Priam's last and deathward ride.
Into the lower town they passed, and reached the plain of Troy. Here those who followed after turned back, sons and sons-in-law. And Zeus who views the wide world saw the car and wagon brave the plain. He felt a pang for Priam and quickly said to Hermês, his own son:

"Hermês, as you go most happily of all the gods with mortals, and give heed to whom you will, be on your way this time as guide for Priam to the deepsea ships.
Guide him so that not one of the Danáäns may know or see him till he reach Akhilleus."

Argeiphontês the Wayfinder obeyed.
He bent to tie his beautiful sandals on, ambrosial, golden, that carry him over water and over endless land on a puff of wind, and took the wand with which he charms asleep—
or, when he wills, awake—the eyes of men.
So, wand in hand, the strong god glittering paced into the air. Quick as a thought he came to Hellê's waters and to Troy, appearing as a boy whose lip was downy in the first bloom of manhood, a young prince, all graciousness.

After the travelers

drove past the mound of Ilos, at the ford they let the mules and horses pause to drink the running stream. Now darkness had come on when, looking round, the crier saw Hermês near at hand. He said to Priam:

"You must think hard and fast, your grace;
there is new danger; we need care and prudence.
I see a man-at-arms there—ready, I think, to prey on us. Come, shall we whip the team and make a run for it? Or take his knees and beg for mercy?"

Now the old man's mind

gave way to confusion and to terror.
On his gnarled arms and legs the hair stood up, and he stared, breathless. But the affable god came over and took his hand and asked:

"Old father,

where do you journey, with your cart and car,
while others rest, below the evening star?
Do you not fear the Akhaians where they lie encamped, hard, hostile outlanders, nearby?
Should someone see you, bearing stores like these by night, how would you deal with enemies?
You are not young, your escort's ancient, too.
Could you beat off an attacker, either of you?

411. Argeiphontês: A title of Hermês, of unknown meaning.

423. mound of Ilos: The tomb of Priam's grandfather, a landmark on the Trojan plain.

426. the crier: Idaios, Priam's herald.

438–559. The translator has used rhymed couplets for Hermês' speeches; in the original Greek Hermês speaks just like everyone else, in unrhymed lines.

I'll do no hurt to you but defend you here.
You remind me of my father, whom I hold dear."

Old Priam answered him:

"Indeed, dear boy,

the case is as you say. And yet some god stretched out his hand above me, he who sent before me here—and just at the right time—
a traveler like yourself, well-made, well-spoken, clearheaded, too. You come of some good family."

The Wayfinder rejoined:

"You speak with courtesy,

dear sir. But on this point enlighten me:
are you removing treasure here amassed for safety abroad, until the war is past?
Or can you be abandoning Ilion in fear, after he perished, that great one who never shirked a battle, your own princely son?"

Old Priam replied:

"My brave young friend, who are you?
Born of whom? How nobly you acknowledge the dreadful end of my unfortunate son."

To this the Wayfinder replied:

"Dear sir,

you question me about him? Never surmise
I have not seen him with my very eyes, and often, on the field. I saw him chase Argives with carnage to their own shipways, while we stood wondering, forbidden war
by the great anger that Akhilleus bore Lord Agamémnon. I am of that company Akhilleus led. His own ship carried me as one of the Myrmidons. My father is old, as you are, and his name's Polyktôr; gold and other wealth he owns;
and I am seventh and last of all his sons.
When I cast lots among them, my lot fell to join the siege against Troy citadel.
Tonight I've left the camp to scout this way

where, circling Troy, we'll fight at break of day;
our men are tired of waiting and will not stand for any postponement by the high command."

Responded royal Priam:

"If you belong to the company of Akhilleus, son of Pêleus, tell me this, and tell me the whole truth:

is my son even now beside the ships?
Or has Akhilleus by this time dismembered him and thrown him to the wild dogs?"

The Wayfinder

made reply again:

"Dear sir,

no dogs or birds have yet devoured your son.
Beside Akhilleus' ship, out of the sun,
he lies in a place of shelter. Now twelve days the man has lain there, yet no part decays, nor have the blowfly's maggots, that devour dead men in war, fed on him to this hour.
True that around his dear friend's barrow tomb Akhilleus drags him when dawn-shadows come, driving pitilessly; but he mars him not.
You might yourself be witness, on the spot,
how fresh with dew he lies, washed of his gore, unstained, for the deep gashes that he bore have all closed up—and many thrust their bronze into his body. The blest immortal ones favor your prince, and care for every limb even in death, as they so cherished him."

The old king's heart exulted, and he said:

"Child, it was well to honor the immortals.
He never forgot, at home in Ilion—ah, did my son exist? was he a dream?— the gods who own Olympos. They in turn were mindful of him when he met his end.
Here is a goblet as a gift from me.
Protect me, give me escort, if the gods attend us, till I reach Akhilleus' hut."

And in response Hermês the Wayfinder said:

"You are putting a young man to the test,
dear sir, but I may not, as you request, accept a gift behind Akhilleus' back.
Fearing, honoring him, I could not lack discretion to that point. The consequence, too, could be unwelcome. As for escorting you, even to Argos' famous land I'd ride
a deck with you, or journey at your side.
No cutthroat ever will disdain your guide."

With this, Hermês who lights the way for mortals leapt into the driver's place. He caught up reins and whip, and breathed a second wind into the mule-team and the team of horses.
Onward they ran toward parapet and ships, and pulled up to the moat.

Now night had fallen,
bringing the sentries to their supper fire,
but the glimmering god Hermês, the Wayfinder, showered a mist of slumber on them all.
As quick as thought, he had the gates unbarred and open to let the wagon enter, bearing the old king and the ransom.

Going seaward
they came to the lofty quarters of Akhilleus, a lodge the Myrmidons built for their lord of pine trees cut and trimmed, and shaggy thatch from mowings in deep meadows. Posts were driven round the wide courtyard in a palisade, whose gate one crossbar held, one beam of pine.
It took three men to slam this home, and three to draw the bolt again—but great Akhilleus worked his entryway alone with ease.
And now Hermês, who lights the way for mortals, opened for Priam, took him safely in with all his rich gifts for the son of Pêleus.
Then the god dropped the reins, and stepping down
he said:

"I am no mortal wagoner, but Hermês, sir. My father sent me here to be your guide amid the Akhaian men.
Now that is done, I'm off to heaven again and will not visit Akhilleus. That would be to compromise an immortal's dignity—to be received with guests of mortal station.

Go take his knees, and make your supplication:
invoke his father, his mother, and his child;
pray that his heart be touched, that he be reconciled."

Now Hermês turned, departing for Olympos, and Priam vaulted down. He left Idaíos to hold the teams in check, while he went forward into the lodge. He found Akhilleus, dear to Zeus, there in his chair, with officers at ease across the room. Only Automédôn and Álkimos were busy near Akhilleus, for he had just now made an end of dinner, eating and drinking, and the laden boards lay near him still upon the trestles.

Priam,

the great king of Troy, passed by the others,
knelt down, took in his arms Akhilleus' knees,
and kissed the hands of wrath that killed his sons.

When, taken with mad Folly in his own land, a man does murder and in exile finds refuge in some rich house, then all who see him stand in awe.
So these men stood.

Akhilleus

gazed in wonder at the splendid king, and his companions marveled too, all silent, with glances to and fro. Now Priam prayed to the man before him:

"Remember your own father,

Akhilleus, in your godlike youth: his years like mine are many, and he stands upon the fearful doorstep of old age. He, too, is hard pressed, it may be, by those around him,
there being no one able to defend him from bane of war and ruin. Ah, but he may nonetheless hear news of you alive, and so with glad heart hope through all his days for sight of his dear son, come back from Troy, while I have deathly fortune.

Noble sons

I fathered here, but scarce one man is left me.
Fifty I had when the Akhaians came, nineteen out of a single belly, others

born of attendant women. Most are gone.
Raging Arês cut their knees from under them.
And he who stood alone among them all,
their champion, and Troy's, ten days ago
you killed him, fighting for his land, my prince, Hektor.

It is for him that I have come among these ships, to beg him back from you, and I bring ransom without stint.

Akhilleus,

be reverent toward the great gods! And take pity on me, remember your own father.
Think me more pitiful by far, since I have brought myself to do what no man else has done before—to lift to my lips the hand of one who killed my son."

Now in Akhilleus

the evocation of his father stirred new longing, and an ache of grief. He lifted the old man's hand and gently put him by.
Then both were overborne as they remembered:
the old king huddled at Akhilleus' feet
wept, and wept for Hektor, killer of men,
while great Akhilleus wept for his own father as for Patróklos once again; and sobbing filled the room.

But when Akhilleus' heart had known the luxury of tears, and pain within his breast and bones had passed away, he stood then, raised the old king up, in pity for his gray head and graybeard cheek, and spoke in a warm rush of words:

"Ah, sad and old!

Trouble and pain you've borne, and bear, aplenty.
Only a great will could have brought you here among the Akhaian ships, and here alone before the eyes of one who stripped your sons, your many sons, in battle. Iron must be the heart within you. Come, then, and sit down.
We'll probe our wounds no more but let them rest, though grief lies heavy on us. Tears heal nothing,

611. put him by: Moved him away.

drying so stiff and cold. This is the way the gods ordained the destiny of men, to bear such burdens in our lives, while they feel no affliction. At the door of Zeus are those two urns of good and evil gifts that he may choose for us; and one for whom the lightning's joyous king dips in both urns will have by turns bad luck and good. But one to whom he sends all evil—that man goes contemptible by the will of Zeus; ravenous hunger drives him over the wondrous earth, unresting, without honor from gods or men.
Mixed fortune came to Pêleus. Shining gifts at the gods' hands he had from birth: felicity, wealth overflowing, rule of the Myrmidons,
a bride immortal at his mortal side.
But then Zeus gave afflictions too—no family of powerful sons grew up for him at home, but one child, of all seasons and of none.
Can I stand by him in his age? Far from my country
I sit at Troy to grieve you and your children.
You, too, sir, in time past were fortunate,
we hear men say. From Makar's isle of Lesbos northward, and south of Phrygia and the Straits, no one had wealth like yours, or sons like yours.
Then gods out of the sky sent you this bitterness:
the years of siege, the battles and the losses.
Endure it, then. And do not mourn forever for your dead son. There is no remedy.
You will not make him stand again. Rather await some new misfortune to be suffered."

The old king in his majesty replied:

"Never give me a chair, my lord, while Hektor lies in your camp uncared for. Yield him to me now. Allow me sight of him. Accept the many gifts I bring. May they reward you, and may you see your home again.
You spared my life at once and let me live."

Akhilleus, the great runner, frowned and eyed him
under his brows:

653–654. Makar's isle . . . Straits: Makar is the legendary first king of Lesbos, a large and fertile island off the coast of Asia Minor. The Straits refers to the Hellespont. The whole phrase means that Priam was the richest king in the whole of northwest Asia Minor.

"Do not vex me, sir," he said.
"I have intended, in my own good time, to yield up Hektor to you. She who bore me,
the daughter of the Ancient of the sea, has come with word to me from Zeus. I know in your case, too—though you say nothing, Priam—that some god guided you to the shipways here.
No strong man in his best days could make entry into this camp. How could he pass the guard, or force our gateway?
Therefore, let me be.
Sting my sore heart again, and even here, under my own roof, suppliant though you are,
I may not spare you, sir, but trample on the express command of Zeus!"

When he heard this,
the old man feared him and obeyed with silence.
Now like a lion at one bound Akhilleus left the room. Close at his back the officers Automédôn and Álkimos went out—comrades in arms whom he esteemed the most after the dead Patróklos. They unharnessed mules and horses, led the old king's crier to a low bench and sat him down.
Then from the polished wagon
they took the piled-up price of Hektor's body.
One khiton and two capes they left aside as dress and shrouding for the homeward journey.
Then, calling to the women slaves, Akhilleus ordered the body bathed and rubbed with oil—but lifted, too, and placed apart, where Priam could not see his son—for seeing Hektor he might in his great pain give way to rage, and fury then might rise up in Akhilleus to slay the old king, flouting Zeus's word.
So after bathing and anointing Hektor they drew the shirt and beautiful shrouding over him.
Then with his own hands lifting him, Akhilleus laid him upon a couch, and with his two companions aiding, placed him in the wagon.
Now a bitter groan burst from Akhilleus, who stood and prayed to his own dead friend:

"Patróklos,
do not be angry with me, if somehow even in the world of Death you learn of this—that I released Prince Hektor to his father.

The gifts he gave were not unworthy. Aye, and you shall have your share, this time as well."

The Prince Akhilleus turned back to his quarters.
He took again the splendid chair that stood against the farther wall, then looked at Priam and made his declaration:

"As you wished, sir,
the body of your son is now set free.
He lies in state. At the first sight of Dawn you shall take charge of him yourself and see him.
Now let us think of supper. We are told that even Niobê in her extremity took thought for bread—though all her brood had perished, her six young girls and six tall sons. Apollo, making his silver longbow whip and sing, shot the lads down, and Artemis with raining arrows killed the daughters—all this after Niobê had compared herself with Lêto, the smooth-cheeked goddess.
She has borne two children,
Niobê said, How many have I borne!
But soon those two destroyed the twelve.
Besides,
nine days the dead lay stark, no one could bury them,
for Zeus had turned all folk of theirs to stone.
The gods made graves for them on the tenth day,
and then at last, being weak and spent with weeping, Niobê thought of food. Among the rocks of Sipylos' lonely mountainside, where nymphs who race Akhelôïos river go to rest, she, too, long turned to stone, somewhere broods on the gall immortal gods gave her to drink.

Like her we'll think of supper, noble sir.
Weep for your son again when you have borne him back to Troy; there he'll be mourned indeed."

In one swift movement now Akhilleus caught and slaughtered a white lamb. His officers

723. Niobê: Wife of Amphion, one of the two founders of the great Greek city of Thebes.

738. Sipylos: A mountain in Asia Minor. The legend is thought to have had its origin in a rock face which resembled a weeping woman, like Niobê, who wept inconsolably for the loss of her children.

739. Akhelôïos river: The river near Mount Sipylos in Asia Minor.

flayed it, skillful in their butchering to dress the flesh; they cut bits for the skewers, roasted, and drew them off, done to a turn.
Automédôn dealt loaves into the baskets on the great board; Akhilleus served the meat.
Then all their hands went out upon the supper.
When thirst and appetite were turned away,
Priam, the heir of Dárdanos, gazed long in wonder at Akhilleus' form and scale—so like the gods in aspect. And Akhilleus in his turn gazed in wonder upon Priam, royal in visage as in speech. Both men in contemplation found rest for their eyes, till the old hero, Priam, broke the silence:

"Make a bed ready for me, son of Thetis, and let us know the luxury of sleep.
From that hour when my son died at your hands till now, my eyelids have not closed in slumber over my eyes, but groaning where I sat
I tasted pain and grief a thousandfold, or lay down rolling in my courtyard mire.
Here for the first time I have swallowed bread and made myself drink wine.
Before, I could not."

Akhilleus ordered men and servingwomen to make a bed outside, in the covered forecourt, with purple rugs piled up and sheets outspread and coverings of fleeces laid on top.
The girls went out with torches in their hands and soon deftly made up a double bed.
Then Akhilleus, defiant of Agamémnon, told his guest:

"Dear venerable sir,
you'll sleep outside tonight, in case an Akhaian officer turns up, one of those men who are forever taking counsel with me—as well they may. If one should see you here as the dark night runs on, he would report it to the Lord Marshal Agamémnon. Then return of the body would only be delayed.
Now tell me this, and give me a straight answer:
How many days do you require for the funeral of Prince Hektor?—I should know how long to wait, and hold the Akhaian army."

Old Priam in his majesty replied:

"If you would have me carry out the burial,
Akhilleus, here is the way to do me grace.
As we are penned in the town, but must bring wood from the distant hills, the Trojans are afraid.
We should have mourning for nine days in hall,
then on the tenth conduct his funeral and feast the troops and commons;
on the eleventh we should make his tomb, and on the twelfth give battle, if we must."

Akhilleus said:

"As you command, old Priam,
the thing is done. I shall suspend the war for those eleven days that you require."

He took the old man's right hand by the wrist and held it, to allay his fear.

Now crier
and king with hearts brimful retired to rest in the sheltered forecourt, while Akhilleus slept deep in his palisaded lodge. Beside him, lovely in her youth, Brisêis lay.
And other gods and soldiers all night long,
by slumber quieted, slept on. But slumber would not come to Hermês the Good Companion, as he considered how to ease the way for Priam from the camp, to send him through unseen by the formidable gatekeepers.
Then Hermês came to Priam's pillow, saying:

"Sir, no thought of danger shakes your rest,
as you sleep on, being great Akhilleus' guest,
amid men fierce as hunters in a ring.
You triumphed in a costly ransoming, but three times costlier your own would be to your surviving sons—a monarch's fee—if this should come to Agamémnon's ear and all the Akhaian host should learn that you are here."

The old king started up in fright, and woke his herald. Hermês yoked the mules and horses, took the reins, then inland like the wind
he drove through all the encampment, seen by no one.

When they reached Xánthos, eddying and running god-begotten river, at the ford, Hermês departed for Olympos. Dawn spread out her yellow robe on all the earth, as they drove on toward Troy, with groans and sighs,
and the mule-team pulled the wagon and the body.
And no one saw them, not a man or woman, before Kassandra. Tall as the pale-gold goddess Aphrodítê, she had climbed the citadel of Pergamos at dawn.
Now looking down she saw her father come in his war-car, and saw the crier there, and saw Lord Hektor on his bed of death upon the mulecart. The girl wailed and cried to all the city:

"Oh, look down, look down,
go to your windows, men of Troy, and women, see Lord Hektor now! Remember joy at seeing him return alive from battle, exalting all our city and our land!"

Now, at the sight of Hektor, all gave way to loss and longing, and all crowded down to meet the escort and body near the gates, till no one in the town was left at home.
There Hektor's lady and his gentle mother tore their hair for him, flinging themselves upon the wagon to embrace his person while the crowd groaned. All that long day until the sun went down they might have mourned in tears before the gateway. But old Priam spoke to them from his chariot:

"Make way,
let the mules pass. You'll have your fill of weeping later, when I've brought the body home."

They parted then, and made way for the wagon, allowing Priam to reach the famous hall.
They laid the body of Hektor in his bed,
and brought in minstrels, men to lead the dirge.
While these wailed out, the women answered, moaning.
Andrómakhê of the ivory-white arms held in her lap between her hands the head of Hektor who had killed so many.

Now she lamented:

"You've been torn from life,
my husband, in young manhood, and you leave me empty in our hall. The boy's a child whom you and I, poor souls, conceived; I doubt he'll come to manhood. Long before, great Troy will go down plundered, citadel and all, now that you are lost, who guarded it and kept it, and preserved its wives and children.
They will be shipped off in the murmuring hulls
one day, and I along with all the rest.
You, my little one, either you come with me to do some grinding labor, some base toil for a harsh master, or an Akhaian soldier will grip you by the arm and hurl you down from a tower here to a miserable death—out of his anger for a brother, a father, or even a son that Hektor killed. Akhaians in hundreds mouthed black dust under his blows.
He was no moderate man in war, your father,
and that is why they mourn him through the city.
Hektor, you gave your parents grief and pain
but left me loneliest, and heartbroken.
You could not open your strong arms to me from your deathbed, or say a thoughtful word, for me to cherish all my life long as I weep for you night and day."

Her voice broke,
and a wail came from the women. Hékabê lifted her lamenting voice among them:

"Hektor, dearest of sons to me, in life you had the favor of the immortal gods, and they have cared for you in death as well.
Akhilleus captured other sons of mine in other years, and sold them overseas to Samos, Imbros, and the smoky island, Lemnos. That was not his way with you.
After he took your life, cutting you down with his sharp-bladed spear, he trussed and dragged you many times round the barrow of his friend, Patróklos, whom you killed—though not by this could that friend live again. But now I find you fresh as pale dew, seeming newly dead,

like one to whom Apollo of the silver bow had given easy death with his mild arrows."

Hékabê sobbed again, and the wails redoubled.
Then it was Helen's turn to make lament:

"Dear Hektor, dearest brother to me by far!
My husband is Aléxandros, who brought me here to Troy—God, that I might have died sooner! This is the twentieth year since I left home, and left my fatherland.
But never did I have an evil word or gesture from you. No—and when some other brother-in-law or sister would revile me, or if my mother-in-law spoke to me bitterly—but Priam never did, being as mild as my own father—you would bring her round with your kind heart and gentle speech. Therefore I weep for you and for myself as well, given this fate, this grief. In all wide Troy no one is left who will befriend me, none;
they all shudder at me."

Helen wept,
and a moan came from the people, hearing her.
Then Priam, the old king, commanded them:

"Trojans, bring firewood to the edge of town.
No need to fear an ambush of the Argives.
When he dismissed me from the camp, Akhilleus told me clearly they will not harass us, not until dawn comes for the twelfth day."

Then yoking mules and oxen to their wagons
the people thronged before the city gates.
Nine days they labored, bringing countless loads of firewood to the town. When Dawn that lights the world of mortals came for the tenth day, they carried greathearted Hektor out at last,
and all in tears placed his dead body high upon its pyre, then cast a torch below.
When the young Dawn with finger tips of rose made heaven bright, the Trojan people massed about Prince Hektor's ritual fire.
All being gathered and assembled, first they quenched the smoking pyre with tawny wine wherever flames had licked their way, then friends and brothers picked his white bones from the char in sorrow, while the tears rolled down their cheeks.

In a golden urn they put the bones,
shrouding the urn with veiling of soft purple.
Then in a grave dug deep they placed it and heaped it with great stones. The men were quick to raise the death-mound, while in every quarter lookouts were posted to ensure against an Akhaian surprise attack. When they had finished raising the barrow, they returned to Ilion, where all sat down to banquet in his honor in the hall of Priam king. So they performed the funeral rites of Hektor, tamer of horses.

The Odyssey*

[Ten years after the fall of Troy, Odysseus, king of Ithaca, on the west coast of Greece, has still not returned home to his wife Penélopê and his son Telémakhos. He is stranded on Ogýgia, the far-off island of trhe nymph Kalypso, where he was cast up, sole survivor of his fleet, seven years before, after many adventures in unknown seas. But in the tenth year the gods contrive his homecoming. Kalypso releases him, and on a raft he makes his way toward his home, only to be cast up, naked and battered, on the shore of Phaiákia, home of rich merchant princes.]

Book VI

Far gone in weariness, in oblivion, the noble and enduring man slept on;
but Athena in the night went down the land of the Phaiákians, entering their city.
In days gone by, these men held Hypereia, a country of wide dancing grounds, but near them were overbearing Kyklopês, whose power could not be turned from pillage. So the Phaiákians migrated thence under Nausíthoös

* An extract: five books of the twenty-four. From The Odyssey, translated by Robert Fitzgerald.

4. Phaiákians: See p. 102, note 2 on pronunciation.

5. Hypereia: The geography is almost certainly imaginary, though later Greeks identified the final home of the Phaiákians, Skheria (line 11), with Corcyra (modern Corfu).

7. Kyklopês: A tribe of one-eyed monsters: Odysseus meets one in Book IX.

9. Nausíthoös: Son of Poseidon, god of the sea and of earthquakes, and father of King Alkínoös.

to settle a New World across the sea, Skhería Island. That first captain walled their promontory, built their homes and shrines, and parcelled out the black land for the plow.
But he had gone down long ago to Death.
Alkínoös ruled, and Heaven gave him wisdom, so on this night the goddess, gray-eyed Athena, entered the palace of Alkínoös to make sure of Odysseus' voyage home.
She took her way to a painted bedchamber where a young girl lay fast asleep—so fine in mould and feature that she seemed a goddess—the daughter of Alkínoös, Nausikaa.
On either side, as Graces might have slept, her maids were sleeping. The bright doors were shut, but like a sudden stir of wind, Athena moved to the bedside of the girl, and grew visible as the shipman Dymas' daughter, a girl the princess' age, and her dear friend.
In this form gray-eyed Athena said to her:

"How so remiss, and yet thy mother's daughter?
leaving thy clothes uncared for, Nausikaa,
when soon thou must have store of marriage linen,
and put thy minstrelsy in wedding dress!
Beauty, in these, will make the folk admire,
and bring thy father and gentle mother joy.
Let us go washing in the shine of morning!
Beside thee will I drub, so wedding chests will brim by evening. Maidenhood must end!
Have not the noblest born Phaiákians paid court to thee, whose birth none can excel?
Go beg thy sovereign father, even at dawn, to have the mule cart and the mules brought round to take thy body-linen, gowns and mantles.
Thou shouldst ride, for it becomes thee more,
the washing pools are found so far from home."

On this word she departed, gray-eyed Athena, to where the gods have their eternal dwelling—
as men say— in the fastness of Olympos.
Never a tremor of wind, or a splash of rain,
no errant snowflake comes to stain that heaven,
so calm, so vaporless, the world of light.

25. Athena: See note to Iliad, I, 227, p. 109. She shows Odysseus particular signs of her favor throughout the Odyssey.

Here, where the gay gods live their days of pleasure,
the gray-eyed one withdrew, leaving the princess.

And now Dawn took her own fair throne, awaking
the girl in the sweet gown, still charmed by dream.
Down through the rooms she went to tell her parents, whom she found still at home: her mother seated near the great hearth among her maids—and twirling out of her distaff yarn dyed like the sea—;
her father at the door, bound for a council of princes on petition of the gentry.
She went up close to him and softly said:

"My dear Papà, could you not send the mule cart around for me—the gig with pretty wheels?
I must take all our things and get them washed at the river pools; our linen is all soiled.
And you should wear fresh clothing, going to council with counselors and first men of the realm.
Remember your five sons at home: though two are married, we have still three bachelor sprigs;
they will have none but laundered clothes each time they go to the dancing. See what I must think of!"

She had no word to say of her own wedding, though her keen father saw her blush. Said he:

"No mules would I deny you, child, nor anything.
Go along, now; the grooms will bring your gig with pretty wheels and the cargo box upon it."

He spoke to the stableman, who soon brought round the cart, low-wheeled and nimble;
harnessed the mules, and backed them in the traces.
Meanwhile the girl fetched all her soiled apparel to bundle in the polished wagon box.
Her mother, for their luncheon, packed a hamper with picnic fare, and filled a skin of wine, and, when the princess had been handed up, gave her a golden bottle of olive oil for softening girls' bodies, after bathing.
Nausikaa took the reins and raised her whip, lashing the mules. What jingling! What a clatter!
But off they went in a ground-covering trot,
with princess, maids, and laundry drawn behind.

59. distaff: Staff holding wool or plant fibers to be spun.

By the lower river where the wagon came were washing pools, with water all year flowing in limpid spillways that no grime withstood.
The girls unhitched the mules, and sent them down along the eddying stream to crop sweet grass.
Then sliding out the cart's tail board, they took armloads of clothing to the dusky water, and trod them in the pits, making a race of it.
All being drubbed, all blemish rinsed away,
they spread them, piece by piece, along the beach whose pebbles had been laundered by the sea;
then took a dip themselves, and, all anointed with golden oil, ate lunch beside the river while the bright burning sun dried out their linen.
Princess and maids delighted in that feast;
then, putting off their veils,
they ran and passed a ball to a rhythmic beat,
Nausikaa flashing first with her white arms.

So Artemis goes flying after her arrows flown down some tremendous valley-side—Taÿgetos, Erymanthos—chasing the mountain goats or ghosting deer, with nymphs of the wild places flanking her;
and Lêto's heart delights to see them running,
for, taller by a head than nymphs can be,
the goddess shows more stately, all being beautiful.
So one could tell the princess from the maids.

Soon it was time, she knew, for riding homeward—mules to be harnessed, linen folded smooth—but the gray-eyed goddess Athena made her tarry, so that Odysseus might behold her beauty and win her guidance to the town.
It happened
when the king's daughter threw her ball off line and missed, and put it in the whirling stream,— at which they all gave such a shout, Odysseus awoke and sat up, saying to himself:

"Now, by my life, mankind again! But who?
Savages, are they, strangers to courtesy?

101. along the beach: They did not have to worry about the tide, as there is almost no tide in the Mediterranean.

110. Artemis: Virgin goddess of the hunt, and of women's natural deaths.

111. Taÿgetos: Mountain range near Sparta. Erymanthos: Mountain in Arcadia.

114. Lêto: Lover of Zeus, to whom she bore Artemis and Apollo.

Or gentle folk, who know and fear the gods?
That was a lusty cry of tall young girls—
most like the cry of nymphs, who haunt the peaks, and springs of brooks, and inland grassy places.
Or am I amid people of human speech?
Up again, man; and let me see for myself."

He pushed aside the bushes, breaking off with his great hand a single branch of olive, whose leaves might shield him in his nakedness;
so came out rustling, like a mountain lion,
rain-drenched, wind-buffeted, but in his might at ease, with burning eyes—who prowls among the herds or flocks, or after game, his hungry belly taking him near stout homesteads for his prey.
Odysseus had this look, in his rough skin advancing on the girls with pretty braids;
and he was driven on by hunger, too.
Streaked with brine, and swollen, he terrified them, so that they fled, this way and that. Only Alkínoös' daughter stood her ground, being given a bold heart by Athena, and steady knees.

She faced him, waiting. And Odysseus came, debating inwardly what he should do:
embrace this beauty's knees in supplication?
or stand apart, and, using honeyed speech, inquire the way to town, and beg some clothing?
In his swift reckoning, he thought it best to trust in words to please her—and keep away;
he might anger the girl, touching her knees.
So he began, and let the soft words fall:

"Mistress: please: are you divine, or mortal?
If one of those who dwell in the wide heaven,
you are most near to Artemis, I should say—great Zeus's daughter—in your grace and presence.
If you are one of earth's inhabitants,
how blest your father, and your gentle mother, blest all your kin. I know what happiness must send the warm tears to their eyes, each time they see their wondrous child go to the dancing!
But one man's destiny is more than blest—
he who prevails, and takes you as his bride.
Never have I laid eyes on equal beauty in man or woman. I am hushed indeed.

So fair, one time, I thought a young palm tree at Delos near the altar of Apollo—
I had troops under me when I was there on the sea route that later brought me grief—but that slim palm tree filled my heart with wonder:
never came shoot from earth so beautiful.
So now, my lady, I stand in awe so great
I cannot take your knees. And yet my case is desperate:
twenty days, yesterday, in the winedark sea,
on the ever-lunging swell, under gale winds, getting away from the Island of Ogýgia.
And now the terror of Storm has left me stranded upon this shore—with more blows yet to suffer,
I must believe, before the gods relent.
Mistress, do me a kindness!
After much weary toil, I come to you, and you are the first soul I have seen—I know no others here. Direct me to the town, give me a rag that I can throw around me,
some cloth or wrapping that you brought along.
And may the gods accomplish your desire:
a home, a husband, and harmonious converse with him—the best thing in the world being a strong house held in serenity where man and wife agree. Woe to their enemies, joy to their friends! But all this they know best."

Then she of the white arms, Nausikaa, replied:

"Stranger, there is no quirk or evil in you that I can see. You know Zeus metes out fortune to good and bad men as it pleases him.
Hardship he sent to you, and you must bear it.
But now that you have taken refuge here you shall not lack for clothing, or any other comfort due to a poor man in distress.
The town lies this way, and the men are called Phaiákians, who own the land and city.
I am daughter to the Prince Alkinoös, by whom the power of our people stands."

Turning, she called out to her maids-in-waiting:

"Stay with me! Does the sight of a man scare you?
Or do you take this one for an enemy?

173. Delos: The sacred island of Apollo, in the Cyclades.

Why, there's no fool so brash, and never will be,
as to bring war or pillage to this coast,
for we are dear to the immortal gods, living here, in the sea that rolls forever,
distant from other lands and other men.
No: this man is a castaway, poor fellow;
we must take care of him. Strangers and beggars come from Zeus: a small gift, then, is friendly.
Give our new guest some food and drink, and take him into the river, out of the wind, to bathe."

They stood up now, and called to one another to go on back. Quite soon they led Odysseus under the river bank, as they were bidden;
and there laid out a tunic, and a cloak,
and gave him olive oil in the golden flask.
"Here," they said, "go bathe in the flowing water."
But heard now from that kingly man, Odysseus:

"Maids," he said, "keep away a little; let me wash the brine from my own back, and rub on plenty of oil. It is long since my anointing.
I take no bath, however, where you can see me—naked before young girls with pretty braids."

They left him, then, and went to tell the princess.
And now Odysseus, dousing in the river, scrubbed the coat of brine from back and shoulders and rinsed the clot of sea-spume from his hair;
got himself all rubbed down, from head to foot,
then he put on the clothes the princess gave him.
Athena lent a hand, making him seem taller, and massive too, with crisping hair in curls like petals of wild hyacinth, but all red-golden. Think of gold infused on silver by a craftsman, whose fine art Hephaistos taught him, or Athena: one whose work moves to delight: just so she lavished beauty over Odysseus' head and shoulders.
Then he went down to sit on the sea beach in his new splendor. There the girl regarded him, and after a time she said to the maids beside her:

"My gentlewomen, I have a thing to tell you.
The Olympian gods cannot be all averse

246. Hephaistos: Patron god of craftsmen, especially workers in metal.

to this man's coming here among our islanders.
Uncouth he seemed, I thought so, too, before;
but now he looks like one of heaven's people.
I wish my husband could be fine as he and glad to stay forever on Skhería!

But have you given refreshment to our guest?"

At this the maids, all gravely listening, hastened to set out bread and wine before Odysseus, and ah! how ravenously that patient man took food and drink, his long fast at an end.

The princess Nausikaa now turned aside to fold her linens; in the pretty cart she stowed them, put the mule team under harness, mounted the driver's seat, and then looked down to say with cheerful prompting to Odysseus:

"Up with you now, friend; back to town we go;
and I shall send you in before my father who is wondrous wise; there in our house with him you'll meet the noblest of the Phaiákians.
You have good sense, I think; here's how to do it:
while we go through the countryside and farmland stay with my maids, behind the wagon, walking briskly enough to follow where I lead.
But near the town—well, there's a wall with towers around the Isle, and beautiful ship basins right and left of the causeway of approach; seagoing craft are beached beside the road
each on its launching ways. The agora, with fieldstone benches bedded in the earth, lies either side Poseidon's shrine—for there men are at work on pitch-black hulls and rigging, cables and sails, and tapering of oars.
The archer's craft is not for the Phaiákians, but ship designing, modes of oaring cutters in which they love to cross the foaming sea.
From these fellows I will have no salty talk,
no gossip later. Plenty are insolent.
And some seadog might say, after we passed:
'Who is this handsome stranger trailing Nausikaa?

281. agora: Place of assembly.
287. modes of . . . cutters: That is, types of sharp-prowed ships.

Where did she find him? Will he be her husband?
Or is she being hospitable to some rover come off his ship from lands across the sea—there being no lands nearer. A god, maybe?
a god from heaven, the answer to her prayer, descending now—to make her his forever?
Better, if she's roamed and found a husband somewhere else: none of our own will suit her, though many come to court her, and those the best.'
This is the way they might make light of me.
And I myself should hold it shame for any girl to flout her own dear parents, taking up with a man, before her marriage.

Note well, now, what I say, friend, and your chances are excellent for safe conduct from my father.
You'll find black poplars in a roadside park around a meadow and fountain—all Athena's—but Father has a garden on the place—this within earshot of the city wall.
Go in there and sit down, giving us time to pass through town and reach my father's house.
And when you can imagine we're at home, than take the road into the city, asking directions to the palace of Alkínoös.
You'll find it easily: any small boy can take you there; no family has a mansion half so grand as he does, being king.
As soon as you are safe inside, cross over and go straight through into the mégaron to find my mother. She'll be there in firelight before a column, with her maids in shadow, spinning a wool dyed richly as the sea.
My father's great chair faces the fire, too;
there like a god he sits and takes his wine.
Go past him; cast yourself before my mother, embrace her knees—and you may wake up soon
at home rejoicing, though your home be far.
On Mother's feeling much depends; if she looks on you kindly, you shall see your friends under your own roof in your father's country."

At this she raised her glistening whip, lashing the team into a run; they left the river cantering beautifully, then trotted smartly.

321. mégaron: Great hall of the palace.

But then she reined them in, and spared the whip,
so that her maids could follow with Odysseus.
The sun was going down when they went by Athena's grove. Here, then, Odysseus rested, and lifted up his prayer to Zeus's daughter:

"Hear me, unwearied child of royal Zeus!
O listen to me now—thou so aloof
while the Earthshaker wrecked and battered me.
May I find love and mercy among these people."

He prayed for that, and Pallas Athena heard him—although in deference to her father's brother
she would not show her true form to Odysseus, at whom Poseidon smoldered on until the kingly man came home to his own shore.

[Odysseus follows Nausikaa's instructions and is received as a guest in the palace by her mother Arêtê and her father Alkínoös, who promises to help him return home.]

Book VIII

Under the opening fingers of the dawn
Alkínoös, the sacred prince, arose, and then arose Odysseus, raider of cities.
As the king willed, they went down by the shipways to the assembly ground of the Phaiakians.
Side by side the two men took their ease there on smooth stone benches. Meanwhile Pallas Athena roamed through the byways of the town, contriving Odysseus' voyage home—in voice and feature the crier of the king Alkínoös who stopped and passed the word to every man:

"Phaiákian lords and counselors, this way!
Come to assembly; learn about the stranger,
the new guest at the palace of Alkínoös—
a man the sea drove, but a comely man;
the gods' own light is on him."

She aroused them,
and soon the assembly ground and seats were filled with curious men, a throng who peered and saw

343. Earthshaker: Odysseus has mortally offended Poseidon by blinding his son, the Kyklops, Polyphêmos. The god has pursued Odysseus with suffering on the element he controls, the sea.

345. Pallas: A title of Athena, of uncertain meaning.

10. crier: Herald.

the master mind of war, Laërtês' son.
Athena now poured out her grace upon him, head and shoulders, height and mass—a splendor awesome to the eyes of the Phaiákians;
she put him in a fettle to win the day,
mastering every trial they set to test him.
When all the crowd sat marshalled, quieted,
Alkínoös addressed the full assembly:

"Hear me, lords and captains of the Phaiákians!
Hear what my heart would have me say!
Our guest and new friend—nameless to me still—comes to my house after long wandering in Dawn lands, or among the Sunset races.
Now he appeals to me for conveyance home.
As in the past, therefore, let us provide passage, and quickly, for no guest of mine languishes here for lack of it. Look to it:
get a black ship afloat on the noble sea, and pick our fastest sailer; draft a crew of two and fifty from our younger townsmen—men who have made their names at sea. Loop oars well to your tholepins, lads, then leave the ship, come to our house, fall to, and take your supper:
we'll furnish out a feast for every crewman.
These are your orders. As for my older peers and princes of the realm, let them foregather in festival for our friend in my great hall;
and let no man refuse. Call in our minstrel, Demódokos, whom God made lord of song, heart-easing, sing upon what theme he will."

He turned, led the procession, and those princes followed, while his herald sought the minstrel.
Young oarsmen from the assembly chose a crew of two and fifty, as the king commanded, and these filed off along the waterside to where the ship lay, poised above open water.
They hauled the black hull down to ride the sea,
rigging a mast and spar in the black ship, with oars at trail from corded rawhide, all seamanly; then tried the white sail, hoisting, and moored her off the beach. Then going ashore

19. Laërtês: The old king of Ithaka.
40. Tholepins: Pegs serving as oarlocks.
56. spar: Crosspiece at the top of the mast, to which the sail is fastened.

the crew went up to the great house of Alkínoös.
Here the enclosures, entrance ways, and rooms were filled with men, young men and old, for whom Alkínoös had put twelve sheep to sacrifice, eight tuskers and a pair of shambling oxen.
These, now, they flayed and dressed to make their banquet.
The crier soon came, leading that man of song whom the Muse cherished; by her gift he knew the good of life, and evil—for she who lent him sweetness made him blind.
Pontónoös fixed a studded chair for him hard by a pillar amid the banqueters, hanging the taut harp from a peg above him,
and guided up his hands upon the strings;
placed a bread basket at his side, and poured wine in a cup, that he might drink his fill.
Now each man's hand went out upon the banquet.

In time, when hunger and thirst were turned away,
the Muse brought to the minstrel's mind a song of heroes whose great fame rang under heaven:
the clash between Odysseus and Akhilleus, how one time they contended at the godfeast raging, and the marshal, Agamémnon, felt inward joy over his captains' quarrel;
for such had been foretold him by Apollo at Pytho—hallowed height—when the Akhaian crossed that portal of rock to ask a sign—in the old days when grim war lay ahead for Trojans and Danaans, by God's will.
So ran the tale the minstrel sang. Odysseus with massive hand drew his rich mantle down over his brow, cloaking his face with it, to make the Phaiákians miss the secret tears that started to his eyes. How skillfully he dried them when the song came to a pause!
threw back his mantle, spilt his gout of wine!
But soon the minstrel plucked his note once more

64. tuskers: Boars.
67. Muse: Goddess of the arts, source of artistic inspiration.
70. Pontónoös: The herald of Alkínoös.
80. clash: This is the only reference to a quarrel between Odysseus and Akhilleus. This story was perhaps told in some epic poem now lost.
81. godfeast: A religious festival.
85. Pytho: Apollo's prophetic shrine at Delphi. It seems to be implied that Apollo had foretold the fall of Troy after such a quarrel, hence Agamémnon's "inward joy." the Akhaian: The Greek; here, Agamémnon.
88. Danaans: Greeks.
95. spilt . . . wine: As an offering to the gods.

to please the Phaiákian lords, who loved the song;
then in his cloak Odysseus wept again.
His tears flowed in the mantle unperceived:
only Alkínoös, at his elbow, saw them,
and caught the low groan in the man's breathing.
At once he spoke to all the seafolk round him:

"Hear me, lords and captains of the Phaiákians.
Our meat is shared, our hearts are full of pleasure from the clear harp tone that accords with feasting;
now for the field and track; we shall have trials in the pentathlon. Let our guest go home and tell his friends what champions we are at boxing, wrestling, broadjump and foot racing."

On this he led the way and all went after.
The crier unslung and pegged the shining harp and, taking Demódokos's hand, led him along with all the rest—Phaiákian peers, gay amateurs of the great games.
They gained the common, where a crowd was forming,
and many a young athlete now came forward with seaside names like Tipmast, Tiderace, Sparwood, Hullman, Sternman, Beacher and Pullerman, Bluewater, Shearwater, Runningwake, Boardalee, Seabelt, son of Grandfleet Shipwrightson; Seareach stepped up, son of the Launching Master, rugged as Arês, bane of men; his build excelled all but the Prince Laódamas;
and Laódamas made entry with his brothers,
Halios and Klytóneus, sons of the king.
The runners, first, must have their quarter mile.
All lined up tense; then Go! and down the track they raised the dust in a flying bunch, strung out longer and longer behind Prince Klytóneus.
By just so far as a mule team, breaking ground, will distance oxen, he left all behind and came up to the crowd, an easy winner.
Then they made room for wrestling—grinding bouts that Seareach won, pinning the strongest men;
then the broadjump; first place went to Seabelt;
Sparwood gave the discus the mightiest fling,

107. pentathlon: Literally, 'five-contests'. At the great games, the event consisted of competition in long-jump, footrace, discus-throw, javelin-throw, and wrestling.
111. crier: Herald.
122. Arês: God of war.

and Prince Laódamas outboxed them all.
Now it was he, the son of Alkínoös, who said when they had run through these diversions:

"Look here friends, we ought to ask the stranger
if he competes in something. He's no cripple;
look at his leg muscles and his forearms.
Neck like a bollard; strong as a bull, he seems;
and not old, though he may have gone stale under the rough times he had. Nothing like the sea for wearing out the toughest man alive."

Then Seareach took him up at once, and said:

"Laódamas, you're right, by all powers.
Go up to him, yourself, and put the question."

At this, Alkínoös' tall son advanced to the center ground, and there addressed Odysseus:

"Friend, Excellency, come join our competition,
if you are practiced, as you seem to be.
While a man lives he wins no greater honor than footwork and the skill of hands can bring him.
Enter our games, then; ease your heart of trouble.
Your journey home is not far off, remember;
the ship is launched, the crew all primed for sea."

Odysseus, canniest of men, replied:

"Laódamas, why do you young chaps challenge me?
I have more on my mind than track and field—hard days, and many, have I seen, and suffered.
I sit here at your field meet, yes; but only as one who begs your king to send him home."

Now Seareach put his words in, and contentiously:

"The reason being, as I see it, friend, you never learned a sport, and have no skill in any of the contests of fighting men.
You must have been the skipper of some tramp that crawled from one port to the next, jam full of chaffering hands: a tallier of cargoes, itching for gold—not, by your looks, an athlete."

143. bollard: Massive post on a dock, to which a large ship may be made fast.

Odysseus frowned, and eyed him coldly, saying:

"That was uncalled for, friend, you talk like a fool.
The gods deal out no gift, this one or any—birth, brains, or speech—to every man alike.
In looks a man may be a shade, a specter, and yet be master of speech so crowned with beauty that people gaze at him with pleasure. Courteous, sure of himself, he can command assemblies,
and when he comes to town, the crowds gather.
A handsome man, contrariwise, may lack grace and good sense in everything he says.
You now, for instance, with your fine physique—a god's, indeed—you have an empty noddle.
I find my heart inside my ribs aroused by your impertinence. I am no stranger to contests, as you fancy. I rated well when I could count on youth and my two hands.
Now pain has cramped me, and my years of combat hacking through ranks in war, and the bitter sea.
Aye. Even so I'll give your games a trial.
You spoke heart-wounding words. You shall be answered."

He leapt out, cloaked as he was, and picked a discus, a rounded stone, more ponderous than those already used by the Phaíákian throwers, and, whirling, let it fly from his great hand with a low hum. The crowd went flat on the ground—all those oar-pulling, seafaring Phaiákians—under the rushing noise. The spinning disk soared out, light as a bird, beyond all others.
Disguised now as a Phaiákian, Athena staked it and called out:

"Even a blind man,
friend, could judge this, finding with his fingers
one discus, quite alone, beyond the cluster.
Congratulations; this event is yours;
not a man here can beat you or come near you."

That was a cheering hail, Odysseus thought, seeing one friend there on the emulous field,
so, in relief, he turned among the Phaiákians
and said:

"Now come alongside that one, lads.
The next I'll send as far, I think, or farther.

Anyone else on edge for competition try me now. By heaven, you angered me.
Racing, wrestling, boxing—I bar nothing with any man except Laódamas, for he's my host. Who quarrels with his host?
Only a madman—or no man at all—would challenge his protector among strangers, cutting the ground away under his feet.
Here are no others I will not engage, none but I hope to know what he is made of.
Inept at combat, am I? Not entirely.
Give me a smooth bow; I can handle it, and I might well be first to hit my man amid a swarm of enemies, though archers in company around me drew together.
Philoktêtês alone, at Troy, when we Akhaians took the bow, used to outshoot me.
Of men who now eat bread upon the earth
I hold myself the best hand with a bow—conceding mastery to the men of old, Heraklês, or Eurýtos of Oikhalía, heroes who vied with gods in bowmanship.
Eurýtos came to grief, it's true; old age never crept over him in his long hall;
Apollo took his challenge ill, and killed him.
What then, the spear? I'll plant it like an arrow.
Only in sprinting, I'm afraid, I may be passed by someone. Roll of the sea waves wearied me, and the victuals in my ship ran low; my legs are flabby."

When he finished,
the rest were silent, but Alkínoös answered:

"Friend, we take your challenge in good part,
for this man angered and affronted you here at our peaceful games. You'd have us note the prowess that is in you, and so clearly,
no man of sense would ever cry it down!
Come, turn your mind, now, on a thing to tell among your peers when you are home again, dining in hall, beside your wife and children:
I mean our prowess, as you may remember it,
for we, too, have our skills, given by Zeus, and practiced from our father's time to this—

228. Philoktêtês: A famous archer, who had inherited the bow and arrows of Heraklês.

not in the boxing ring nor the palestra conspicuous, but in racing, land or sea;
and all our days we set great store by feasting, harpers, and the grace of dancing choirs,
changes of dress, warm baths, and downy beds.
O master dancers of the Phaiákians!
Perform now: let our guest on his return tell his companions we excel the world in dance and song, as in our ships and running.
Someone go find the gittern harp in hall and bring it quickly to Demódokos!"

At the serene king's word, a squire ran to bring the polished harp out of the palace, and place was given to nine referees—peers of the realm, masters of ceremony—who cleared a space and smoothed a dancing floor.
The squire brought down, and gave Demódokos, the clear-toned harp; and centering on the minstrel magical young dancers formed a circle with a light beat, and stamp of feet. Beholding, Odysseus marvelled at the flashing ring.

Now to his harp the blinded minstrel sang of Arês' dalliance with Aphroditê:
how hidden in Hephaistos' house they played at love together, and the gifts of Arês, dishonoring Hephaistos' bed—and how the word that wounds the heart came to the master from Hêlios, who had seen the two embrace; and when he learned it, Lord Hephaistos went with baleful calculation to his forge.
There mightily he armed his anvil block and hammered out a chain, whose tempered links could not be sprung or bent; he meant that they should hold.
Those shackles fashioned, hot in wrath Hephaistos climbed to the bower and the bed of love, pooled all his net of chain around the bed posts and swung it from the rafters overhead—light as a cobweb even gods in bliss could not perceive, so wonderful his cunning.
Seeing his bed now made a snare, he feigned

255. palestra: Wrestling-ground.
264. gittern: Shaped like a guitar.
278. Hephaistos' house: Aphroditê was married to Hephaistos (though in Iliad Book XVIII he is married to Grace).
282. Hêlios: The sun, who on his daily journey across the sky sees everything.

a journey to the trim stronghold of Lemnos,
the dearest of earth's towns to him. And Arês?
Ah, golden Arês' watch had its reward
when he beheld the great smith leaving home.
How promptly to the famous door he came,
intent on pleasure with sweet Kythereia!
She, who had left her father's side but now,
sat in her chamber when her lover entered;
and tenderly he pressed her hand and said:

"Come and lie down, my darling, and be happy!
Hephaistos is no longer here, but gone to see his grunting Sintian friends on Lemnos."

As she, too, thought repose would be most welcome, the pair went in to bed—into a shower of clever chains, the netting of Hephaistos.
So trussed, they could not move apart, nor rise,
at last they knew there could be no escape,
they were to see the glorious cripple now—
for Hêlios had spied for him, and told him;
so he turned back, this side of Lemnos Isle, sick at heart, making his way homeward.
Now in the doorway of the room he stood while deadly rage took hold of him; his voice, hoarse and terrible, reached all the gods:

"O Father Zeus, O gods in bliss forever, here is indecorous entertainment for you, Aphroditê, Zeus's daughter, caught in the act, cheating me, her cripple, with Arês—devastating Arês.
Cleanlimbed beauty is her joy, not these bandylegs I came into the world with:
no one to blame but the two gods who bred me!
Come see this pair entwining here in my own bed! How hot it makes me burn!
I think they may not care to lie much longer, pressing on one another, passionate lovers;
they'll have enough of bed together soon.
And yet the chain that bagged them holds them down

295. Lemnos: An island in the Aegean sea. As to why it was "dearest" to him, see Iliad, I, 686–688.

300. Kythereia: Aphroditê, goddess of love, daughter of Zeus, king of the gods. She was born from the sea near Kythera, a large island off the southeast coast of Greece.

301. her father: Zeus.

306. Sintian: The Sintians preceded the Greeks as inhabitants of Lemnos.

326. two gods that bred me: Zeus and Hêra; she was his wife and sister, and the goddess of marriage.

till Father sends me back my wedding gifts—
all that I poured out for his damned pigeon, so lovely, and so wanton."

All the others were crowding in, now, to the brazen house—Poseidon who embraces earth, and Hermês
the runner, and Apollo, lord of Distance.
The goddesses stayed home for shame; but these munificences ranged there in the doorway, and irrepressible among them all arose the laughter of the happy gods.
Gazing hard at Hephaistos' handiwork
the gods in turn remarked among themselves:

"No dash in adultery now."

"The tortoise tags the hare—Hephaistos catches Arês—and Arês outran the wind."

"The lame god's craft has pinned him. Now shall he pay what is due from gods taken in cuckoldry."

They made these improving remarks to one another, but Apollo leaned aside to say to Hermês:

"Son of Zeus, beneficient Wayfinder, would you accept a coverlet of chain, if only you lay by Aphroditê's golden side?"

To this the Wayfinder replied, shining:

"Would I not, though, Apollo of distances!
Wrap me in chains three times the weight of these,
come goddesses and gods to see the fun;
only let me lie beside the pale-golden one!"

The gods gave way again to peals of laughter,
all but Poseidon, and he never smiled,
bur urged Hephaistos to unpinion Arês, saying emphatically, in a loud voice:

"Free him;
you will be paid, I swear; ask what you will;
he pays up every jot the gods decree."

337. Hermes: The gods' messenger.
338. Apollo, lord of Distance: God of prophecy, music, medicine, and archery. The epithet is also translated, "one who works from afar."

To this the Great Gamelegs replied:

"Poseidon,
lord of the earth-surrounding sea, I should not swear to a scoundrel's honor. What have I as surety from you, if Arês leaves me empty-handed, with my empty chain?"

The Earth-shaker for answer urged again:

"Hephaistos, let us grant he goes, and leaves the fine unpaid; I swear, then, I shall pay it."

Then said the Great Gamelegs at last:

"No more;
you offer terms I cannot well refuse."

And down the strong god bent to set them free, till disencumbered of their bond, the chain,
the lovers leapt away—he into Thrace, while Aphroditê, laughter's darling, fled to Kypros Isle and Paphos, to her meadow and altar dim with incense. There the Graces bathed and anointed her with golden oil—a bloom that clings upon immortal flesh alone—and let her folds of mantle fall in glory.

So ran the song the minstrel sang.

Odysseus,
listening, found sweet pleasure in the tale,
among the Phaiákian mariners and oarsmen.
And next Alkínoös called upon his sons, Halios and Laódamas, to show the dance no one could do as well as they—handling a purple ball carven by Pólybos.
One made it shoot up under the shadowing clouds as he leaned backward; bounding high in air the other cut its flight far off the ground—and neither missed a step as the ball soared.
The next turn was to keep it low, and shuttling hard between them, while the ring of boys gave them a steady stamping beat.

365. Gamelegs: Hephaistos was lame.
379. Kypros: Cyprus. Paphos was its principal city, famous for its temple to Aphroditê.
380. Graces: Goddesses of beauty and refinement.

Odysseus now addressed Alkínoös:

"O majesty, model of all your folk,
your promise was to show me peerless dancers;
here is the promise kept. I am all wonder."

At this Alkínoös in his might rejoicing said to the seafarers of Phaiákia:

"Attend me now, Phaiákian lords and captains:
our guest appears a clear-eyed man and wise.
Come, let him feel our bounty as he should.
Here are twelve princes of the kingdom—lords paramount, and I who make thirteen;
let each one bring a laundered cloak and tunic,
and add one bar of honorable gold.
Heap all our gifts together; load his arms;
let him go joyous to our evening feast!
As for Seareach—why, man to man he'll make amends, and handsomely; he blundered."

Now all as one acclaimed the king's good pleasure, and each one sent a squire to bring his gifts.
Meanwhile Seareach found speech again, saying:

"My lord and model of us all, Alkínoös, as you require of me, in satisfaction, this broadsword of clear bronze goes to our guest.
Its hilt is silver, and the ringed sheath of new-sawn ivory—a costly weapon."

He turned to give the broadsword to Odysseus, facing him, saying blithely:

"Sir, my best wishes, my respects; if I offended,
I hope the seawinds blow it out of mind.
God send you see your lady and your homeland soon again, after the pain of exile."

Odysseus, the great tactician, answered:

"My hand, friend; may the gods award you fortune.
I hope no pressing need comes on you ever for this fine blade you give me in amends."

He slung it, glinting silver, from his shoulder, as the light shone from sundown. Messengers were bearing gifts and treasure to the palace, where the king's sons received them all, and made a glittering pile at their grave mother's side;

then, as Alkínoös took his throne of power,
each went to his own high-backed chair in turn,
and said Alkínoös to Arêtê:

"Lady, bring here a chest, the finest one;
a clean cloak and tunic; stow these things;
and warm a cauldron for him. Let him bathe,
when he has seen the gifts of the Phaiákians,
and so dine happily to a running song.
My own wine-cup of gold intaglio
I'll give him, too; through all the days to come, tipping his wine to Zeus or other gods in his great hall, he shall remember me."

Then said Arêtê to her maids:

"The tripod:
stand the great tripod legs about the fire."

They swung the cauldron on the fire's heart, poured water in, and fed the blaze beneath until the basin simmered, cupped in flame.
The queen set out a rich chest from her chamber and folded in the gifts—clothing and gold given Odysseus by the Phaiákians;
then she put in the royal cloak and tunic, briskly saying to her guest:

"Now here, sir,
look to the lid yourself, and tie it down against light fingers, if there be any,
on the black ship tonight while you are sleeping."

Noble Odysseus, expert in adversity, battened the lid down with a lightning knot learned, once, long ago, from the Lady Kirkê.
And soon a call came from the Bathing Mistress who led him to a hip-bath, warm and clear—a happy sight, and rare in his immersions after he left Kalypso's home—where, surely, the luxuries of a god were ever his.

446. intaglio: With designs cut into it in inverse relief.

465. Kirkê: (Circe) a sorceress who kept Odysseus on her island for several months.

470. luxuries of a god: Kalypso was immortal, and did indeed entertain Odysseus royally.

When the bath maids had washed him, rubbed him down, put a fresh tunic and a cloak around him,
he left the bathing place to join the men at wine in hall.

The princess Nausikaa, exquisite figure, as of heaven's shaping, waited beside a pillar as he passed and said swiftly, with wonder in her look:

"Fare well, stranger; in your land remember me who met and saved you. It is worth your thought."

The man of all occasions now met this:

"Daughter of great Alkínoös, Nausikaa, may Zeus the lord of thunder, Hera's consort, grant me daybreak again in my own country!
But there and all my days until I die may I invoke you as I would a goddess, princess, to whom I owe my life."

He left her and went to take his place beside the king.

Now when the roasts were cut, the winebowls full,
a herald led the minstrel down the room amid the deference of the crowd, and paused to seat him near a pillar in the center—whereupon that resourceful man, Odysseus, carved out a quarter from his chine of pork,
crisp with fat, and called the blind man's guide:

"Herald! here, take this to Demódokos:
let him feast and be merry, with my compliments.
All men owe honor to the poets—honor and awe, for they are dearest to the Muse who puts upon their lips the ways of life."

Gentle Demódokos took the proffered gift and inwardly rejoiced. When all were served, every man's hand went out upon the banquet,
repelling hunger and thirst, until at length Odysseus spoke again to the blind minstrel:

"Demódokos, accept my utmost praise.
The Muse, daughter of Zeus in radiance,

493. chine: Back.

or else Apollo gave you skill to shape with such great style your songs of the Akhaians—their hard lot, how they fought and suffered war.
You shared it, one would say, or heard it all.
Now shift your theme, and sing that wooden horse Epeios built, inspired by Athena—the ambuscade Odysseus filled with fighters and sent to take the inner town of Troy.
Sing only this for me, sing me this well, and I shall say at once before the world
the grace of heaven has given us a song."

The minstrel stirred, murmuring to the god, and soon clear words and notes came one by one, a vision of the Akhaians in their graceful ships drawing away from shore: the torches flung and shelters flaring: Argive soldiers crouched in the close dark around Odysseus: and the horse, tall on the assembly ground of Troy.
For when the Trojans pulled it in, themselves, up to the citadel, they sat nearby with long-drawn-out and hapless argument—favoring, in the end, one course of three:
either to stave the vault with brazen axes,
or haul it to a cliff and pitch it down, or else to save it for the gods, a votive glory—
the plan that could not but prevail.
For Troy must perish, as ordained, that day she harbored the great horse of timber; hidden the flower of Akhaia lay, and bore slaughter and death upon the men of Troy.
He sang, then, of the town sacked by Akhaians pouring down from the horse's hollow cave, this way and that way raping the steep city, and how Odysseus came like Arês to the door of Deïphobos, with Meneláos, and braved the desperate fight there—conquering once more by Athena's power.

The splendid minstrel sang it.

And Odysseus
let the bright molten tears run down his cheeks, weeping the way a wife mourns for her lord
on the lost field where he has gone down fighting

511. The story of the wooden horse and the fall of Troy is told in The Aeneid, II, p. 589.

531. votive: As an offering in thanks for Troy's deliverance.

the day of wrath that came upon his children.
At sight of the man panting and dying there,
she slips down to enfold him, crying out;
then feels the spears, prodding her back and shoulders,
and goes bound into slavery and grief.
Piteous weeping wears away her cheeks:
but no more piteous than Odysseus' tears,
cloaked as they were, now, from the company.
Only Alkínoös, at his elbow, knew—hearing the low sob in the man's breathing—and when he knew, he spoke:

"Hear me, lords and captains of Phaiákia!
And let Demódokos touch his harp no more.
His theme has not been pleasing to all here.
During the feast, since our fine poet sang, our guest has never left off weeping. Grief seems fixed upon his heart. Break off the song!
Let everyone be easy, host and guest;
there's more decorum in a smiling banquet!
We had prepared here, on our friend's behalf, safe conduct in a ship, and gifts to cheer him, holding that any man with a grain of wit will treat a decent suppliant like a brother.
Now by the same rule, friend, you must not be secretive any longer! Come, in fairness, tell me the name you bore in that far country;
how were you known to family, and neighbors?
No man is nameless—no man, good or bad,
but gets a name in his first infancy,
none being born, unless a mother bears him!
Tell me your native land, your coast and city—sailing directions for the ships, you know—for those Phaiákian ships of ours that have no steersman, and no steering oar, divining the crew's wishes, as they do,
and knowing, as they do, the ports of call about the world. Hidden in mist or cloud they scud the open sea, with never a thought of being in distress or going down.
There is, however, something I once heard Nausíthoös, my father, say: Poseidon holds it against us that our deep sea ships are sure conveyance for all passengers.
My father said, some day one of our cutters

591–594. This prophecy is fulfilled. Poseidon, angry at the Phaiákians for taking Odysseus back to his home on Ithaka, turns the Phaiákian ship to stone as it returns, and throws a range of hills around the city.

homeward bound over the cloudy sea would be wrecked by the god, and a range of hills thrown round our city. So, in his age, he said, and let it be, or not, as the god please.
But come, now, put it for me clearly, tell me
the sea ways that you wandered, and the shores you touched; the cities, and the men therein, uncivilized, if such there were, and hostile,
and those godfearing who had kindly manners.
Tell me why you should grieve so terribly over the Argives and the fall of Troy.
That was all gods' work, weaving ruin there so it should make a song for men to come!
Some kin of yours, then, died at Ilion,
some first rate man, by marriage near to you,
next your own blood most dear?
Or some companion of congenial mind and valor? True it is, a wise friend can take a brother's place in our affection."

Book IX

Now this was the reply Odysseus made:
"Alkínoös, king and admiration of men,
how beautiful this is, to hear a minstrel gifted as yours: a god he might be, singing!
There is no boon in life more sweet, I say,
than when a summer joy holds all the realm,
and banqueters sit listening to a harper in a great hall, by rows of tables heaped with bread and roast meat, while a steward goes to dip up wine and brim your cups again.
Here is the flower of life, it seems to me!
But now you wish to know my cause for sorrow—
and thereby give me cause for more.
What shall I say first? What shall I keep until the end?
The gods have tried me in a thousand ways.
But first my name: let that be known to you,
and if I pull away from pitiless death, friendship will bind us, though my land lies far.

I am Laërtês' son, Odysseus.
Men hold me
formidable for guile in peace and war:
this fame has gone abroad to the sky's rim.
My home is on the peaked sea-mark of Ithaka

under Mount Neion's wind-blown robe of leaves, in sight of other islands—Doulikhion, Samê, wooded Zakynthos—Ithaka being most lofty in that coastal sea, and northwest, while the rest lie east and south.
A rocky isle, but good for a boy's training;
I shall not see on earth a place more dear,
though I have been detained long by Kalypso, loveliest among goddesses, who held me in her smooth caves, to be her heart's delight, as Kirkê of Aiaia, the enchantress, desired me, and detained me in her hall.
But in my heart I never gave consent.
Where shall a man find sweetness to surpass his own home and his parents? In far lands he shall not, though he find a house of gold.

What of my sailing, then, from Troy?
What of those years of rough adventure, weathered under Zeus?
The wind that carried west from Ilion brought me to Ismaros, on the far shore,
a strongpoint on the coast of the Kikonês.
I stormed that place and killed the men who fought.
Plunder we took, and we enslaved the women, to make division, equal shares to all—but on the spot I told them: 'Back, and quickly!
Out to sea again!' My men were mutinous, fools, on stores of wine. Sheep after sheep they butchered by the surf, and shambling cattle, feasting,—while fugitives went inland, running to call to arms the main force of Kikonês.
This was an army, trained to fight on horseback or, where the ground required, on foot. They came with dawn over that terrain like the leaves and blades of spring. So doom appeared to us, dark word of Zeus for us, our evil days.
My men stood up and made a fight of it—backed on the ships, with lances kept in play, from bright morning through the blaze of noon holding our beach, although so far outnumbered;
but when the sun passed toward unyoking time,
then the Akhaians, one by one, gave way.
Six benches were left empty in every ship

43. Kikonês: allies of the Trojans, but Odysseus does not even mention. this fact to excuse his piratical raid; he did not think any excuse was needed.

that evening when we pulled away from death.
And this new grief we bore with us to sea:
our precious lives we had, but not our friends.
No ship made sail next day until some shipmate had raised a cry, three times, for each poor ghost unfleshed by the Kikonês on that field.

Now Zeus the lord of cloud roused in the north a storm against the ships, and driving veils of squall moved down like night on land and sea.
The bows went plunging at the gust; sails cracked and lashed out strips in the big wind.
We saw death in that fury, dropped the yards, unshipped the oars, and pulled for the nearest lee:
then two long days and nights we lay offshore worn out and sick at heart, tasting our grief,
until a third Dawn came with ringlets shining.
Then we put up our masts, hauled sail, and rested, letting the steersmen and the breeze take over.

I might have made it safely home, that time, but as I came round Malea the current took me out to sea, and from the north a fresh gale drove me on, past Kythera.
Nine days I drifted on the teeming sea before dangerous high winds. Upon the tenth we came to the coastline of the Lotos Eaters, who live upon that flower. We landed there to take on water. All ships' companies mustered alongside for the mid-day meal.
Then I sent out two picked men and a runner to learn what race of men that land sustained.
They fell in, soon enough, with Lotos Eaters, who showed no will to do us harm, only offering the sweet Lotos to our friends—but those who ate this honeyed plant, the Lotos, never cared to report, nor to return:
they longed to stay forever, browsing on that native bloom, forgetful of their homeland.
I drove them, all three wailing, to the ships,

76–77. Dropped the yards: Took in the sail. unshipped the oars: I.e. got ready to row. lee: Shore offering shelter from the wind.

84. Malea: the southeastern tip of the Peloponnese peninsula of Greece.

89. Lotos Eaters: It is generally thought that this story contains some memory of early Greek contact with North Africa; the north wind Odysseus describes would have taken him to the area of Cyrenaica, modern Libya. Modern identifications of the lotos range from dates to hashish.

tied them down under their rowing benches, and called the rest: 'All hands aboard;
come, clear the beach and no one taste
the Lotos, or you lose your hope of home.'
Filing in to their places by the rowlocks my oarsmen dipped their long oars in the surf, and we moved out again on our sea faring.

In the next land we found were Kyklopês, giants, louts, without a law to bless them.
In ignorance leaving the fruitage of the earth in mystery to the immortal gods, they neither plow nor sow by hand, nor till the ground, though grain—wild wheat and barley—grows untended, and wine-grapes, in clusters, ripen in heaven's rain.
Kyklopês have no muster and no meeting,
no consultation or old tribal ways,
but each one dwells in his own mountain cave dealing out rough justice to wife and child, indifferent to what the others do.
Well, then:
across the wide bay from the mainland
there lies a desert island, not far out, but still not close inshore. Wild goats in hundreds breed there; and no human being comes upon the isle to startle them—no hunter of all who ever tracked with hounds through forests or had rough going over mountain trails.
The isle, unplanted and untilled, a wilderness, pastures goats alone. And this is why:
good ships like ours with cheekpaint at the bows are far beyond the Kyklopês. No shipwright toils among them, shaping and building up symmetrical trim hulls to cross the sea and visit all the seaboard towns, as men do who go and come in commerce over water.
This isle—seagoing folk would have annexed it and built their homesteads on it: all good land, fertile for every crop in season: lush well-watered meads along the shore, vines in profusion, prairie, clear for the plow, where grain would grow chin high by harvest time, and rich sub-soil.
The island cove is landlocked, so you need

110. next land: According to ancient tradition the Kyklopes lived in Sicily.
131. cheekpaint: On a Greek ship an emblem (often shown as a huge eye on vase-paintings) was painted on the bows.

no hawsers out astern, bow-stones or mooring:
run in and ride there till the day your crews
chafe to be under sail, and a fair wind blows.
You'll find good water flowing from a cavern through dusky poplars into the upper bay.
Here we made harbor. Some god guided us that night, for we could barely see our bows in the dense fog around us, and no moonlight filtered through the overcast. No look-out, nobody saw the island dead ahead,
nor even the great landward rolling billow that took us in: we found ourselves in shallows, keels grazing shore: so furled our sails and disembarked where the low ripples broke.
There on the beach we lay, and slept till morning.

When Dawn spread out her finger tips of rose
we turned out marvelling, to tour the isle, while Zeus's shy nymph daughters flushed wild goats down from the heights—a breakfast for my men.
We ran to fetch our hunting bows and long-shanked lances from the ships, and in three companies we took our shots. Heaven gave us game a-plenty:
for every one of twelve ships in my squadron nine goats fell to be shared; my lot was ten.
So there all day, until the sun went down,
we made our feast on meat galore, and wine—wine from the ship, for our supply held out, so many jars were filled at Ismaros from stores of the Kikonês that we plundered.
We gazed, too, at Kyklopês Land, so near,
we saw their smoke, heard bleating from their flocks.
But after sundown, in the gathering dusk,
we slept again above the wash of ripples.

When the young Dawn with finger tips of rose came in the east, I called my men together and made a speech to them:
'Old shipmates, friends,
the rest of you stand by; I'll make the crossing in my own ship, with my own company, and find out what the mainland natives are—
for they may be wild savages, and lawless, or hospitable and god fearing men.'

144. bow-stones: a primitive anchor made of a stone attached to a rope.
145. hawsers . . . mooring: cf. Iliad, I, 501–502 and note, p. 111.
161. nymph daughters: Mountain nymphs.

At this I went aboard, and gave the word to cast off by the stern. My oarsmen followed, filing in to their benches by the rowlocks,
and all in line dipped oars in the grey sea.

As we rowed on, and nearer to the mainland, at one end of the bay, we saw a cavern yawning above the water, screened with laurel, and many rams and goats about the place inside a sheepfold—made from slabs of stone earthfast between tall trunks of pine and rugged towering oak trees.
A prodigious man
slept in this cave alone, and took his flocks to graze afield—remote from all companions, knowing none but savage ways, a brute so huge, he seemed no man at all of those who eat good wheaten bread; but he seemed rather a shaggy mountain reared in solitude.
We beached there, and I told the crew to stand by and keep watch over the ship;
as for myself I took my twelve best fighters and went ahead. I had a goatskin full of that sweet liquor that Euanthês' son, Maron, had given me. He kept Apollo's holy grove at Ismaros; for kindness we showed him there, and showed his wife and child, he gave me seven shining golden talents perfectly formed, a solid silver winebowl, and then this liquor—twelve two-handled jars of brandy, pure and fiery. Not a slave in Maron's household knew this drink; only he, his wife and the storeroom mistress knew;
and they would put one cupful—ruby-colored,
honey-smooth—in twenty more of water,
but still the sweet scent hovered like a fume over the winebowl. No man turned away when cups of this came round.
A wineskin full
I brought along, and victuals in a bag.
for in my bones I knew some towering brute would be upon us soon—all outward power,
a wild man, ignorant of civility.

186. cast off: Release the mooring.
210. talents: Ingots of gold; the talent was a standard weight.

We climbed, then, briskly to the cave. But Kyklops had gone afield, to pasture his fat sheep, so we looked round at everything inside:
a drying rack that sagged with cheeses, pens crowded with lambs and kids, each in its class:
firstlings apart from middlings, and the 'dewdrops,'
or newborn lambkins, penned apart from both.
And vessels full of whey were brimming there—bowls of earthenware and pails for milking.
My men came pressing round me, pleading:
'Why not take these cheeses, get them stowed, come back, throw open all the pens, and make a run for it?
We'll drive the kids and lambs aboard. We say put out again on good salt water!'
Ah,
how sound that was! Yet I refused, I wished to see the caveman, what he had to offer—no pretty sight, it turned out, for my friends.
We lit a fire, burnt an offering,
and took some cheese to eat; then sat in silence around the embers, waiting. When he came he had a load of dry boughs on his shoulder to stoke his fire at suppertime. He dumped it with a great crash into that hollow cave, and we all scattered fast to the far wall.
Then over the broad cavern floor he ushered the ewes he meant to milk. He left his rams and he-goats in the yard outside, and swung high overhead a slab of solid rock to close the cave. Two dozen four-wheeled wagons, with heaving wagon teams, could not have stirred the tonnage of that rock from where he wedged it over the doorsill. Next he took his seat and milked his bleating ewes. A practiced job he made of it, giving each ewe her suckling:
thickened his milk, then, into curds and whey, sieved out the curds to drip in withy baskets, and poured the whey to stand in bowls cooling until he drank it for his supper.
When all these chores were done, he poked the fire, heaping on brushwood. In the glare he saw us.

'Strangers,' he said, 'who are you? And where from?

261. withy: Willow.

What brings you here by sea ways—a fair traffic?
Or are you wandering rogues, who cast your lives like dice, and ravage other folk by sea?'

We felt a pressure on our hearts, in dread of that deep rumble and that mighty man.
But all the same I spoke up in reply:
'We are from Troy, Akhaians, blown off course by shifting gales on the Great South Sea; homeward bound, but taking routes and ways uncommon; so the will of Zeus would have it.
We served under Agamémnon, son of Atreus—the whole world knows what city he laid waste, what armies he destroyed.
It was our luck to come here; here we stand, beholden for your help, or any gifts
you give—as custom is to honor strangers.
We would entreat you, great Sir, have a care for the gods' courtesy; Zeus will avenge the unoffending guest.'
He answered this from his brute chest, unmoved:
'You are a ninny,
or else you come from the other end of nowhere, telling me, mind the gods! We Kyklopês care not a whistle for your thundering Zeus or all the gods in bliss; we have more force by far.
I would not let you go for fear of Zeus—you or your friends—unless I had a whim to.
Tell me, where was it, now, you left your ship—around the point, or down the shore, I wonder?'

He thought he'd find out, but I saw through this,
and answered with a ready lie:
'My ship?
Poseidon Lord, who sets the earth a-tremble, broke it up on the rocks at your land's end.
A wind from seaward served him, drove us there.
We are survivors, these good men and I.'

Neither reply nor pity came from him, but in one stride he clutched at my companions and caught two in his hands like squirming puppies to beat their brains out, spattering the floor.
Then he dismembered them and made his meal, gaping and crunching like a mountain lion—

everything: innards, flesh, and marrow bones.
We cried aloud, lifting our hands to Zeus, powerless, looking on at this, appalled;
but Kyklops went on filling up his belly with manflesh and great gulps of whey, then lay down like a mast among his sheep.
My heart beat high now at the chance of action, and drawing the sharp sword from my hip I went along his flank to stab him where the midriff holds the liver. I had touched the spot when sudden fear stayed me: if I killed him we perished there as well, for we could never move his ponderous doorway slab aside.
So we were left to groan and wait for morning.

When the young Dawn with finger tips of rose lit up the world, the Kyklops built a fire and milked his handsome ewes, all in due order, putting the sucklings to the mothers. Then, his chores being all dispatched, he caught another brace of men to make his breakfast, and whisked away his great door slab to let his sheep go through—but he, behind, reset the stone as one would cap a quiver.
There was a din of whistling as the Kyklops rounded his flock to higher ground, then stillness.
And now I pondered how to hurt him worst,
if but Athena granted what I prayed for.

Here are the means I thought would serve my turn:
a club, or staff, lay there along the fold—an olive tree, felled green and left to season for Kyklops' hand. And it was like a mast a lugger of twenty oars, broad in the beam—a deep-sea-going craft—might carry:
so long, so big around, it seemed. Now I chopped out a six foot section of this pole and set it down before my men, who scraped it;
and when they had it smooth, I hewed again to make a stake with pointed end. I held this in the fire's heart and turned it, toughening it, then hid it, well back in the cavern, under one of the dung piles in profusion there.
Now came the time to toss for it: who ventured along with me? whose hand could bear to thrust and grind that spike in Kyklops' eye, when mild sleep had mastered him? As luck would have it, the men I would have chosen, won the toss—

four strong men, and I made five as captain.

At evening came the shepherd with his flock, his woolly flock. The rams as well, this time, entered the cave: by some sheep-herding whim—
or a god's bidding—none were left outside.
He hefted his great boulder into place and sat him down to milk the bleating ewes in proper order, put the lambs to suck, and swiftly ran through all his evening chores.
Then he caught two more men and feasted on them.
My moment was at hand, and I went forward holding an ivy bowl of my dark drink, looking up, saying:
'Kyklops, try some wine.
Here's liquor to wash down your scraps of men.
Taste it, and see the kind of drink we carried under our planks. I meant it for an offering if you would help us home. But you are mad, unbearable, a bloody monster! After this, will any other traveller come to see you?'

He seized and drained the bowl, and it went down so fiery and smooth he called for more:
'Give me another, thank you kindly. Tell me, how are you called? I'll make a gift will please you.
Even Kyklopês know the wine-grapes grow out of grassland and loam in heaven's rain, but here's a bit of nectar and ambrosia!'

Three bowls I brought him and he poured them down.
I saw the fuddle and flush come over him,
then I sang out in cordial tones:
'Kyklops,
you ask my honorable name? Remember the gift you promised me, and I shall tell you.
My name is Nohbdy: mother, father, and friends, everyone calls me Nohbdy.'

And he said:
'Nohbdy's my meat, then, after I eat his friends.

378. nectar and ambrosia: The drink and food of the gods.

Others come first. There's a noble gift, now.'

Even as he spoke, he reeled and tumbled backward, his great head lolling to one side; and sleep took him like any creature. Drunk, hiccuping, he dribbled streams of liquor and bits of men.

Now, by the gods, I drove my big hand spike deep in the embers, charring it again, and cheered my men along with battle talk to keep their courage up: no quitting now.
The pike of olive, green though it had been,
reddened and glowed as if about to catch.
I drew it from the coals and my four fellows gave me a hand, lugging it near the Kyklops as more than natural force nerved them; straight forward they sprinted, lifted it, and rammed it deep in his crater eye, and I leaned on it turning it as a shipwright turns a drill in planking, having men below to swing the two-handled strap that spins it in the groove.
So with our brand we bored that great eye socket while blood ran out around the red hot bar.
Eyelid and lash were seared; the pierced ball hissed broiling, and the roots popped.

In a smithy
one sees a white-hot axehead or an adze plunged and wrung in a cold tub, screeching steam—the way they make soft iron hale and hard—:
just so that eyeball hissed around the spike.
The Kyklops bellowed and the rock roared round him, and we fell back in fear. Clawing his face
he tugged the bloody spike out of his eye, threw it away, and his wild hands went groping;
then he set up a howl for Kyklopês who lived in caves on windy peaks nearby.
Some heard him; and they came by divers ways to clump around outside and call:

'What ails you,
Polyphêmos? Why do you cry so sore in the starry night? You will not let us sleep.
Sure no man's driving off your flock? No man has tricked you, ruined you?'

Out of the cave
the mammoth Polyphêmos roared in answer:
'Nohbdy, Nohbdy's tricked me, Nohbdy's ruined me!'

To this rough shout they made a sage reply;
'Ah well, if nobody has played you foul there in your lonely bed, we are no use in pain given by great Zeus. Let it be your father, Poseidon Lord, to whom you pray.'
So saying they trailed away. And I was filled with laughter to see how like a charm the name deceived them.
Now Kyklops, wheezing as the pain came on him, fumbled to wrench away the great doorstone and squatted in the breach with arms thrown wide for any silly beast or man who bolted—hoping somehow I might be such a fool.
But I kept thinking how to win the game:
death sat there huge; how could we slip away?
I drew on all my wits, and ran through tactics, reasoning as a man will for dear life,
until a trick came—and it pleased me well.
The Kyklops' rams were handsome, fat, with heavy fleeces, a dark violet.

Three abreast
I tied them silently together, twining cords of willow from the ogre's bed;
then slung a man under each middle one to ride there safely, shielded left and right.
So three sheep could convey each man. I took the woolliest ram, the choicest of the flock, and hung myself under his kinky belly, pulled up tight, with fingers twisted deep in sheepskin ringlets for an iron grip.
So, breathing hard, we waited until morning.

When Dawn spread out her finger tips of rose
the rams began to stir, moving for pasture, and peals of bleating echoed round the pens where dams with udders full called for a milking.
Blinded, and sick with pain from his head wound,
the master stroked each ram, then let it pass, but my men riding on the pectoral fleece the giant's blind hands blundering never found.
Last of them all my ram, the leader, came,

weighted by wool and me with my meditations.
The Kyklops patted him, and then he said:
'Sweet cousin ram, why lag behind the rest in the night cave? You never linger so, but graze before them all, and go afar to crop sweet grass, and take your stately way leading along the streams, until at evening you run to be the first one in the fold.
Why, now, so far behind? Can you be grieving over your Master's eye? That carrion rogue and his accurst companions burnt it out when he had conquered all my wits with wine.
Nohbdy will not get out alive, I swear.
Oh, had you brain and voice to tell where he may be now, dodging all my fury!
Bashed by this hand and bashed on this rock wall his brains would strew the floor, and I should have rest from the outrage Nohbdy worked upon me.'
He sent us into the open, then. Close by,
I dropped and rolled clear of the ram's belly, going this way and that to untie the men.
With many glances back, we rounded up his fat, stiff-legged sheep to take aboard, and drove them down to where the good ship lay.
We saw, as we came near, our fellows' faces shining; then we saw them turn to grief tallying those who had not fled from death.
I hushed them, jerking head and eyebrows up,
and in a low voice told them: 'Load this herd;
move fast, and put the ship's head toward the breakers.'
They all pitched in at loading, then embarked and struck their oars into the sea. Far out, as far off shore as shouted words would carry,
I sent a few back to the adversary:
'O Kyklops! Would you feast on my companions?
Puny, am I, in a Caveman's hands?
How do you like the beating that we gave you, you damned cannibal? Eater of guests under your roof! Zeus and the gods have paid you!'

The blind thing in his doubled fury broke a hilltop in his hands and heaved it after us.
Ahead of our black prow it struck and sank whelmed in a spuming geyser, a giant wave that washed the ship stern foremost back to shore.

I got the longest boathook out and stood fending us off, with furious nods to all to put their backs into a racing stroke—row, row, or perish. So the long oars bent kicking the foam sternward, making head until we drew away, and twice as far.
Now when I cupped my hands I heard the crew in low voices protesting:
'Godsake, Captain!
Why bait the beast again? Let him alone!'
'That tidal wave he made on the first throw all but beached us.'
'All but stove us in!'
'Give him our bearing with your trumpeting, he'll get the range and lob a boulder.'
'Aye
He'll smash our timbers and our heads together!'

I would not heed them in my glorying spirit, but let my anger flare and yelled:
'Kyklops,
if ever mortal man inquire how you were put to shame and blinded, tell him
Odysseus, raider of cities, took your eye:
Laërtês' son, whose home's on Ithaka!'

At this he gave a mighty sob and rumbled:
'Now comes the weird upon me, spoken of old.
A wizard, grand and wondrous, lived here—Télemos, a son of Eurymos; great length of days
he had in wizardry among the Kyklopês, and these things he foretold for time to come:
my great eye lost, and at Odysseus' hands.
Always I had in mind some giant, armed in giant force, would come against me here.
But this, but you—small, pitiful and twiggy—
you put me down with wine, you blinded me.
Come back, Odysseus, and I'll treat you well, praying the god of earthquake to befriend you—his son I am, for he by his avowal fathered me, and, if he will, he may

520. stove us in: Smashed the hull of the ship.

heal me of this black wound—he and no other of all the happy gods or mortal men.'

Few words I shouted in reply to him:
'If I could take your life I would and take your time away, and hurl you down to hell!
The god of earthquake could not heal you there!'

At this he stretched his hands out in his darkness toward the sky of stars, and prayed Poseidon:
'O hear me, lord, blue girdler of the islands,
if I am thine indeed, and thou art father:
grant that Odysseus, raider of cities, never see his home: Laërtês' son, I mean, who kept his hall on Ithaka. Should destiny intend that he shall see his roof again among his family in his father land, far be that day, and dark the years between.
Let him lose all companions, and return under strange sail to bitter days at home.'

In these words he prayed, and the god heard him.
Now he laid hands upon a bigger stone and wheeled around, titanic for the cast, to let it fly in the black-prowed vessel's track.
But it fell short, just aft the steering oar, and whelming seas rose giant above the stone to bear us onward toward the island.
There
as we ran in we saw the squadron waiting, the trim ships drawn up side by side, and all our troubled friends who waited, looking seaward.
We beached her, grinding keel in the soft sand,
and waded in, ourselves, on the sandy beach.
Then we unloaded all the Kyklops' flock to make division, share and share alike, only my fighters voted that my ram, the prize of all, should go to me. I slew him by the sea side and burnt his long thighbones to Zeus beyond the stormcloud, Kronos' son, who rules the world. But Zeus disdained my offering; destruction for my ships he had in store and death for those who sailed them, my companions.
Now all day long until the sun went down
we made our feast on mutton and sweet wine, till after sunset in the gathering dark we went to sleep above the wash of ripples.

When the young Dawn with finger tips of rose touched the world, I roused the men, gave orders to man the ships, cast off the mooring lines;
and filing in to sit beside the rowlocks oarsmen in line dipped oars in the grey sea.
So we moved out, sad in the vast offing, having our precious lives, but not our friends.

Book X

We made our landfall on Aiolia Island, domain of Aiolos Hippotadês, the wind king, dear to the gods who never die—an isle adrift upon the sea, ringed round with brazen ramparts on a sheer cliffside.
Twelve children had old Aiolos at home—six daughters and six lusty sons—and he gave girls to boys to be their gentle brides;
now those lords, in their parents' company, sup every day in hall—a royal feast with fumes of sacrifice and winds that pipe
'round hollow courts; and all the night they sleep on beds of filigree beside their ladies.
Here we put in, lodged in the town and palace, while Aiolos played host to me. He kept me one full month to hear the tale of Troy,
the ships and the return of the Akhaians,
all which I told him point by point in order.
When in return I asked his leave to sail and asked provisioning, he stinted nothing, adding a bull's hide sewn from neck to tail into a mighty bag, bottling storm winds;
for Zeus had long ago made Aiolos warden of winds, to rouse or calm at will.
He wedged this bag under my afterdeck, lashing the neck with shining silver wire so not a breath got through; only the west wind
he lofted for me in a quartering breeze

1. Aiolia: A moving island, the home of the king of the winds (whose name in Greek means "shifting, changeable"). It has been located by modern geographers in the Lipari Islands of the Sicilian coast. The great ancient geographer Eratosthenes was not so confident. He once said that we would know exactly where Odysseus wandered after we had traced the leatherworker who made the bag in which the winds were contained.

2. Hippotadês: Son of Hippotas, "horseman."

28. quartering breeze: A breeze blowing diagonally from the rear of the boat, highly favorable for sailing.

to take my squadron spanking home.
No luck:
the fair wind failed us when our prudence failed.

Nine days and nights we sailed without event, till on the tenth we raised our land. We neared it, and saw men building fires along the shore;
but now, being weary to the bone, I fell into deep slumber; I had worked the sheet nine days alone, and given it to no one, wishing to spill no wind on the homeward run.
But while I slept, the crew began to parley:
silver and gold, they guessed, were in that bag bestowed on me by Aiolos' great heart;
and one would glance at his benchmate and say:
'It never fails. He's welcome everywhere:
hail to the captain when he goes ashore!
He brought along so many presents, plunder out of Troy, that's it. How about ourselves—his shipmates all the way? Nigh home we are with empty hands. And who has gifts from Aiolos?
He has. I say we ought to crack that bag, there's gold and silver, plenty, in that bag!'

Temptation had its way with my companions, and they untied the bag.
Then every wind
roared into hurricane; the ships went pitching west with many cries; our land was lost.
Roused up, despairing in that gloom, I thought:
"Should I go overside for a quick finish or clench my teeth and stay among the living?'
Down in the bilge I lay, pulling my sea cloak over my head, while the rough gale blew the ships and rueful crews clear back to Aiolia.

We put ashore for water; then all hands gathered alongside for a mid-day meal.
When we had taken bread and drink, I picked one soldier, and one herald, to go with me and called again on Aiolos. I found him at meat with his young princes and his lady, but there beside the pillars, in his portico,
we sat down silent at the open door.
The sight amazed them, and they all exclaimed:

35. the sheet: The line which keeps the sail trimmed to take best advantage of the wind.

'Why back again, Odysseus?'
'What sea fiend
rose in your path?'
'Did we not launch you well for home, or for whatever land you chose?'

Out of my melancholy I replied:
'Mischief aboard and nodding at the tiller—
a damned drowse—did for me. Make good my loss, dear friends! You have the power!'
Gently I pleaded,
but they turned cold and still. Said Father Aiolos:
'Take yourself out of this island, creeping thing—no law, no wisdom, lays it on me now to help a man the blessed gods detest—out! Your voyage here was cursed by heaven!'

He drove me from the place, groan as I would,
and comfortless we went again to sea, days of it, till the men flagged at the oars—
no breeze, no help in sight, by our own folly—six indistinguishable nights and days before we raised the Laistrygonian height and far stronghold of Lamos. In that land the daybreak follows dusk, and so the shepherd homing calls to the cowherd setting out;
and he who never slept could earn two wages, tending oxen, pasturing silvery flocks, where the low night path of the sun is near the sun's path by day. Here, then, we found a curious bay with mountain walls of stone to left and right, and reaching far inland,— a narrow entrance opening from the sea where cliffs converged as though to touch and close.
All of my squadron sheltered here, inside
the cavern of this bay.
Black prow by prow
those hulls were made fast in a limpid calm without a ripple, stillness all around them.
My own black ship I chose to moor alone on the sea side, using a rock for bollard;
and climbed a rocky point to get my bearings.
No farms, no cultivated land appeared,
but puffs of smoke rose in the wilderness;

93. sun's path by day: Generally thought to be a confused reference to the short summer nights of the far north.

so I sent out two picked men and a herald to learn what race of men this land sustained.

My party found a track—a wagon road for bringing wood down from the heights to town;
and near the settlement they met a daughter of Antiphatês the Laistrygon—a stalwart young girl taking her pail to Artakía, the fountain where these people go for water.
My fellows hailed her, put their questions to her:
who might the king be? ruling over whom?
She waved her hand, showing her father's lodge, so they approached it. In its gloom they saw a woman like a mountain crag, the queen—and loathed the sight of her. But she, for greeting, called from the meeting ground her lord and master,
Antiphatês, who came to drink their blood.
He seized one man and tore him on the spot, making a meal of him; the other two leaped out of doors and ran to join the ships.
Behind, he raised the whole tribe howling, countless Laistrygonês—and more than men they seemed, gigantic when they gathered on the sky line to shoot great boulders down from slings; and hell's own crashing rose, and crying from the ships, as planks and men were smashed to bits—poor gobbets
the wildmen speared like fish and bore away.
But long before it ended in the anchorage—havoc and slaughter—I had drawn my sword and cut my own ship's cable. 'Men,' I shouted,
'man the oars and pull till your hearts break
if you would put this butchery behind!'
The oarsmen rent the sea in mortal fear and my ship spurted out of range, far out from that deep canyon where the rest were lost.
So we fared onward, and death fell behind,
and we took breath to grieve for our companions.

Our next landfall was on Aiaia, island of Kirkê, dire beauty and divine, sister of baleful Aiêtês, like him fathered by Hêlios the light of mortals on Persê, child of the Ocean stream.

We came

113. Antiphatês: The king.
145. Aiêtês: Father of Medea, heroine of Euripides' play (p. 415).
147. Ocean: The river which was thought of as encircling the world.

washed in our silent ship upon her shore,
and found a cove, a haven for the ship—some god, invisible, conned us in. We landed, to lie down in that place two days and nights,
worn out and sick at heart, tasting our grief
But when Dawn set another day a-shining
I took my spear and broadsword, and I climbed a rocky point above the ship, for sight or sound of human labor. Gazing out from that high place over a land of thicket, oaks and wide watercourses, I could see a smoke wisp from the woodland hall of Kirkê.
So I took counsel with myself: should I go inland scouting out that reddish smoke?
No: better not, I thought, but first return to waterside and ship, and give the men breakfast before I sent them to explore.
Now as I went down quite alone, and came a bowshot from the ship, some god's compassion set a big buck in motion to cross my path—a stag with noble antlers, pacing down from pasture in the woods to the riverside, as long thirst and the power of sun constrained him.
He started from the bush and wheeled: I hit him square in the spine midway along his back and the bronze point broke through it. In the dust he fell and whinnied as life bled away.
I set one foot against him, pulling hard to wrench my weapon from the wound, then left it, butt-end on the ground. I plucked some withies and twined a double strand into a rope—enough to tie the hocks of my huge trophy;
then pickaback I lugged him to the ship, leaning on my long spearshaft; I could not haul that mighty carcass on one shoulder.
Beside the ship I let him drop, and spoke gently and low to each man standing near:
'Come, friends, though hard beset, we'll not go down into the House of Death before our time.
As long as food and drink remain aboard
let us rely on it, not die of hunger.'

At this those faces, cloaked in desolation upon the waste sea beach, were bared;
their eyes turned toward me and the mighty trophy,

150. conned: Piloted.

lighting, foreseeing pleasure, one by one.
So hands were washed to take what heaven sent us.
And all that day until the sun went down
we had our fill of venison and wine, till after sunset in the gathering dusk
we slept at last above the line of breakers.
When the young Dawn with finger tips of rose made heaven bright, I called them round and said:
'Shipmates, companions in disastrous time,
O my dear friends, where Dawn lies, and the West, and where the great Sun, light of men, may go under the earth by night, and where he rises—of these things we know nothing. Do we know any least thing to serve us now? I wonder.
All that I saw when I went up the rock was one more island in the boundless main,
a low landscape, covered with woods and scrub,
and puffs of smoke ascending in mid-forest.'

They were all silent, but their hearts contracted, remembering Antiphatês the Laistrygon and that prodigious cannibal, the Kyklops.
They cried out, and the salt tears wet their eyes.
But seeing our time for action lost in weeping,
I mustered those Akhaians under arms, counting them off in two platoons, myself and my godlike Eurýlokhos commanding.
We shook lots in a soldier's dogskin cap and his came bounding out—valiant Eurýlokhos!—
So off he went, with twenty-two companions weeping, as mine wept, too, who stayed behind.

In the wild wood they found an open glade, around a smooth stone house—the hall of Kirkê—and wolves and mountain lions lay there, mild in her soft spell, fed on her drug of evil.
None would attack—oh, it was strange, I tell you—but switching their long tails they faced our men like hounds, who look up when their master comes with tidbits for them—as he will—from table.
Humbly those wolves and lions with mighty paws
fawned on our men—who met their yellow eyes

201. where Dawn lies, etc.: In view of the immediately preceding lines, this can hardly be taken literally. It is possibly a sailor's metaphorical way of saying, "we don't know where we are."

217. Eurýlokhos: Odysseus' second in command.

and feared them.
In the entrance way they stayed to listen there: inside her quiet house they heard the goddess Kirkê.
Low she sang
in her beguiling voice, while on her loom she wove ambrosial fabric sheer and bright, by that craft known to the goddesses of heaven.
No one would speak, until Politês—most faithful and likable of my officers, said:
'Dear friends, no need for stealth: here's a young weaver singing a pretty song to set the air
a-tingle on these lawns and paven courts.
Goddess she is, or lady. Shall we greet her?'

So reassured, they all cried out together, and she came swiftly to the shining doors to call them in. All but Eurýlokhos—who feared a snare—the innocents went after her.
On thrones she seated them, and lounging chairs,
while she prepared a meal of cheese and barley and amber honey mixed with Pramnian wine, adding her own vile pinch, to make them lose desire or thought of our dear father land.
Scarce had they drunk when she flew after them with her long stick and shut them in a pigsty—bodies, voices, heads, and bristles, all swinish now, though minds were still unchanged.
So, squealing, in they went. And Kirkê tossed them acorns, mast, and cornel berries—fodder for hogs who rut and slumber on the earth.

Down to the ship Eurýlokhos came running to cry alarm, foul magic doomed his men!
But working with dry lips to speak a word he could not, being so shaken; blinding tears welled in his eyes; foreboding filled his heart.
When we were frantic questioning him, at last we heard the tale: our friends were gone. Said he:
'We went up through the oak scrub where you sent us, Odysseus, glory of commanders, until we found a palace in a glade, a marble house on open ground, and someone singing before her loom a chill, sweet song—

236. ambrosial: Divine, from ambrosia, the food of the gods.
250. Pramnian wine: Evidently a very strong wine. (We don't know where Pramnos was.)
258. mast: Nuts.

goddess or girl, we could not tell. They hailed her,
and then she stepped through shining doors and said,
"Come, come in!" Like sheep they followed her,
but I saw cruel deceit, and stayed behind.
Then all our fellows vanished. Not a sound, and nothing stirred, although I watched for hours.'

When I heard this I slung my silver-hilted broadsword on, and shouldered my long bow, and said, 'Come, take me back the way you came.'
But he put both his hands around my knees in desperate woe, and said in supplication:
'Not back there, O my lord! Oh, leave me here!
You, even you, cannot return, I know it,
I know you cannot bring away our shipmates;
better make sail with these men, quickly too,
and save ourselves from horror while we may.'

But I replied:
'By heaven, Eurýlokhos, rest here then; take food and wine;
stay in the black hull's shelter. Let me go,
as I see nothing for it but to go.'

I turned and left him, left the shore and ship, and went up through the woodland hushed and shady to find the subtle witch in her long hall.
But Hermês met me, with his golden wand, barring the way—a boy whose lip was downy in the first bloom of manhood, so he seemed.
He took my hand and spoke as though he knew me:
'Why take the inland path alone, poor seafarer, by hill and dale upon this island all unknown?
Your friends are locked in Kirkê's pale;
all are become like swine to see;
and if you go to set them free you go to stay, and never more make sail for your old home upon Thaki.
But I can tell you what to do to come unchanged from Kirkê's power and disenthrall your fighting crew:

298ff. The four rhymed stanzas which follow are a translator's license; in the original there is no change of meter and no rhyme.
302. pale: Pen.
306. Thaki: Ithaka.

take with you to her bower
as amulet, this plant I know—it will defeat her horrid show, so pure and potent is the flower;
no mortal herb was ever so.

Your cup with numbing drops of night and evil, stilled of all remorse, she will infuse to charm your sight;
but this great herb with holy force will keep your mind and senses clear:
when she turns cruel, coming near with her long stick to whip you out of doors, then let your cutting blade appear,

Let instant death upon it shine, and she will cower and yield her bed—
a pleasure you must not decline, so may her lust and fear bestead
you and your friends, and break her spell;
but make her swear by heaven and hell
no witches' tricks, or else, your harness shed, you'll be unmanned by her as well.'

He bent down glittering for the magic plant and pulled it up, black root and milky flower—a molü in the language of the gods—fatigue and pain for mortals to uproot;
but gods do this, and everything, with ease.

Then toward Olympos through the island trees Hermês departed, and I sought out Kirkê, my heart high with excitement, beating hard.
Before her mansion in the porch I stood to call her, all being still. Quick as a cat she opened her bright doors and sighed a welcome;
then I strode after her with heavy heart down the long hall, and took the chair she gave me, silver-studded, intricately carved, made with a low footrest. The lady Kirkê mixed me a golden cup of honeyed wine, adding in mischief her unholy drug.
I drank, and the drink failed. But she came forward aiming a stroke with her long stick, and whispered:

326. bestead: Help.

'Down in the sty and snore among the rest!'

Without a word, I drew my sharpened sword and in one bound held it against her throat.
She cried out, then slid under to take my knees, catching her breath to say, in her distress:
'What champion, of what country, can you be?
Where are your kinsmen and your city?
Are you not sluggish with my wine? Ah, wonder!
Never a mortal man that drank this cup
but when it passed his lips he had succumbed.
Hale must your heart be and your tempered will.
Odysseus then you are, O great contender, of whom the glittering god with golden wand spoke to me ever, and foretold
the black swift ship would carry you from Troy.
Put up your weapon in the sheath. We two shall mingle and make love upon our bed.
So mutual trust may come of play and love.'

To this I said:
'Kirkê, am I a boy,
that you should make me soft and doting now?
Here in this house you turned my men to swine;
now it is I myself you hold, enticing into your chamber, to your dangerous bed, to take my manhood when you have me stripped.
I mount no bed of love with you upon it.
Or swear me first a great oath, if I do, you'll work no more enchantment to my harm.'
She swore at once, outright, as I demanded, and after she had sworn, and bound herself,
I entered Kirkê's flawless bed of love.

Presently in the hall her maids were busy,
the nymphs who waited upon Kirkê: four,
whose cradles were in fountains, under boughs,
or in the glassy seaward-gliding streams.
One came with richly colored rugs to throw on seat and chairback, over linen covers;
a second pulled the tables out, all silver,
and loaded them with baskets all of gold;
a third mixed wine as tawny-mild as honey in a bright bowl, and set out golden cups.

362. god with the golden wand: Hermês.

The fourth came bearing water, and lit a blaze under a cauldron. By and by it bubbled, and when the dazzling brazen vessel seethed
she filled a bathtub to my waist, and bathed me, pouring a soothing blend on head and shoulders, warming the soreness of my joints away.
When she had done, and smoothed me with sweet oil,
she put a tunic and a cloak around me and took me to a silver-studded chair with footrest, all elaborately carven.
Now came a maid to tip a golden jug of water into a silver finger bowl, and draw a polished table to my side.
The larder mistress brought her tray of loaves with many savory slices, and she gave the best, to tempt me. But no pleasure came;
I huddled with my mind elsewhere, oppressed.

Kirkê regarded me, as there I sat disconsolate, and never touched a crust.
Then she stood over me and chided me:
'Why sit at table mute, Odysseus?
Are you mistrustful of my bread and drink?
Can it be treachery that you fear again,
after the gods' great oath I swore for you?'
I turned to her at once, and said:
'Kirkê,
where is the captain who could bear to touch this banquet, in my place? A decent man would see his company before him first.
Put heart in me to eat and drink—you may,
by freeing my companions. I must see them.'

But Kirkê had already turned away.
Her long staff in her hand, she left the hall and opened up the sty. I saw her enter, driving those men turned swine to stand before me.
She stroked them, each in turn, with some new chrism;
and then, behold! their bristles fell away,
the coarse pelt grown upon them by her drug melted away, and they were men again, younger, more handsome, taller than before.
Their eyes upon me, each one took my hands,
and wild regret and longing pierced them through,
so the room rang with sobs, and even Kirkê

424. chrism: Ointment.

pitied that transformation. Exquisite the goddess looked as she stood near me, saying:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier,
go to the sea beach and sea-breasting ship;
drag it ashore, full length upon the land;
stow gear and stores in rock-holes under cover;
return; be quick; bring all your dear companions.'

Now, being a man, I could not help consenting.
So I went down to the sea beach and the ship,
where I found all my other men on board,
weeping, in despair along the benches.
Sometimes in farmyards when the cows return well fed from pasture to the barn, one sees the pens give way before the calves in tumult, breaking through to cluster about their mothers, bumping together, bawling. Just that way my crew poured round me when they saw me come—their faces wet with tears as if they saw their homeland, and the crags of Ithaka, even the very town where they were born.
And weeping still they all cried out in greeting:
'Prince, what joy this is, your safe return!
Now Ithaka seems here, and we in Ithaka!
But tell us now, what death befell our friends?'

And, speaking gently, I replied:
'First we must get the ship high on the shingle, and stow our gear and stores in clefts of rock for cover. Then come follow me, to see your shipmates in the magic house of Kirkê eating and drinking, endlessly regaled.'

They turned back, as commanded, to this work;
only one lagged, and tried to hold the others;
Eurýlokhos it was, who blurted out:
'Where now, poor remnants? is it devil's work you long for? Will you go to Kirkê's hall?
Swine, wolves, and lions she will make us all,
beasts of her courtyard, bound by her enchantment.
Remember those the Kyklops held, remember shipmates who made that visit with Odysseus!
The daring man! They died for his foolishness!'

When I heard this I had a mind to draw the blade that swung against my side and chop him, bowling his head upon the ground—kinsman or no kinsman, close to me though he was.
But others came between, saying, to stop me,
'Prince, we can leave him, if you say the word;
let him stay here on guard. As for ourselves, show us the way to Kirkê's magic hall.'

So all turned inland, leaving shore and ship, and Eurýlokhos—he, too, came on behind, fearing the rough edge of my tongue. Meanwhile at Kirkê's hands the rest were gently bathed, anointed with sweet oil, and dressed afresh
in tunics and new cloaks with fleecy linings.
We found them all at supper when we came.
But greeting their old friends once more, the crew could not hold back their tears; and now again the rooms rang with sobs. Then Kirkê, loveliest of all immortals, came to counsel me:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old.
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier, enough of weeping fits. I know—I, too—what you endured upon the inhuman sea, what odds you met on land from hostile men.
Remain with me, and share my meat and wine;
restore behind your ribs those gallant hearts that served you in the old days, when you sailed from stony Ithaka. Now parched and spent, your cruel wandering is all you think of,
never of joy, after so many blows.'

As we were men we could not help consenting.
So day by day we lingered, feasting long on roasts and wine, until a year grew fat.
But when the passing months and wheeling seasons brought the long summery days, the pause of summer, my shipmates one day summoned me and said:
'Captain, shake off this trance, and think of home—
if home indeed awaits us, if we shall ever see your own well-timbered hall on Ithaka.'

They made me feel a pang, and I agreed.
That day, and all day long, from dawn to sundown,

475. kinsman: Eurýlokhos was related to Odysseus by marriage.

we feasted on roast meat and ruddy wine, and after sunset when the dusk came on my men slept in the shadowy hall, but I went through the dark to Kirkê's flawless bed and took the goddess' knees in supplication, urging, as she bent to hear:
'O Kirkê,
now you must keep your promise; it is time.
Help me make sail for home. Day after day my longing quickens, and my company give me no peace, but wear my heart away pleading when you are not at hand to hear.'

The loveliest of goddesses replied:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier,
you shall not stay here longer against your will;
but home you may not go unless you take a strange way round and come to the cold homes of Death and pale Perséphonê.
You shall hear prophecy from the rapt shade of blind Teirêsias of Thebes, forever charged with reason even among the dead;
to him alone, of all the flitting ghosts, Perséphonê has given a mind undarkened.'

At this I felt a weight like stone within me, and, moaning, pressed my length against the bed,
with no desire to see the daylight more.
But when I had wept and tossed and had my fill of this despair, at last I answered her:
'Kirkê, who pilots me upon this journey?
No man has ever sailed to the land of Death.'

That loveliest of goddesses replied:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master of land ways and sea ways,
feel no dismay because you lack a pilot;
only set up your mast and haul your canvas to the fresh blowing North; sit down and steer, and hold that wind, even to the bourne of Ocean,
Perséphonê's deserted strand and grove,

531. Perséphonê: Queen of the underworld.
533. Teirêsias: The famous seer; cf. Sophocles, Oedipus Tyrannus, p. 349.
550. bourne: Frontier.

dusky with poplars and the drooping willow.
Run through the tide-rip, bring your ship to shore, land there, and find the crumbling homes of Death.
Here, toward the Sorrowing Water, run the streams of Wailing, out of Styx, and quenchless Burning—torrents that join in thunder at the Rock.
Here then, great soldier, setting foot obey me:
dig a well shaft a forearm square; pour out
libations round it to the unnumbered dead:
sweet milk and honey, then sweet wine, and last clear water, scattering handfulls of white barley.
Pray now, with all your heart, to the faint dead;
swear you will sacrifice your finest heifer,
at home in Ithaka, and burn for them her tenderest parts in sacrifice; and vow to the lord Teirêsias, apart from all,
a black lamb, handsomest of all your flock—
thus to appease the nations of the dead.
Then slash a black ewe's throat, and a black ram, facing the gloom of Erebos; but turn your head away toward Ocean. You shall see, now souls of the buried dead in shadowy hosts, and now you must call out to your companions to flay those sheep the bronze knife has cut down, for offerings, burnt flesh to those below,
to sovereign Death and pale Perséphonê.
Meanwhile draw sword from hip, crouch down, ward off
the surging phantoms from the bloody pit
until you know the presence of Teirêsias.
He will come soon, great captain; be it he who gives you course and distance for your sailing homeward across the cold fish-breeding sea.'

As the goddess ended, Dawn came stitched in gold.
Now Kirkê dressed me in my shirt and cloak, put on a gown of subtle tissue, silvery, then wound a golden belt about her waist and veiled her head in linen, while I went through the hall to rouse my crew.
I bent above each one, and gently said:
'Wake from your sleep; no more sweet slumber. Come,
we sail: the Lady Kirkê so ordains it.'

555–556. Sorrowing Water . . . Burning: Translations of the Greek names for the rivers of the underworld: Acheron, Cocytus, and Pyriphlegethon. Styx means "hateful river."

577. Erebos: The darkest region of the underworld, usually imagined as below the underworld itself but here to the west.

They were soon up, and ready at that word;
but I was not to take my men unharmed from this place, even from this. Among them all the youngest was Elpênor—no mainstay in a fight nor very clever—and this one, having climbed on Kirkê's roof to taste the cool night, fell asleep with wine.
Waked by our morning voices, and the tramp of men below, he started up, but missed his footing on the long steep backward ladder and fell that height headlong. The blow smashed the nape cord, and his ghost fled to the dark.
But I was outside, walking with the rest,
saying:
'Homeward you think we must be sailing to our own land; no, elsewhere is the voyage Kirkê has laid upon me. We must go to the cold homes of Death and pale Perséphonê
to hear Teirêsias tell of time to come.'

They felt so stricken, upon hearing this,
they sat down wailing loud, and tore their hair.
But nothing came of giving way to grief.
Down to the shore and ship at last we went,
bowed with anguish, cheeks all wet with tears,
to find that Kirkê had been there before us and tied nearby a black ewe and a ram:
she had gone by like air.
For who could see the passage of a goddess unless she wished his mortal eyes aware?

Book XI

We bore down on the ship at the sea's edge and launched her on the salt immortal sea, stepping our mast and spar in the black ship;
embarked the ram and ewe and went aboard
in tears, with bitter and sore dread upon us.
But now a breeze came up for us astern—
a canvas-bellying landbreeze, hale shipmate sent by the singing nymph with sun-bright hair;
so we made fast the braces, took our thwarts,
and let the wind and steersman work the ship

598. roof: A flat roof, and the coolest place to sleep.

3. stepping: Putting up.

9. braces: Lines running to the top of the mast to keep it upright. thwarts: Seats.

with full sail spread all day above our coursing, till the sun dipped, and all the ways grew dark upon the fathomless unresting sea.
By night
our ship ran onward toward the Ocean's bourne,
the realm and region of the Men of Winter, hidden in mist and cloud. Never the flaming eye of Hêlios lights on those men at morning, when he climbs the sky of stars, nor in descending earthward out of heaven;
ruinous night being rove over those wretches.
We made the land, put ram and ewe ashore, and took our way along the Ocean stream to find the place foretold for us by Kirkê.
There Perimêdês and Eurýlokhos pinioned the sacred beasts. With my drawn blade
I spaded up the votive pit, and poured libations round it to the unnumbered dead:
sweet milk and honey, then sweet wine, and last clear water; and I scattered barley down.
Then I addressed the blurred and breathless dead, vowing to slaughter my best heifer for them before she calved, at home in Ithaka, and burn the choice bits on the altar fire;
as for Teirêsias, I swore to sacrifice
a black lamb, handsomest of all our flock.
Thus to assuage the nations of the dead
I pledged these rites, then slashed the lamb and ewe, letting their black blood stream into the wellpit.
Now the souls gathered, stirring out of Erebos, brides and young men, and men grown old in pain,
and tender girls whose hearts were new to grief;
many were there, too, torn by brazen lanceheads, battle-slain, bearing still their bloody gear.
From every side they came and sought the pit with rustling cries; and I grew sick with fear.
But presently I gave command to my officers to flay those sheep the bronze cut down, and make burnt offerings of flesh to the gods below—to sovereign Death, to pale Perséphonê.
Meanwhile I crouched with my drawn sword to keep the surging phantoms from the bloody pit
till I should know the presence of Teirêsias.

15. Men of Winter: Although Homer usually places Hades below the earth, here he puts it across a great expanse of sea, apparently in the far north.

One shade came first—Elpênor, of our company, who lay unburied still on the wide earth
as we had left him—dead in Kirkê's hall, untouched, unmourned, when other cares compelled us.
Now when I saw him there I wept for pity and called out to him:
'How is this, Elpênor,
how could you journey to the western gloom swifter afoot than I in the black lugger?'

He sighed, and answered:
'Son of great Laërtês,
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier,
bad luck shadowed me, and no kindly power;
ignoble death I drank with so much wine.
I slept on Kirkê's roof, then could not see the long steep backward ladder, coming down, and fell that height. My neck bone, buckled under, snapped, and my spirit found this well of dark.
Now hear the grace I pray for, in the name of those back in the world, not here—your wife and father, he who gave you bread in childhood, and your own child, your only son, Telémakhos, long ago left at home.
When you make sail
and put these lodgings of dim Death behind, you will moor ship, I know, upon Aiaia Island;
there, O my lord, remember me, I pray,
do not abandon me unwept, unburied,
to tempt the gods' wrath, while you sail for home;
but fire my corpse, and all the gear I had,
and build a cairn for me above the breakers—an unknown sailor's mark for men to come.
Heap up the mound there and implant upon it the oar I pulled in life with my companions.'

He ceased, and I replied:
'Unhappy spirit,
I promise you the barrow and the burial.'

So we conversed, and grimly, at a distance, with my long sword between, guarding the blood,
while the faint image of the lad spoke on.
Now came the soul of Antikleía, dead,
my mother, daughter of Autólykos, dead now, though living still when I took ship

60. lugger: Small sailing boat.
80. cairn: Rounded heap of stones, built as a memorial.

for holy Troy. Seeing this ghost I grieved, but held her off, through pang on pang of tears,
till I should know the presence of Teirêsias.
Soon from the dark that prince of Thebes came forward bearing a golden staff; and he addressed me:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master of land ways and sea ways,
why leave the blazing sun, O man of woe,
to see the cold dead and the joyless region?
Stand clear, put up your sword;
let me but taste of blood, I shall speak true.'

At this I stepped aside, and in the scabbard let my long sword ring home to the pommel silver, as he bent down to the sombre blood. Then spoke the prince of those with gift of speech:
'Great captain,
a fair wind and the honey lights of home are all you seek. But anguish lies ahead;
the god who thunders on the land prepares it,
not to be shaken from your track, implacable,
in rancor for the son whose eye you blinded.
One narrow strait may take you through his blows:
denial of yourself, restraint of shipmates.
When you make landfall on Thrinakia first and quit the violet sea, dark on the land you'll find the grazing herds of Hêlios by whom all things are seen, all speech is known.
Avoid those kine, hold fast to your intent,
and hard seafaring brings you all to Ithaka.
But if you raid the beeves, I see destruction for ship and crew. Though you survive alone, bereft of all companions, lost for years, under strange sail shall you come home, to find your own house filled with trouble: insolent men eating your livestock as they court your lady.
Aye, you shall make those men atone in blood!

114ff.: Teirêsias here predicts the future of Odysseus. Like many Greek prophecies, it contains alternatives. The second (l. 120ff.) is what happens. In Book XII (not in our selection) Odysseus and his crew land on Thrinakia (Sicily), and while Odysseus goes off to explore, his crew kill and eat the cattle of the Sun-god Hêlios. As a result the ship is wrecked when they put to sea again. Odysseus is the only survivor and is cast up on the island of Kalypso, where he is detained for seven years before he makes his way to the land of the Phaiákians. From there he reaches Ithaka and after great trials kills the suitors who besiege his wife and waste his wealth. The journey inland to find a people who have never seen the sea (and so mistake an oar for a winnowing-fan —l. 136) does not take place within the Odyssey itself.

But after you have dealt out death—in open combat or by stealth—to all the suitors, go overland on foot, and take an oar, until one day you come where men have lived with meat unsalted, never known the sea, nor seen seagoing ships, with crimson bows and oars that fledge light hulls for dipping flight.
The spot will soon be plain to you, and I can tell you how: some passerby will say,
"What winnowing fan is that upon your shoulder?"
Halt, and implant your smooth oar in the turf and make fair sacrifice to Lord Poseidon:
a ram, a bull, a great buck boar; turn back,
and carry out pure hekatombs at home to all wide heaven's lords, the undying gods, to each in order. Then a seaborne death soft as this hand of mist will come upon you when you are wearied out with rich old age,
your country folk in blessed peace around you.
And all this shall be just as I foretell.'

When he had done, I said at once,
'Teirêsias,
my life runs on then as the gods have spun it.
But come, now, tell me this; make this thing clear:
I see my mother's ghost among the dead sitting in silence near the blood. Not once has she glanced this way toward her son, nor spoken.
Tell me, my lord,
may she in some way come to know my presence?'

To this he answered:
'I shall make it clear in a few words and simply. Any dead man whom you allow to enter where the blood is will speak to you, and speak the truth; but those deprived will grow remote again and fade.'
When he had prophesied, Teirêsias' shade retired lordly to the halls of Death;
but I stood fast until my mother stirred, moving to sip the black blood; then she knew me and called out sorrowfully to me:
'Child,
how could you cross alive into this gloom

140. hekatombs: Sacrifices of a hundred head of cattle.

at the world's end?—No sight for living eyes;
great currents run between, desolate waters,
the Ocean first, where no man goes a journey without ship's timber under him.
Say, now,
is it from Troy, still wandering, after years,
that you come here with ship and company?
Have you not gone at all to Ithaka?
Have you not seen your lady in your hall?'

She put these questions, and I answered her:
'Mother, I came here, driven to the land of death in want of prophecy from Teirêsias' shade;
nor have I yet coasted Akhaia's hills nor touched my own land, but have had hard roving since first I joined Lord Agamémnon's host by sea for Ilion, the wild horse country, to fight the men of Troy.
But come now, tell me this, and tell me clearly,
what was the bane that pinned you down in Death?
Some ravaging long illness, or mild arrows
a-flying down one day from Artemis?
Tell me of Father, tell me of the son
I left behind me; have they still my place, my honors, or have other men assumed them?
Do they not say that I shall come no more?
And tell me of my wife: how runs her thought,
still with her child, still keeping our domains, or bride again to the best of the Akhaians?'

To this my noble mother quickly answered:
'Still with her child indeed she is, poor heart, still in your palace hall. Forlorn her nights and days go by, her life used up in weeping.
But no man takes your honored place. Telémakhos has care of all your garden plots and fields, and holds the public honor of a magistrate, feasting and being feasted. But your father is country bound and comes to town no more.
He owns no bedding, rugs, or fleecy mantles,
but lies down, winter nights, among the slaves, rolled in old cloaks for cover, near the embers
Or when the heat comes at the end of summer,
the fallen leaves, all round his vineyard plot,

184–185. arrows . . . from Artemis: death for women. A formula for mysterious but painless heaped into windrows, make his lowly bed.

He lies now even so, with aching heart,
and longs for your return, while age comes on him.
So I, too, pined away, so doom befell me, not that the keen-eyed huntress with her shafts had marked me down and shot to kill me; not that illness overtook me—no true illness wasting the body to undo the spirit;
only my loneliness for you, Odysseus, for your kind heart and counsel, gentle Odysseus, took my own life away.'

I bit my lip, rising perplexed, with longing to embrace her,
and tried three times, putting my arms around her,
but she went sifting through my hands, impalpable
as shadows are, and wavering like a dream.
Now this embittered all the pain I bore,
and I cried in the darkness:

'O my mother,
will you not stay, be still, here in my arms,
may we not, in this place of Death, as well, hold one another, touch with love, and taste
salt tears' relief, the twinge of welling tears?
Or is this all hallucination, sent against me by the iron queen, Perséphonê, to make me groan again?'

My noble mother answered quickly:

'O my child—alas,
most sorely tried of men—great Zeus's daughter,
Perséphonê, knits no illusion for you.
All mortals meet this judgment when they die.
No flesh and bone are here, none bound by sinew, since the bright-hearted pyre consumed them down—
the white bones long exanimate—to ash;
dreamlike the soul flies, insubstantial.
You must crave sunlight soon.
Note all things strange seen here, to tell your lady in after days.'

So went our talk; then other shadows came, ladies in company, sent by Perséphonê—consorts or daughters of illustrious men—

237. exanimate: Lifeless.

crowding about the black blood.
I took thought how best to separate and question them, and saw no help for it, but drew once more the long bright edge of broadsword from my hip, that none should sip the blood in company but one by one, in order; so it fell that each declared her lineage and name.

Here was great loveliness of ghosts! I saw before them all, that princess of great ladies, Tyro, Salmoneus' daughter, as she told me,
and queen to Krêtheus, a son of Aiolos.
She had gone daft for the river Enipeus, most graceful of all running streams, and ranged all day by Enipeus' limpid side, whose form the foaming girdler of the islands,
the god who makes earth tremble, took and so lay down with her where he went flooding seaward, their bower a purple billow, arching round to hide them in a sea-vale, god and lady.
Now when his pleasure was complete, the god spoke to her softly, holding fast her hand:
'Dear mortal, go in joy! At the turn of seasons, winter to summer, you shall bear me sons;
no lovemaking of gods can be in vain.
Nurse our sweet children tenderly, and rear them.
Home with you now, and hold your tongue, and tell no one your lover's name—though I am yours, Poseidon, lord of surf that makes earth tremble.'

He plunged away into the deep sea swell, and she grew big with Pelias and Neleus, powerful vassals, in their time, of Zeus.
Pelias lived on broad Iolkos seaboard rich in flocks, and Neleus at Pylos.
As for the sons borne by that queen of women to Krêtheus, their names were Aison, Pherês, and Amytháon, expert charioteer.
Next after her I saw Antiopê,

251. loveliness of ghosts: There follows a "catalogue of women," a list of famous and beautiful women of former times.

253. Tyro: A queen of Thessaly.

255. Enipeus: A river of Thessaly. Tyro had fallen in love with the river-god; Poseidon, the "god who makes earth tremble," assumed his shape.

273. Neleus: Father of Nestor of Pylos. Pelias: King of Iolcus, who sent Jason on the quest for the golden fleece.

278. Alison: Father of Jason. Pherês: King of Thessaly, father of Admetus.

279. Amytháon: Father of Melampos. (See line 319 and note.)

daughter of Ásopos. She too could boast a god for lover, having lain with Zeus and borne two sons to him: Amphion and Zêthos, who founded Thebes, the upper city, and built the ancient citadel. They sheltered no life upon that plain, for all their power, without a fortress wall.
And next I saw Amphitrion's true wife, Alkmênê, mother, as all men know, of lionish Heraklês, conceived when she lay close in Zeus's arms;
and Megarê, high-hearted Kreon's daughter, wife of Amphitrion's unwearying son.

I saw the mother of Oidipous, Epikastê, whose great unwitting deed it was to marry her own son. He took that prize from a slain father; presently the gods brought all to light that made the famous story.
But by their fearsome wills he kept his throne in dearest Thebes, all through his evil days, while she descended to the place of Death, god of the locked and iron door. Steep down from a high rafter, throttled in her noose, she swung, carried away by pain, and left him endless agony from a mother's Furies.

And I saw Khloris, that most lovely lady, whom for her beauty in the olden time
Neleus wooed with countless gifts, and married.
She was the youngest daughter of Amphion, son of Iasos. In those days he held power at Orkhómenos, over the Minyai.
At Pylos then as queen she bore her children—
Nestor, Khromios, Periklýmenos, and Pêro, too, who turned the heads of men with her magnificence. A host of princes from nearby lands came courting her; but Neleus would hear of no one, not unless the suitor could drive the steers of giant Iphiklos from Phylakê—longhorns, broad in the brow,

281. Asopos: A river in Boeotia, the territory of Thebes.

291. Kreon: Not the same Kreon who appears in Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannus and Antigone.

292. unwearying son: Herakles.

293. Epikastê: Usually known as Jocasta.

309. he: Amphion (not the same Amphion who founded Thebes, l. 284).

310. Orkhómenos: One of the two great cities of Boeotia, the region north of Athens; Thebes was the other. Minyai: The original inhabitants of Boeotia.

317. Iphiklos: Brother of Herakles.

318. Phylakê: In Thessaly, northern Greece.

so fierce that one man only, a diviner, offered to round them up. But bitter fate saw him bound hand and foot by savage herdsmen.

Then days and months grew full and waned, the year went wheeling round, the seasons came again, before at last the power of Iphiklos, relenting, freed the prisoner, who foretold all things to him. So Zeus's will was done.

And I saw Lêda, wife of Tyndareus, upon whom Tyndareus had sired twins indomitable: Kastor, tamer of horses, and Polydeukês, best in the boxing ring.
Those two live still, though life-creating earth embraces them: even in the underworld honored as gods by Zeus, each day in turn one comes alive, the other dies again.

Then after Lêda to my vision came the wife of Aloeus, Iphimedeia, proud that she once had held the flowing sea and borne him sons, thunderers for a day, the world-renowned Otos and Ephialtês.
Never were men on such a scale bred on the plowlands and the grainlands, never so magnificent any, after Orion.
At nine years old they towered nine fathoms tall, nine cubits in the shoulders, and they promised furor upon Olympos, heaven broken by battle cries, the day they met the gods in arms.
With Ossa's
mountain peak they meant to crown Olympos and over Ossa Pelion's forest pile for footholds up the sky. As giants grown they might have done it, but the bright son of Zeus by Lêto of the smooth braid shot them down while they were boys unbearded; no dark curls clustered yet from temples to the chin.

319. a diviner: Named Melampos.

327. Lêda: She bore Helen to Zeus; to her husband Tyndareus, she bore twin sons, Kastor and Polydeuces, and Klytaimnéstra, who was to be the wife of Agamémnon.

333. each day in turn: They shared, as it were, one immortality between them.

337. flowing sea: Poseidon.

342. Orion: The hunter who was, according to later legend, transformed into the constellation which still bears his name; in Homer he is in the underworld after his death (see l. 643*ff*.).

343. nine fathoms: 54 feet.

344. nine cubits: 14 feet or more.

346-347. Ossa's mountain peak: Ossa and Pelion are mountains near Olympus in Thessaly.

350. son of Zeus: Apollo.

Then I saw Phaidra, Prokris; and Ariadnê, daughter of Minos, the grim king. Theseus took her aboard with him from Krete for the terraced land of ancient Athens; but he had no joy of her.
Artemis killed her on the Isle of Dia at a word from Dionysos.
Maira, then,
and Klymênê, and that detested queen,
Eriphylê, who betrayed her lord for gold . . .
but how name all the women I beheld there, daughters and wives of kings? The starry night wanes long before I close.
Here, or aboard ship,
amid the crew, the hour for sleep has come.
Our sailing is the gods' affair and yours."

Then he fell silent. Down the shadowy hall the enchanted banqueters were still. Only the queen with ivory pale arms, Arêtê, spoke, saying to all the silent men:
"Phaiákians,
how does he stand, now, in your eyes, this captain,
the look and bulk of him, the inward poise?
He is my guest, but each one shares that honor.
Be in no haste to send him on his way or scant your bounty in his need. Remember how rich, by heaven's will, your possessions are."

Then Ekhenêos, the old soldier, eldest of all Phaiákians, added his word:
"Friends, here was nothing but our own thought spoken,
the mark hit square. Our duties to her majesty.
For what is to be said and done,
we wait upon Alkínoös' command."

At this the king's voice rang:

354. Phaidra: The Cretan wife of Theseus of Athens, who fell in love with her stepson Hippolytus. Prokris: the unfaithful wife of Cephalus, king of Athens. Ariadnê: sister of Phaidra; she helped Theseus slay the Minotaur on Crete and escaped with him, only to die on the island of Dia.

355. Minos: King of Crete, father of Phaidra and Ariadnê.

359. Dionysus: God of the vine and all green growing things. We have no other account of this version of the episode to explain why Dionysus wanted Ariadnê killed; the prevalent version of the story in later times is that Dionysus carried Ariadnê off to be his bride. Maira: A nymph of Artemis who broke her vow of chastity and was killed by the goddess.

360. Klymênê: Some story must have been attached to this name, but we do not know what it was.

361. Eriphylê: Bribed with a golden necklace by Polynices, son of Oedipus, she persuaded her husband Amphiaraus to take part in the attack on Thebes, where he was killed.

"I so command—
as sure as it is I who, while I live, rule the sea rovers of Phaiákia. Our friend longs to put out for home, but let him be content to rest here one more day, until I see all gifts bestowed. And every man will take thought for his launching and his voyage,
I most of all, for I am master here."

Odysseus, the great tactician, answered:
"Alkínoös, king and admiration of men,
even a year's delay, if you should urge it,
in loading gifts and furnishing for sea—
I too could wish it; better far that I return with some largesse of wealth about me—
I shall be thought more worthy of love and courtesy by every man who greets me home in Ithaka."
The king said:
"As to that, one word, Odysseus:
from all we see, we take you for no swindler—though the dark earth be patient of so many, scattered everywhere, baiting their traps with lies of old times and of places no one knows.
You speak with art, but your intent is honest.
The Argive troubles, and your own troubles,
you told as a poet would, a man who knows the world.
But now come tell me this: among the dead did you meet any of your peers, companions who sailed with you and met their doom at Troy?
Here's a long night—an endless night—before us,
and no time yet for sleep, not in this hall.
Recall the past deeds and the strange adventures.
I could stay up until the sacred Dawn
as long as you might wish to tell your story."

Odysseus the great tactician answered:
"Alkínoös, king and admiration of men,
there is a time for story telling; there is also a time for sleep. But even so, if, indeed, listening be still your pleasure,
I must not grudge my part. Other and sadder tales there are to tell, of my companions, of some who came through all the Trojan spears, clangor and groan of war,
only to find a brutal death at home—

396. wealth about me: He lost at sea all the loot he took at Troy and Ismaros.

and a bad wife behind it.
After Perséphonê, icy and pale, dispersed the shades of women,
the soul of Agamémnon, son of Atreus, came before me, sombre in the gloom,
and others gathered round, all who were with him
when death and doom struck in Aegísthos' hall.
Sipping the black blood, the tall shade perceived me,
and cried out sharply, breaking into tears;
then tried to stretch his hands toward me, but could not,
being bereft of all the reach and power
he once felt in the great torque of his arms.
Gazing at him, and stirred, I wept for pity,
and spoke across to him:
'O son of Atreus, illustrious Lord Marshal, Agamémnon,
what was the doom that brought you low in death?
Were you at sea, aboard ship, and Poseidon blew up a wicked squall to send you under, or were you cattle-raiding on the mainland or in a fight for some strongpoint, or women, when the foe hit you to your mortal hurt?'
But he replied at once:
'Son of Laërtês,
Odysseus, master of land ways and sea ways,
neither did I go down with some good ship in any gale Poseidon blew, nor die upon the mainland, hurt by foes in battle.
It was Aigísthos who designed my death, he and my heartless wife, and killed me, after feeding me, like an ox felled at the trough.
That was my miserable end—and with me my fellows butchered, like so many swine killed for some troop, or feast, or wedding banquet in a great landholder's household. In your day you have seen men, and hundreds, die in war, in the bloody press, or downed in single combat,
but these were murders you would catch your breath at:
think of us fallen, all our throats cut, winebowl brimming, tables laden on every side, while blood ran smoking over the whole floor.
In my extremity I heard Kassandra,

430. Aigísthos: Cousin of Agamémnon, who remained at home while Agamémnon went to Troy, seduced his wife Klytaimnéstra, and helped her murder her husband when he returned.

437. Atreus: See note to Aeschylus, Agamemnon, p. 299.

463. Kassandra: She was part of Agamemnon's share of the booty at Troy.

Priam's daughter, piteously crying as the traitress Klytaimnéstra made to kill her along with me. I heaved up from the ground and got my hands around the blade, but she eluded me, that whore. Nor would she close my two eyes as my soul swam to the underworld or shut my lips. There is no being more fell, more bestial than a wife in such an action,
and what an action that one planned!
The murder of her husband and her lord.
Great god, I thought my children and my slaves at least would give me welcome. But that woman, plotting a thing so low, defiled herself and all her sex, all women yet to come,
even those few who may be virtuous,'
He paused then, and I answered:
'Foul and dreadful.
That was the way that Zeus who views the wide world vented his hatred on the sons of Atreus—intrigues of women, even from the start.
Myriads
died by Helen's fault, and Klytaimnéstra plotted against you half the world away.'

And he at once said:
'Let it be a warning even to you. Indulge a woman never, and never tell her all you know. Some things a man may tell, some he should cover up.
Not that I see a risk for you, Odysseus, of death at your wife's hands. She is too wise, too clear-eyed, sees alternatives too well, Penélopê, Ikários' daughter—that young bride whom we left behind—think of it!— when we sailed off to war. The baby boy still cradled at her breast—now he must be a grown man, and a lucky one. By heaven, you'll see him yet, and he'll embrace his father with old fashioned respect, and rightly.
My own lady never let me glut my eyes on my own son, but bled me to death first.
One thing I will advise, on second thought;
stow it away and ponder it.

468–469. close my two eyes: I.e., give me a proper burial.

500. own son: Orestés.

Land your ship
in secret on your island; give no warning.
The day of faithful wives is gone forever.

But tell me, have you any word at all about my son's life? Gone to Orkhómenos or sandy Pylos, can he be? Or waiting with Meneláos in the plain of Sparta?
Death on earth has not yet taken Orestés.'

But I could only answer:
'Son of Atreus,
why do you ask these questions of me? Neither news of home have I, nor news of him, alive or dead. And empty words are evil.'

So we exchanged our speech, in bitterness, weighed down by grief, and tears welled in our eyes,
when there appeared the spirit of Akhilleus, son of Peleus; then Patróklos' shade,
and then Antílokhos, and then Aias, first among all the Danaans in strength and bodily beauty, next to prince Akhilleus.
Now that great runner, grandson of Aíakhos, recognized me and called across to me:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier, old knife, what next? What greater feat remains for you to put your mind on, after this?
How did you find your way down to the dark where these dimwitted dead are camped forever, the after images of used-up men?'

I answered:
'Akhilleus, Peleus' son, strongest of all among the Akhaians, I had need of foresight such as Teirêsias alone could give to help me, homeward bound for the crags of Ithaka.
I have not yet coasted Akhaia, not yet touched my land; my life is all adversity.
But was there ever a man more blest by fortune than you, Akhilleus? Can there ever be?
We ranked you with immortals in your lifetime,
we Argives did, and here your power is royal

506. Pylos: City on the west coast of Greece, the home of Nestor. The young Orestés had been sent away to the north while Agamémnon was at Troy; he eventually returned home to avenge his father, killing Aigisthos and Klytaimnéstra.

518. Antílokhos: Son of Nestor.

519. Argives: Greeks. (Likewise Danaans means "Greeks.")

521. grandson of Aíakhos: Akhilleus.

534. coasted Akhaia: Reached the coast of Greece.

among the dead men's shades. Think, then, Akhilleus:
you need not be so pained by death.' To this he answered swiftly:
'Let me hear no smooth talk
of death from you, Odysseus, light of councils.
Better, I say, to break sod as a farm hand for some poor country man, on iron rations, than lord it over all the exhausted dead.
Tell me, what news of the prince my son: did he come after me to make a name in battle or could it be he did not? Do you know if rank and honor still belong to Peleus in the towns of the Myrmidons? Or now, may be, Hellas and Phthia spurn him, seeing old age fetters him, hand and foot. I cannot help him under the sun's rays, cannot be that man
I was on Troy's wide seaboard, in those days when I made bastion for the Argives and put an army's best men in the dust.
Were I but whole again, could I go now to my father's house, one hour would do to make my passion and my hands no man could hold hateful to any who shoulder him aside.'

Now when he paused I answered:
'Of all that—
of Peleus' life, that is—I know nothing;
but happily I can tell you the whole story of Neoptólemos, as you require.
In my own ship I brought him out from Skyros to join the Akhaians under arms.
And I can tell you,
in every council before Troy thereafter your son spoke first and always to the point;
no one but Nestor and I could out-debate him.
And when we formed against the Trojan line he never hung back in the mass, but ranged far forward of his troops—no man could touch him for gallantry. Aye, scores went down before him

547. my son: Neoptólemos (the name means "new war").
Troy would fall only to the son of Akhilleus, who was living on the rocky island of Skyros.

550. Peleus: Father of Akhilleus.

551. Myrmidons: The people from whom Akhilleus' army was drawn.

552. Hellas: Northeastern Greece. Phthia: The home of Peleus and Akhilleus. Hellas: Later used to mean the whole of Greece, in Homer it describes the area of Thessaly from which Akhilleus came.

566. brought him out from Skyros: The Greeks were told by a prophet that Troy would fall only to the son of Akhilleus, who was living on the rocky island of Skyros.

in hard fights man to man. I shall not tell all about each, or name them all—the long roster of enemies he put out of action, taking the shock of charges on the Argives.
But what a champion his lance ran through in Eurýpulos the son of Télephos! Ketеians in throngs around that captain also died—all because Priam's gifts had won his mother to send the lad to battle; and I thought Memnon alone in splendor ever outshone him.

But one fact more: while our picked Argive crew still rode that hollow horse Epeios built, and when the whole thing lay with me, to open the trapdoor of the ambuscade or not, at that point our Danaan lords and soldiers wiped their eyes, and their knees began to quake, all but Neoptólemos. I never saw his tanned cheek change color or his hand brush one tear away. Rather he prayed me, hand on hilt, to sortie, and he gripped his tough spear, bent on havoc for the Trojans.
And when we had pierced and sacked Priam's tall city he loaded his choice plunder and embarked with no scar on him; not a spear had grazed him nor the sword's edge in close work—common wounds one gets in war. Arês in his mad fits knows no favorites.'

But I said no more,
for he had gone off striding the field of asphodel,
the ghost of our great runner, Akhilleus Aiákidês, glorying in what I told him of his son.

Now other souls of mournful dead stood by, each with his troubled questioning, but one remained alone, apart: the son of Télamon, Aías, it was—the great shade burning still because I had won favor on the beachhead in rivalry over Akhilleus' arms.
The Lady Thetis, mother of Akhilleus,

580. Eurýpulos: He came to the aid of the Trojans with a fresh army. Télephos: King of Mysia, a land of central Asia Minor.

584. Memnon: Leader of the Ethiopian allies of Troy, killed by Akhilleus. (Not related to Agamémnon.)

603. Aiákidês: Akhilleus was the grandson of Aiakos, a son of Zeus.

610. Akhilleus' arms: After Akhilleus was killed by the Trojan Paris, his mother Thetis offered them as a prize to the Greek who had done most harm to the Trojans. They were awarded to Odysseus. Aias, after an attempt to kill Odysseus and the two kings, Menelaos and Agamémnon, committed suicide.

laid out for us the dead man's battle gear, and Trojan children, with Athena, named the Danaan fittest to own them. Would god I had not borne the palm that day!
For earth took Aías then to hold forever,
the handsomest and, in all feats of war,
noblest of the Danaans after Akhilleus.
Gently therefore I called across to him:
'Aías, dear son of royal Télamon,
you would not then forget, even in death,
your fury with me over those accurst calamitous arms?—and so they were, a bane sent by the gods upon the Argive host.
For when you died by your own hand we lost a tower, formidable in war. All we Akhaians mourn you forever, as we do Akhilleus;
and no one bears the blame but Zeus.
He fixed that doom for you because he frowned on the whole expedition of our spearmen.
My lord, come nearer, listen to our story!
Conquer your indignation and your pride.'

But he gave no reply, and turned away, following other ghosts toward Erebos.
Who knows if in that darkness he might still have spoken, and I answered?
But my heart
longed, after this, to see the dead elsewhere.
And now there came before my eyes Minos,
the son of Zeus, enthroned, holding a golden staff, dealing out justice among ghostly pleaders arrayed about the broad doorways of Death.

And then I glimpsed Orion, the huge hunter, gripping his club, studded with bronze, unbreakable, with wild beasts he had overpowered in life on lonely mountainsides, now brought to bay on fields of asphodel.
And I saw Tityos,
the son of Gaia, lying abandoned over nine square rods of plain.
Vultures, hunched above him, left and right, rifling his belly, stabbed into the liver,
and he could never push them off.
This hulk
had once committed rape of Zeus's mistress,

Léto, in her glory, when she crossed the open grass of Panopeus toward Pytho.

Then I saw Tántalos put to the torture:
in a cool pond he stood, lapped round by water clear to the chin, and being athirst he burned to slake his dry weasand with drink, though drink he would not ever again. For when the old man put his lips down to the sheet of water it vanished round his feet, gulped underground, and black mud baked there in a wind from hell.
Boughs, too, drooped low above him, big with fruit,
pear trees, pomegranates, brilliant apples, luscious figs, and olives ripe and dark;
but if he stretched his hand for one, the wind
under the dark sky tossed the bough beyond him.

Then Sísyphos in torment I beheld being roustabout to a tremendous boulder.
Leaning with both arms braced and legs driving,
he heaved it toward a height, and almost over, but then a Power spun him round and sent the cruel boulder bounding again to the plain.
Whereon the man bent down again to toil, dripping sweat, and the dust rose overhead.
Next I saw manifest the power of Heraklês—a phantom, this, for he himself has gone feasting amid the gods, reclining soft with Hêbê of the ravishing pale ankles, daughter of Zeus and Hêra, shod in gold.
But, in my vision, all the dead around him cried like affrighted birds; like Night itself he loomed with naked bow and nocked arrow and glances terrible as continual archery.
My hackles rose at the gold swordbelt he wore sweeping across him: gorgeous intaglio of savage bears, boars, lions with wildfire eyes, swordfights, battle, slaughter, and sudden death—
the smith who had that belt in him, I hope he never made, and never will make, another.

654. Pytho: Shrine of Apollo's oracle on Delphi.

655. Tántalos: King of Lydia. He was the confidant of the gods and ate at their table, but he betrayed their secrets.

658. weasand: Throat.

668. Sisyphos: King of Corinth, the archetype of the liar and trickster. We do not know what misdeed he is being punished for in this passage.

679. Hêbê: Divine personification of youth.

The eyes of the vast figure rested on me,
and of a sudden he said in kindly tones:
'Son of Laërtês and the gods of old,
Odysseus, master mariner and soldier,
under a cloud, you too? Destined to grinding labors like my own in the sunny world?
Son of Kronion Zeus or not, how many days I sweated out, being bound in servitude to a man far worse than I, a rough master!
He made me hunt this place one time to get the watchdog of the dead: no more perilous task, he thought, could be; but I brought back that beast, up from the underworld Hermês and grey-eyed Athena showed the way.'

And Heraklês, down the vistas of the dead, faded from sight; but I stood fast, awaiting other great souls who perished in times past.
I should have met, then, god-begotten Theseus and Peirithoös, whom both I longed to see, but first came shades in thousands, rustling in a pandemonium of whispers, blown together, and the horror took me that Perséphonê had brought from darker hell some saurian death's head.
I whirled then, made for the ship, shouted to crewmen to get aboard and cast off the stern hawsers, an order soon obeyed. They took their thwarts, and the ship went leaping toward the stream of Ocean
first under oars, then with a following wind.

699. rough master: Heraklês, son of Zeus, was made subject to the orders of Eurýstheus of Argos who ordered him to perform the twelve famous labors. One of them was to bring back from Hades the dog which guarded the gate.

708. Theseus: After his adventures in Crete, he went with his friend Peirithoös to Hades to kidnap Perséphonê; the venture failed, and the two heroes, imprisoned in Hades, were rescued by Heraklês.

AESCHYLUS

(524?–456 B.C.)

Agamemnon*

[The myth on which this play is based is the story of a family which suffered through many generations from a series of acts of vengeance to which there was no foreseeable end as long as private vengeance was a recognized system of justice. Pelops, son of Tantalus, had two sons, Atreus and Thyestes, who quarreled when Thyestes seduced Atreus' wife. Atreus revenged himself by killing the children of Thyestes and serving their flesh to their father at a feast. One son of Thyestes, Aegisthus, escaped the slaughter, and lived to avenge his father. The sons of Atreus, Agamemnon and Menelaus, were kings of Argos and Sparta respectively. Menelaus' wife was Helen, whose abduction caused the Trojan War. Agamemnon, leader of the Greek army, sacrificed his daughter Iphigenia to ensure the departure of the fleet when it lay wind-bound at the port of Aulis. His wife, Clytemnestra, committed adultery with Aegisthus while Agamemnon was away at Troy, and when her husband returned, with Aegisthus' aid, she murdered him. He was avenged seven years later by his son Orestes, who killed Aegisthus and Clytemnestra. (This action is the subject of the second play of the Aeschylean trilogy, the Choephoroe.) The Agamemnon begins with the moment when the news of the fall of Troy reaches Argos. The play was first produced in the open-air theater of Dionysus at Athens.]

Characters

WATCHMAN	HERALD
CHORUS OF OLD MEN	AGAMEMNON
OF THE CITY	CASSANDRA
CLYTEMNESTRA	AEGISTHUS

SCENE—A space in front of the palace of Agamemnon in Argos. Night. A WATCHMAN on the roof of the palace.

WATCHMAN. The gods it is I ask to release me from this watch
A year's length now, spending my nights like a dog,
Watching on my elbow on the roof of the sons of Atreus
So that I have come to know the assembly of the nightly stars

* First produced in the spring of 458 B.C. Our text is a translation by Louis MacNeice, published as The Agamemnon of Aeschylus, Harcourt, Brace and Company, New York, 1936.

2. like a dog: explained by the following words, "Watching on my elbow"; head on arms like a reclining dog.

3. sons of Atreus: Agamemnon and Menelaus.

Those which bring storm and those which bring summer to men,
The shining Masters riveted in the sky—
I know the decline and rising of those stars.
And now I am waiting for the sign of the beacon,
The flame of fire that will carry the report from Troy,
News of her taking. Which task has been assigned me
By a woman of sanguine heart but a man's mind.
Yet when I take my restless rest in the soaking dew,
My night not visited with dreams—
For fear stands by me in the place of sleep
That I cannot firmly close my eyes in sleep—
Whenever I think to sing or hum to myself
As an antidote to sleep, then every time I groan
And fall to weeping for the fortunes of this house
Where not as before are things well ordered now.
But now may a good chance fall, escape from pain,
The good news visible in the midnight fire.

[Pause. A light appears, gradually increasing, the light of the beacon.]

Ha! I salute you, torch of the night whose light
Is like the day, an earnest of many dances
In the city of Argos, celebration of Peace.
I call to Agamemnon's wife; quickly to rise
Out of her bed and in the house to raise Clamour of joy in answer to this torch
For the city of Troy is taken—
Such is the evident message of the beckoning flame.
And I myself will dance my solo first
For I shall count my master's fortune mine
Now that this beacon has thrown me a lucky throw.
And may it be when he comes, the master of this house,
That I grasp his hand in my hand.
As to the rest, I am silent. A great ox, as they say, Stands on my tongue. The house itself, if it took voice,
Could tell the case most clearly. But I will only speak
To those who know. For the others I remember nothing.

[Enter CHORUS OF OLD MEN. During the following chorus the day begins to dawn.]

CHORUS. The tenth year it is since Priam's high Adversary, Menelaus the king

8. beacon: Clytemnestra had arranged to be informed of the fall of Troy by a chain of signal fires stretching from Troy across the islands of the Aegean Sea to Argos.

11. woman . . . mind: Clytemnestra.

27. Clamour of joy: the triumphant cry with which the women of a city greeted the news of victory.

40. Adversary. Menelaus: Priam's son Paris carried off Menelaus' wife Helen.

And Agamemnon, the double-throned and sceptred Yoke of the sons of Atreus Ruling in fee from God,
From this land gathered an Argive army
On a mission of war a thousand ships,
Their hearts howling in boundless bloodlust
In eagles' fashion who in lonely Grief for nestlings above their homes hang Turning in cycles
Beating the air with the oars of their wings,
  Now to no purpose
  Their love and task of attention.

But above there is One,
Maybe Pan, maybe Zeus or Apollo,
Who hears the harsh cries of the birds
Guests in his kingdom,
Wherefore, though late, in requital
He sends the Avenger.
Thus Zeus our master
Guardian of guest and of host Sent against Paris the sons of Atreus
For a woman of many men
Many the dog-tired wrestlings Limbs and knees in the dust pressed—
  For both the Greeks and Trojans
  An overture of breaking spears.

Things are where they are, will finish
In the manner fated and neither Fire beneath nor oil above can soothe
The stubborn anger of the unburnt offering.
As for us, our bodies are bankrupt,
The expedition left us behind
And we wait supporting on sticks
Our strength—the strength of a child;

54. Pan: a god particularly associated with the forest and all forms of wild life.

56. guests in his kingdom: since they live in the sky, his domain.

58. Avenger: a Fury. The Furies avenged those who could not avenge themselves. So, later in the trilogy, they come to demand retribution for the murder of Clytemnestra, who has left no avenger behind her.

60. Guardian of guest and of host: Zeus himself punished violations of the code of hospitality. In this case he punishes the abduction of Helen by Paris, who was a guest in the house of Menelaus.

73 ff. And we wait . . . : The general sense of the passage is that only two classes of the male population are left in Argos, those who are too young to fight and those who, like the chorus, are too old. The emphasis on the age and weakness of the members of the chorus prepares the audience for their complete failure of nerve at the moment of Agamemnon's murder.

For the marrow that leaps in a boy's body
Is no better than that of the old
For the War God is not in his body;
While the man who is very old
And his leaf withering away
Goes on the three-foot way
No better than a boy, and wanders
A dream in the middle of the day.

But you, daughter of Tyndareus,
Queen Clytemnestra,
What is the news, what is the truth, what have you learnt,
On the strength of whose word have you thus Sent orders for sacrifice round?
All the gods, the gods of the town,
Of the worlds of Below and Above,
By the door, in the square,
Have their altars ablaze with your gifts,
From here, from there, all sides, all corners,
Sky-high leap the flame-jets fed
By gentle and undeceiving Persuasion of sacred unguent,
Oil from the royal stores.
Of these things tell
That which you can, that which you may,
Be healer of this our trouble
Which at times torments with evil
Though at times by propitiations
A shining hope repels
The insatiable thought upon grief
Which is eating away our hearts.

Of the omen which powerfully speeded
That voyage of strong men, by God's grace even I Can tell, my age can still Be galvanized to breathe the strength of song,
To tell how the kings of all the youth of Greece
Two-throned but one in mind
Were launched with pike and punitive hand
Against the Trojan shore by angry birds.

80. three-foot: two feet and a stick.
82. Enter Clytemnestra.
104. Clytemnestra leaves the stage without giving them an answer.
105. omen: The chorus proceeds to describe the omen which accompanied the departure of the army for Troy ten years before. Two eagles seized and tore a pregnant hare; this was interpreted by the prophet Calchas as meaning that the two kings would destroy the city of Troy, thus killing not only the living Trojans but the Trojan generations yet unborn.

Kings of the birds to our kings came,
One with a white rump, the other black,
Appearing near the palace on the spear-arm side
Where all could see them,
Tearing a pregnant hare with the unborn young Foiled of their courses.
Cry, cry upon Death; but may the good prevail

But the diligent prophet of the army seeing the sons
Of Atreus twin in temper knew That the hare-killing birds were the two Generals, explained it thus—
"In time this expedition sacks the town
Of Troy before whose towers
By Fate's force the public Wealth will be wasted.
Only let not some spite from the gods benight the bulky battalions,
The bridle of Troy, nor strike them untimely;
For the goddess feels pity, is angry
With the winged dogs of her father
Who killed the cowering hare with her unborn young;
Artemis hates the eagles' feast."
Cry, cry upon Death; but may the good prevail.

"But though you are so kind, goddess,
To the little cubs of lions
And to all the sucking young of roving beasts
In whom your heart delights,
Fulfil us the signs of these things,
The signs which are good but open to blame,
And I call on Apollo the Healer
That his sister raise not against the Greeks
Unremitting gales to baulk their ships,
Hurrying on another kind of sacrifice, with no feasting,

113. Kings of the birds: eagles.
115. spear-arm side: the right.
120. prophet: Calchas.
130. goddess: Artemis, a virgin goddess, patron of hunting and the protectress of wild life. She is angry that the eagles have destroyed a pregnant animal. The prophet fears that she may turn her wrath against the kings whom the eagles represent.
135. goddess: Calchas addresses a prayer to Artemis.
143. Unremitting gales: He foresees the future. Artemis will send unfavorable winds to prevent the sailing of the Greek expedition from Aulis, the port of embarkation. She will demand the sacrifice of Agamemnon's daughter Iphigenia as the price of the fleet's release.
144. with no feasting: At an ordinary sacrifice the celebrants gave the gods their due portion and then feasted on the animal's flesh. The word "sacrifice" comes to have the connotation of "feast." There will be no feast at this sacrifice, since the victim will be a human being. The ominous phrase reminds us of a feast of human flesh which has already taken place, Thyestes' feasting on his children.

Barbarous building of hates and disloyalties Grown on the family. For anger grimly returns Cunningly haunting the house, avenging the death of a child, never forgetting its due."

So cried the prophet—evil and good together,
Fate that the birds foretold to the king's house.
In tune with this
Cry, cry upon Death; but may the good prevail.

Zeus, whoever He is, if this
Be a name acceptable,
By this name I will call him.
There is no one comparable
When I reckon all of the case
Excepting Zeus, if ever I am to jettison
The barren care which clogs my heart.
Not He who formerly was great
With brawling pride and mad for broils
Will even be said to have been.
And He who was next has met
His match and is seen no more,
But Zeus is the name to cry in your triumph-song
And win the prize for wisdom.

Who setting us on the road
Made this a valid law—
"That men must learn by suffering."
Drop by drop in sleep upon the heart
Falls the laborious memory of pain,
Against one's will comes wisdom;
The grace of the gods is forced on us
Throned inviolably.

So at that time the elder
Chief of the Greek ships
Would not blame any prophet
Nor face the flail of fortune;

147. avenging the death of a child: This prophecy is fulfilled in this play, by the murder of Agamemnon.

159. He who formerly was great: Uranus, father of Cronos, grandfather of Zeus, the first lord of heaven. This whole passage refers to a primitive legend which told how Uranus was violently supplanted by his son Cronos, who was in his turn overthrown by his son Zeus. This legend is made to bear new meaning by Aeschylus, for he suggests that it is not a meaningless series of acts of violence, but a progression to the rule of Zeus, who stands for order and justice. Thus the law of human life which Zeus proclaims and administers, that wisdom comes through suffering, has its counterpart in the history of the establishment of the divine rule.

162. He who was next: Cronos.

174–175. elder chief: Agamemnon.

For unable to sail, the people
Of Greece were heavy with famine, Waiting in Aulis where the tides Flow back, opposite Chalcis.

But the winds that blew from the Strymon,
Bringing delay, hunger, evil harbourage,
Crazing men, rotting ships and cables,
By drawing out the time
Were shredding into nothing the flower of Argos,
When the prophet screamed a new Cure for that bitter tempest
And heavier still for the chiefs,
Pleading the anger of Artemis so that the sons of Atreus
Beat the ground with their sceptres and shed tears.
Then the elder king found voice and answered:
"Heavy is my fate, not obeying,
And heavy it is if I kill my child, the delight of my house,
And with a virgin's blood upon the altar
Make foul her father's hands.
Either alternative is evil.
How can I betray the fleet
And fail the allied army?
It is right they should passionately cry for the winds to be lulled
By the blood of a girl. So be it. May it be well."

But when he had put on the halter of Necessity
Breathing in his heart a veering wind of evil
Unsanctioned, unholy, from that moment forward
He changed his counsel, would stop at nothing.
For the heart of man is hardened by infatuation,
A faulty adviser, the first link of sorrow.
Whatever the cause, he brought himself to slay
His daughter, an offering to promote the voyage
To a war for a runaway wife.

Her prayers and her cries of father,
Her life of a maiden,
Counted for nothing with those militarists;
But her father, having duly prayed, told the attendants

180–181. Aulis . . . Chalcis: the unruly water of the narrows between Aulis on the mainland and Chalcis on the island of Euboea.

182. Strymon: a river in Thrace; the winds blew from the north.

190. anger of Artemis: The prophet announces Artemis' demand for the sacrifice of Iphigenia.

To lift her, like a goat, above the altar
With her robes falling about her,
To lift her boldly, her spirit fainting,
And hold back with a gag upon her lovely mouth
By the dumb force of a bridle
The cry which would curse the house.
Then dropping on the ground her saffron dress,
Glancing at each of her appointed Sacrificers a shaft of pity,
Plain as in a picture she wished
To speak to them by name, for often
At her father's table where men feasted
She had sung in celebration for her father
With a pure voice, affectionately, virginally,
The hymn for happiness at the third libation.
The sequel to this I saw not and tell not
But the crafts of Calchas gained their object.
To learn by suffering is the equation of Justice; the Future
Is known when it comes, let it go till then.
To know in advance is to sorrow in advance.
The facts will appear with the shining of the dawn.

[Enter CLYTEMNESTRA.]

But may good, at the least, follow after
As the queen here wishes, who stands Nearest the throne, the only Defence of the land of Argos.

LEADER OF THE CHORUS. I have come, Clytemnestra, reverencing your authority.
For it is right to honour our master's wife
When the man's own throne is empty.
But you, if you have heard good news for certain, or if You sacrifice on the strength of flattering hopes,
I would gladly hear. Though I cannot cavil at silence.

CLYTEMNESTRA. Bearing good news, as the proverb says, may Dawn Spring from her mother Night.
You will hear something now that was beyond your hopes.
The men of Argos have taken Priam's city.

LEAD. What! I cannot believe it. It escapes me.

CLYT. Troy in the hands of the Greeks. Do I speak plain?

LEAD. Joy creeps over me, calling out my tears.

CLYT. Yes. Your eyes proclaim your loyalty.

LEAD. But what are your grounds? Have you a proof of it?

229. at the third libation: At the banquet three libations (offerings of wine) were poured, the third and last to Zeus the Savior. The last libation was accompanied by a hymn of praise.

CLYT. There is proof indeed—unless God has cheated us.
LEAD. Perhaps you believe the inveigling shapes of dreams?
CLYT. I would not be credited with a dozing brain!
LEAD. Or are you puffed up by Rumour, the wingless flyer?
CLYT. You mock my common sense as if I were a child.
LEAD. But at what time was the city given to sack?
CLYT. In this very night that gave birth to this day.
LEAD. What messenger could come so fast?
CLYT. Hephaestus, launching a fine flame from Ida,
Beacon forwarding beacon, despatch-riders of fire,
Ida relayed to Hermes' cliff in Lemnos
And the great glow from the island was taken over third
By the height of Athos that belongs to Zeus,
And towering then to straddle over the sea
The might of the running torch joyfully tossed
The gold gleam forward like another sun,
Herald of light to the heights of Mount Macistus,
And he without delay, nor carelessly by sleep
Encumbered, did not shirk his intermediary role,
His farflung ray reached the Euripus' tides
And told Messapion's watchers, who in turn Sent on the message further Setting a stack of dried-up heather on fire.
And the strapping flame, not yet enfeebled, leapt

263. Hephaestus: i.e., fire. Hephaestus was the god of fire and of the crafts dependent upon fire.

263 ff. Ida: the mountain range near Troy. The names which follow in this speech designate the places where beacon fires flashed the message of Troy's fall to Argos. The chain extends from Ida to Hermes' cliff on the island of Lemnos (off the coast of Asia Minor), to Mount Athos (which is situated on a rocky peninsula in north Greece), to Mount Macistus on the island of Euboea (off the coast of central Greece), to Messapion, a mountain of the mainland, to Cithaeron, a mountain near Thebes, across Lake Gorgopis to Mount Aegiplanctus on the Isthmus of Corinth, across the sea (the Saronic Gulf) to Mount Arachnaeus in Argive territory. This fire is the one seen by the watchman at the beginning of the play. The speech has often been criticized as discursive, but it has great poetic importance. The image of the light which will dispel the darkness, first introduced by the watchman, is one of the dominant images of the trilogy, and is here developed by Clytemnestra with magnificent ambiguous effect. For the watchman the light means the safe return of Agamemnon and the restoration of order in the house; for Clytemnestra it means the return of Agamemnon to his death at her hands. Each swift jump of the racing light is one step nearer home and death for Agamemnon. The light the watchman longs for brings only greater darkness, but eventually it brings darkness for Clytemnestra too. The final emergence of the true light comes in the glare of the torchlight procession which ends the last play of the trilogy, a procession which symbolizes perfect reconciliation on both the human and the divine levels, and the working out of the will of Zeus in the substitution of justice for vengeance. The conception of the beacons as a chain of descendants (compare, "Issue and image of the fire on Ida," l. 293), is also important; the fire at Argos which announces Agamemnon's imminent death is a direct descendant of the fire on Ida which announces the sack of Troy and Agamemnon's sacrilegious conduct there. The metaphor thus reminds us of the sequence of crimes from generation to generation which is the history of the house of Pelops.

Over the plain of Asopus like a blazing moon
And woke on the crags of Cithaeron
Another relay in the chain of fire.
The light that was sent from far was not declined
By the look-out men, who raised a fiercer yet,
A light which jumped the water of Gorgopis
And to Mount Aegiplanctus duly come Urged the reveille of the punctual fire.
So then they kindle it squanderingly and launch
A beard of flame big enough to pass
The headland that looks down upon the Saronic gulf,
Blazing and bounding till it reached at length
The Arachnaean steep, our neighbouring heights;
And leaps in the latter end on the roof of the sons of Atreus
Issue and image of the fire on Ida.
Such was the assignment of my torch-racers,
The task of each fulfilled by his successor,
And victor is he who ran both first and last.
Such is the proof I offer you, the sign
My husband sent me out of Troy.

LEAD. To the gods, queen, I shall give thanks presently.
But I would like to hear this story further,
To wonder at it in detail from your lips.

CLYT. The Greeks hold Troy upon this day.
The cries in the town I fancy do not mingle.
Pour oil and vinegar into the same jar,
You would say they stand apart unlovingly;
Of those who are captured and those who have conquered
Distinct are the sounds of their diverse fortunes,
For these having flung themselves about the bodies
Of husbands and brothers, or sons upon the bodies
Of aged fathers from a throat no longer
Free, lament the fate of their most loved.
But those a night's marauding after battle Sets hungry to what breakfast the town offers
Not billeted duly in any barracks order
But as each man has drawn his lot of luck.
So in the captive homes of Troy already
They take their lodging, free of the frosts
And dews of the open. Like happy men
They will sleep all night without sentry.
But if they respect duly the city's gods,

296. he who ran both first and last. The chain of beacons is compared to a relay race in which the runners carry torches: the last runner (who runs the final lap) comes in first to win.

Those of the captured land and the sanctuaries of the gods,
They need not, having conquered, fear reconquest.
But let no lust fall first upon the troops
To plunder what is not right, subdued by gain,
For they must still, in order to come home safe,
Get round the second lap of the doubled course.
So if they return without offence to the gods
The grievance of the slain may learn at last
A friendly talk—unless some fresh wrong falls.
Such are the thoughts you hear from me, a woman.
But may the good prevail for all to see.
We have much good. I only ask to enjoy it.

LEAD. Woman, you speak with sense like a prudent man.
I, who have heard your valid proofs, prepare
To give the glory to God.
Fair recompense is brought us for our troubles.

[CLYTEMNESTRA goes back into the palace.]

CHOR. O Zeus our king and Night our friend
Donor of glories,
Night who cast on the towers of Troy
A close-clinging net so that neither the grown Nor any of the children can pass
The enslaving and huge Trap of all-taking destruction.
Great Zeus, guardian of host and guest,
I honour who has done his work and taken
A leisured aim at Paris so that neither Too short nor yet over the stars
He might shoot to no purpose.

From Zeus is the blow they can tell of,
This at least can be established,
They have fared according to his ruling. For some Deny that the gods deign to consider those among men
Who trample on the grace of inviolate things;
It is the impious man says this,
For Ruin is revealed the child
Of not to be attempted actions
When men are puffed up unduly
And their houses are stuffed with riches.

323. But let no lust fall: The audience was familiar with the traditional account, according to which Agamemnon and his army failed signally to respect the gods and temples of Troy.

337. Night: Troy fell to a night attack.

353. Who trample . . . things: The language throughout this passage is significantly general. The chorus refers to Paris, but everything it says is equally applicable to Agamemnon, who sacrificed his daughter for his ambitions.

Measure is the best. Let danger be distant,
This should suffice a man
With a proper part of wisdom.
For a man has no protection Against the drunkenness of riches
Once he has spurned from his sight
The high altar of Justice.

Sombre Persuasion compels him,
Intolerable child of calculating Doom;
All cure is vain, there is no glozing it over
But the mischief shines forth with a deadly light
And like bad coinage
By rubbings and frictions
He stands discoloured and black
Under the test—like a boy
Who chases a winged bird.
He has branded his city for ever.
His prayers are heard by no god.
Who makes such things his practice
The gods destroy him.
This way came Paris
To the house of the sons of Atreus
And outraged the table of friendship
Stealing the wife of his host.

Leaving to her countrymen clanging of Shields and spears and Launching of warships
And bringing instead of a dowry destruction to Troy
Lightly she was gone through the gates daring Things undared. Many the groans
Of the palace spokesmen on this theme—
"O the house, the house, and its princes,
O the bed and the imprint of her limbs;
One can see him crouching in silence
Dishonoured and unreviling."
Through desire for her who is overseas, a ghost
Will seem to rule the household.
And now her husband hates
The grace of shapely statues;
In the emptiness of their eyes
All their appeal is departed.

359. Measure: the mean, moderation.
373–374. like a boy . . . bird: a proverbial expression describing a person of insane ambitions.

But appearing in dreams persuasive
Images come bringing a joy that is vain,
Vain for when in fancy he looks to touch her—Slipping through his hands the vision Rapidly is gone
Following on wings the walks of sleep.
Such are his griefs in his house on his hearth,
Such as these and worse than these,
But everywhere through the land of Greece which men have left
Are mourning women with enduring hearts
To be seen in all houses; many
Are the thoughts which stab their hearts;
For those they sent to war
They know, but in place of men
That which comes home to them
Is merely an urn and ashes.

But the money-changer War, changer of bodies,
Holding his balance in the battle
Home from Troy refined by fire
Sends back to friends the dust
That is heavy with tears, stowing
A man's worth of ashes
In an easily handled jar.
And they wail speaking well of the men how that one
Was expert in battle, and one fell well in the carnage—
But for another man's wife.
Muffled and muttered words;
And resentful grief creeps up against the sons
Of Atreus and their cause.
But others there by the wall
Entombed in Trojan ground
Lie, handsome of limb,
Holding and hidden in enemy soil.

Heavy is the murmur of an angry people
Performing the purpose of a public curse;
There is something cowled in the night
That I anxiously wait to hear.
For the gods are not blind to the Murderers of many and the black Furies in time
When a man prospers in sin
By erosion of life reduce him to darkness,

406. his: Menelaus'.

417. balance: scales.

Who, once among the lost, can no more
Be helped. Over-great glory
Is a sore burden. The high peak
Is blasted by the eyes of Zeus.
I prefer an unenvied fortune,
Not to be a sacker of cities
Nor to find myself living at another's Ruling, myself a captive.

AN OLD MAN. From the good news' beacon a swift Rumour is gone through the town.
Who knows if it be true
Or some deceit of the gods?

ANOTHER OLD MAN. Who is so childish or broken in wit
To kindle his heart at a new-fangled message of flame
And then be downcast
At a change of report?

ANOTHER OLD MAN. It fits the temper of a woman.
To give her assent to a story before it is proved.

ANOTHER OLD MAN. The over-credulous passion of women expands
In swift conflagration but swiftly declining is gone
The news that a woman announced.

LEAD. Soon we shall know about the illuminant torches,
The beacons and the fiery relays,
Whether they were true or whether like dreams
That pleasant light came here and hoaxed our wits.
Look: I see, coming from the beach, a herald
Shadowed with olive shoots; the dust upon him,
Mud's thirsty sister and colleague, is my witness
That he will not give dumb news nor news by lighting
A flame of fire with the smoke of mountain timber;
In words he will either corroborate our joy—
But the opposite version I reject with horror.
To the good appeared so far may good be added.

ANOTHER SPEAKER. Whoever makes other prayers for this our city,
May he reap himself the fruits of his wicked heart.

[Enter the HERALD, who kisses the ground before speaking.]

HERALD. Earth of my fathers, O the earth of Argos,
In the light of the tenth year I reach you thus After many shattered hopes achieving one,
For never did I dare to think that here in Argive land
I should win a grave in the dearest soil of home;

468. Shadowed with olive shoots: wearing a wreath of olive.

But now hail, land, and hail, light of the sun.
And Zeus high above the country and the Pythian king—
May he no longer shoot his arrows at us (Implacable long enough beside Scamander)
But now be saviour to us and be healer,
King Apollo. And all the Assembly's gods
I call upon, and him my patron, Hermes,
The dear herald whom all heralds adore,
And the Heroes who sped our voyage, again with favour Take back the army that has escaped the spear.
O cherished dwelling, palace of royalty,
O august thrones and gods facing the sun,
If ever before, now with your bright eyes Gladly receive your king after much time,
Who comes bringing light to you in the night time,
And to all these as well—King Agamemnon.
Give him a good welcome as he deserves,
Who with the axe of judgment-awarding God
Has smashed Troy and levelled the Trojan land;
The altars are destroyed, the seats of the gods,
And the seed of all the land is perished from it.
Having cast this halter round the neck of Troy
The King, the elder son of Atreus, a blessed man, Comes, the most worthy to have honour of all Men that are now. Paris nor his guilty city
Can boast that the crime was greater than the atonement.
Convicted in a suit for rape and robbery
He has lost his stolen goods and with consummate ruin
Mowed down the whole country and his father's house.
The sons of Priam have paid their account with interest.

LEAD. Hail and be glad, herald of the Greek army.

HER. Yes. Glad indeed! So glad that at the gods' demand
I should no longer hesitate to die.

LEAD. Were you so harrowed by desire for home?

HER. Yes. The tears come to my eyes for joy.

LEAD. Sweet then is the fever which afflicts you.

HER. What do you mean? Let me learn your drift.

LEAD. Longing for those whose love came back in echo.

HER. Meaning the land was homesick for the army?

LEAD. Yes. I would often groan from a darkened heart.

HER. This sullen hatred—how did it fasten on you?

483. Pythian king: Apollo.

484. arrows: Compare the opening scenes of the Iliad, Book 1.

488. Hermes: As the messenger of Zeus, he was the patron deity of heralds.

LEAD. I cannot say. Silence is my stock prescription.
HER. What? In your masters' absence were there some you feared?
LEAD. Yes. In your phrase, death would now be a gratification.
HER. Yes, for success is ours. These things have taken time.
Some of them we could say have fallen well,
While some we blame. Yet who except the gods
Is free from pain the whole duration of life?
If I were to tell of our labours, our hard lodging,
The sleeping on crowded decks, the scanty blankets,
Tossing and groaning, rations that never reached us—
And the land too gave matter for more disgust,
For our beds lay under the enemy's walls.
Continuous drizzle from the sky, dews from the marshes,
Rotting our clothes, filling our hair with lice.
And if one were to tell of the bird-destroying winter
Intolerable from the snows of Ida
Or of the heat when the sea slackens at noon
Waveless and dozing in a depressed calm—
But why make these complaints? The weariness is over;
Over indeed for some who never again
Need even trouble to rise.
Why make a computation of the lost?
Why need the living sorrow for the spites of fortune?
I wish to say a long goodbye to disasters.
For us, the remnant of the troops of Argos,
The advantage remains, the pain can not outweigh it;
So we can make our boast to this sun's light,
Flying on words above the land and sea:
"Having taken Troy the Argive expedition
Has nailed up throughout Greece in every temple
These spoils, these ancient trophies."
Those who hear such things must praise the city
And the generals. And the grace of God be honoured Which brought these things about. You have the whole story.
LEAD. I confess myself convinced by your report.
Old men are always young enough to learn.
[Enter CLYTEMNESTRA from the palace.]
This news belongs by right first to the house
And Clytemnestra—though I am enriched also.
CLYT. Long before this I shouted at joy's command
At the coming of the first night-messenger of fire
Announcing the taking and capsizing of Troy.

523. Silence: Throughout this dialogue the chorus has been nerving itself to warn the herald that there is danger for Agamemnon at home; at this point its nerve fails, and it abandons the attempt.

And people reproached me saying, "Do mere beacons Persuade you to think that Troy is already down?
Indeed a woman's heart is easily exalted."
Such comments made me seem to be wandering but yet
I began my sacrifices and in the women's fashion
Throughout the town they raised triumphant cries
And in the gods' enclosures
Lulling the fragrant, incense-eating flame.
And now what need is there for you to tell me more?
From the King himself I shall learn the whole story.
But how the best to welcome my honoured lord
I shall take pains when he comes back—For what Is a kinder light for a woman to see than this,
To open the gates to her man come back from war
When God has saved him? Tell this to my husband,
To come with all speed, the city's darling;
May he returning find a wife as loyal
As when he left her, watchdog of the house,
Good to him but fierce to the ill-intentioned,
And in all other things as ever, having destroyed
No seal or pledge at all in the length of time.
I know no pleasure with another man, no scandal,
More than I know how to dye metal red.
Such is my boast, bearing a load of truth,
A boast that need not disgrace a noble wife. [Exit.]

LEAD. Thus has she spoken; if you take her meaning,
Only a specious tale to shrewd interpreters.
But do you, herald, tell me; I ask after Menelaus
Whether he will, returning safe preserved,
Come back with you, our land's loved master.

HER. I am not able to speak the lovely falsehood
To profit you, my friends, for any stretch of time.

LEAD. But if only the true tidings could be also good!
It is hard to hide a division of good and true.

HER. The prince is vanished out of the Greek fleet, Himself and ship. I speak no lie.

LEAD. Did he put forth first in the sight of all from Troy,
Or a storm that troubled all sweep him apart?

HER. You have hit the target like a master archer, Told succinctly a long tale of sorrow.

569. triumphant cries: the women's victory cry mentioned by the watchman.

591. Menelaus: The relevance of this question and the following speeches lies in the fact that Menelaus' absence makes Agamemnon's murder easier (his presence might have made it impossible), and in the fact that Menelaus is bringing Helen home; the choral ode which follows shows how much the chorus is obsessed with Helen's guilt—so much that it fails to recognize the true responsibility for the war and the imminence of disaster.

LEAD. Did the rumours current among the remaining ships Represent him as alive or dead?
HER. No one knows so as to tell for sure
Except the sun who nurses the breeds of earth.
LEAD. Tell me how the storm came on the host of ships
Through the divine anger, and how it ended.
HER. Day of good news should not be fouled by tongue
That tells ill news. To each god his season.
When, despair in his face, a messenger brings to a town
The hated news of a fallen army—
One general wound to the city and many men
Outcast, outcursed, from many homes
By the double whip which War is fond of,
Doom with a bloody spear in either hand,
One carrying such a pack of grief could well
Recite this hymn of the Furies at your asking.
But when our cause is saved and a messenger of good
Comes to a city glad with festivity,
How am I to mix good news with bad, recounting
The storm that meant God's anger on the Greeks?
For they swore together, those inveterate enemies,
Fire and sea, and proved their alliance, destroying
The unhappy troops of Argos.
In night arose ill-waved evil,
Ships on each other the blasts from Thrace
Crashed colliding, which butting with horns in the violence
Of big wind and rattle of rain were gone
To nothing, whirled all ways by a wicked shepherd.
But when there came up the shining light of the sun
We saw the Aegean sea flowering with corpses
Of Greek men and their ships' wreckage.
But for us, our ship was not damaged,
Whether someone snatched it away or begged it off,
Some god, not a man, handling the tiller;
And Saving Fortune was willing to sit upon our ship
So that neither at anchor we took the tilt of waves
Nor ran to splinters on the crag-bound coast.
But then having thus escaped death on the sea,
In the white day, not trusting our fortune,
We pastured this new trouble upon our thoughts,
The fleet being battered, the sailors weary,
And now if any of them still draw breath,
They are thinking no doubt of us as being lost
And we are thinking of them as being lost.

625. Fire: lightning.

May the best happen. As for Menelaus
The first guess and most likely is a disaster.
But still—if any ray of sun detects him
Alive, with living eyes, by the plan of Zeus
Not yet resolved to annul the race completely,
There is some hope then that he will return home.
So much you have heard. Know that it is the truth. [Exit.]

CHOR. Who was it named her thus
In all ways appositely
Unless it was Someone whom we do not see,
Fore-knowing fate
And plying an accurate tongue?
Helen, bride of spears and conflict's
Focus, who as was befitting
Proved a hell to ships and men,
Hell to her country, sailing
Away from delicately-sumptuous curtains,
Away on the wind of a giant Zephyr,
And shielded hunters mustered many
On the vanished track of the oars,
Oars beached on the leafy Banks of a Trojan river
For the sake of a bloody war.

But on Troy was thrust a marring marriage
By the Wrath that working to an end exacts
In time a price from guests
Who dishonoured their host
And dishonoured Zeus of the Hearth,
From those noisy celebrants
Of the wedding hymn which fell
To the brothers of Paris
To sing upon that day.
But learning this, unlearning that,
Priam's ancestral city now Continually mourns, reviling
Paris the fatal bridegroom.
The city has had much sorrow,
Much desolation in life,
From the pitiful loss of her people.

So in his house a man might rear
A lion's cub caught from the dam
In need of suckling,

656. appositely: Helen's name contains a Greek root (hele-) which means "to destroy."

675. Zeus of the Hearth: Zeus in his capacity as protector of host and guest.

In the prelude of its life
Mild, gentle with children,
For old men a playmate,
Often held in the arms
Like a new-born child,
Wheedling the hand,
Fawning at belly's bidding.

But matured by time he showed
The temper of his stock and payed
Thanks for his fostering
With disaster of slaughter of sheep
Making an unbidden banquet
And now the house is a shambles, Irremediable grief to its people,
Calamitous carnage;
For the pet they had fostered was sent
By God as a priest of Ruin.

So I would say there came To the city of Troy
A notion of windless calm,
Delicate adornment of riches,
Soft shooting of the eyes and flower
Of desire that stings the fancy.
But swerving aside she achieved
A bitter end to her marriage,
Ill guest and ill companion,
Hurled upon Priam's sons, convoyed
By Zeus, patron of guest and host,
Dark angel dowered with tears.

Long current among men an old saying Runs that a man's prosperity
When grown to greatness
Comes to birth, does not die childless—
His good luck breeds for his house
Distress that shall not be appeased.
I only, apart from the others,
Hold that the unrighteous action
Breeds true to its kind,

719–724. Long current . . . appeased: These lines state the traditional Greek view that immoderate good fortune (or excellence of any kind beyond the average) is itself the cause of disaster. In the lines which follow, the chorus rejects this view and states that only an act of evil produces evil consequences. It later admits by implication (ll. 739 ff.) that those who are less prosperous are less likely to commit such an act.

Leaves its own children behind it.
But the lot of a righteous house
Is a fair offspring always.

Ancient self-glory is accustomed
To bear to light in the evil sort of men
A new self-glory and madness,
Which sometime or sometime finds
The appointed hour for its birth,
And born therewith is the Spirit, intractable, unholy, irresistible,
The reckless lust that brings black Doom upon the house,
A child that is like its parents.

But Honest Dealing is clear
Shining in smoky homes,
Honours the god-fearing life.
Mansions gilded by filth of hands she leaves,
Turns her eyes elsewhere, visits the innocent house,
Not respecting the power
Of wealth mis-stamped with approval,
But guides all to the goal.

[Enter AGAMEMNON and CASSANDRA on chariots.]

CHOR. Come then my King, stormer of Troy, Offspring of Atreus,
How shall I hail you, how give you honour
Neither overshooting nor falling short
Of the measure of homage?
There are many who honour appearance too much Passing the bounds that are right.
To condole with the unfortunate man
Each one is ready but the bite of the grief
Never goes through to the heart.
And they join in rejoicing, affecting to share it,
Forcing their face to a smile.
But he who is shrewd to shepherd his sheep
Will fail not to notice the eyes of a man
Which seem to be loyal but lie,
Fawning with watery friendship.
Even you, in my thought, when you marshalled the troops
For Helen's sake, I will not hide it,
Made a harsh and ugly picture,
Holding badly the tiller of reason,
Paying with the death of men

740. smoky homes: i.e., poor homes.
752. There are many . . . : The chorus is trying to warn Agamemnon, and goes much further than it did in its dialogue with the herald.

Ransom for a willing whore.
But now, not unfriendly, not superficially,
I offer my service, well-doers' welcome.
In time you will learn by inquiry
Who has done rightly, who transgressed
In the work of watching the city.

AGAMEMNON. First to Argos and the country's gods
My fitting salutations, who have aided me
To return and in the justice which I exacted
From Priam's city. Hearing the unspoken case
The gods unanimously had cast their vote
Into the bloody urn for the massacre of Troy;
But to the opposite urn
Hope came, dangled her hand, but did no more.
Smoke marks even now the city's capture.
Whirlwinds of doom are alive, the dying ashes
Spread on the air the fat savour of wealth.
For these things we must pay some memorable return
To Heaven, having exacted enormous vengeance
For wife-rape; for a woman
The Argive monster ground a city to powder, Sprung from a wooden horse, shield-wielding folk,
Launching a leap at the setting of the Pleiads,
Jumping the ramparts, a ravening lion,
Lapped its fill of the kingly blood.
To the gods I have drawn out this overture
But as for your concerns, I bear them in my mind
And say the same, you have me in agreement.
To few of men does it belong by nature
To congratulate their friends unenviously,
For a sullen poison fastens on the heart,
Doubling the pain of a man with this disease;
He feels the weight of his own griefs and when He sees another's prosperity he groans.
I speak with knowledge, being well acquainted With the mirror of comradeship—ghost of a shadow
Were those who seemed to be so loyal to me.
Only Odysseus, who sailed against his will,
Proved, when yoked with me, a ready tracehorse;

779. bloody urn: The Greeks voted with pebbles, which were put into different urns and then counted.

789. wooden horse: The stratagem with which the Greeks captured the city.

790. at the setting of the Pleiads: late in the fall.

805. Odysseus: Feigning madness in order to escape going to Troy, he was tricked into demonstrating his sanity. The remark shows that the truth is far from Agamemnon's mind; he has no thought that his danger comes from a woman

I speak of him not knowing if he is alive.
But for what concerns the city and the gods
Appointing public debates in full assembly
We shall consult. That which is well already
We shall take steps to ensure it remain well.
But where there is need of medical remedies,
By applying benevolent cautery or surgery
We shall try to deflect the dangers of disease.
But now, entering the halls where stands my hearth,
First I shall make salutation to the gods
Who sent me a far journey and have brought me back.
And may my victory not leave my side.

[Enter CLYTEMNESTRA, followed by women slaves carrying purple tapestries.]

CLYT. Men of the city, you the aged of Argos,
I shall feel no shame to describe to you my love
Towards my husband. Shyness in all of us Wears thin with time. Here are the facts first hand.
I will tell you of my own unbearable life
I led so long as this man was at Troy.
For first that the woman separate from her man Should sit alone at home is extreme cruelty, Hearing so many malignant rumours—First Comes one, and another comes after, bad news to worse, Clamour of grief to the house. If Agamemnon
Had had so many wounds as those reported
Which poured home through the pipes of hearsay, then—
Then he would be gashed fuller than a net has holes!
And if only he had died . . . as often as rumour told us,
He would be like the giant in the legend,
Three-bodied. Dying once for every body,
He should have by now three blankets of earth above him—
All that above him; I care not how deep the mattress under!
Such are the malignant rumours thanks to which They have often seized me against my will and undone
The loop of a rope from my neck.
And this is why our son is not standing here,
The guarantee of your pledges and mine,
As he should be, Orestes. Do not wonder;
He is being brought up by a friendly ally and host,

820–821. love towards my husband: The Greek is ambiguous, and may mean also "love for men."

821. Shyness: The word also means "modesty," "virtue." Almost every statement in this speech has a double meaning.

834. giant: Geryon, a fabulous giant with three heads and six arms.

Strophius the Phocian, who warned me in advance
Of dubious troubles, both your risks at Troy
And the anarchy of shouting mobs that might Overturn policy, for it is born in men
To kick the man who is down.
This is not a disingenuous excuse.
For me the outrushing wells of weeping are dried up,
There is no drop left in them.
My eyes are sore from sitting late at nights
Weeping for you and for the baffled beacons, Never lit up. And, when I slept, in dreams
I have been waked by the thin whizz of a buzzing Gnat, seeing more horrors fasten on you
Than could take place in the mere time of my dream.
Having endured all this, now, with unsorrowed heart
I would hail this man as the watchdog of the farm, Forestay that saves the ship, pillar that props
The lofty roof, appearance of an only son
To a father or of land to sailors past their hope,
The loveliest day to see after the storm,
Gush of well-water for the thirsty traveller.
Such are the metaphors I think befit him,
But envy be absent. Many misfortunes already
We have endured. But now, dear head, come down
Out of that car, not placing upon the ground
Your foot, O King, the foot that trampled Troy.
Why are you waiting, slaves, to whom the task is assigned
To spread the pavement of his path with tapestries?
At once, at once let his way be strewn with purple
That Justice lead him toward his unexpected home.
The rest a mind, not overcome by sleep
Will arrange rightly, with God's help, as destined.

AGAM. Daughter of Leda, guardian of my house,
You have spoken in proportion to my absence.
You have drawn your speech out long. Duly to praise me,
That is a duty to be performed by others.
And further—do not by women's methods make me
Effeminate nor in barbarian fashion

845. Phocian: Phocis is in central Greece. Orestes grew up there in exile and later returned to avenge his father.

872. tapestries: To walk on these tapestries, wall hangings dyed with the expensive purple (crimson), would be an act of extravagant pride. Pride is the keynote of Agamemnon's character, and it suits Clytemnestra's sense of fitness that he should go into his death in godlike state, treading a way "strewn with purple," the color of blood.

877. Daughter of Leda: Clytemnestra and Helen are both daughters of Leda.

882. barbarian: foreign, especially Asiatic. Aeschylus is thinking of the pomp and servility of the contemporary Persian court.

Gape ground-grovelling acclamations at me
Nor strewing my path with cloths make it invidious.
It is the gods should be honoured in this way.
But being mortal to tread embroidered beauty
For me is no way without fear.
I tell you to honour me as a man, not god.
Footcloths are very well—Embroidered stuffs
Are stuff for gossip. And not to think unwisely
Is the greatest gift of God. Call happy only him
Who has ended his life in sweet prosperity.
I have spoken. This thing I could not do with confidence.

CLYT. Tell me now, according to your judgment.

AGAM. I tell you you shall not override my judgment.

CLYT. Supposing you had feared something . . .
Could you have vowed to God to do this thing?

AGAM. Yes. If an expert had prescribed that vow.

CLYT. And how would Priam have acted in your place?

AGAM. He would have trod the cloths, I think, for certain.

CLYT. Then do not flinch before the blame of men.

AGAM. The voice of the multitude is very strong.

CLYT. But the man none envy is not enviable.

AGAM. It is not a woman's part to love disputing.

CLYT. But it is a conqueror's part to yield upon occasion.

AGAM. You think such victory worth fighting for?

CLYT. Give way. Consent to let me have the mastery.

AGAM. Well, if such is your wish, let someone quickly loose
My vassal sandals, underlings of my feet,
And stepping on these sea-purples may no god
Shoot me from far with the envy of his eye.
Great shame it is to ruin my house and spoil
The wealth of costly weavings with my feet.
But of this matter enough. This stranger woman here
Take in with kindness. The man who is a gentle master
God looks on from far off complacently.
For no one of his will bears the slave's yoke.
This woman, of many riches being the chosen Flower, gift of the soldiers, has come with me.
But since I have been prevailed on by your words
I will go to my palace home, treading on purples.

[He dismounts from the chariot and begins to walk up the

898. expert: a priest, or prophet; Calchas for instance.

910. sea-purples: The dye was made from shellfish.

914. stranger woman: Cassandra, daughter of Priam, Agamemnon's share of the human booty of the sack of Troy. She was loved by Apollo and by him given the gift of prophecy; but when she refused her love to the god he added to his gift the proviso that her prophecies, though true, should never be believed until it was too late.

tapestried path. During the following speech he enters the palace.]

CLYT. There is the sea and who shall drain it dry? It breeds
Its wealth in silver of plenty of purple gushing
And ever-renewed, the dyeings of our garments.
The house has its store of these by God's grace, King.
This house is ignorant of poverty
And I would have vowed a pavement of many garments
Had the palace oracle enjoined that vow Thereby to contrive a ransom for his life.
For while there is root, foliage comes to the house Spreading a tent of shade against the Dog Star.
So now that you have reached your hearth and home
You prove a miracle—advent of warmth in winter;
And further this—even in the time of heat
When God is fermenting wine from the bitter grape,
Even then it is cool in the house if only
Its master walk at home, a grown man, ripe.
O Zeus the Ripener, ripen these my prayers;
Your part it is to make the ripe fruit fall.

[She enters the palace.]

CHOR. Why, why at the doors
Of my fore-seeing heart
Does this terror keep beating its wings?
And my song play the prophet Unbidden, unhired—
Which I cannot spit out
Like the enigmas of dreams
Nor plausible confidence
Sit on the throne of my mind?
It is long time since
The cables let down from the stern
Were chafed by the sand when the seafaring army started for Troy.

And I learn with my eyes
And witness myself their return;
But the hymn without lyre goes up,
The dirge of the Avenging Fiend,
In the depths of my self-taught heart
Which has lost its dear
Possession of the strength of hope.
But my guts and my heart
Are not idle which seethe with the waves
Of trouble nearing its hour.

But I pray that these thoughts
May fall out not as I think
And not be fulfilled in the end.

Truly when health grows much
It respects not limit; for disease,
Its neighbour in the next door room,
Presses upon it.
A man's life, crowding sail,
Strikes on the blind reef:
But if caution in advance
Jettison part of the cargo
With the derrick of due proportion,
The whole house does not sink,
Though crammed with a weight of woe
The hull does not go under.
The abundant bounty of God
And his gifts from the year's furrows Drive the famine back.

But when upon the ground there has fallen once
The black blood of a man's death,
Who shall summon it back by incantations?
Even Asclepius who had the art
To fetch the dead to life, even to him
Zeus put a provident end.
But, if of the heaven-sent fates
One did not check the other,
Cancel the other's advantage,
My heart would outrun my tongue
In pouring out these fears.
But now it mutters in the dark, Embittered, no way of hoping
To unravel a scheme in time
From a burning mind.

[CLYTEMNESTRA appears in the door of the palace.]

CLYT. Go in too, you; I speak to you, Cassandra, Since God in his clemency has put you in this house
To share our holy water, standing with many slaves
Beside the altar that protects the house,

971–979. But if caution . . . back: These lines refer to a traditional Greek belief that the fortunate man could avert the envy of heaven by deliberately getting rid of some precious possession.

983. Asclepius: the great physician, who was so skillful that he finally succeeded in restoring a dead man to life. Zeus struck him with a thunderbolt for going too far.

997. holy water: used in the sacrifice in honor of Agamemnon's return which is about to take place inside the house.

Step down from the car there, do not be overproud.
Heracles himself they say was once
Sold, and endured to eat the bread of slavery.
But should such a chance inexorably fall,
There is much advantage in masters who have long been rich.
Those who have reaped a crop they never expected
Are in all things hard on their slaves and overstep the line.
From us you will have the treatment of tradition.

LEAD. You, it is you she has addressed, and clearly.
Caught as you are in these predestined toils
Obey her if you can. But should you disobey . . .

CLYT. If she has more than the gibberish of the swallow,
An unintelligible barbaric speech,
I hope to read her mind, persuade her reason.

LEAD. As things now stand for you, she says the best.
Obey her; leave that car and follow her.

CLYT. I have no leisure to waste out here, outside the door.
Before the hearth in the middle of my house
The victims stand already, wait the knife.
You, if you will obey me, waste no time.
But if you cannot understand my language—
[To CHORUS LEADER]
You make it plain to her with the brute and voiceless hand.

LEAD. The stranger seems to need a clear interpreter.
She bears herself like a wild beast newly captured.

CLYT. The fact is she is mad, she listens to evil thoughts,
Who has come here leaving a city newly captured
Without experience how to bear the bridle
So as not to waste her strength in foam and blood.
I will not spend more words to be ignored.
[She re-enters the palace.]

CHOR. But I, for I pity her, will not be angry.
Obey, unhappy woman. Leave this car.
Yield to your fate. Put on the untried yoke.

CASSANDRA. Apollo! Apollo!

CHOR. Why do you cry like this upon Apollo?
He is not the kind of god that calls for dirges.

CASS. Apollo! Apollo!

CHOR. Once more her funereal cries invoke the god
Who has no place at the scene of lamentation.

CASS. Apollo! Apollo!

1000. Heracles: The Greek hero, famous for his twelve labors which rid the earth of monsters, was at one time forced to be slave to Omphale, an Eastern queen.

1010. gibberish of the swallow: The comparison of foreign speech to the twittering of the swallow was a Greek commonplace.

God of the Ways! My destroyer!
Destroyed again—and this time utterly!
CHOR. She seems about to predict her own misfortunes.
The gift of the god endures, even in a slave's mind.
CASS. Apollo! Apollo!
God of the Ways! My destroyer!
Where? To what house, Where, where have you brought me?
CHOR. To the house of the sons of Atreus. If you do not know it,
I will tell you so. You will not find it false.
CASS. No, no, but to a god-hated, but to an accomplice
In much kin-killing, murdering nooses,
Man-shambles, a floor asperged with blood.
CHOR. The stranger seems like a hound with a keen scent,
Is picking up a trail that leads to murder.
CASS. Clues! I have clues! Look! They are these.
These wailing, these children, butchery of children;
Roasted flesh, a father sitting to dinner.
CHOR. Of your prophetic fame we have heard before
But in this matter prophets are not required.
CASS. What is she doing? What is she planning?
What is this new great sorrow?
Great crime . . . within here . . . planning
Unendurable to his folk, impossible Ever to be cured. For help Stands far distant.
CHOR. This reference I cannot catch. But the children
I recognized; that refrain is hackneyed.
CASS. Damned, damned, bringing this work to completion—
Your husband who shared your bed
To bathe him, to cleanse him, and then—
How shall I tell of the end?
Soon, very soon, it will fall.
The end comes hand over hand
Grasping in greed.
CHOR. Not yet do I understand. After her former riddles
Now I am baffled by these dim pronouncements.
CASS. Ah God, the vision! God, God, the vision!

1038. God of the Ways: A statue of Apollo was often placed outside the house overlooking the street. (Perhaps there was one on stage in this scene.) destroyer: The Greek word is apollon, a pun on the god's name.

1044. brought: another pun on the god's name; the word translated "brought" echoes, in the Greek, the word translated "God of the ways."

1049. asperged with blood: She sees Agamemnon murdered in his bath.

1054. a father sitting to dinner: Thyestes at his feast.

1057. she: Clytemnestra.

1061–1062. help stands far distant: a reference to Menelaus (distant in space) and Orestes (distant in time).

A net, is it? Net of Hell!
But herself is the net; shared bed; shares murder.
O let the pack ever-hungering after the family
Howl for the unholy ritual, howl for the victim.
CHOR. What black Spirit is this you call upon the house—
To raise aloft her cries? Your speech does not lighten me.
Into my heart runs back the blood
Yellow as when for men by the spear fallen
The blood ebbs out with the rays of the setting life
And death strides quickly.
CASS. Quick! Be on your guard! The bull—
Keep him clear of the cow.
Caught with a trick, the black horn's point,
She strikes. He falls; lies in the water.
Murder; a trick in a bath. I tell what I see.
CHOR. I would not claim to be expert in oracles
But these, as I deduce, portend disaster.
Do men ever get a good answer from oracles?
No. It is only through disaster
That their garrulous craft brings home
The meaning of the prophet's panic.
CASS. And for me also, for me, chance ill-destined!
My own now I lament, pour into the cup my own.
Where is this you have brought me in my misery?
Unless to die as well. What else is meant?
CHOR. You are mad, mad, carried away by the god,
Raising the dirge, the tuneless
Tune, for yourself. Like the tawny Unsatisfied singer from her luckless heart
Lamenting "Itys, Itys," the nightingale
Lamenting a life luxuriant with grief.
CASS. Oh the lot of the songful nightingale!
The gods enclosed her in a winged body,
Gave her a sweet and tearless passing.
But for me remains the two-edged cutting blade.
CHOR. From whence these rushing and God-inflicted Profitless pains?
Why shape with your sinister crying
The piercing hymn—fear-piercing?
How can you know the evil-worded landmarks

1077. pack ever-hungering: the Furies.

1102–1103. tawny unsatisfied singer: the nightingale. Philomela was raped by Tereus, the husband of her sister Procne. The two sisters avenged themselves by killing Tereus' son Itys, and serving up his flesh to Tereus to eat. Philomela was changed into a nightingale, mourning for Itys (the name is an imitation of the sound of the nightingale's song).

On the prophetic path?
CASS. Oh the wedding, the wedding of Paris—death to his people!
O river Scamander, water drunk by my fathers!
When I was young, alas, upon your beaches
I was brought up and cared for.
But now it is the River of Wailing and the banks of Hell
That shall hear my prophecy soon.
CHOR. What is this clear speech, too clear?
A child can understand it.
I am bitten with fangs that draw blood
By the misery of your cries,
Cries harrowing the heart.
CASS. O trouble on trouble of a city lost, lost utterly!
My father's sacrifices before the towers,
Much killing of cattle and sheep,
No cure—availed not at all
To prevent the coming of what came to Troy,
And I, my brain on fire, shall soon enter the trap.
CHOR. This speech accords with the former.
What god, malicious, over-heavy, persistently pressing,
Drives you to chant of these lamentable Griefs with death their burden?
But I cannot see the end.
[CASSANDRA now steps down from the car.]
CASS. The oracle now no longer from behind veils
Will be peeping forth like a newly-wedded bride;
But I can feel it like a fresh wind swoop
And rush in the face of the dawn and, wave-like, wash
Against the sun a vastly greater grief
Than this one. I shall speak no more conundrums.
And bear me witness, pacing me, that I Am trailing on the scent of ancient wrongs.
For this house here a choir never deserts,
Chanting together ill. For they mean ill,
And to puff up their arrogance they have drunk
Men's blood, this band of revellers that haunts the house,
Hard to be rid of, fiends that attend the family.
Established in its rooms they hymn their hymn
Of that original sin, abhor in turn
The adultery that proved a brother's ruin.
A miss? Or do my arrows hit the mark?
Or am I a quack prophet who knocks at doors, a babbler?
Give me your oath, confess I have the facts,

1153. adultery: Thyestes seduced the wife of Atreus. This was the beginning of strife between the brothers.

The ancient history of this house's crimes.
LEAD. And how could an oath's assurance, however finely assured, Turn out a remedy? I wonder, though, that you
Being brought up overseas, of another tongue,
Should hit on the whole tale as if you had been standing by.
CASS. Apollo the prophet set me to prophesy.
LEAD. Was he, although a god, struck by desire?
CASS. Till now I was ashamed to tell the story.
LEAD. Yes. Good fortune keeps us all fastidious.
CASS. He wrestled hard upon me, panting love.
LEAD. And did you come, as they do, to child-getting?
CASS. No. I agreed to him. And I cheated him.
LEAD. Were you already possessed by the mystic art?
CASS. Already I was telling the townsmen all their future suffering.
LEAD. Then how did you escape the doom of Apollo's anger?
CASS. I did not escape. No one ever believed me.
LEAD. Yet to us your words seem worthy of belief.
CASS. Oh misery, misery!
Again comes on me the terrible labour of true
Prophecy, dizzying prelude; distracts . . .
Do you see these who sit before the house,
Children, like the shapes of dreams?
Children who seem to have been killed by their kinsfolk,
Filling their hands with meat, flesh of themselves,
Guts and entrails, handfuls of lament—
Clear what they hold—the same their father tasted.
For this I declare someone is plotting vengeance—
A lion? Lion but coward, that lurks in bed,
Good watchdog truly against the lord's return—
My lord, for I must bear the yoke of serfdom.
Leader of the ships, overturner of Troy,
He does not know what plots the accursed hound
With the licking tongue and the pricked-up ear will plan
In the manner of a lurking doom, in an evil hour.
A daring criminal! Female murders male.
What monster could provide her with a title?
An amphisbaena or hag of the sea who dwells
In rocks to ruin sailors—
A raving mother of death who breathes against her folk War to the finish. Listen to her shout of triumph,
Who shirks no horrors, like men in a rout of battle.

1184. Lion but coward: Aegisthus.
1188. hound: Clytemnestra.
1193. amphisbaena: a fabulous serpent with a head at either end; the word means literally "going in both directions."

And yet she poses as glad at their return.
If you distrust my words, what does it matter?
That which will come will come. You too will soon stand here
And admit with pity that I spoke too truly.
LEAD. Thyestes' dinner of his children's meat
I understood and shuddered, and fear grips me
To hear the truth, not framed in parables.
But hearing the rest I am thrown out of my course.
CASS. It is Agamemnon's death I tell you you shall witness.
LEAD. Stop! Provoke no evil. Quiet your mouth!
CASS. The god who gives me words is here no healer.
LEAD. Not if this shall be so. But may some chance avert it.
CASS. You are praying. But others are busy with murder.
LEAD. What man is he promotes this terrible thing?
CASS. Indeed you have missed my drift by a wide margin!
LEAD. But I do not understand the assassin's method.
CASS. And yet too well I know the speech of Greece!
LEAD. So does Delphi but the replies are hard.
CASS. Ah what a fire it is! It comes upon me.
Apollo, Wolf-Destroyer, pity, pity . . .
It is the two-foot lioness who beds
Beside a wolf, the noble lion away,
It is she will kill me. Brewing a poisoned cup
She will mix my punishment too in the angry draught
And boasts, sharpening the dagger for her husband,
To pay back murder, for my bringing here.
Why then do I wear these mockeries of myself,
The wand and the prophet's garland round my neck?
My hour is coming—but you shall perish first.
Destruction! Scattered thus you give me my revenge;
Go and enrich some other woman with ruin.
See: Apollo himself is stripping me
Of my prophetic gear, who has looked on
When in this dress I have been a laughing-stock
To friends and foes alike, and to no purpose;
They called me crazy, like a fortune-teller,
A poor starved beggar-woman—and I bore it.
And now the prophet undoing his prophetess
Has brought me to this final darkness.
Instead of my father's altar the executioner's block
Waits me the victim, red with my hot blood.

1208. healer: one of Apollo's titles.
1212. missed my drift: in speaking of a man instead of a woman.
1215. Delphi: The replies of the Delphic oracle were celebrated for their obscurity and ambiguity.

But the gods will not ignore me as I die.
One will come after to avenge my death,
A matricide, a murdered father's champion.
Exile and tramp and outlaw he will come back
To gable the family house of fatal crime;
His father's outstretched corpse shall lead him home.
Why need I then lament so pitifully?
For now that I have seen the town of Troy
Treated as she was treated, while her captors
Come to their reckoning thus by the gods' verdict,
I will go in and have the courage to die.
Look, these gates are the gates of Death. I greet them.
And I pray that I may meet a deft and mortal stroke
So that without a struggle I may close
My eyes and my blood ebb in easy death.

LEAD. Oh woman very unhappy and very wise,
Your speech was long. But if in sober truth
You know your fate, why like an ox that the gods
Drive, do you walk so bravely to the altar?

CASS. There is no escape, strangers. No; not by postponement.

LEAD. But the last moment has the privilege of hope.

CASS. The day is here. Little should I gain by flight.

LEAD. This patience of yours comes from a brave soul.

CASS. A happy man is never paid that compliment.

LEAD. But to die with credit graces a mortal man.

CASS. Oh my father! You and your noble sons!

[She approaches the door, then suddenly recoils.]

LEAD. What is it? What is the fear that drives you back?

CASS. Faugh.

LEAD. Why faugh? Or is this some hallucination?

CASS. These walls breathe out a death that drips with blood.

LEAD. Not so. It is only the smell of the sacrifice.

CASS. It is like a breath out of a charnel-house.

LEAD. You think our palace burns odd incense then!

CASS. But I will go to lament among the dead
My lot and Agamemnon's. Enough of life!
Strangers,
I am not afraid like a bird afraid of a bush
But witness you my words after my death
When a woman dies in return for me a woman
And a man falls for a man with a wicked wife.
I ask this service, being about to die.

LEAD. Alas, I pity you for the death you have foretold.

1240 ff., one will come after . . . : These lines refer to Orestes.

CASS. One more speech I have; I do not wish to raise
The dirge for my own self. But to the sun I pray
In face of his last light that my avengers
May make my murderers pay for this my death,
Death of a woman slave, an easy victim.
[She enters the palace.]

LEAD. Ah the fortunes of men! When they go well
A shadow sketch would match them, and in ill-fortune
The dab of a wet sponge destroys the drawing.
It is not myself but the life of man I pity.
CHOR. Prosperity in all men cries
For more prosperity. Even the owner
Of the finger-pointed-at palace never shuts
His door against her, saying "Come no more."
So to our king the blessed gods had granted
To take the town of Priam, and heaven-favoured
He reaches home. But now if for former bloodshed
He must pay blood
And dying for the dead shall cause
Other deaths in atonement
What man could boast he was born Secure, who heard this story?
AGAM. [Within] Oh! I am struck a mortal blow—within!
LEAD. Silence! Listen. Who calls out, wounded with a mortal stroke?
AGAM. Again—the second blow—I am struck again.
LEAD. You heard the king cry out. I think the deed is done.
Let us see if we can concert some sound proposal.
2ND OLD MAN. Well, I will tell you my opinion—
Raise an alarm, summon the folk to the palace.
3RD OLD MAN. I say burst in with all speed possible,
Convict them of the deed while still the sword is wet.
4TH OLD MAN. And I am partner to some such suggestion.
I am for taking some course. No time to dawdle.
5TH OLD MAN. The case is plain. This is but the beginning.
They are going to set up dictatorship in the state.
6TH OLD MAN. We are wasting time. The assassins tread to earth
The decencies of delay and gives their hands no sleep.
7TH OLD MAN. I do not know what plan I could hit on to propose.
The man who acts is in the position to plan.
8TH OLD MAN. So I think, too, for I am at a loss
To raise the dead man up again with words.
9TH OLD MAN. Then to stretch out our life shall we yield thus

To the rule of these profaners of the house?
10TH OLD MAN. It is not to be endured. To die is better.
Death is more comfortable than tyranny.
11TH OLD MAN. And are we on the evidence of groans Going to give oracle that the prince is dead?
12TH OLD MAN. We must know the facts for sure and then be angry.
Guesswork is not the same as certain knowledge.
LEAD. Then all of you back me and approve this plan—
To ascertain how it is with Agamemnon
[The doors of the palace open, revealing the bodies of AGAMEMNON and CASSANDRA. CLYTEMNESTRA stands above them.]
CLYT. Much having been said before to fit the moment,
To say the opposite now will not outface me.
How else could one serving hate upon the hated,
Thought to be friends, hang high the nets of doom
To preclude all leaping out?
For me I have long been training for this match,
I tried a fall and won—a victory overdue.
I stand here where I struck, above my victims;
So I contrived it—this I will not deny—
That he could neither fly nor ward off death;
Inextricable like a net for fishes
I cast about him a vicious wealth of raiment
And struck him twice and with two groans he loosed
His limbs beneath him, and upon him fallen
I deal him the third blow to the God beneath the earth,
To the safe keeper of the dead a votive gift,
And with that he spits his life out where he lies
And smartly spouting blood he sprays me with The sombre drizzle of bloody dew and I Rejoice no less than in God's gift of rain
The crops are glad when the ear of corn gives birth.
These things being so, you, elders of Argos,
Rejoice if rejoice you will. Mine is the glory.
And if I could pay this corpse his due libation
I should be right to pour it and more than right;
With so many horrors this man mixed and filled
The bowl—and, coming home, has drained the draught himself.
LEAD. Your speech astonishes us. This brazen boast Above the man who was your king and husband!
CLYT. You challenge me as a woman without foresight

1345. third blow to the God beneath the earth: like the third libation to Zeus above.

But I with unflinching heart to you who know Speak. And you, whether you will praise or blame,
It makes no matter. Here lies Agamemnon,
My husband, dead, the work of this right hand,
An honest workman. There you have the facts.
CHOR. Woman, what poisoned
Herb of the earth have you tasted
Or potion of the flowing sea
To undertake this killing and the people's curses?
You threw down, you cut off—The people will cast you out,
Black abomination to the town.
CLYT. Now your verdict—in my case—is exile
And to have the people's hatred, the public curses,
Though then in no way you opposed this man
Who carelessly, as if it were a head of sheep
Out of the abundance of his fleecy flocks, Sacrificed his own daughter, to me the dearest
Fruit of travail, charm for the Thracian winds.
He was the one to have banished from this land,
Pay off the pollution. But when you hear what I Have done, you judge severely. But I warn you—Threaten me on the understanding that I am ready
For two alternatives—Win by force the right
To rule me, but, if God brings about the contrary,
Late in time you will have to learn self-discipline.
CHOR. You are high in the thoughts,
You speak extravagant things,
After the soiling murder your crazy heart
Fancies your forehead with a smear of blood.
Unhonoured, unfriended, you must Pay for a blow with a blow.
CLYT. Listen then to this—the sanction of my oaths:
By the Justice totting up my child's atonement,
By the Avenging Doom and Fiend to whom I killed this man,
For me hope walks not in the rooms of fear
So long as my fire is lit upon my hearth
By Aegisthus, loyal to me as he was before.
The man who outraged me lies here,
The darling of each courtesan at Troy,
And here with him is the prisoner clairvoyant,
The fortune-teller that he took to bed,
Who shares his bed as once his bench on shipboard,
A loyal mistress. Both have their deserts.
He lies so; and she who like a swan
Sang her last dying lament

Lies his lover, and the sight contributes
An appetiser to my own bed's pleasure.
CHOR. Ah would some quick death come not overpainful,
Not overlong on the sickbed,
Establishing in us the ever-Lasting unending sleep now that our guardian
Has fallen, the kindest of men,
Who suffering much for a woman
By a woman has lost his life.
O Helen, insane, being one
One to have destroyed so many
And many souls under Troy,
Now is your work complete, blossomed not for oblivion,
Unfading stain of blood. Here now, if in any home,
Is Discord, here is a man's deep-rooted ruin.
CLYT. Do not pray for the portion of death Weighed down by these things, do not turn
Your anger on Helen as destroyer of men,
One woman destroyer of many Lives of Greek men,
A hurt that cannot be healed.
CHOR. O Evil Spirit, falling on the family,
On the two sons of Atreus and using
Two sisters in heart as your tools,
A power that bites to the heart—
See on the body
Perched like a raven he gloats
Harshly croaking his hymn.
CLYT. Ah, now you have amended your lips' opinion, Calling upon this family's three times gorged
Genius—demon who breeds
Blood-hankering lust in the belly:
Before the old sore heals, new pus collects.
CHOR. It is a great spirit—great—
You tell of, harsh in anger,
A ghastly tale, alas,
Of unsatisfied disaster
Brought by Zeus, by Zeus,
Cause and worker of all.
For without Zeus what comes to pass among us?
Which of these things is outside Providence?
O my king, my king,
How shall I pay you in tears,
Speak my affection in words?
You lie in that spider's web,
In a desecrating death breathe out your life,

Lie ignominiously
Defeated by a crooked death
And the two-edged cleaver's stroke.

CLYT. You say this is my work—mine?
Do not cozen yourself that I am Agamemnon's wife.
Masquerading as the wife
Of the corpse there the old sharp-witted Genius
Of Atreus who gave the cruel banquet
Has paid with a grown man's life
The due for children dead.

CHOR. That you are not guilty of
This murder who will attest?
No, but you may have been abetted
By some ancestral Spirit of Revenge.
Wading a millrace of the family's blood
The black Manslayer forces a forward path
To make the requital at last
For the eaten children, the blood-clot cold with time.
O my king, my king,
How shall I pay you in tears,
Speak my affection in words?
You lie in that spider's web,
In a desecrating death breathe out your life,
Lie ignominiously
Defeated by a crooked death
And the two-edged cleaver's stroke.

CLYT. Did he not, too, contrive a crooked Horror for the house? My child by him, Shoot that I raised, much-wept-for Iphigeneia,
He treated her like this;
So suffering like this he need not make Any great brag in Hell having paid with death Dealt by the sword for work of his own beginning.

CHOR. I am at a loss for thought, I lack
All nimble counsel as to where
To turn when the house is falling.
I fear the house-collapsing crashing
Blizzard of blood—of which these drops are earnest.
Now is Destiny sharpening her justice
On other whetstones for a new infliction.
O earth, earth, if only you had received me
Before I saw this man lie here as if in bed
In a bath lined with silver.
Who will bury him? Who will keen him?

1495. keen: mourn for.

Will you, having killed your own husband,
Dare now to lament him
And after great wickedness make Unamending amends to his ghost?
And who above this godlike hero's grave
Pouring praises and tears
Will grieve with a genuine heart?

CLYT. It is not your business to attend to that.
By my hand he fell low, lies low and dead,
And I shall bury him low down in the earth,
And his household need not weep him
For Iphigeneia his daughter
Tenderly, as is right,
Will meet her father at the rapid ferry of sorrows,
Put her arms round him and kiss him!

CHOR. Reproach answers reproach,
It is hard to decide,
The catcher is caught, the killer pays for his kill.
But the law abides while Zeus abides enthroned
That the wrongdoer suffers. That is established.
Who could expel from the house the seed of the Curse?
The race is soldered in sockets of Doom and Vengeance.

CLYT. In this you say what is right and the will of God.
But for my part I am ready to make a contract
With the Evil Genius of the House of Atreus
To accept what has been till now, hard though it is,
But that for the future he shall leave this house
And wear away some other stock with deaths Imposed among themselves. Of my possessions
A small part will suffice if only I Can rid these walls of the mad exchange of murder.

[Enter AEGISTHUS, followed by soldiers.]

AEGISTHUS. O welcome light of a justice-dealing day!
From now on I will say that the gods, avenging men,
Look down from above on the crimes of earth,
Seeing as I do in woven robes of the Furies
This man lying here—a sight to warm my heart—
Paying for the crooked violence of his father.
For his father Atreus, when he ruled the country,
Because his power was challenged, hounded out
From state and home his own brother Thyestes.
My father—let me be plain—was this Thyestes,
Who later came back home a suppliant,
There, miserable, found so much asylum
As not to die on the spot, stain the ancestral floor.

But to show his hospitality godless Atreus
Gave him an eager if not a loving welcome,
Pretending a day of feasting and rich meats
Served my father with his children's flesh.
The hands and feet, fingers and toes, he hid
At the bottom of the dish. My father sitting apart Took unknowing the unrecognizable portion
And ate of a dish that has proved, as you see, expensive.
But when he knew he had eaten worse than poison
He fell back groaning, vomiting their flesh,
And invoking a hopeless doom on the sons of Pelops
Kicked over the table to confirm his curse—
So may the whole race perish!
Result of this—you see this man lie here.
I stitched this murder together; it was my title.
Me the third son he left, an unweaned infant,
To share the bitterness of my father's exile.
But I grew up and Justice brought me back,
I grappled this man while still beyond his door,
Having pieced together the programme of his ruin.
So now would even death be beautiful to me
Having seen Agamemnon in the nets of Justice.

LEAD. Aegisthus. I cannot respect brutality in distress.
You claim that you deliberately killed this prince
And that you alone planned this pitiful murder.
Be sure that in your turn your head shall not escape
The people's volleyed curses mixed with stones.

AEG. Do you speak so who sit at the lower oar
While those on the upper bench control the ship?
Old as you are, you will find it is a heavy load
To go to school when old to learn the lesson of tact.
For old age, too, gaol and hunger are fine
Instructors in wisdom, second-sighted doctors.
You have eyes. Cannot you see?
Do not kick against the pricks. The blow will hurt you.

LEAD. You woman waiting in the house for those who return from battle
While you seduce their wives! Was it you devised
The death of a master of armies?

AEG. And these words, too, prepare the way for tears.
Contrast your voice with the voice of Orpheus: he Led all things after him bewitched with joy, but you Having stung me with your silly yelps shall be 1550. Pelops: the founder of the line.

Led off yourself, to prove more mild when mastered.
LEAD. Indeed! So you are now to be king of Argos,
You who, when you had plotted the king's death,
Did not even dare to do that thing yourself!
AEG. No. For the trick of it was clearly woman's work.
I was suspect, an enemy of old.
But now I shall try with Agamemnon's wealth
To rule the people. Any who is disobedient
I will harness in a heavy yoke, no tracehorse work for him
Like barley-fed colt, but hateful hunger lodging
Beside him in the dark will see his temper soften.
LEAD. Why with your cowardly soul did you yourself
Not strike this man but left that work to a woman Whose presence pollutes our country and its gods?
But Orestes—does he somewhere see the light
That he may come back here by favour of fortune
And kill this pair and prove the final victor?
AEG. [Summoning his guards] Well, if such is your design in deeds and words, you will quickly learn—
Here my friends, here my guards, there is work for you at hand.
LEAD. Come then, hands on hilts, be each and all of us prepared.
[The old men and the guards threaten each other.]
AEG. Very well! I too am ready to meet death with sword in hand.
LEAD. We are glad you speak of dying. We accept your words for luck.
CLYT. No, my dearest, do not so. Add no more to the train of wrong.
To reap these many present wrongs is harvest enough of misery.
Enough of misery. Start no more. Our hands are red.
But do you, and you old men, go home and yield to fate in time,
In time before you suffer. We have acted as we had to act.
If only our afflictions now could prove enough, we should agree—
We who have been so hardly mauled in the heavy claws of the evil god.
So stands my word, a woman's, if any man thinks fit to hear.
AEG. But to think that these should thus pluck the blooms of an idle tongue
And should throw out words like these, giving the evil god his chance,
And should miss the path of prudence and insult their master so!
LEAD. It is not the Argive way to fawn upon a cowardly man.
AEG. Perhaps. But I in later days will take further steps with you.

1590. tracehorse: an extra horse, outside the yoke, which does less work than the others.

LEAD. Not if the god who rules the family guides Orestes to his home.
AEG. Yes. I know that men in exile feed themselves on barren hopes.
LEAD. Go on, grow fat defiling justice . . . while you have your hour.
AEG. Do not think you will not pay me a price for your stupidity. 1620 LEAD. Boast on in your self-assurance, like a cock beside his hen.
CLYT. Pay no heed, Aegisthus, to these futile barkings. You and I, Masters of this house, from now shall order all things well.
[They enter the palace.]

THUCYDIDES

History of the Peloponnesian War*

[Athenian Democracy—The Athenians from the Enemy's Point of View]†

[This is an extract from a speech made by the representatives of Corinth, a city bitterly hostile to Athens, at a congress of Spartan allies meeting at Sparta in 432 B.C. to discuss the question of peace or war with Athens. The Spartans were hesitant, and in this speech the Corinthian ambassadors urge them to take a firm stand.]

You have never considered what manner of men are these Athenians with whom you will have to fight, and how utterly unlike yourselves. They are revolutionary, equally quick in the conception and in the execution of every new plan; while you are conservative —careful only to keep what you have, originating nothing, and not acting even when action is most necessary. They are bold beyond their strength; they run risks which prudence would condemn; and in the midst of misfortune they are full of hope. Whereas it is your nature, though strong, to act feebly; when your plans are most prudent, to distrust them; and when calamities come upon you, to think that you will never be delivered from them. They are impetuous, and you are dilatory; they are always abroad, and you are always at home. For they hope to gain something by leaving their homes; but you are afraid that any new enterprise may imperil what you have already. When conquerors, they pursue their victory to the utmost; when defeated, they fall back the least. Their bodies they devote to their country as though they belonged to other men; their true self is their mind, which is most truly their own when employed in her service. When they do not carry out an intention which they have formed, they seem to have sustained a personal bereavement; when an enterprise succeeds, they have gained a mere instalment of what is to come; but if they fail, they at once conceive new hopes and so fill up the void. With them alone to hope is to have, for they lose not a moment in the execution of an idea. This is the life-long task, full of danger and toil, which they are always imposing upon themselves. None enjoy their good things less, because they are always seeking for more. To do their duty is their only holiday, and they deem the quiet of inaction to be as disagreeable as the most tiresome business. If a man should say of them, in a word, that they were born neither to have peace themselves nor to allow peace to other men, he would simply speak the truth.

* Translated by Benjamin Jowett. † From Book I, Chapter 70.

[Athenian Democracy—The Athenians, a Self-Portrait]*

During the same winter,[1] in accordance with an old national custom, the funeral of those who first fell in this war was celebrated by the Athenians at the public charge. The ceremony is as follows: Three days before the celebration they erect a tent in which the bones of the dead are laid out, and every one brings to his own dead any offering which he pleases. At the time of the funeral the bones are placed in chests of cypress wood, which are conveyed on hearses; there is one chest for each tribe.[2] They also carry a single empty litter decked with a pall for all whose bodies are missing, and cannot be recovered after the battle. The procession is accompanied by any one who chooses, whether citizen or stranger, and the female relatives of the deceased are present at the place of interment and make lamentation. The public sepulchre is situated in the most beautiful spot outside the walls; there they always bury those who fall in war; only after the battle of Marathon[3] the dead, in recognition of their pre-eminent valor, were interred on the field. When the remains have been laid in the earth, some man of known ability and high reputation, chosen by the city, delivers a suitable oration over them; after which the people depart. Such is the manner of interment; and the ceremony was repeated from time to time throughout the war. Over those who were the first buried Pericles[4] was chosen to speak. At the fitting moment he advanced from the sepulchre to a

* From Book II, Chapters 34–46.

1. 431–430 B.C.

2. The Athenian citizen body was organized in ten tribes.

3. on the coast of Attica. In this battle (490 B.C.) the Athenians, alone except for a small contingent from the neighboring city of Plataea, defeated a Persian expeditionary force.

4. the statesman who guided the policies of the Athenian democracy during its greatest years. He died in the next year, 430 B.C.

lofty stage, which had been erected in order that he might be heard as far as possible by the multitude, and spoke as follows:

"Most of those who have spoken here before me have commended the lawgiver who added this oration to our other funeral customs; it seemed to them a worthy thing that such an honor should be given at their burial to the dead who have fallen on the field of battle. But I should have preferred that, when men's deeds have been brave, they should be honored in deed only, and with such an honor as this public funeral, which you are now witnessing. Then the reputation of many would not have been imperilled on the eloquence or want of eloquence of one, and their virtues believed or not as he spoke well or ill. For it is difficult to say neither too little nor too much; and even moderation is apt not to give the impression of truthfulness. The friend of the dead who knows the facts is likely to think that the words of the speaker fall short of his knowledge and of his wishes; another who is not so well informed, when he hears of anything which surpasses his own powers, will be envious and will suspect exaggeration. Mankind are tolerant of the praises of others so long as each hearer thinks that he can do as well or nearly as well himself, but, when the speaker rises above him, jealousy is aroused and he begins to be incredulous. However, since our ancestors have set the seal of their approval upon the practice, I must obey, and to the utmost of my power shall endeavor to satisfy the wishes and beliefs of all who hear me.

"I will speak first of our ancestors, for it is right and becoming that now, when we are lamenting the dead, a tribute should be paid to their memory. There has never been a time when they did not inhabit this land,[5] which by their valor they have handed down from generation to generation, and we have received from them a free state. But if they were worthy of praise, still more were our fathers, who added to their inheritance, and after many a struggle transmitted to us their sons this great empire.[6] And we ourselves assembled here to-day, who are still most of us in the vigor of life, have chiefly done the work of improvement, and have richly endowed our city with all things, so that she is sufficient for herself both in peace and war. Of the military exploits by which our various possessions were acquired, or of the energy with which we or our fathers drove back the tide of war, Hellenic or Barbarian,[7] I will not speak; for the tale would be long and is familiar to you. But

5. The Athenians boasted uninterrupted descent from the first inhabitants of the land.

6. After the defeat of the Persian invaders in 479 B.C. the Athenians organized a league of the Greek cities on the islands and the Asiatic mainland for defense against any renewed Persian attack; as the years went by this league was transformed from a league dominated by the Athenians into an empire which they ruled.

7. Hellenic or Barbarian: Greek or Persian.

before I praise the dead, I should like to point out by what principles of action we rose to power, and under what institutions and through what manner of life our empire became great. For I conceive that such thoughts are not unsuited to the occasion,[8] and that this numerous assembly of citizens and strangers may profitably listen to them.

"Our form of government does not enter into rivalry with the institutions of others. We do not copy our neighbors, but are an example to them. It is true that we are called a democracy, for the administration is in the hands of the many and not of the few.[9] But while the law secures equal justice to all alike in their private disputes, the claim of excellence is also recognized; and when a citizen is in any way distinguished, he is preferred to the public service, not as a matter of privilege, but as the reward of merit. Neither is poverty a bar, but a man may benefit his country whatever be the obscurity of his condition. There is no exclusiveness in our public life, and in our private intercourse we are not suspicious of one another, nor angry with our neighbor if he does what he likes; we do not put on sour looks at him which, though harmless, are not pleasant. While we are thus unconstrained in our private intercourse, a spirit of reverence pervades our public acts; we are prevented from doing wrong by respect for authority and for the laws, having an especial regard to those which are ordained for the protection of the injured as well as to those unwritten laws which bring upon the transgressor of them the reprobation of the general sentiment.

"And we have not forgotten to provide for our weary spirits many relaxations from toil; we have regular games and sacrifices throughout the year; at home the style of our life is refined; and the delight which we daily feel in all these things helps to banish melancholy. Because of the greatness of our city the fruits of the whole earth flow in upon us; so that we enjoy the goods of other countries as freely as of our own.

"Then, again, our military training is in many respects superior to that of our adversaries. Our city is thrown open to the world, and we never expel a foreigner or prevent him from seeing or learning anything of which the secret if revealed to an enemy might profit

8. Thucydides tells his readers (Book I, Chapter 22) how he composed this and other speeches: "As to the speeches . . . it was hard for me, and for others who reported them to me, to recollect the exact words. I have therefore put into the mouth of each speaker the sentiments proper to the occasion, expressed as I thought he would be likely to express them, while at the same time I endeavoured, as nearly as I could, to give the general purport of what was actually said."

9. The word "democracy" is composed of the two Greek words demos and kratos, which mean "people" and "power" respectively.

him.[10] We rely not upon management or trickery, but upon our own hearts and hands. And in the matter of education, whereas they from early youth are always undergoing laborious exercises which are to make them brave, we live at ease, and yet are equally ready to face the perils which they face. And here is the proof. The Lacedaemonians[11] come into Attica not by themselves, but with their whole confederacy following; we go alone into a neighbor's country; and although our opponents are fighting for their homes and we on a foreign soil, we have seldom any difficulty in overcoming them. Our enemies have never yet felt our united strength: the care of a navy divides our attention, and on land we are obliged to send our own citizens everywhere. But they, if they meet and defeat a part of our army, are as proud as if they had routed us all, and when defeated they pretend to have been vanquished by us all.

"If then we prefer to meet danger with a light heart but without laborious training, and with a courage which is gained by habit and not enforced by law, are we not greatly the gainers? Since we do not anticipate the pain, although, when the hour comes, we can be as brave as those who never allow themselves to rest; and thus too our city is equally admirable in peace and in war. For we are lovers of the beautiful, yet simple in our tastes, and we cultivate the mind without loss of manliness. Wealth we employ, not for talk and ostentation, but when there is a real use for it. To avow poverty with us is no disgrace: the true disgrace is in doing nothing to avoid it. An Athenian citizen does not neglect the state because he takes care of his own household; and even those of us who are engaged in business have a very fair idea of politics. We alone regard a man who takes no interest in public affairs, not as a harmless, but as a useless character; and if few of us are originators, we are all sound judges of a policy. The great impediment to action is, in our opinion, not discussion, but the want of that knowledge which is gained by discussion preparatory to action. For we have a peculiar power of thinking before we act and of acting too, whereas other men are courageous from ignorance but hesitate upon reflection. And they are surely to be esteemed the bravest spirits who, having the clearest sense both of the pains and pleasures of life, do not on that account shrink from danger. In doing good, again, we are unlike others; we make our friends by conferring, not by receiving favors. Now he who confers a favor is the firmer friend, because he would fain by kindness keep alive the memory of an obligation; but the recipient is colder in his feelings, because he knows that in requiting

10. In contrast to Sparta, where foreigners were admitted only on state business and then kept under surveillance. The next sentence contrasts the Athenian system of education with the Spartan.

11. Spartans.

another's generosity he will not be winning gratitude, but only paying a debt. We alone do good to our neighbors not upon a calculation of interest, but in the confidence of freedom and in a frank and fearless spirit. To sum up: I say that Athens is the school of Hellas, and that the individual Athenian in his own person seems to have the power of adapting himself to the most varied forms of action with the utmost versatility and grace. This is no passing and idle word, but truth and fact; and the assertion is verified by the position to which these qualities have raised the state. For in the hour of trial Athens alone among her contemporaries is superior to the report of her. No enemy who comes against her is indignant at the reverses which he sustains at the hands of such a city; no subject complains that his masters are unworthy of him. And we shall assuredly not be without witnesses; there are mighty monuments of our power which will make us the wonder of this and of succeeding ages;[12] we shall not need the praises of Homer or of any other panegyrist whose poetry may please for the moment, although his representation of the facts will not bear the light of day. For we have compelled every land and every sea to open a path for our valor, and have everywhere planted eternal memorials of our friendship and of our enmity. Such is the city for whose sake these men nobly fought and died; they could not bear the thought that she might be taken from them; and every one of us who survive should gladly toil on her behalf.

"I have dwelt upon the greatness of Athens because I want to show you that we are contending for a higher prize than those who enjoy none of these privileges, and to establish by manifest proof the merit of these men whom I am now commemorating. Their loftiest praise has been already spoken. For in magnifying the city I have magnified them, and men like them whose virtues made her glorious. And of how few Hellenes can it be said as of them, that their deeds when weighed in the balance have been found equal to their fame! Methinks that a death such as theirs has been given the true measure of a man's worth; it may be the first revelation of his virtues, but is at any rate their final seal. For even those who come short in other ways may justly plead the valor with which they have fought for their country; they have blotted out the evil with the good, and have benefited the state more by their public services than they have injured her by their private actions. None of these men were enervated by wealth or hesitated to resign the pleasures of life; none of them put off the evil day in the hope, natural to poverty, that a man, though poor, may one day become rich. But, deeming that the punishment of their enemies was sweeter than any of these things, and that they could fall in no nobler cause, they determined at the hazard of their lives to be honorably avenged, and to leave the rest. They resigned to hope their unknown chance of happiness; but in the face of death they resolved to rely upon themselves alone. And when the moment came they were minded to resist and suffer, rather than to fly and save their lives; they ran away from the word of dishonor, but on the battle-field their feet stood fast, and in an instant, at the height of their fortune, they passed away from the scene, not of their fear, but of their glory.

12. The ruins of the fifth-century buildings on the Acropolis of Athens are still the wonder of the world.

"Such was the end of these men; they were worthy of Athens, and the living need not desire to have a more heroic spirit, although they may pray for a less fatal issue. The value of such a spirit is not to be expressed in words. Any one can discourse to you for ever about the advantages of a brave defence which you know already. But instead of listening to him I would have you day by day fix your eyes upon the greatness of Athens, until you become filled with the love of her; and when you are impressed by the spectacle of her glory, reflect that this empire has been acquired by men who knew their duty and had the courage to do it, who in the hour of conflict had the fear of dishonor always present to them, and who, if ever they failed in an enterprise, would not allow their virtues to be lost to their country, but freely gave their lives to her as the fairest offering which they could present at her feast. The sacrifice which they collectively made was individually repaid to them; for they received again each one for himself a praise which grows not old, and the noblest of all sepulchres—I speak not of that in which their remains are laid, but of that in which their glory survives, and is proclaimed always and on every fitting occasion both in word and deed. For the whole earth is the sepulchre of famous men; not only are they commemorated by columns and inscriptions in their own country, but in foreign lands there dwells also an unwritten memorial of them, graven not on stone but in the hearts of men. Make them your examples, and, esteeming courage to be freedom and freedom to be happiness, do not weigh too nicely the perils of war. The unfortunate who has no hope of a change for the better has less reason to throw away his life than the prosperous who, if he survive, is always liable to a change for the worse, and to whom any accidental fall makes the most serious difference. To a man of spirit, cowardice and disaster coming together are far more bitter than death, striking him unperceived at a time when he is full of courage and animated by the general hope.

"Wherefore I do not now commiserate the parents of the dead who stand here; I would rather comfort them. You know that your life has been passed amid manifold vicissitudes; and that they may be deemed fortunate who have gained most honor, whether an honorable death like theirs, or an honorable sorrow like yours, and whose days have been so ordered that the term of their happiness is likewise the term of their life. I know how hard it is to make you feel this, when the good fortune of others will too often remind you of the gladness which once lightened your hearts. And sorrow is felt at the want of those blessings, not which a man never knew, but which were a part of his life before they were taken from him. Some of you are of an age at which they may hope to have other children, and they ought to bear their sorrow better; not only will the children who may hereafter be born make them forget their own lost ones, but the city will be doubly a gainer. She will not be left desolate, and she will be safer. For a man's counsel cannot have equal weight or worth, when he alone has no children to risk in the general danger. To those of you who have passed their prime, I say: 'Congratulate yourselves that you have been happy during the greater part of your days; remember that your life of sorrow will not last long, and be comforted by the glory of those who are gone. For the love of honor alone is ever young, and not riches, as some say, but honor is the delight of men when they are old and useless.'

"To you who are the sons and brothers of the departed, I see that the struggle to emulate them will be an arduous one. For all men praise the dead, and, however pre-eminent your virtue may be, hardly will you be thought, I do not say to equal, but even to approach them. The living have their rivals and detractors, but when a man is out of the way, the honor and good-will which he receives is unalloyed. And, if I am to speak of womanly virtues to those of you who will henceforth be widows, let me sum them up in one short admonition: To a woman not to show more weakness than is natural to her sex is a great glory, and not to be talked about for good or for evil among men.

"I have paid the required tribute, in obedience to the law, making use of such fitting words as I had. The tribute of deeds has been paid in part; for the dead have been honorably interred, and it remains only that their children should be maintained at the public charge until they are grown up; this is the solid prize with which, as with a garland, Athens crowns her sons living and dead, after a struggle like theirs. For where the rewards of virtue are greatest, there the noblest citizens are enlisted in the service of the state. And now, when you have duly lamented, every one of his own dead, you may depart."

SOPHOCLES
(495?–406 B.C.)
Oedipus Tyrannus*

Characters

OEDIPUS, RULER OF THEBES
JOCASTA, WIFE OF OEDIPUS
CREON, BROTHER OF JOCASTA
TEIRESIAS, A BLIND PROPHET
A PRIEST
MESSENGER 1
MESSENGER 2
A SHEPHERD
AN ATTENDANT
ANTIGONE, ISMENE } DAUGHTERS OF OEDIPUS AND JOCASTA
CHORUS OF THEBAN ELDERS

SCENE.—In front of the doors of the palace of Oedipus at Thebes. A crowd of citizens sits at an altar in supplication. Among them is an old man, the PRIEST of Zeus.

[Enter, through the doors, OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS: What is it, children, sons of the ancient house of Cadmus?[1] Why do you sit as suppliants crowned with laurel branches? What is the meaning of the incense which fills the city? The pleas to end pain? The cries of sorrow? I chose not to hear it from my messengers, but came myself—I came, Oedipus, Oedipus, whose name is known to all. You, old one—age gives you the right to speak for all of them—you tell me why they sit before my altar. Has something frightened you? What brings you here? Some need? Some want? I'll help you all I can. I would be cruel did I not greet you with compassion when you are gathered here before me.

PRIEST: My Lord and King, we represent the young and old; some are priests and some the best of Theban youth. And I—I am a priest of Zeus. There are many more who carry laurel boughs[2] like these—in the market-places, at the twin altars of Pallas,[3] by the sacred ashes of Ismenus' oracle.[4] You see yourself how torn our city is, how she craves relief from the waves of death which now crash over her. Death is everywhere—in the harvests of the land, in the flocks that roam the pastures, in the unborn children

* Translated by Luci Berkowitz and Theodore F. Brunner. Copyright © 1970 by W. W. Norton & Company, Inc. The date of the play's first production is unknown but is usually taken to be 430 B.C. or a few years later.

1. Cadmus: founder of Thebes and its first king.

2. laurel boughs: the suppliant carried a branch, which he laid on the altar and left there until his request was granted. At the end of this scene, Oedipus tells the suppliants to take their branches away.

3. Pallas: Athena.

4. Ismenus' oracle: in a temple of Apollo near the river Ismenus, where burnt offerings were made and prophecies given.

of our mothers' wombs. A fiery plague is ravaging the city, festering, spreading its pestilence, wasting the house of Cadmus, filling the house of Hades with screams of pain and of fear. This is the reason why we come to you, these children and I. No, we do not think you a god. But we deem you a mortal set apart to face life's common issues and the trials which the gods dispense to men. It was you who once before came to Thebes and freed us from the spell that hypnotized our lives.[5] You did this, and yet you knew no more than we—less even. You had no help from us. God aided you. Yes, you restored our life. And now a second time, great Oedipus, we turn to you for help. Find some relief for us, whether with god or man to guide your way. You helped us then. Yes. And we believe that you will help us now. O Lord, revive our city; restore her life. Think of your fame, your own repute. The people know you saved us from our past despair. Let no one say you raised us up to let us fall. Save us and keep us safe. You found good omens once to aid you and brought us fortune then. Find them again. If you will rule this land as king and lord, rule over men and not a wall encircling emptiness. No city wall, no ship can justify its claim to strength if it is stripped of men who give it life.

OEDIPUS: O my children, I know well the pain you suffer and understand what brings you here. You suffer—and yet not one among you suffers more than I. Each of you grieves for himself alone, while my heart must bear the strain of sorrow for all—myself and you and all our city's people. No, I am not blind to it. I have wept and in my weeping set my thoughts on countless paths, searching for an answer. I have sent my own wife's brother Creon, son of Menoeceus, to Apollo's Pythian shrine[6] to learn what I might say or do to ease our city's suffering. I am concerned that he is not yet here—he left many days ago. But this promise: whenever he returns, whatever news he brings, whatever course the god reveals—that is the course that I shall take.

PRIEST: Well spoken. Look! They are giving signs that Creon is returning.

OEDIPUS: O God! If only he brings news as welcome as his smiling face.

PRIEST: I think he does. His head is crowned with laurel leaves.

OEDIPUS: We shall know soon enough. There. My Lord Creon, what word do you bring from the god?

[Enter CREON.]

CREON: Good news. I tell you this: if all goes well, our troubles will be past.

OEDIPUS: But what was the oracle? Right now I'm swaying between hope and fear.

5. spell: the Sphinx, a winged female monster which terrorized the city of Thebes until her riddle was finally answered by Oedipus. The riddle was: "What is it that walks on four feet and two feet and three feet and has only one voice; when it walks on most feet, it is weakest?" Oedipus' answer was Man. (He has four feet as a child crawling on all fours, and three feet in old age when he walks with the aid of a stick.)

6. Pythian shrine: the oracle of Apollo at Delphi.

CREON: If you want to hear it in the presence of these people, I shall tell you. If not, let's go inside.

OEDIPUS: Say it before all of us. I sorrow more for them than for myself.

CREON: Then I shall tell you exactly what the god Apollo answered. These are his words: Pollution. A hidden sore is festering in our land. We are to stop its growth before it is too late.

OEDIPUS: Pollution? How are we to save ourselves?

CREON: Blood for blood. To save ourselves we are to banish a man or pay for blood with blood. It is a murder which has led to this despair.

OEDIPUS: Murder? Whose? Did the god say whose . . . ?

CREON: My Lord, before you came to rule our city, we had a king. His name was Laius . . .

OEDIPUS: I know, although I never saw him.

CREON: He was murdered. And the god's command is clear: we must find the assassin and destroy him.

OEDIPUS: But where? Where is he to be found? How can we find the traces of a crime committed long ago?

CREON: He lives among us. If we seek, we will find; what we do not seek cannot be found.

OEDIPUS: Where was it that Laius met his death? At home? The country? In some foreign land?

CREON: One day he left and told us he would go to Delphi. That was the last we saw of him.

OEDIPUS: And there was no one who could tell what happened? No one who traveled with him? Did no one see? Is there no evidence?

CREON: All perished. All—except one who ran in panic from the scene and could not tell us anything for certain, except . . .

OEDIPUS: Except? What? What was it? One clue might lead to many. We have to grasp the smallest shred of hope.

CREON: He said that robbers—many of them—fell upon Laius and his men and murdered them.

OEDIPUS: Robbers? Who committed murder? Why? Unless they were paid assassins?

CREON: We considered that. But the king was dead and we were plagued with trouble. No one came forth as an avenger.

OEDIPUS: Trouble? What could have kept you from investigating the death of your king?

CREON: The Sphinx. The Sphinx was confounding us with her riddles, forcing us to abandon our search for the unknown and to tend to what was then before us.

OEDIPUS: Then I—I shall begin again. I shall not cease until I bring the truth to light. Apollo has shown, and you have shown, the duty which we owe the dead. You have my gratitude. You will find me a firm ally, and together we shall exact vengeance for our land and for the god. I shall not rest till I dispel this defilement—not just for another man's sake, but for my own as well. For whoever the assassin—he might turn his hand against me too. Yes, I shall be serving Laius and myself. Now go, my children. Leave the steps of my altar. Go. Take away your laurel branches. Go to the people of Cadmus. Summon them.[7] Tell them that I, their king, will leave nothing untried. And with the help of God, we shall find success—or ruin.

[Exit OEDIPUS.]

PRIEST: Come, children. We have learned what we came to learn.
Come, Apollo, come yourself, who sent these oracles!
Come as our savior! Come! Deliver us from this plague!

CHORUS:

O prophecy of Zeus,[8] sweet is the sound of your words as they come to our glorious city of Thebes from Apollo's glittering shrine.
Yet I quake and I dread and I tremble at those words.
Io, Delian Lord![9]

What will you bring to pass? Disaster unknown, or familiar to us, as the ever recurring seasons?
Tell me, O oracle,
heavenly daughter of blessèd hope.

Foremost I call on you, daughter of Zeus, Athena, goddess supreme;
and on Artemis,[10] shielding the world, shielding this land from her circular shrine graced with renown.
And on you I call, Phoebus,[11] Lord of the unerring bow.

Come to my aid, you averters of doom!
Come to my aid if ever you came!
Come to my aid as once you did, when you quenched
the fires of doom that fell on our soil!
Hear me, and come to my aid!

Boundless the pain, boundless the grief I bear;
sickness pervades this land, affliction without reprieve.
Barren the soil, barren of fruit;
children are born no longer to light;
all of us flutter in agony winging our way into darkness and death.

Countless the number of dead in the land;
corpses of children cover the plain,
children dying before they have lived,
no one to pity them,
reeking, and spreading diseases and death.

Moaning and wailing our wives,

7. Summon them: The people of Thebes are represented by the chorus, which comes into the orchestra at the end of the scene.

8. Zeus: Apollo was his son, and spoke for him.

9. Delian: Apollo was born on the sacred island of Delos.

10. Artemis: sister of Apollo.

11. Phoebus: Apollo.

moaning and wailing our mothers stream to the altars this way and that, scream to the air with helpless cries.
Hear us, golden daughter of Zeus, hear us! Send us release!

Ares[12] now rages in our midst brandishing in his hands
the firebrands of disease, raving, consuming, rousing the screams of death.
Hear us, O goddess!
Help us, and still his rage!
Turn back his assault!
Help us! Banish him from our land!
Drive him into the angry sea,
to the wave-swept border of Thrace!

We who escape him tonight will be struck down at dawn.
Help us, O father Zeus,
Lord of the thunderbolt, crush him! Destroy him!
Burn him with fires of lightning!

Help us, Apollo, Lycean[13] Lord!
Stand at our side with your golden bow!
Artemis, help us!
Come from the Lycian[14] hills!
Come with your torches aflame!
Dionysus,[15] protector, come to our aid,
come with your revelers' band!
Burn with your torch the god hated among the gods!

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS: I have heard your prayers and answer with relief and help, if you will heed my words and tend the sickness with the cure it cries for. My words are uttered as a stranger to the act, a stranger to its tale. I cannot trace its path alone, without a sign. As a citizen newer to Thebes than you, I make this proclamation: If one among you knows who murdered Laius, the son of Labdacus, let him tell us now. If he fears for his life, let him confess and know a milder penalty. He will be banished from this land. Nothing more. Or if you know the assassin to be an alien, do not protect him with your silence. You will be rewarded. But if in fear you protect yourself or any other man and keep your silence, then hear what I say now: Whoever he is, this assassin

12. Ares: god of war and destruction. He was thought to be at home among the savages of Thrace, to the northeast of Greece proper.

13. Lycean: an epithet of Apollo, suggestive of his connection with light (like Phoebus = shining) and also of his role as protector of the flocks against wolves.

14. Lycian: from Lycia, in southern Turkey. The connection of this region with Artemis is not clear.

15. Dionysus: son of Zeus, god of the forest and the vine.

must be denied entrance to your homes. Any man where I rule is forbidden to receive him or speak to him or share with him his prayers and sacrifice or offer him the holy rites of purification. I command you to drive this hideous curse out of your homes; I command you to obey the will of Pythian Apollo. I will serve the god and the dead. On the assassin or assassins, I call down the most vile damnation—for this vicious act, may the brand of shame be theirs to wear forever. And if I knowingly harbor their guilt within my own walls, I shall not exempt myself from the curse that I have called upon them. It is for me, for God, and for this city that staggers toward ruin that you must fulfill these injunctions. Even if Heaven gave you no sign, you had the sacred duty to insure that this act did not go unexamined, unavenged! It was the assassination of a noble man—your king! Now that I hold the powers that he once held, his bed, his wife—had fate been unopposed, his children would have bound us closer yet—and now on him has this disaster fallen. I will avenge him as I would avenge my own father. I will leave nothing untried to expose the murderer of Laius, the son of Labdacus, heir to the house of Cadmus and Agenor.[16] On those who deny me obedience, I utter this curse: May the gods visit them with barrenness in their harvests, barrenness in their women, barrenness in their fate. Worse still—may they be haunted and tormented and never know the peace that comes with death. But for you, my people, in sympathy with me—I pray that Justice and all the gods attend you forever.

CHORUS: You have made me swear an oath, my Lord, and under oath I speak. I did not kill the king and cannot name the man who did. The question was Apollo's. He could name the man you seek.

OEDIPUS: I know. And yet no mortal can compel a god to speak.

CHORUS: The next-best thing, it seems to me . . .

OEDIPUS: Tell me. Tell me all your thoughts. We must consider everything.

CHORUS: There is one man, second only to Apollo, who can see the truth, who can clearly help us in our search—Teiresias.[17]

OEDIPUS: I thought of this. On Creon's advice, I sent for him. Twice. He should be here.

CHORUS: There were some rumors once, but no one hears them now.

OEDIPUS: What rumors? I want to look at every tale that is told.

CHORUS: They said that travelers murdered Laius.

OEDIPUS: I have heard that too. And yet there's no one to be found who saw the murderer in the act.

CHORUS: He will come forth himself, once he has heard your curse, if he knows what it means to be afraid.

OEDIPUS: Why? Why should a man now fear words if then he did not fear to kill?

16. Agenor: king of Phoenicia, father of Cadmus.

17. Teiresias: the blind prophet of Thebes (the same one whose ghost Odysseus goes to consult in Hades, p. 242).

CHORUS: But there is one man who can point him out—the man in whom the truth resides, the god-inspired prophet. And there—they are bringing him now.

[Enter TEIRESIAS, guided by a servant.]

OEDIPUS: Teiresias, all things are known to you—the secrets of heaven and earth, the sacred and profane. Though you are blind, you surely see the plague that rakes our city. My Lord Teiresias, we turn to you as our only hope. My messengers may have told you—we have sent to Apollo and he has answered us. We must find Laius' murderers and deal with them. Or drive them out. Then—only then will we find release from our suffering. I ask you not to spare your gifts of prophecy. Look to the voices of prophetic birds or the answers written in the flames. Spare nothing. Save all of us—yourself, your city, your king, and all that is touched by this deathly pollution. We turn to you. My Lord, it is man's most noble role to help his fellow man the best his talents will allow.

TEIRESIAS: O God! How horrible wisdom is! How horrible when it does not help the wise! How could I have forgotten? I should not have come.

OEDIPUS: Why? What's wrong?

TEIRESIAS: Let me go. It will be better if you bear your own distress and I bear mine. It will be better this way.

OEDIPUS: This city gave you life and yet you refuse her an answer! You speak as if you were her enemy.

TEIRESIAS: No! No! It is because I see the danger in your words. And mine would add still more.

OEDIPUS: For God's sake, if you know, don't turn away from us! We are pleading. We are begging you.

TEIRESIAS: Because you are blind! No! I shall not reveal my secrets. I shall not reveal yours.

OEDIPUS: What? You know, and yet you refuse to speak? Would you betray us and watch our city fall helplessly to her death?

TEIRESIAS: I will not cause you further grief. I will not grieve myself. Stop asking me to tell; I will tell you nothing.

OEDIPUS: You will not tell? You monster! You could stir the stones of earth to a burning rage! You will never tell? What will it take?

TEIRESIAS: Know yourself, Oedipus. You denounce me, but you do not yet know yourself.

OEDIPUS: Yes! You disgrace your city. And then you expect us to control our rage!

TEIRESIAS: It does not matter if I speak; the future has already been determined.

OEDIPUS: And if it has, then it is for you to tell me, prophet!

TEIRESIAS: I shall say no more. Rage, if you wish.

OEDIPUS: I am enraged. And now I will tell you what I think. I think this was your doing. You plotted the crime, you saw it carried out. It was your doing. All but the actual killing. And had you not been blind, you would have done that, too!

TEIRESIAS: Do you believe what you have said? Then accept your own decree! From this day on, deny yourself the right to speak to anyone. You, Oedipus, are the desecrator, the polluter of this land!

OEDIPUS: You traitor! Do you think that you can get away with this?

TEIRESIAS: The truth is my protection.

OEDIPUS: Who taught you this? It did not come from prophecy!

TEIRESIAS: You taught me. You drove me, you forced me to say it against my will.

OEDIPUS: Say it again. I want to make sure that I understand you.

TEIRESIAS: Understand me? Or are you trying to provoke me?

OEDIPUS: No, I want to be sure, I want to know. Say it again.

TEIRESIAS: I say that you, Oedipus Tyrannus, are the murderer you seek.

OEDIPUS: So! A second time! Now twice you will regret what you have said!

TEIRESIAS: Shall I tell you more? Shall I fan your flames of anger?

OEDIPUS: Yes. Tell me more. Tell me more—whatever suits you. It will be in vain.

TEIRESIAS: I say you live in shame with the woman you love, blind to your own calamity.

OEDIPUS: Do you think you can speak like this forever?

TEIRESIAS: I do, if there is any strength in truth.

OEDIPUS: There is—for everyone but you. You—you cripple! Your ears are deaf, your eyes are blind, your mind—your mind is crippled!

TEIRESIAS: You fool! You slander me when one day you will hear the same . . .

OEDIPUS: You live in night, Teiresias, in night that never turns to day. And so, you cannot hurt me—or any man who sees the light.

TEIRESIAS: No—it is not I who will cause your fall. That is Apollo's office—and he will discharge it.

OEDIPUS: Was this your trick—or Creon's?

TEIRESIAS: No, not Creon's. No, Oedipus. You are destroying yourself!

OEDIPUS: Ah, wealth and sovereignty and skill surpassing skill in life's contentions, why must envy always attend them? This city gave me power; I did not ask for it. And Creon, my friend, my trusted friend, would plot to overthrow me—with this charlatan, this impostor, who auctions off his magic wares! His eyes see profit clearly, but they are blind in prophecy. Tell me, Teiresias, what makes you a prophet? Where were you when the monster was here weaving her spells and taunts? What words of relief did Thebes hear from you? Her riddle would stagger the simple mind; it demanded the mind of a seer. Yet, put to the test, all your birds and god-craft proved useless; you had no answer. Then I came—ignorant Oedipus—I came and smothered her, using only my wit. There were no birds to tell me what to do. I am the man you would overthrow so you can stand near Creon's throne. You will regret—you and your conspirator—you will regret your attempt to purify this land. If you were not an old man, I would make you suffer the pain which you deserve for your audacity.

CHORUS: Both of you, my Lord, have spoken in bitter rage. No more—not when we must direct our every thought to obey the god's command

TEIRESIAS: Though you are king, the right to speak does not belong to you alone. It is my right as well and I shall claim it. I am not your servant and Creon is not my patron. I serve only Loxian[18] Apollo. And I tell you this, since you mock my blindness. You have eyes, Oedipus, and do not see your own destruction. You have eyes and do not see what lives with you. Do you know whose son you are? I say that you have sinned and do not know it; you have sinned against your own—the living and the dead. A double scourge, your mother's and your father's curse, will drive you from this land. Then darkness will shroud those eyes that now can see the light. Cithæron,[19]—the whole earth will resound with your mournful cries when you discover the meaning of the wedding-song that brought you to this place you falsely thought a haven. More sorrow still awaits you—more than you can know—to show you what you are and what your children are. Damn Creon, if you will; damn the words I say. No man on earth will ever know the doom that waits for you.

OEDIPUS: How much of this am I to bear? Leave! Now! Leave my house!

TEIRESIAS: I would not be here had you not sent for me.

OEDIPUS: I never would have sent for you had I known the madness I would hear.

TEIRESIAS: To you, I am mad; but not to your parents . . .

OEDIPUS: Wait! My parents? Who are my parents?

TEIRESIAS: This day shall bring you birth and death.

OEDIPUS: Why must you persist with riddles?

TEIRESIAS: Are you not the best of men when it comes to riddles?

OEDIPUS: You mock the very skill that proves me great.

TEIRESIAS: A great misfortune—which will destroy you.

OEDIPUS: I don't care. If I have saved this land, I do not care.

TEIRESIAS: Then I shall go. [To his servant.] Come, take me home.

OEDIPUS: Yes, go home. You won't be missed.

TEIRESIAS: I will go when I've said all that I came to say. I am not afraid of you. You cannot hurt me. And I tell you this: The man you seek—the man whose death or banishment you ordered, the man who murdered Laius—that man is here, passing as an alien, living in our midst. Soon it will be known to all of you—he is a native Theban. And he will find no joy in that discovery. His eyes now see, but soon they will be blind: rich now, but soon a beggar. Holding a scepter now, but soon a cane, he will grope for the earth beneath him—in a foreign land. Both brother and father to the children that he loves. Both son and husband to the woman who bore him. Both heir and spoiler of his father's bed

18. Loxian: an epithet of Apollo which means "crooked, ambiguous."

19. Cithaeron: the mountain range near Thebes.

and the one who took his life. Go, think of this. And if you find the words I speak are lies, then say that I am blind.

[Exeunt OEDIPUS, TEIRESIAS.]

CHORUS:

Who is he? Who is the man?
Who is the man whom the voice of the Delphian shrine denounced as the killer, the murderer,
the man who committed the terrible crime?
Where is he? Where is he now?
Let him run, let him flee!
Let him rush with the speed of the wind on his flight!
For with fire and lightning the god will attack, and relentlessly fate will pursue him and haunt him and drive him to doom.

Do you hear? Do you hear the command of the god?
From Parnassus[20] he orders the hunt.
In vain will the murderer hide,
in vain will he run,
in vain will he lurk in the forests and caves like an animal roaming the desolate hills.
Let him flee to the edge of the world:
On his heels he will find the command of the god!

Confusion and fear
have been spread by the prophet's words.
For I cannot affirm, yet I cannot refute what he spoke. And I'm lost, I am lost—
What am I to believe?
Now foreboding is gripping my heart.
Was there ever a strife between Laius and Polybus'[21] house?
Can I test? Can I prove?
Can I ever believe that the name of my king has been soiled by a murder unknown?

It is Zeus and Apollo who know, who can see the affairs of men.
But the seer and I,
we are mortal, and blind.
Who is right? Who can judge?
We are mortal, our wisdom assigned in degrees.
Does the seer know? Do I?
No, I will not believe in the prophet's charge till the charge has been proved to my mind.
For I saw how the king in the test with the Sphinx proved his wisdom and worth when he saved this city from doom.

20. Parnassus: mountain above Delphi.
21. Polybus: king of Corinth and, so far as anyone yet knows, the father of Oedipus.

No! I can never condemn the king!

[Enter CREON.]

CREON: My fellow-citizens, anger has impelled me to come because I have heard the accusation which Oedipus has brought against me—and I will not tolerate it. If he thinks that I—in the midst of this torment—I have thought to harm him in any way, I will not spend the rest of my life branded by his charge. Doesn't he see the implications of such slander? To you, to my friends, to my city—I would be a traitor!

CHORUS: He spoke in anger—without thinking.

CREON: Yes—and who was it who said that the prophet lied on my advice?

CHORUS: It was said, but I don't know how it was meant.

CREON: And was this a charge leveled by one whose eyes were clear? Whose head was clear?

CHORUS: I don't know. I do not judge my master's actions. But here he comes.

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS: Why have you come, Creon? Do you have the audacity to show your face in my presence? Assassin! And now you would steal my throne! What drove you to this plot? Did you see cowardice in me? Stupidity? Did you imagine that I would not see your treachery? Did you expect that I wouldn't act to stop you? You fool! Your plot was mad! You go after a throne without money, without friends! How do you think thrones are won?

CREON: You listen to me! And when you have heard me out, when you have heard the truth, then judge for yourself.

OEDIPUS: Ah yes, your oratory! I can learn nothing from that. This is what I have learned—you are my enemy!

CREON: Just let me say . . .

OEDIPUS: Say one thing—say that you are not a traitor.

CREON: If you think that senseless stubbornness is a precious gift, you are a fool.

OEDIPUS: If you think that you can threaten the house of Cadmus —your own house—and not pay for it, you are mad.

CREON: I grant you that. But tell me: just what is this terrible thing you say I have done to you?

OEDIPUS: Did you or did you not tell me to send for that—that—prophet?

CREON: I did. And I would again.

OEDIPUS: Then, how long since Laius . . . ?

CREON: What? I do not follow . . .

OEDIPUS: . . . Disappeared?

CREON: A long time ago.

OEDIPUS: Your Teiresias—was he—was he a prophet then?

CREON: Yes—and just as honored and just as wise.

OEDIPUS: Did he ever mention me—then?

CREON: Not in my presence.

OEDIPUS: But didn't you investigate the murder?

CREON: Of course we did—

OEDIPUS: And why didn't the prophet say anything then?
CREON: I do not know. It's not for me to try to understand.
OEDIPUS: You know this much which you will try to tell me . . .
CREON: What is it? I will tell you if I can.
OEDIPUS: Just this: Had he not acted under your instructions, he would not have named me killer of Laius.
CREON: If this is what he said, you ought to know. You heard him. But now I claim the right to question you, as you have me.
OEDIPUS: Ask what you wish. I am not the murderer.
CREON: Then answer me. Did you marry my sister?
OEDIPUS: Of course I did.
CREON: And do you rule on equal terms with her?
OEDIPUS: She has all that she wants from me.
CREON: And am I not the third and equal partner?
OEDIPUS: You are—and that is where you have proved yourself a traitor.
CREON: Not true. Consider rationally, as I have done. First ask yourself—would any man prefer a life of fear to one in which the self-same rank, the self-same rights are guaranteed untroubled peace? I have no wish to be a king when I can act as one without a throne. And any man would feel the same, if he were wise. I share with you a king's prerogatives, yet you alone must face the danger lurking around the throne. If I were king, I would have to act in many ways against my pleasure. What added benefit could kingship hold when I have rank and rule without the threat of pain? I am not deluded—no, I would not look for honors beyond the ones which profit me. I have the favor of every man; each greets me first when he would hope to have your favor. Why should I exchange this for a throne? Only a fool would. No, I am not a traitor nor would I aid an act of treason. You want proof? Go to Delphi; ask if I have brought you the truth. Then, if you find me guilty of conspiracy with the prophet, command my death. I will face that. But do not condemn me without proof. You are wrong to judge the guilty innocent, the innocent guilty —without proof. Casting off a true friend is like casting off your greatest prize—your life. You will know in time that this is true. Time alone reveals the just; a single day condemns the guilty.
CHORUS: He is right, my Lord. Respect his words. A man who plans in haste will gamble the result.
OEDIPUS: This is a plot conceived in rashness. It must be met with quick response. I cannot sit and wait until the plot succeeds.
CREON: What will you do then? Do you intend to banish me?
OEDIPUS: No. No, not banish you. I want to see you dead—to make you an example for all aspiring to my throne.
CREON: Then you won't do as I suggest? You won't believe me?
OEDIPUS: You have not shown that you deserve belief.
CREON: No, because I see that you are mad.
OEDIPUS: In my own eyes, I am sane.
CREON: You should be sane in mine as well.
OEDIPUS: No. You are a traitor!

CREON: And what if you are wrong?
OEDIPUS: Still—I will rule.
CREON: Not when you rule treacherously.
OEDIPUS: O Thebes! My city! Listen to him!
CREON: My city too!
CHORUS: My Lords, no more. Here comes Jocasta. Perhaps the queen can end this bitter clash.

[Enter JOCASTA.]

JOCASTA: Why do you behave like senseless fools and quarrel without reason? Are you not ashamed to add trouble of your own when your city is sick and dying? Go, Creon. Go and leave us alone. Forget those petty grievances which you exaggerate. How important can they be?
CREON: This important, sister: Oedipus, your husband, in his insanity, has threatened me with banishment or death.
OEDIPUS: Yes, for I have realized his plot—a plot against my person.
CREON: May the gods haunt me forever, if that is true—if I am guilty of that charge.
JOCASTA: In the name of God, believe him, Oedipus! Believe him for the sake of his oath, for my own sake, and for theirs!
CHORUS: Listen to her, my Lord. I beg you to consider and comply.
OEDIPUS: What would you have me do?
CHORUS: Respect the oath that Creon gave you. Respect his past integrity.
OEDIPUS: Do you know what you are asking?
CHORUS: Yes, I know.
OEDIPUS: Then, tell me what you mean.
CHORUS: I mean that you are wrong to charge a friend who has invoked a curse upon his head. You are wrong to slander without proof and be the cause for his dishonor.
OEDIPUS: Then you must know that when you ask for this, you ask for banishment or doom—for me.
CHORUS:

O God, no!
O Helios,[22] no!
May Heaven and Earth exact my doom
if that is what I thought!
When our city is torn by sickness and my heart is torn with pain—do not compound the troubles that beset us!

OEDIPUS: Then, let him go, although it surely means my death—or banishment with dishonor. Your words—not his—have touched my heart. But Creon—wherever he may be—I will hate him.
CREON: You are hard when you should yield, cruel when you should pity. Such natures deserve the pain they bear.
OEDIPUS: Just go—and leave me in peace.

22. Helios: the sun. He is appealed to as a witness to oaths since, in his daily passage over the earth, he sees everything that happens.

CREON: I will go—my guilt pronounced by you alone. Behold my judge and jury—Oedipus Tyrannus!

[Exit CREON.]

CHORUS: My queen, persuade your husband to rest awhile.

JOCASTA: I will—when I have learned the truth.

CHORUS: Blind suspicion has consumed the king. And Creon's passions flared beneath the sting of unjust accusations.

JOCASTA: Are both at fault?

CHORUS: Yes, both of them.

JOCASTA: But what is the reason for their rage?

CHORUS: Don't ask again. Our city is weary enough from suffering. Enough. Let the matter rest where it now stands.

OEDIPUS: Do you see what you have done? Do you see where you have come—with your good intentions, your noble efforts to dull the sharpness of my anger?

CHORUS:

My Lord, I have said before and now I say again:
I would be mad,
a reckless fool
to turn away my king, who saved us from a sea of troubles and set us on a fairer course, and who will lead us once again to peace, a haven from our pain.

JOCASTA: In the name of Heaven, my Lord, tell me the reason for your bitterness.

OEDIPUS: I will—because you mean more to me than anyone. The reason is Creon and his plot against my throne.

JOCASTA: But can you prove a plot?

OEDIPUS: He says that I—Oedipus—bear the guilt of Laius' death.

JOCASTA: How does he justify this charge?

OEDIPUS: He does not stain his own lips by saying it. No. He uses that false prophet to speak for him.

JOCASTA: Then, you can exonerate yourself because no mortal has the power of divination. And I can prove it. An oracle came to Laius once from the Pythian priests—I'll not say from Apollo himself—that he would die at the hands of his own child, his child and mine. Yet the story which we heard was that robbers murdered Laius in a place where three roads meet. As for the child—when he was three days old, Laius drove pins into his ankles and handed him to someone to cast upon a deserted mountain path—to die. And so, Apollo's prophecy was unfulfilled—the child did not kill his father. And Laius' fears were unfulfilled—he did not die by the hand of his child. Yet, these had been the prophecies. You need not give them any credence. For the god will reveal what he wants.

OEDIPUS: Jocasta—my heart is troubled at your words. Suddenly, my thoughts are wandering, disturbed . . .

JOCASTA: What is it? What makes you so frightened?

OEDIPUS: Your statement—that Laius was murdered in a place where three roads meet. Isn't that what you said?

JOCASTA: Yes. That was the story then; that is the story now.

OEDIPUS: Where is this place where three roads meet?

JOCASTA: In the land called Phocis where the roads from Delphi and from Daulia converge.

OEDIPUS: How long a time has passed since then?

JOCASTA: We heard it shortly before you came.

OEDIPUS: O God, what have you planned for me?

JOCASTA: What is it, Oedipus? What frightens you?

OEDIPUS: Do not ask me. Do not ask. Just tell me—what was Laius like? How old was he?

JOCASTA: He was tall and his hair was lightly cast with silver tones, the contour of his body much like yours.

OEDIPUS: O God! Am I cursed and cannot see it?

JOCASTA: What is it, Oedipus? You frighten me.

OEDIPUS: It cannot be—that the prophet sees! Tell me one more thing.

JOCASTA: You frighten me, my Lord, but I will try to tell you what I know.

OEDIPUS: Who traveled with the king? Was he alone? Was there a guide? An escort? A few? Many?

JOCASTA: There were five—one of them a herald—and a carriage in which Laius rode.

OEDIPUS: O God! O God! I see it all now! Jocasta, who told you this?

JOCASTA: A servant—the only one who returned alive.

OEDIPUS: Is he here now? In our house?

JOCASTA: No. When he came back and saw you ruling where once his master was, he pleaded with me—begged me—to send him to the fields to tend the flocks, far from the city. And so I did. He was a good servant and I would have granted him more than that, if he had asked.

OEDIPUS: Could we arrange to have him here—now?

JOCASTA: Yes, but what do you want with him?

OEDIPUS: I am afraid, Jocasta. I have said too much and now I have to see him.

JOCASTA: Then he shall be brought. But I, too, must know the cause of your distress. I have the right to know.

OEDIPUS: Yes, you have that right. And I must tell you—now. You, more than anyone, will have to know what I am going through. My father was Polybus of Corinth, my mother a Dorian—Merope. I was held in high regard in Corinth until—until something strange occurred—something uncanny and strange, although I might have given it too much concern. There was a man dining with us one day who had had far too much wine and shouted at me—half-drunk and shouting that I was not rightly called my father's son. I could barely endure the rest of that day and on the next I went to my parents and questioned them. They were enraged at the remark. I felt relieved at their response. But still, this—this thing—kept gnawing at my heart. And it was spread about in vulgar whispers. And then, without my parents' knowledge, I went to Delphi, but Apollo did not say what I had gone to hear. Instead, he answered questions I had not asked and told of horror and misery beyond belief—how I would know my mother's bed and bring to the world a race of children too terrible for men to see and cause the death of my own father. I trembled at those words and fled from Corinth—as far as I could—to where no star could ever guide me back, where I could never see that infamous prophecy fulfilled. And as I traveled, I came to that place where you say the king was murdered. This is the truth, Jocasta—I was in that place where the three roads meet. There was a herald leading a carriage drawn by horses and a man riding in the carriage—just as you described. The man in front, and the old one, ordered me out of the path. I refused. The driver pushed. In anger, I struck him. The old man saw it, reached for his lash and waited till I had passed. Then he struck me on the head. But he paid—oh yes, he paid. He lost his balance and fell from the carriage and as he lay there helpless—on his back—I killed him. I killed them all. But if this stranger had any tie with Laius—O God—who could be more hated in the eyes of Heaven and Earth? I am the one whom strangers and citizens are forbidden to receive! I am the one to whom all are forbidden to speak! I am the one who must be driven out! I am the one for whom my curse was meant! I have touched his bed with the very hands that killed him! O God! The sin! The horror! I am to be banished, never to see my people, never to walk in my fatherland. Or else I must take my mother for a bride and kill my father Polybus, who gave me life and cared for me. What cruel god has sent this torture? Hear me, you gods, you holy gods—I will never see that day! I will die before I ever see the stain of this abominable act!

CHORUS: Your words frighten us, my Lord. But you must have hope until you hear the story from the man who saw.

OEDIPUS: Yes—hope. My only hope is waiting for this shepherd.

JOCASTA: Why? What do you hope to find with him?

OEDIPUS: This—if his story agrees with what you say, then I am safe.

JOCASTA: What did I say that makes you sure of this?

OEDIPUS: You said he told of robbers—that robbers killed the king. If he still says robbers, then I am not the guilty one—because no man can talk of many when he means a single one. But if he names a single traveler, there will be no doubt—the guilt is mine.

JOCASTA: You can be sure that this was what he said—and he cannot deny it. The whole city heard him—not I alone. But even if he alters what he said before, he cannot prove that Laius met his death as it was prophesied. For Apollo said that he would die at the hand of a child—of mine. And as it happens, the child is dead. So prophecy is worthless. I wouldn't dignify it with a moment's thought.

OEDIPUS: You are right. But still—send someone for the shepherd. Now.

JOCASTA: I shall—immediately. I shall do what you ask. But now—let us go inside.

[Exeunt OEDIPUS, JOCASTA.]

CHORUS:

I pray, may destiny permit that honestly I live my life in word and deed.
That I obey the laws
the heavens have begotten and prescribed.
Those laws created by Olympus,[23]
laws pure, immortal, forever lasting, essence of the god who lives in them.
On arrogance and pride
a tyrant feeds.
The goad of insolence,
of senseless overbearing, blind conceit,
of seeking things unseasonable, unreasonable, will prick a man to climb to heights where he must lose his footing and tumble to his doom.
Ambition must be used to benefit the state;
else it is wrong, and God must strike it from this earth.
Forever, God, I pray,
may you stand at my side!

A man who goes through life with insolence in word and deed, who lacks respect for law and right,
and scorns the shrines and temples of the gods,
may he find evil fate and doom as his reward for wantonness, for seeking ill-begotten gains and reaching after sacred things with sacrilegious hands.
No! Surely no such man escapes the wrath, the vengeance of the god!
For if he did, if he could find reward
in actions which are wrong,

23. Olympus: the highest mountain on the Greek peninsula, considered by the Greeks to be the home of the gods.

why should I trouble to acclaim, to honor you, God, in my song?

No longer shall my feet take me to Delphi's sacred shrine;
no longer shall they Abae or Olympia's altars[24] seek unless the oracles are shown to tell the truth to mortals without fail!
Where are you, Zeus, all-powerful, all-ruling?
You must be told,
you must know in your all-pervading power:
Apollo's oracles now fall into dishonor, and what the god has spoken about Laius finds disregard.
Could God be dead?

[Enter JOCASTA.]

JOCASTA: My Lords, I want to lay these laurel wreaths and incense offerings at the shrines of Thebes—for Oedipus is torturing himself, tearing his heart with grief. His vision to weigh the present against the past is blurred by fear and terror. He devours every word of dread, drinks in every thought of pain, destruction, death. And I no longer have the power to ease his suffering. Now I turn to you, Apollo, since you are nearest, with prayer and suppliant offerings. Find some way to free us, end our agony! O God of Light, release us! You see the fear that grips us—like sailors who watch their captain paralyzed by some unknown terror on the seas.

[Enter MESSENGER 1.]

MESSENGER 1: Strangers, would you direct me to the house of Oedipus? Or if you know where I might find the king himself, please tell me.

CHORUS: This is his house, stranger. He is inside. But this is the queen—his wife, and mother of his children.

MESSENGER 1: Then, blessings on the house of Oedipus—his house, his children, and his wife.

JOCASTA: Blessings on you as well, stranger. Your words are kind. But why have you come? What is it?

MESSENGER 1: Good news, my lady—for your husband and your house.

JOCASTA: What news? Where do you come from?

MESSENGER 1: From Corinth, my lady. My news will surely bring you joy—but sorrow, too.

JOCASTA: What? How can that be?

MESSENGER 1: Your husband now is ruler of the Isthmus![25]

JOCASTA: Do you mean that Polybus of Corinth has been deposed?

MESSENGER 1: Deposed by death, my lady. He has passed away.

JOCASTA: What! Polybus dead?

24. Abae, Olympia: Abae was a city in central Greece and Olympia a site in the western Peloponnese, where there were important oracles of Apollo and Zeus, respectively.

25. Isthmus: Corinth owed its importance to its situation on the narrow neck of land separating the Gulf of Corinth and the westward route from the Saronic gulf to the south.

MESSENGER 1.: I swear on my life that this is true.

JOCASTA: [to a servant]: Go! Quickly! Tell your master. [To the heavens.] You prophecies—you divinely-uttered prophecies! Where do you stand now? The man that Oedipus feared, the man he dared not face lest he should be his killer—that man is dead! Time claimed his life—not Oedipus!

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS: Why, Jocasta? Why have you sent for me again?

JOCASTA: I want you to listen to this man. Listen to him and judge for yourself the worth of those holy prophecies.

OEDIPUS: Who is he? What news could he have for me?

JOCASTA: He comes from Corinth with the news that—that Polybus—is dead.

OEDIPUS: What! Tell me.

MESSENGER 1: If you must know this first, then I shall tell you—plainly. Polybus has died.

OEDIPUS: How? An act of treason? Sickness? How?

MESSENGER 1: My Lord, only a slight shift in the scales is required to bring the aged to their rest.

OEDIPUS: Then it was sickness. Poor old man.

MESSENGER 1: Sickness—yes. And the weight of years.

OEDIPUS: Oh, Jocasta! Why? Why should we even look to oracles, the prophetic words delivered at their shrines or the birds that scream above us? They led me to believe that I would kill my father. But he is dead and in his grave, while I stand here—never having touched a weapon. Unless he died of longing for his son. If that is so, then I was the instrument of his death. And those oracles! Where are they now? Polybus has taken them to his grave. What worth have they now?

JOCASTA: Have I not been saying this all along?

OEDIPUS: Yes, you have. But I was misled by fear.

JOCASTA: Now you will no longer have to think of it.

OEDIPUS: But—my mother's bed. I still have that to fear.

JOCASTA: No. No, mortals have no need to fear when chance reigns supreme. The knowledge of the future is denied to us. It is better to live as you will, live as you can. You need not fear a union with your mother. Men often, in their dreams, approach their mothers' beds, lie with them, possess them. But the man who sees that this is meaningless can live without the threat of fear.

OEDIPUS: You would be right, Jocasta, if my mother were not alive. But she is alive. And no matter what you say, I have reason to fear.

JOCASTA: At least your father's death has brought some comfort.

OEDIPUS: Yes—some comfort. But my fear is of her—as long as she lives.

MESSENGER 1: Who is she? The woman you fear?

OEDIPUS: Queen Merope, old man, the wife of Polybus.

MESSENGER 1: But why does she instill fear in you?

OEDIPUS: There was an oracle—a dreadful oracle sent by the gods.

MESSENGER 1: Can you tell me—a stranger—what it is?

OEDIPUS: Yes, it is all right to tell. Once Loxian Apollo said that I would take my mother for my bride and murder my father with my own hands. This is the reason that I left Corinth long ago. Fortunately. And yet, I have often longed to see my parents.

MESSENGER 1: Is this the fear that drove you away from Corinth?

OEDIPUS: Yes. I did not want to kill my father.

MESSENGER 1: But I can free you from this fear, my Lord. My purpose for coming was a good one.

OEDIPUS: And I shall see that you receive a fitting reward.

MESSENGER 1: Yes—that's why I came. To fare well myself by your returning home.

OEDIPUS: Home? To Corinth? To my parents? Never.

MESSENGER 1: My son, you do not realize what you are doing.

OEDIPUS: What do you mean, old man? For God's sake, tell me what you mean.

MESSENGER 1: I mean—the reasons why you dread returning home.

OEDIPUS: I dread Apollo's prophecy—and its fulfillment.

MESSENGER 1: You mean the curse—the stain they say lies with your parents?

OEDIPUS: Yes, old man. That is the fear that lives with me.

MESSENGER 1: Then you must realize that this fear is groundless.

OEDIPUS: How can that be—if I am their son?

MESSENGER 1: Because Polybus was no relative of yours.

OEDIPUS: What are you saying! Polybus was not my father?

MESSENGER 1: No more than I.

OEDIPUS: No more than you? But you are nothing to me.

MESSENGER 1: He was not your father any more than I.

OEDIPUS: Then why did he call me his son?

MESSENGER 1: You were a gift to him—from me.

OEDIPUS: A gift? From you? And yet he loved me as his son?

MESSENGER 1: Yes, my Lord. He had been childless.

OEDIPUS: And when you gave me to him—had you bought me? Or found me?

MESSENGER 1: I found you—in the hills of Cithaeron.

OEDIPUS: What were you doing there?

MESSENGER 1: Tending sheep along the mountain side.

OEDIPUS: Then you were a—hired shepherd?

MESSENGER 1: Yes, my son—a hired shepherd who saved you at that time.

OEDIPUS: Saved me? Was I in pain when you found me? Was I in trouble?

MESSENGER 1: Yes, your ankles are the proof of that.

OEDIPUS: Ah, you mean this old trouble. What has that to do with it?

MESSENGER 1: When I found you, your ankles were pierced with rivets. And I freed you.

OEDIPUS: Yes, I have had this horrible stigma since infancy.

MESSENGER 1: And so it was the swelling in your ankles that caused your name: Oedipus—"Clubfoot."

OEDIPUS: Oh! Who did this to me? My father? Or my mother?

MESSENGER 1: I don't know. You will have to ask the man who handed you to me.

OEDIPUS: You mean—you did not find me? It was someone else?
MESSENGER 1: Another shepherd.
OEDIPUS: Who? Do you remember who he was?
MESSENGER 1: I think—he was of the house of Laius.
OEDIPUS: The king who ruled this city?
MESSENGER 1: Yes. He was a shepherd in the service of the king.
OEDIPUS: Is he still alive? Can I see him?
MESSENGER 1: [addressing the CHORUS]: You—you people here—could answer that.
OEDIPUS: Do any of you know this shepherd? Have you seen him in the fields? Here in Thebes? Tell me now! Now is the time to unravel this mystery—once and for all.
CHORUS: I think it is the shepherd you asked to see before. But the queen will know.
OEDIPUS: Jocasta, is that the man he means? Is it the shepherd we have sent for? Is he the one?
JOCASTA: Why? What difference does it make? Don't think about it. Pay no attention to what he said. It makes no difference.
OEDIPUS: No difference? When I must have every clue to untangle the line of mystery surrounding my birth?
JOCASTA: In the name of God, if you care at all for your own life, you must not go on with this. I cannot bear it any longer.
OEDIPUS: Do not worry, Jocasta. Even if I am a slave—a third-generation slave, it is no stain on your nobility.
JOCASTA: Oedipus! I beg you—don't do this!
OEDIPUS: I can't grant you that. I cannot leave the truth unknown.
JOCASTA: It is for your sake that I beg you to stop. For your own good.
OEDIPUS: My own good has brought me pain too long.
JOCASTA: God help you! May you never know what you are!
OEDIPUS: Go, someone, and bring the shepherd to me. Leave the queen to exult in her noble birth.
JOCASTA: God help you! This is all that I can say to you—now or ever.

[Exit JOCASTA.]

CHORUS: Why has the queen left like this—grief-stricken and tortured with pain? My Lord, I fear—I fear that from her silence some horror will burst forth.
OEDIPUS: Let it explode! I will still want to uncover the secret of my birth—no matter how horrible. She—she is a woman with a woman's pride—and she feels shame for my humble birth. But I am the child of Fortune—beneficent Fortune—and I shall not be shamed! She is my mother. My sisters are the months and they have seen me rise and fall. This is my family. I will never deny my birth—and I will learn its secret!

[Exit OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS:

Ah Cithaeron,
if in my judgment I am right,
if I interpret what I hear correctly, then—by Olympus' boundless majesty!—

tomorrow's full moon will not pass before, Cithaeron, you will find that Oedipus will honor you as mother and as nurse!
That we will praise you in our song, benevolent and friendly to our king.
Apollo, our Lord, may you find joy in this!

Who bore you, Oedipus? A nymph?
Did Pan[26] beget you in the hills?
Were you begotten by Apollo?
Perhaps so, for he likes the mountain glens.
Could Hermes[27] be your father?
Or Dionysus? Could it be that he received you as a gift high in the mountains from a nymph with whom he lay?

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

OEDIPUS: My Lords, I have never met him, but could that be the shepherd we have been waiting for? He seems to be of the same age as the stranger from Corinth. And I can see now—those are my servants who are bringing him here. But, perhaps you know—if you have seen him before. Is he the shepherd?

[Enter SHEPHERD.]

CHORUS: Yes. I recognize him. He was a shepherd in the service of Laius—as loyal as any man could be.

OEDIPUS: Corinthian, I ask you—is this the man you mean?

MESSENGER 1: Yes, my Lord. This is the man.

OEDIPUS: And you, old man, look at me and answer what I ask. Were you in the service of Laius?

SHEPHERD: I was. But not bought. I was reared in his house.

OEDIPUS: What occupation? What way of life?

SHEPHERD: Tending flocks—for most of my life.

OEDIPUS: And where did you tend those flocks?

SHEPHERD: Sometimes Cithaeron, sometimes the neighboring places.

OEDIPUS: Have you ever seen this man before?

SHEPHERD: What man do you mean? Doing what?

OEDIPUS: This man. Have you ever met him before?

SHEPHERD: Not that I recall, my Lord.

MESSENGER 1: No wonder, my Lord. But I shall help him to recall. I am sure that he'll remember the time we spent on Cithaeron—he with his two flocks and I with one. Six months—spring to autumn—every year—for three years. In the winter I would drive my flocks to my fold in Corinth, and he to the fold of Laius. Isn't that right, sir?

SHEPHERD: That is what happened. But it was a long time ago.

MESSENGER 1: Then tell me this. Do you remember a child you gave me to bring up as my own?

26. Pan: a woodland god; patron of shepherds and flocks.

27. Hermes: son of Zeus and Maia; god of flocks and shepherds.

SHEPHERD: What are you saying? Why are you asking me this?
MESSENGER 1: This, my friend, this—is that child.
SHEPHERD: Damn you! Will you keep your mouth shut!
OEDIPUS: Save your reproaches, old man. It is you who deserve them—your words deserve them.
SHEPHERD: But master—how have I offended?
OEDIPUS: By refusing to answer his question about the child.
SHEPHERD: He doesn't know what he's saying. He's crazy.
OEDIPUS: If you don't answer of your own accord, we'll make you talk.
SHEPHERD: No! My Lord, please! Don't hurt an old man.
OEDIPUS [to the CHORUS]: One of you—twist his hands behind his back!
SHEPHERD: Why? Why? What do you want to know?
OEDIPUS: Did you or did you not give him that child?
SHEPHERD: I did. I gave it to him—and I wish that I had died that day.
OEDIPUS: You tell the truth, or you'll have your wish now.
SHEPHERD: If I tell, it will be worse.
OEDIPUS: Still he puts it off!
SHEPHERD: I said that I gave him the child!
OEDIPUS: Where did you get it? Your house? Someone else's? Where?
SHEPHERD: Not mine. Someone else's.
OEDIPUS: Whose? One of the citizens'? Whose house?
SHEPHERD: O God, master! Don't ask me any more.
OEDIPUS: This is the last time that I ask you.
SHEPHERD: It was a child—of the house of Laius.
OEDIPUS: A slave? Or of his own line?
SHEPHERD: Ah master, do I have to speak?
OEDIPUS: You have to. And I have to hear.
SHEPHERD: They said—it was his child. But the queen could tell you best.
OEDIPUS: Why? Did she give you the child?
SHEPHERD: Yes, my Lord.
OEDIPUS: Why?
SHEPHERD: To—kill!
OEDIPUS: Her own child!
SHEPHERD: Yes. Because she was terrified of some dreadful prophecy.
OEDIPUS: What prophecy?
SHEPHERD: The child would kill his father.
OEDIPUS: Then why did you give him to this man?
SHEPHERD: I felt sorry for him, master. And I thought that he would take him to his own home. But he saved him from his suffering—for worse suffering yet. My Lord, if you are the man he says you are—O God—you were born to suffering!
OEDIPUS: O God! O no! I see it now! All clear! O Light! I will never look on you again! Sin! Sin in my birth! Sin in my marriage! Sin in blood!

[Exit OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS:

O generations of men, you are nothing!
You are nothing!
And I count you as not having lived at all!
Was there ever a man,
was there ever a man on this earth who could say he was happy, who knew happiness, true happiness,
not an image, a dream,
an illusion, a vision, which would disappear?
Your example, Oedipus, your example, your fate, your disaster, show that none of us mortals ever knew, ever felt what happiness truly is.

Here is Oedipus,
fortune and fame and bliss leading him by the hand, prodding him on to heights mortals had never attained.
Zeus, it was he who removed the scourge of the riddling maid, of the sharp-clawed, murderous Sphinx!
He restored me to life from the brink of disaster, of doom and of death.
It was he who was honored and hailed,
who was crowned and acclaimed as our king.

Here is Oedipus:
Anyone on this earth struck by a harder blow,
stung by a fate more perverse?
Wretched Oedipus!
Father and son alike, pleasures you took from where once you were given life.
Furrows your father ploughed bore you in silence. How, how, oh how could it be?

Time found you out,
all-seeing, irrepressible time.
Time sits in judgment on the union that never could be;
judges you, father and son,
begot and begetter alike.
Would that I never had laid eyes on Laius' child!
Now I wail and I weep,
and my lips are drenched in lament.
It was you, who offered me life;
it is you, who now bring me death.

[Enter MESSENGER 2.]

MESSENGER 2: O you most honored citizens of Thebes, you will mourn for the things you will hear, you will mourn for the things you will see, you will ache from the burden of sorrow—if you are true sons of the house of Labdacus, if you care, if you feel. The waters of Ister and Phasis[28] can never cleanse this house of the horrors hidden within it and soon to be revealed—horrors willfully done! Worst of the sorrows we know are those that are willfully done!

CHORUS: We have mourned enough for sorrows we have known. What more is there that you can add?

MESSENGER 2: One more and only one—Jocasta, the queen, is dead.

CHORUS: O God—no! How?

MESSENGER 2: By her own hand. But the most dreadful pain you have not seen. You have not seen the worst. I have seen it and I shall tell you what I can of her terrible suffering. She ran in frenzied despair through the palace halls and rushed straight to her bridal bed—her fingers clutching and tearing at her hair. Then, inside the bedroom, she flung the doors closed and cried out to Laius, long since dead. She cried out to him, remembering the son that she had borne long ago, the son who killed his father, the son who left her to bear a dread curse—the children of her own son! She wept pitifully for that bridal bed which she had twice defiled—husband born of husband, child born of child. I didn't see what happened then. I didn't see her die. At that moment the king rushed in and shrieked in horror. All eyes turned to him as he paced in frantic passion and confusion. He sprang at each of us and begged to have a sword. He begged to know where he could find the wife that was no wife to him, the woman who had been mother to him and to his children. Some power beyond the scope of man held him in its sway and guided him to her. It was none of us. Then—as if someone had beckoned to him and bade him follow—he screamed in terror and threw himself against the doors that she had locked. His body's weight and force shattered the bolts and thrust them from their sockets and he rushed into the room. There we saw the queen hanging from a noose of twisted cords. And when the king saw her, he cried out and moaned in deep, sorrowful misery. Then he untied the rope that hung about her neck and laid her body on the ground. But what happened then was even worse. Her gold brooches, her pins—he tore them from her gown and plunged them into his eyes again and again and again and screamed, "No longer shall you see the suffering you have known and caused! You saw what was forbidden to be seen, yet failed to recognize those whom you longed to see! Now you shall see only darkness!" And as he cried out in such desperate misery, he struck his eyes over and over—until a shower of blood and tears splattered down his beard, like a torrent of crimson rain and hail. And now suffering is mingled with pain for man and wife for the sins that both have done. Not one alone. Once—long ago—this house was happy—and rightly so. But now—today—sorrow, destruction, death, shame—all torments that have a name—all, all are theirs to endure.

28. Ister and Phasis: the Danube and a river flowing into the Black Sea, both large.

CHORUS: But the king—does he have any relief from his suffering now?

MESSENGER 2: He calls for someone to unlock the gates and reveal to Thebes his father's killer, his mother's—I can't say it. I cannot say this unholy word. He cries out that he will banish himself from the land to free this house of the curse that he has uttered. But he is weak, drained. There is no one to guide his way. The pain is more than he can bear. You will see for yourselves. The palace gates are opening. You will see a sight so hideous that even his most bitter enemy would pity him.

[Enter OEDIPUS.]

CHORUS:

Ah!
Dread horror for men to see!
Most dreadful of all that I have seen!
Ah!
Wretched one,
what madness has possessed you?
What demon has descended upon you and bound you to this dire fate?
Ah!
Wretched one,
I cannot bear to look at you.
I want to ask you more and learn still more and understand—but I shudder at the sight of you!

OEDIPUS: Ah! Ah! Where has this misery brought me? Is this my own voice I hear—carried on the wings of the air? O Fate! What have you done to me?

CHORUS: Terrible! Too terrible to hear! Too terrible to see!

OEDIPUS: O cloud of darkness! Cruel! Driven by the winds of fate! Assaulting me! With no defense to hold you back! O God! The pain! The pain! My flesh aches from its wounds! My soul aches from the memory of its horrors!

CHORUS: Body and soul—each suffers and mourns.

OEDIPUS: Ah! You still remain with me—a constant friend. You still remain to care for me—a blind man now. Now there is darkness and I cannot see your face. But I can hear your voice and I know that you are near.

CHORUS: O my Lord, how could you have done this? How could you blind yourself? What demon drove you?

OEDIPUS: Apollo! It was Apollo! He brought this pain, this suffering to me. But it was my own hand that struck the blow. Not his. O God! Why should I have sight when all that I would see is ugliness?

CHORUS: It is as you say.

OEDIPUS: What is there for me to see and love? What sight would give me joy? What sound? Take me away! Take me out of this land! I am cursed! Doomed! I am the man most hated by the gods!

CHORUS: You have suffered equally for your fortune and for your disaster. I wish that you had never come to Thebes.

OEDIPUS: Damn the man who set me free! Who loosed the fetters from my feet and let me live! I will never forgive him. If he had let me die, I would never have become the cause—the grief . . .

CHORUS: I wish that it had been this way.

OEDIPUS: If it had been, I would not have come to this—killer of my father, bridegroom of the woman who gave me birth, despised by the gods, child of shame, father and brother to my children. Is there any horror worse than these—any horror that has not fallen upon Oedipus?

CHORUS: My Lord, I cannot condone what you have done. You would have been better dead than alive and blind.

OEDIPUS: I did what I had to. You know I did. No more advice. Could these eyes have looked upon my father in the house of Hades? Could these eyes have faced my mother in her agony? I sinned against them both—a sin no suicide could purge. Could I have joy at the sight of my children—born as they were born? With these eyes? Never! Could I look upon the city of Thebes? The turrets that grace her walls? The sacred statues of her gods? Never! Damned! I—the noblest of the sons of Thebes—I have damned myself. It was I who commanded that Thebes must cast out the one who is guilty, unholy, cursed by the heavenly gods. I was the curse of Thebes! Could these eyes look upon the people? Never! And if I could raise a wall to channel the fountain of my hearing, I would spare nothing to build a prison for this defiled body where sight and sound would never penetrate. Then only would I have peace—where grief could not reach my mind. O Cithaeron! Why did you receive me? Why did you not let me die then? Why did you let me live to show the world how I was born? O Polybus! O Corinth! My home that was no home! You raised me, thinking I was fair and never knowing the evil that festered beneath. Now—now see the evil from which I was born, the evil I have become. O God! The three roads! The hidden glen! The thickets! The pathway where three roads meet! The blood you drank from my hands—do you not know—it was the blood of my father! Do you remember? Do you remember what I did then and what I did for Thebes? Wedding-rites! You gave me birth and gave my children birth! Born of the same womb that bore my children! Father! Brother! Child! Incestuous sin! Bride! Wife! Mother! All of one union! All the most heinous sins that man can know! The most horrible shame—I can no longer speak of it. For the love of God, hide me somewhere. Hide me away from this land! Kill me! Cast me into the sea where you will never have to look at me again! I beg you—touch me—in my misery. Touch me. Do not be afraid. My sins are mine alone to bear and touch no other man.

[Enter CREON.]

CHORUS: My Lord, Creon is here to act or counsel in what you ask. In your stead—he is now our sole protector.

OEDIPUS: What can I say to him? How can I ask for his trust? I have wronged him. I know that now.

CREON: I have not come to mock you, Oedipus, nor to reproach you for the past. But you—if you have no respect for men, at least respect the lord of the sun whose fires give life to men. Hide your naked guilt from his sight. No earth or sacred rain or light can endure its presence. [To a servant.] Take him inside. It is impious for any but his own family to see and hear his suffering.

OEDIPUS: I ask you in the name of God to grant one favor. You have been kinder to me than I deserved. But one favor. I ask it for you—not for myself?

CREON: What do you ask of me?

OEDIPUS: Cast me out of this land. Cast me out to where no man can see me. Cast me out now.

CREON: I would have done so, you can be sure. But I must wait and do the will of the god.

OEDIPUS: He has signified his will—with clarity. Destroy the parricide! Destroy the unholy one! Destroy Oedipus!

CREON: That was the god's command, I know. But now—with what has happened—I think it better to wait and learn what we must do.

OEDIPUS: You mean that you would ask for guidance for a man so sorrowful as I?

CREON: Surely, you are ready to put your trust in the god—now.

OEDIPUS: Yes, I am ready now. But I ask this of you. Inside—she is lying inside—give her whatever funeral rites you wish. You will do the right thing for her. She is your sister. But for me—do not condemn this city—my father's city—to suffer any longer from my presence as long as I live. Let me go and live upon Cithaeron—O Cithaeron, your name is ever linked with mine! Where my parents chose a grave for me. Where they would have had me die. Where I shall die in answer to their wish. And yet, I know, neither sickness nor anything else will ever bring me death. For I would not have been saved from death that once. No—I was saved for a more dreadful fate. Let it be. Creon, do not worry about my sons. They are boys and will have all they need, no matter where they go. But my daughters—poor creatures! They never ate a single meal without their father. We shared everything together. Creon, take care of them. Creon, let me touch them one last time. And let me weep—one last time. Please, my Lord, please, allow it—you're generous, you're kind. If I could only touch them and feel that they are with me—as I used to—when I could see them. [Enter ANTIGONE and ISMENE.] What is that crying? Is it my daughters? Has Creon taken pity on me? Has he sent my daughters to me? Are they here?

CREON: Yes, Oedipus, they are here. I had them brought to you. I know how much you love them, how much you have always loved them.

OEDIPUS: Bless you for this, Creon. Heaven bless you and grant you greater kindness than it has granted me. Ah, children, where are you? Come—come, touch my hands, the hands of your father, the hands of your brother, the hands that blinded these eyes which once were bright—these eyes—your father's eyes which neither saw nor knew what he had done when he became your father. I weep for you, my children. I cannot see you now. But when I think of the bitterness that waits for you in life, what you will have to suffer—the festivals, the holidays—the sadness you will know when you should share in gaiety! And when you are old enough to marry—who will there be, who will be the man strong enough to bear the slander that will haunt you—because you are my children? What disgrace will you not know? Your father killed his father. And lay with the woman that bore him and his children. These are the taunts that will follow you. And what man will marry you? No man, my children. You will spend your lives unwed—without children of your own—barren and wasted. Ah, Creon, you are the only father left to them. We—their parents—are lost. We gave them life. And we are lost to them. Take care of them. See that they do not wander poor and lonely. Do not let them suffer for what I have done. Pity them. They are so young. So lost. They have no one but you. Take my hand and promise me. And oh, my children, if you were older, I could make you understand. But now, make this your prayer—to find some place where you can live and have a better life than what your father knew.

CREON: Enough, my Lord. Go inside now.

OEDIPUS: Yes. I do not want to, but I will go.

CREON: All things have their time and their place.

OEDIPUS: I shall go—on this condition.

CREON: What condition? I am listening.

OEDIPUS: That you will send me away.

CREON: That is the god's decision, not mine.

OEDIPUS: The gods will not care where I go.

CREON: Then you shall have your wish.

OEDIPUS: Then—you consent?

CREON: It has nothing to do with my consent.

OEDIPUS: Let me go away from here.

CREON: Go then—but leave the children.

OEDIPUS: No! Do not take them away from me!

CREON: Do not presume that you are still in power. Your power has not survived with you.

CHORUS:

There goes Oedipus—
he was the man who was able to answer the riddle proposed by the Sphinx.
Mighty Oedipus—
he was an object of envy to all for his fortune and fame.

There goes Oedipus—
now he is drowning in waves of dread and despair.
Look at Oedipus—proof that none of us mortals can truly be thought of as happy until he is granted deliverance from life, until he is dead
and must suffer no more.

Antigone*

Characters

ANTIGONE, daughter of Oedipus
ISMENE, her sister
CREON, king of Thebes
EURYDICE, his wife
HAEMON, their son
TIRESIAS, a blind prophet GUARD
MESSENGER

The CHORUS represents the ELDERS OF THEBES.

SCENE:—Courtyard of the royal palace at Thebes. Daybreak.

[Enter ANTIGONE and ISMENE.]

ANTIGONE. Dear sister! Dear Ismene! How many evils
Our father, Oedipus, bequeathed to us!
And is there one of them—do you know of one
That Zeus has not showered down upon our heads?
I have seen pain, dishonor, shame, and ruin,
I have seen them all, in what we have endured.
And now comes this new edict by the King Proclaimed throughout the city. Have you heard?
Do you not know, even yet, our friends are threatened?
They are to meet the fate of enemies.

ISMENE. Our friends, Antigone? No, I have heard Nothing about them either good or bad.
I have no news except that we two sisters
Lost our two brothers when they killed each other.
I know the Argive army fled last night,
But what that means, or whether it makes my life
Harder or easier, I cannot tell.

ANTIGONE. This I was sure of. So I brought you here
Beyond the palace gates to talk alone.

ISMENE. What is the matter? I know you are deeply troubled.

ANTIGONE. Yes, for our brothers' fate. Creon has given An honored burial to one, to the other
Only unburied shame. Eteocles
Is laid in the earth with all the rites observed

* From Three Theban Plays, translated by T. H. Banks. Copyright © 1956 by Theodore Howard Banks. Reprinted by permission of Oxford University Press, Inc. First produced in 441 B.C.

That give him his due honor with the dead.
But the decree concerning Polyneices
Published through Thebes is that his wretched body Shall lie unmourned, unwept, unsepulchered.
Sweet will he seem to the vultures when they find him,
A welcome feast that they are eager for.
This is the edict the good Creon uttered
For your observance and for mine—yes, mine.
He is coming here himself to make it plain
To those who have not heard. Nor does he think it
Of little consequence, because whoever Does not obey is doomed to death by stoning.
Now you can show you are worthy of your birth,
Or bring disgrace upon a noble house.

ISMENE. What can I do, Antigone? As things are,
What can I do that would be of any help?

ANTIGONE. You can decide if you will share my task.

ISMENE. What do you mean? What are you planning to do?

ANTIGONE. I intend to give him burial. Will you help?

ISMENE. To give him burial! Against the law?

ANTIGONE. He is our brother. I will do my duty.
Yours too, perhaps. I never will be false.

ISMENE. Creon forbids it! You are too rash, too headstrong.

ANTIGONE. He has no right to keep me from my own.

ISMENE. Antigone! Think! Think how our father perished
In scorn and hatred when his sins, that he Himself discovered, drove him to strike blind
His eyes by his own hand. Think how his mother,
His wife—both names were hers—ended her life
Shamefully hanging in a twisted noose.
Think of that dreadful day when our two brothers,
Our wretched brothers, fought and fell together,
Each slayer and each slain. And now we too,
Left all alone, think how in turn we perish,
If, in defiance of the law, we brave
The power of the commandment of a king.
O think Antigone! We who are women Should not contend with men; we who are weak
Are ruled by the stronger, so that we must obey
In this and in matters that are yet more bitter.
And so I pray the dead to pardon me
If I obey our rulers, since I must.
To be too bold in what we do is madness.

ANTIGONE. I will not urge you. And I would not thank you
For any help that you might care to give me.
Do what you please, but I will bury him,
And if I die for that, I shall be happy.

Loved, I shall rest beside the one I loved.
My crime is innocence, for I owe the dead
Longer allegiance than I owe the living.
With the dead I lie forever. Live, if you choose,
Dishonoring the laws the gods have hallowed.

ISMENE. No, I dishonor nothing. But to challenge Authority—I have not strength enough.

ANTIGONE. Then make that your excuse. I will go heap
The earth above the brother that I love.

ISMENE. O Sister, Sister! How I fear for you!

ANTIGONE. No, not for me. Set your own life in order.

ISMENE. Well then, at least, tell no one of your plan.
Keep it close hidden, as I too will keep it.

ANTIGONE. Oh! Publish it! Proclaim it to the world!
Then I will hate you less than for your silence.

ISMENE. Your heart is hot for deeds that chill the blood.

ANTIGONE. I know that I give pleasure where I should.

ISMENE. Yes, if you can, but you will try in vain.

ANTIGONE. When my strength fails, then I shall try no longer.

ISMENE. A hopeless task should never be attempted.

ANTIGONE. Your words have won their just reward: my hatred
And the long-lasting hatred of the dead.
But leave me and the folly that is mine
To undergo the worst that can befall me.
I shall not suffer an ignoble death.

ISMENE. Go then, Antigone, if you must go.
And yet remember, though your act is foolish,
That those who love you do so with all their hearts.

[Exeunt ANTIGONE and ISMENE. Enter CHORUS.]

CHORUS.

Sunbeam, eye of the golden day, on Thebes the seven-gated,
On Dircé's streams you have dawned at last, O fairest of light.
Dawned on our foes, who had come enflamed by the quarrel of Polyneices, Shone on their glittering arms, made swifter their headlong flight.
From Argos they came with their white shields flashing,
Their helmets, crested with horsehair, agleam:
An army that flew like a snow-white eagle
Across our borders with shrilling scream.
Above our roofs it soared, at our gates with greedy jaws it was gaping;
But before their spears tasted our blood, and before our circle of towers

101*ff.* The chorus of old men celebrates the victory won over the Argive forces and Polynices. Dircé is a river of the Theban plain.

110. Theban dragon: According to legend, the Thebans sprang from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus.

Felt the flame of their torches, they turned to flight. The foes of the Theban dragon Found the surge and clamor of battle too fierce for their feebler powers.
For Zeus, who abhors a proud tongue's boasting,
Seeing their river of armor flow
Clashing and golden, struck with his lightning
To silence the shout of our foremost foe.

He crashed to the earth with his torch, who had scaled the top of our ramparts.
Raging in frenzy against us, breathing tempestuous hate, Raging and threatening in vain. And mighty Ares, our ally, Dealing havoc around him, apportioned to other foemen their fate.
For at seven portals, their seven leaders,
Down to the earth their bronze arms threw
In tribute to Zeus, the lord of the battle;
Save the fated brothers, the wretched two,
Who went to their common doom together,
Each wielding a spear that the other slew.

Now glorious Victory smiles upon jubilant Thebes rich in chariots.
Let us give free rein to our joy, forgetting our late-felt war;
Let us visit in night-long chorus the temples of all the immortals,
With Bacchus, who shakes the land in the dances, going before.
But behold! The son of Menoeceus approaches,
Creon, the new-crowned King of the land,
Made King by new fortunes the gods have allotted.
What step has he pondered? What has he planned
To lay before us, his council of elders,
Who have gathered together at his command?

[Enter CREON.]

CREON. Elders of Thebes, our city has been tossed
By a tempestuous ocean, but the gods
Have steadied it once more and made it safe.
You, out of all the citizens, I have summoned,
Because I knew that you once reverenced
The sovereignty of Laius, and that later,
When Oedipus was King and when he perished,
Your steadfast loyalty upheld his children.
And now his sons have fallen, each one stained
By his brother's blood, killed by his brother's hand,

116. He crashed . . .: Capaneus, the most violent of the Seven against Thebes.

118. Ares: god of war and a patron deity of Thebes.

So that the sovereignty devolves on me,
Since I by birth am nearest to the dead.
Certainly no man can be fully known,
Known in his soul, his will, his intellect,
Until he is tested and has proved himself
In statesmanship. Because a city's ruler,
Instead of following the wisest counsel,
May through some fear keep silent. Such a man
I think contemptible. And one whose friend
Has stronger claims upon him than his country,
Him I consider worthless. As for me,
I swear by Zeus, forever all-beholding,
That I would not keep silence, if I saw Ruin instead of safety drawing near us;
Nor would I think an enemy of the state Could be my friend. For I remember this:
Our country bears us all securely onward,
And only while it sails a steady course
Is friendship possible. Such are the laws
By which I guard the greatness of the city.
And kindred to them is the proclamation
That I have made to all the citizens
Concerning the two sons of Oedipus:
Eteocles, who has fallen in our defence,
Bravest of warriors, shall be entombed
With every honor, every offering given
That may accompany the noble dead
Down to their rest. But as for Polyneices,
He came from exile eager to consume
The city of his fathers with his fire
And all the temples of his father's gods,
Eager to drink deep of his kindred's blood,
Eager to drag us off to slavery.
To this man, therefore, nothing shall be given.
None shall lament him, none shall do him honor.
He shall be left without a grave, his corpse
Devoured by birds and dogs, a loathsome sight.
Such is my will. For never shall the wicked
Be given more approval than the just,
If I have power to stop it. But whoever Feels in his heart affection for his city
Shall be rewarded both in life and death.

CHORUS. Creon, son of Menoeceus, it has pleased you
So to pass judgment on our friend and foe.
And you may give commands to all of us,
The living and the dead. Your will is law.

CREON. Then see that this command is carried out.

CHORUS. Sir, lay that burden on some younger man.
CREON. Sentries have been assigned to guard the body.
CHORUS. Then what additional duty would you give us?
CREON. Never to countenance the disobedient.
CHORUS. Who is so stupid as to long for death?
CREON. Death is indeed the punishment. Yet men
Have often been destroyed by hope of gain.

[Enter GUARD.]

GUARD. My Lord, I cannot say that I have hurried,
Or that my running has made me lose my breath.
I often stopped to think, and turned to go back.
I stood there talking to myself: 'You fool,'
I said, 'Why do you go to certain death?'
And then: 'You idiot, are you still delaying?
If someone else tells Creon, you will suffer.'
I changed my mind this way, getting here slowly, Making a short road long. But still, at last,
I did decide to come. And though my story
Is nothing much to tell, yet I will tell it.
One thing I know. I must endure my fate,
But nothing more than that can happen to me.
CREON. What is the matter? What is troubling you?
GUARD. Please let me tell you first about myself.
I did not do it. I did not see who did.
It is not right for me to be punished for it.
CREON. You take good care not to expose yourself.
Your news must certainly be something strange.
GUARD. Yes, it is strange—dreadful. I cannot speak.
CREON. Oh, tell it, will you? Tell it and go away!
GUARD. Well, it is this. Someone has buried the body,
Just now, and gone—has sprinkled it with dust
And given it other honors it should have.
CREON. What are you saying? Who has dared to do it?
GUARD. I cannot tell. Nothing was to be seen:
No mark of pickaxe, no spot where a spade
Had turned the earth. The ground was hard and dry, Unbroken—not a trace of any wheels—
No sign to show who did it. When the sentry
On the first watch discovered it and told us,
We were struck dumb with fright. For he was hidden
Not by a tomb but a light coat of dust,
As if a pious hand had scattered it.
There were no tracks of any animal,
A dog or wild beast that had come to tear him.
We all began to quarrel, and since no one
Was there to stop us, nearly came to blows.

Everyone was accused, and everyone
Denied his guilt. We could discover nothing.
We were quite willing to handle red-hot iron,
To walk through fire, to swear by all the gods
That we were innocent of the deed itself,
And innocent of taking any part
In planning it or doing it. At last
One of us spoke. We trembled and hung our heads,
For he was right; we could not argue with him,
Yet his advice was bound to cause us trouble.
He told us all this had to be reported,
Not kept a secret. We all agreed to that.
We drew lots for it, and I had no luck.
I won the prize and was condemned to come.
So here I stand, unwilling, because I know
The bringer of bad news is never welcome.

CHORUS. Sir, as he spoke, I have been wondering.
Can this be, possibly, the work of gods?

CREON. Be silent! Before you madden me! You are old.
Would you be senseless also? What you say Is unendurable. You say the gods Cared for this corpse. Then was it for reward, Mighty to match his mighty services,
That the gods covered him? He who came to burn
Their pillared temples and their votive offerings,
Ravage their land, and trample down the state.
Or is it your opinion that the gods
Honor the wicked? Inconceivable!
However, from the first, some citizens
Who found it difficult to endure this edict,
Muttered against me, shaking their heads in secret,
Instead of bowing down beneath the yoke,
Obedient and contented with my rule.
These are the men who are responsible,
For I am certain they have bribed the guards
To bury him. Nothing is worse than money.
Money lays waste to cities, banishes
Men from their homes, indoctrinates the heart,
Perverting honesty to works of shame,
Showing men how to practice villainy,
Subduing them to every godless deed.
But all those men who got their pay for this Need have no doubt their turn to pay will come.
[To the GUARD] Now, you. As I still honor Zeus the King,
I tell you, and I swear it solemnly,
Either you find the man who did this thing,

The very man, and bring him here to me,
Or you will not just die. Before you die,
You will be tortured until you have explained
This outrage; so that later when you steal
You will know better where to look for money
And not expect to find it everywhere.
Ill-gotten wealth brings ruin and not safety.

GUARD. Sir, may I speak? Or shall I merely go?

CREON. You can say nothing that is not offensive.

GUARD. Do I offend your hearing or your heart?

CREON. Is it your business to define the spot?

GUARD. The criminal hurts your heart, and I your ears.

CREON. Still talking? Why, you must have been born talking!

GUARD. Perhaps. But I am not the guilty man.

CREON. You are. And what is more you sold yourself.

GUARD. You have judged me, sir, and have misjudged me, too.

CREON. Be clever about judging if you care to.
But you will say that treachery leads to sorrow
Unless you find the man and show him to me.
[Exit CREON.]

GUARD. Finding him is the best thing that could happen.
Fate will decide. But however that may be,
You never are going to see me here again.
I have escaped! I could not have hoped for that.
I owe the gods my thanks for guarding me.
[Exit GUARD.]

CHORUS.

Many the marvelous things; but none that can be More of a marvel than man! This being that braves
With the south wind of winter the whitened streaks of the sea, Threading his way through the troughs of engulfing waves.
And the earth most ancient, the eldest of all the gods,
Earth, undecaying, unwearied, he wears away with his toil;
Forward and back with his plowshare, year after year, he plods,
With his horses turning the soil.

Man in devising excels. The birds of the air,
That light-minded race, he entangles fast in his toils.
Wild creatures he catches, casting about them his snare,
And the salt-sea brood he nets in his woven coils.
The tireless bull he has tamed, and the beast whose lair
Is hidden deep in the wilds, who roams in the wooded hills.
He has fitted a yoke that the neck of the shaggy-maned horse will bear;
He is master of all through his skills.

He has taught himself speech, and wind-like thought, and the lore
Of ruling a town. He has fled the arrows of rain,
The searching arrows of frost he need fear no more,
That under a starry sky are endured with pain.
Provision for all he has made—unprovided for naught,
Save death itself, that in days to come will take shape.
From obscure and deep-seated disease he has subtly wrought
A way of escape.

Resourceful and skilled, with an inconceivable art,
He follows his course to a good or an evil end.
When he holds the canons of justice high in his heart
And has sworn to the gods the laws of the land to defend, Proud stands his city; without a city is he
Who with ugliness, rashness, or evil dishonors the day.
Let me shun his thoughts. Let him share no hearthstone with me,
Who acts in this way!

CHORUS. Look there! Look there! What portent can this be?
Antigone! I know her, it is she!
Daughter of Oedipus a prisoner brought?
You defied Creon? You in folly caught?

[Enter GUARD with ANTIGONE.]

GUARD. She did it. Here she is. We caught this girl
As she was burying him. Where is the King?
CHORUS. Leaving the palace there, just as we need him.

[Enter CREON.]

CREON. Why do you need my presence? What has happened?
GUARD. My Lord, no one should take a solemn oath
Not to do something, for his second thoughts
Make him a liar. I vowed not to hurry back.
I had been battered by your storm of threats.
But when a joy comes that exceeds our hopes,
No other happiness can equal it.
So I have broken my vow. I have returned,
Bringing this girl along. She was discovered Busy with all the rites of burial.
There was no casting lots, no, not this time!
Such luck as this was mine and no one else's.
Now sir, take her yourself, examine her,
Convict her, do what you like. But as for me,
I have the right to a complete acquittal.
CREON. This is the girl you caught? How? Where was she?
GUARD. Burying the dead man, just as I have told you.

CREON. Do you mean that? Or have you lost your mind?
GUARD. Your order was that he should not be buried.
I saw her bury him. Is that all clear?
CREON. How was she seen? You caught her in the act?
GUARD. This was what happened. When we had gotten back,
With your threats following us, we swept away
The dust that covered him. We left him bare,
A rotting corpse. And then we sat to windward,
Up on the hillside, to avoid the stench.
All of us were alert, and kept awake Threatening each other. No one could get careless.
So the time passed, until the blazing sun
Stood at the zenith, and the heat was burning.
Then suddenly the wind came in a blast,
Lifting a cloud of dust up from the earth,
Troubling the sky and choking the whole plain,
Stripping off all the foliage of the woods,
Filling the breadth of heaven. We closed our eyes
And bore the affliction that the gods had sent us.
When it had finally stopped, we saw this girl.
She wailed aloud with a sharp, bitter cry,
The cry a bird gives seeing its empty nest Robbed of its brood. And she too, when she saw
The naked body, was loud in her lament
And cursed the men who had uncovered him.
Quickly she sprinkled him with dust, and then Lifting a pitcher, poured out three libations
To do him honor. When we ran and caught her,
She was unterrified. When we accused her
Both of her earlier and her present act,
She made no effort to deny the charges.
I am part glad, part sorry. It is good
To find that you yourself have gotten clear,
But to bring trouble on your friends is hard.
However, nothing counts except my safety.
CREON. [To ANTIGONE] You there. You, looking at the ground. Tell me.
Do you admit this or deny it? Which?
ANTIGONE. Yes, I admit it. I do not deny it.
CREON. [To GUARD] Go. You are free. The charge is dropped.
[Exit GUARD.]
Now you,
Answer this question. Make your answer brief.
You knew there was a law forbidding this?
ANTIGONE. Of course I knew it. Why not? It was public.
CREON. And you have dared to disobey the law?

ANTIGONE. Yes. For this law was not proclaimed by Zeus,
Or by the gods who rule the world below.
I do not think your edicts have such power
That they can override the laws of heaven,
Unwritten and unfailing, laws whose life
Belongs not to today or yesterday
But to time everlasting; and no man Knows the first moment that they had their being.
If I transgressed these laws because I feared
The arrogance of man, how to the gods
Could I make satisfaction? Well I know,
Being a mortal, that I have to die,
Even without your proclamations. Yet
If I must die before my time is come,
That is a blessing. Because to one who lives,
As I live, in the midst of sorrows, death
Is of necessity desirable.
For me, to face death is a trifling pain
That does not trouble me. But to have left
The body of my brother, my own brother,
Lying unburied would be bitter grief.
And if these acts of mine seem foolish to you,
Perhaps a fool accuses me of folly.

CHORUS. The violent daughter of a violent father,
She cannot bend before a storm of evils.

CREON. [To ANTIGONE] Stubborn? Self-willed? People like that, I tell you,
Are the first to come to grief. The hardest iron,
Baked in the fire, most quickly flies to pieces.
An unruly horse is taught obedience
By a touch of the curb. How can you be so proud?
You, a mere slave? [To CHORUS] She was well schooled already
In insolence, when she defied the law.
And now look at her! Boasting, insolent, Exulting in what she did. And if she triumphs
And goes unpunished, I am no man—she is.
If she were more than niece, if she were closer Than anyone who worships at my altar,
She would not even then escape her doom,
A dreadful death. Nor would her sister. Yes,
Her sister had a share in burying him.
[To ATTENDANT] Go bring her here. I have just seen her, raving, Beside herself. Even before they act,
Traitors who plot their treason in the dark Betray themselves like that. Detestable!

[To ANTIGONE] But hateful also is an evil-doer
Who, caught red-handed, glorifies the crime.
ANTIGONE. Now you have caught me, will you do more than kill me?
CREON. No, only that. With that I am satisfied.
ANTIGONE. Then why do you delay? You have said nothing
I do not hate. I pray you never will.
And you hate what I say. Yet how could I Have won more splendid honor than by giving Due burial to my brother? All men here
Would grant me their approval, if their lips
Were not scaled up in fear. But you, a king, Blessed by good fortune in much else besides,
Can speak and act with perfect liberty.
CREON. All of these Thebans disagree with you.
ANTIGONE. No. They agree, but they control their tongues.
CREON. You feel no shame in acting without their help?
ANTIGONE. I feel no shame in honoring a brother.
CREON. Another brother died who fought against him.
ANTIGONE. Two brothers. The two sons of the same parents.
CREON. Honor to one is outrage to the other.
ANTIGONE. Eteocles will not feel himself dishonored.
CREON. What! When his rites are offered to a traitor?
ANTIGONE. It was his brother, not his slave, who died.
CREON. One who attacked the land that he defended.
ANTIGONE. The gods still wish those rites to be performed.
CREON. Are the just pleased with the unjust as their equals?
ANTIGONE. That may be virtuous in the world below.
CREON. No. Even there a foe is never a friend.
ANTIGONE. I am not made for hatred but for love.
CREON. Then go down to the dead. If you must love,
Love them. While I yet live, no woman rules me.
CHORUS. Look there. Ismene, weeping as sisters weep.
The shadow of a cloud of grief lies deep
On her face, darkly flushed; and in her pain
Her tears are falling like a flood of rain.

[Enter ISMENE and ATTENDANTS.]

CREON. You viper! Lying hidden in my house,
Sucking my blood in secret, while I reared,
Unknowingly, two subverters of my throne.
Do you confess that you have taken part
In this man's burial, or deny it? Speak.
ISMENE. If she will recognize my right to say so,
I shared the action and I share the blame.
ANTIGONE. No. That would not be just. I never let you Take any part in what you disapproved of.

ISMENE. In your calamity, I am not ashamed
To stand beside you, beaten by this tempest.
ANTIGONE. The dead are witnesses of what I did,
To love in words alone is not enough.
ISMENE. Do not reject me, Sister! Let me die
Beside you, and do honor to the dead.
ANTIGONE. No. You will neither share my death nor claim
What I have done. My death will be sufficient.
ISMENE. What happiness can I have when you are gone?
ANTIGONE. Ask Creon that. He is the one you value.
ISMENE. Do you gain anything by taunting me?
ANTIGONE. Ah, no! By taunting you, I hurt myself.
ISMENE. How can I help you? Tell me what I can do.
ANTIGONE. Protect yourself. I do not grudge your safety.
ISMENE. Antigone! Shall I not share your fate?
ANTIGONE. We both have made our choices: life, and death.
ISMENE. At least I tried to stop you. I protested.
ANTIGONE. Some have approved your way; and others, mine.
ISMENE. Yet now I share your guilt. I too am ruined.
ANTIGONE. Take courage. Live your life. But I long since Gave myself up to death to help the dead.
CREON. One of them has just lost her senses now.
The other has been foolish all her life.
ISMENE. We cannot always use our reason clearly.
Suffering confuses us and clouds our minds.
CREON. It clouds your mind. You join in her wrong-doing.
ISMENE. How is life possible without my sister?
CREON. Your sister? You have no sister. She is dead.
ISMENE. Then you will kill the wife your son has chosen?
CREON. Yes. There are other fields that he can plow.
ISMENE. He will not find such an enduring love.
CREON. A wicked woman for my son? No, never!
ANTIGONE. O Haemon, Haemon! How your father wrongs you!
CREON. You and your marriage! Let me hear no more!
CHORUS. You are unyielding? You will take her from him?
CREON. Death will act for me. Death will stop the marriage.
CHORUS. It seems, then, you have sentenced her to death.
CREON. Yes. And my sentence you yourselves accepted.
Take them inside. From now on, they are women,
And have no liberty. For even the bold
Seek an escape when they see death approaching.
[Exeunt ANTIGONE, ISMENE, and ATTENDANTS.]
CHORUS.
Blesséd the life that has no evil known,
For the gods, striking, strike down a whole race—

Doomed parent and doomed child both overthrown.
As when the fierce breath of the winds of Thrace
Across the darkness of the sea has blown
A rushing surge; black sand from deep below
Comes boiling up; wind-beaten headlands moan,
Fronting the full shock of the billow's blow.

The race of Oedipus, from days of old,
To long dead sorrows add new sorrows' weight.
Some god has sent them sufferings manifold.
None may release another, for their fate
Through generations loosens not its hold.
Now is their last root cut, their last light fled,
Because of frenzy's curse, words overbold,
And dust, the gods' due, on the bloodstained dead.

O Zeus, what human sin restricts thy might?
Thou art unsnared by all-ensnaring sleep
Or tireless months. Unaging thou dost keep Thy court in splendor of Olympian light.
And as this law was true when time began,
Tomorrow and forever it shall be:
Naught beyond measure in the life of man
From fate goes free.

For hope, wide-ranging, that brings good to some,
To many is a false lure of desire
Light-minded, giddy; and until the fire
Scorches their feet, they know not what will come.
Wise is the famous adage: that to one Whom the gods madden, evil, soon or late,
Seems good; then can he but a moment shun
The stroke of fate.

But Haemon comes, of your two sons the last.
Is his heart heavy for the sentence passed Upon Antigone, his promised bride,
And for his hope of marriage now denied?

[Enter HAEMON.]

CREON. We soon shall know better than seers could tell us.
My son, Antigone is condemned to death.
Nothing can change my sentence. Have you learned
Her fate and come here in a storm of anger,
Or do you love me and support my acts?

HAEMON. Father, I am your son. Your greater knowledge

Will trace the pathway that I mean to follow.
My marriage cannot be of more importance
Than to be guided always by your wisdom.
CREON. Yes, Haemon, this should be the law you live by!
In all things to obey your father's will.
Men pray for children round them in their homes
Only to see them dutiful and quick
With hatred to requite their father's foe,
With honor to repay their father's friend.
But what is there to say of one whose children
Prove to be valueless? That he has fathered Grief for himself and laughter for his foes.
Then, Haemon, do not, at the lure of pleasure,
Unseat your reason for a woman's sake.
This comfort soon grows cold in your embrace:
A wicked wife to share your bed and home.
Is there a deeper wound than to find worthless
The one you love? Turn from this girl with loathing,
As from an enemy, and let her go
To get a husband in the world below.
For I have found her openly rebellious,
Her only out of all the city. Therefore,
I will not break the oath that I have sworn.
I will have her killed. Vainly she will invoke
The bond of kindred blood the gods make sacred.
If I permit disloyalty to breed
In my own house, I nurture it in strangers.
He who is righteous with his kin is righteous
In the state also. Therefore, I cannot pardon
One who does violence to the laws or thinks
To dictate to his rulers; for whoever
May be the man appointed by the city,
That man must be obeyed in everything,
Little or great, just or unjust. And surely
He who was thus obedient would be found
As good a ruler as he was a subject;
And in a storm of spears he would stand fast
With loyal courage at his comrade's side.
But disobedience is the worst of evils.
For it is this that ruins cities; this Makes our homes desolate; armies of allies
Through this break up in rout. But most men find Their happiness and safety in obedience.
Therefore we must support the law, and never Be beaten by a woman. It is better
To fall by a man's hand, if we must fall,

Than to be known as weaker than a girl.
CHORUS. We may in our old age have lost our judgment,
And yet to us you seem to have spoken wisely.
HAEMON. The gods have given men the gift of reason,
Greatest of all things that we call our own.
I have no skill, nor do I wish to have it,
To show where you have spoken wrongly. Yet
Some other's thought, beside your own, might prove To be of value. Therefore it is my duty,
My natural duty as your son, to notice,
On your behalf, all that men say, or do,
Or find to blame. For your frown frightens them,
So that the citizen dares not say a word
That would offend you. I can hear, however,
Murmurs in darkness and laments for her.
They say: "No woman ever less deserved
Her doom, no woman ever was to die
So shamefully for deeds so glorious.
For when her brother fell in bloody battle,
She would not let his body lie unburied
To be devoured by carrion dogs or birds.
Does such a woman not deserve reward,
Reward of golden honor?" This I hear,
A rumor spread in secrecy and darkness.
Father, I prize nothing in life so highly As your well-being. How can children have A nobler honor than their father's fame
Or father than his son's? Then do not think Your mood must never alter; do not feel
Your word, and yours alone, must be correct.
For if a man believes that he is right
And only he, that no one equals him
In what he says or thinks, he will be found Empty when searched and tested. Because a man
Even if he be wise, feels no disgrace
In learning many things, in taking care
Not to be over-rigid. You have seen Trees on the margin of a stream in winter:
Those yielding to the flood save every twig,
And those resisting perish root and branch.
So, too, the mariner who never slackens
His taut sheet overturns his craft and spends Keel uppermost the last part of his voyage.
Let your resentment die. Let yourself change.
For I believe—if I, a younger man,
May have a sound opinion—it is best

That men by nature should be wise in all things.
But most men find they cannot reach that goal;
And when this happens, it is also good
To learn to listen to wise counselors.

CHORUS. Sir, when his words are timely, you should heed them.
And Haemon, you should profit by his words.
Each one of you has spoken reasonably.

CREON. Are men as old as I am to be taught How to behave by men as young as he?

HAEMON: Not to do wrong. If I am young, ignore
My youth. Consider only what I do.

CREON. Have you done well in honoring the rebellious?

HAEMON. Those who do wrong should not command respect.

CREON. Then that disease has not infected her?

HAEMON. All of our city with one voice denies it.

CREON. Does Thebes give orders for the way I rule?

HAEMON. How young you are! How young in saying that!

CREON. Am I to govern by another's judgment?

HAEMON. A city that is one man's is no city.

CREON. A city is the king's. That much is sure.

HAEMON. You would rule well in a deserted country.

CREON. This boy defends a woman, it appears.

HAEMON. If you are one. I am concerned for you.

CREON. To quarrel with your father does not shame you?

HAEMON. Not when I see you failing to do justice.

CREON. Am I unjust when I respect my crown?

HAEMON. Respect it! When you trample down religion?

CREON. Infamous! Giving first place to a woman!

HAEMON. But never to anything that would disgrace me.

CREON. Each word you utter is a plea for her.

HAEMON. For you, too, and for me, and for the gods.

CREON. You shall not marry her this side of death.

HAEMON. Then if she dies, she does not die alone.

CREON. What! Has it come to this? You threaten me?

HAEMON. No. But I tell you your decree is useless.

CREON. You will repent this. You! Teaching me wisdom!

HAEMON. I will not call you mad. You are my father.

CREON. You woman's slave! Your talk will not persuade me.

HEAMON. Then what you want is to make all the speeches.

CREON. So. Now by all the gods in heaven above us,
One thing is certain: you are going to pay
For taunting and insulting me. [To ATTENDANTS] Bring out That hated object. Let her die this moment,
Here, at her bridegroom's feet, before his eyes.

HAEMON. No, you are wrong. Not at my feet. And never

Will you set eyes upon my face again.
Rage, rave, with anyone who can bear to listen. [Exit HAEMON.]

CHORUS. Sir, he is gone; his anger gives him speed.
Young men are bitter in their agony.

CREON. Let him imagine more than man can do,
Or let him do more. Never shall he save
These two girls; they are going to their doom.

CHORUS. Do you intend to put them both to death?

CREON. That was well said. No, not the innocent.

CHORUS. And the other? In what way is she to die?

CREON. Along a desolate pathway I will lead her,
And shut her, living, in a rocky vault
With no more food than will appease the gods,
So that the city may not be defiled.
Hades, who is the only god she worships,
May hear her prayers, and rescue her from death.
Otherwise she will learn at last, though late,
That to revere the dead is useless toil. [Exit CREON.]

CHORUS.

None may withstand you, O love unconquered,
Seizing the wealth of man as your prey,
In the cheek of a maiden keeping your vigil,
Till night has faded again to day.
You roam the wilds to men's farthest dwellings,
You haunt the boundless face of the sea.
No god may escape you, no short-lived mortal
From the madness that love inflicts may flee.

You twist our minds until ruin follows.
The just to unrighteous ways you turn.
You have goaded kinsman to strive with kinsman
Till the fires of bitter hatred burn.
In the eyes of a bride you shine triumphant;
Beside the eternal laws your throne
Eternal stands, for great Aphrodite, Resistless, works her will on her own.

But now I too am moved. I cannot keep Within the bounds of loyalty. I weep
When I behold Antigone, the bride,
Near the room where all at last abide.

726-727. With no more food . . . defiled: This passage is obscure; the penalty proposed by Creon seems to be imprisonment in a tomb with a certain ration of food. Since Antigone would die of starvation but not actually by anyone's hand, Creon seems to think that the city will not be "defiled," i.e. incur blood-guilt.

[Enter ANTIGONE, guarded.]

ANTIGONE.

See me, my countrymen! See with what pain
I tread the path I shall not tread again,
Looking my last upon the light of day
That shines for me no more.
Hades, who gives his sleep to all, me, living, leads away
To Acheron's dark shore.
Not mine the hymeneal chant, not mine the bridal song,
For I, a bride, to Acheron belong.

CHORUS.

Glorious, therefore, and with praise you tread
The pathway to the deep gulf of the dead.
You have not felt the force of fate's decrees,
Struck down by violence, wasted by disease;
But of your own free will you choose to go,
Alone of mortals, to the world below.

ANTIGONE.

I know how sad a death she suffered, she
Who was our guest here, Phrygian Niobe.
Stone spread upon her, close as ivy grows,
And locked her in its chains.
Now on her wasted form, men say, fall ceaselessly the snows,
Fall ceaselessly the rains;
While from her grieving eyes drop tears, tears that her bosom steep.
And like hers, my fate lulls me now to sleep.

CHORUS.

She was a goddess of the gods' great race;
Mortals are we and mortal lineage trace.
But for a woman the renown is great
In life and death to share a godlike fate.

ANTIGONE.

By our fathers' gods, I am mocked! I am mocked! Ah! why,
You men of wealth, do you taunt me before I die?
O sacred grove of the city! O waters that flow
From the spring of Dircé! Be witness; to you I cry.
What manner of woman I am you know
And by what laws, unloved, unlamented, I go
To my rocky prison, to my unnatural tomb.
Alas, how ill-bestead!

767. Niobe: a Phrygian princess married to Amphion, king of Thebes. She boasted that she had borne more children than Leto, mother of Apollo and Artemis; these two killed her children. She returned to Phrygia where she was turned into a rock on Mount Sipylus; the melting of the snow on the mountain caused 'tears' to flow down the rock formation which resembled a woman's face.

No fellowship have I; no others can share my doom,
Neither mortals nor corpses, neither the quick nor the dead.

CHORUS.

You have rushed forward with audacious feet
And dashed yourself against the law's high seat.
That was a grievous fall, my child, and yet
In this ordeal you pay your father's debt.

ANTIGONE.

You have touched on the heaviest grief that my heart can hold:
Grief for my father, sorrow that never grows old
For our famous house and its doom that the fates have spun.
My mother's bed! Ah! How can its horrors be told?
My mother who yielded her love to one
Who was at once my father and her son.
Born of such parents, with them henceforth I abide,
Wretched, accursed, unwed.
And you, Polyneices, you found an ill-fated bride,
And I, the living, am ruined by you, the dead.

CHORUS.

A pious action may of praise be sure,
But he who rules a land cannot endure
An act of disobedience to his rule.
Your own self-will you have not learned to school.

ANTIGONE.

Unwept, unfriended, without marriage song,
Forth on my road I miserable am led;
I may not linger. Not for long Shall I, most wretched, see the holy sun.
My fate no friend bewails, not one;
For me no tear is shed.

[Enter CREON.]

CREON. Do you not know that singing and lamentation
Would rise incessantly as death approached,
If they could be of service? Lead her away!
Obey my orders. Shut her in her grave
And leave her there, alone. Then she can take Her choice of living in that home, or dying.
I am not stained by the guilt of this girl's blood,
But she shall see the light of day no longer.

ANTIGONE. O tomb! O cavern! Everlasting prison!
O bridal-chamber! To you I make my way
To join my kindred, all those who have died
And have been greeted by Persephone.

824. Persephone: the queen of the underworld.

The last and far most miserable of all,
I seek them now, before I have lived my life.
Yet high are the hopes I cherish that my coming
Will be most welcome to my father; welcome,
Mother, to you; and welcome to you, Brother.
For when you died I ministered to you all,
With my own hands washed you and dressed your bodies,
And poured libations at your graves. And now,
Because I have given to you, too, Polyneices,
Such honors as I could, I am brought to this.
And yet all wise men will approve my act.
Not for my children, had I been a mother,
Not for a husband, for his moldering body,
Would I have set myself against the city
As I have done. And the law sanctions me.
Losing a husband, I might find another.
I could have other children. But my parents
Are hidden from me in the underworld,
So that no brother's life can bud and bloom
Ever again. And therefore, Polyneices,
I paid you special honor. And for this Creon has held me guilty of evil-doing,
And leads me captive for my too great boldness.
No bridal bed is mine, no bridal song,
No share in the joys of marriage, and no share
In nursing children and in tending them.
But thus afflicted, destitute of friends,
Living, I go down to the vaults of death.
What is the law of heaven that I have broken?
Why should I any longer look to the gods,
Ill-fated as I am? Whose aid should I invoke,
When I for piety am called impious?
If this pleases the gods, then I shall learn
That sin brought death upon me. But if the sin
Lies in my judges, I could wish for them
No harsher fate than they have decreed for me.

CHORUS. Still the storm rages; still the same gusts blow, Troubling her spirit with their savage breath.

CREON. Yes. And her guards will pay for being slow.

ANTIGONE. Ah! With those words I have drawn close to death.

CREON. You cannot hope that you will now be freed
From the fulfillment of the doom decreed.

ANTIGONE.

O Thebes, O land of my fathers, O city!
O gods who begot and guarded my house from of old!
They seize me, they snatch me away!

Now, now! They show no pity.
They give no second's delay.
You elders, you leaders of Thebes, behold me, behold!
The last of the house of your kings, the last See what I suffer. See the doom
That is come upon me, and see from whom,
Because to the laws of heaven I held fast.
[Exeunt ANTIGONE and GUARDS.]

CHORUS.

This likewise Danaë endured:
The light of heaven she changed for a home brass-bound,
In a tomb-like chamber close immured.
And yet, O my child, her race was with honor crowned,
And she guarded the seed of Zeus gold-showered.
But naught from the terrible power of fate is free.
Neither war, nor city walls high-towered,
Nor wealth, nor black ships beaten by the sea.

He too bowed down beneath his doom,
The son of Dryas, swift-angered Edonian king,
Shut fast in a rocky prison's gloom.
How he roused the god with his mad tongue's mocking sting,
As his frenzy faded, he came to know;
For he sought to make the god-filled maenads mute,
To quench the Bacchic torches' glow,
And angered the Muses, lovers of the flute.

By the double sea and the dark rocks steely blue
The beach of Bosporus lies and the savage shore
Of Thracian Salmydessus. There the bride
Of Phineus, whose fierce heart no mercy knew,
Dealt his two sons a blow that for vengeance cried;
Ares beheld her hand, all stained with gore,
Grasping the pointed shuttle that pierced through Their eyes that saw no more.

877. Danaë: daughter of Acrisius, king of Argos. It was prophesied that he would be killed by his daughter's son; so he shut her up in a bronze tower. But Zeus came to her in the form of a golden rainshower and she bore a son, Perseus, who did in the end kill his grandfather.

886. son of Dryas: Lycurgus, the Thracian (Edonian) king. He opposed the introduction of Dionysiac religion into his kingdom and was imprisoned by the god.

893*ff*. By the double sea . . . : The whole story is difficult to follow and its application to the case of Antigone obscure. Cleopatra, the daughter of the Athenian princess Orithyia, whom Boreas, the North Wind, carried off to his home in Thrace (cf. l. 902*ff*.), was married to Phineus, the Thracian king, and bore him two sons. He tired of her, abandoned her, and married Eidothea, "the bride of Phineus" (ll. 895-896). Eidothea put out the eyes of the two sons of Cleopatra. Ares, the god of war, associated with Thrace, watched the savage act.

In misery pining, their lot they lamented aloud,
So is of a mother whose fortune in marriage was ill.
From the ancient line of Erechtheus her blood she traced;
Nurtured in caves far-distant and nursed in cloud,
Daughter of Boreas, daughter of gods, she raced Swift as a steed on the slope of the soaring hill.
And yet, O child, O child, she also bowed
To the long-lived fates' harsh will.

[Enter TIRESIAS and BOY.]

TIRESIAS. Elders of Thebes, we have come to you with one Finding for both the pathway that we followed,
For in this fashion must the blind be guided.
CREON. What tidings, old Tiresias, are you bringing?
TIRESIAS. I will inform you, I the seer. Give heed.
CREON. To ignore your counsel has not been my custom.
TIRESIAS. Therefore you kept Thebes on a steady course.
CREON. I can bear witness to the help you gave.
TIRESIAS. Mark this. You stand upon the brink of ruin.
CREON. What terrible words are those? What do you mean?
TIRESIAS. My meaning is made manifest by my art
And my art's omens. As I took my station
Upon my ancient seat of augury,
Where round me birds of every sort come flocking,
I could no longer understand their language.
It was drowned out in a strange, savage clamor,
Shrill, evil, frenzied, inarticulate.
The whirr of wings told me their murderous talons Tore at each other. Filled with dread, I then Made trial of burnt sacrifice. The altar
Was fully kindled, but no clear, bright flame
Leaped from the offering; only fatty moisture
Oozed from the flesh and trickled on the embers, Smoking and sputtering. The bladder burst,
And scattered in the air. The folds of fat
Wrapping the thigh-bones melted and left them bare.
Such was the failure of the sacrifice,
That did not yield the sign that I was seeking.
I learned these things from this boy's observation;
He is my guide as I am guide to others.
Your edict brings this suffering to the city,
For every hearth of ours has been defiled
And every altar. There the birds and dogs
Have brought their carrion, torn from the corpse
Of ill-starred Polyneices. Hence, the gods
Refuse our prayers, refuse our sacrifice,
Refuse the flame of our burnt-offerings.

No birds cry clearly and auspiciously,
For they are glutted with a slain man's blood.
Therefore, my son, consider what has happened.
All men are liable to grievous error;
But he who, having erred, does not remain
Inflexible, but rather makes amends
For ill, is not unwise or unrewarded.
Stubborn self-will incurs the charge of folly.
Give to the fallen the honors he deserves
And do not stab him. Are you being brave
When you inflict new death upon the dead?
Your good I think of; for your good I speak,
And a wise counselor is sweet to hear
When the advice he offers proves of value.

CREON. Old man, all of you shoot your arrows at me Like archers at a target. You have used Even the art of prophecy in your plotting.
Long have the tribe of prophets traded in me,
Like a ship's cargo. Drive whatever bargain
May please you, buy, sell, heap up for yourself
Silver of Sardis, gold of India. Yet
I tell you this: that man shall not be buried,
Not though the eagles of Zeus himself should bear
The carrion morsels to their master's throne.
Not even from the dread of such pollution
Will I permit his burial, since I know
There is no mortal can defile the gods.
But even the wisest men disastrously
May fall, Tiresias, when for money's sake
They utter shameful words with specious wisdom.

TIRESIAS. Ah! Do men understand, or even consider—

CREON. Consider what? Doubtless some platitude!

TIRESIAS. How precious beyond any wealth is prudence.

CREON. How full of evil is the lack of prudence.

TIRESIAS. Yet you are sick, sick with that same disease.

CREON. I will not in reply revile a prophet.

TIRESIAS. You do. You say my prophecy is false.

CREON. Well, all the race of seers are mercenary.

TIRESIAS. And love of base wealth marks the breed of tyrants.

CREON. Are you aware that you address your King?

TIRESIAS. I made you King by helping you save Thebes.

CREON. Wise in your art and vicious in your acts.

TIRESIAS. Do not enrage me. I should keep my secret.

CREON. Reveal it. Speak. But do not look for profit.

TIRESIAS. You too will find no profit in my words.

CREON. How can you earn your pay? I will not change.

TIRESIAS. Then know this. Yes, be very sure of it.

Only a few more times will you behold
The swift course of the chariot of the sun
Before you give as payment for the dead
Your own dead flesh and blood. For you have thrust
A living soul to darkness, in a tomb Imprisoned without pity. And a corpse, Belonging to the gods below you keep Unpurified, unburied, unrevered.
The dead are no concern either of yours
Or of the gods above, yet you offend them.
So the avengers, the destroyers, Furies
Of Hades and the gods, lurking in ambush,
Wait to inflict your sins upon your head.
Do you still think my tongue is lined with silver?
A time will come, and will not linger coming,
That will awaken in your house the wailing
Of men and women. Hatred shakes the cities, Hatred of you. Their sons are mangled corpses,
Hallowed with funeral rites by dogs or beasts
Or birds who bear the all-polluting stench
To every city having hearth or altar.
You goaded me, and therefore like an archer
I shoot my angry arrows at your heart,
Sure arrows; you shall not escape their sting.
Boy, lead me home. Let him expend his rage
On younger men, and let him learn to speak
With a more temperate tongue, and school his heart
To feelings finer than his present mood.

[Exeunt TIRESIAS and BOY.]

CHORUS. Sir, he is gone, with fearful prophecies.
And from the time that these dark hairs have whitened,
I have known this: never has he foretold
Anything that proved false concerning Thebes.

CREON. I also know it well, and it dismays me.
To yield is bitter. But to resist, and bring A curse upon my pride is no less bitter.

CHORUS. Son of Menoeceus, listen. You must listen.

CREON. What should I do? Tell me, I will obey.

CHORUS. Go. Free the girl. Release her from the cavern,
And build a tomb for the man you would not bury.

CREON. So that is your advice—that I should yield?

CHORUS. Sir, you should not delay. The gods are swift
In cutting short man's folly with their curse.

CREON. How hard it is to change! Yet I obey.
I will give up what I had set my heart on.

1009. Hatred shakes the cities: Creon had exposed the corpses of all seven champions, not only Polynices.

No one can stand against the blows of fate.
CHORUS. Go. Go yourself. These things are not for others.
CREON. I will go this moment. Guards there! All of you!
Take up your axes. Quick! Quick! Over there.
I imprisoned her myself, and I myself
Will set her free. And yet my mind misgives me.
Never to break the ancient law is best. [Exit CREON.]

CHORUS.

Thou art known by many a name.
O Bacchus! To thee we call.
Cadmean Semele's glory and pride,
Begotten of Zeus, whose terrible lightnings flame,
Whose thunders appall.
Bacchus, thou dost for us all in thy love provide.
Over Icaria thou dost reign,
And where the worshippers journey slow
To the rites of Eleusis, where mountains shield
The multitudes crossing Demeter's welcoming plain.
Thou makest this mother-city of maenads thine own,
A city beside the rippling flow
Of the gentle river, beside the murderous field
Where the teeth of the dragon were sown.

In the torches' wind-blown flare
Thou art seen, in their flicker and smoke.
Where the two-fold peaks of Parnassus gleam, Corycian nymphs, as they move through the ruddy glare, Thee, Bacchus, invoke.
They move in their dance beside the Castalian stream.
O Bacchus, guardian divine!
Down from the slopes of Nysa's hills
Where a mantle of ivy covers the ground,
From headlands rich with the purple grape and the vine,
Thou comest to us, thou comest. O be not long!
Thy triumph the echoing city fills.
The streets are loud with thy praises; the highways resound, Resound with immortal song.

1044*ff. Thou art known . . . :* a hymn to the god Dionysus (Bacchus), whose mother was a Theban princess, Semele. When she was pregnant by her lover Zeus, she asked the god to appear to her in his own shape; he did, and she was blasted with the fire of his lightning.

1050. Icaria: the place where Dionysus was welcomed to Attica.

1052. Eleusis: on the coast near Athens, the site of the great mystery religion which had as its cult-deities Demeter and her daughter Persephone.

1060. Parnassus: the great mountain above Delphi, where Dionysus was worshipped as well as Apollo.

1061. Corycian nymphs: named from the Corycian cave on the heights above Delphi.

1063. Castalian stream: the spring at Delphi.

1065. Nysa: on the island of Euboea, opposite the Boeotian (Theban) coast.

Thou honorest highly our Theban city,
Thou, and thy mother by lightning slain.
Our people sicken. O Bacchus have pity!
Across the strait with its moaning wave,
Down from Parnassus, come thou again!
Come with thy healing feet, and save!

O thou who leadest the stars in chorus,
Jubilant stars with their breath of fire,
Offspring of Zeus, appear before us!
Lord of the tumult of night, appear!
With the frenzied dance of thy maenad choir,
Bacchus, thou giver of good, draw near!

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER. You of the house of Cadmus and Amphíon,
No man's estate can ever be established
Firmly enough to warrant praise or blame.
Fortune, from day to day, exalts the lucky
And humbles the unlucky. No one knows Whether his present lot can long endure.
For Creon once was blest, as I count blessings;
He had saved this land of Cadmus from its foes;
He was the sovereign and ruled alone,
The noble father of a royal house.
And now, all has been lost. Because a man Who has forfeited his joy is not alive,
He is a living corpse. Heap, if you will,
Your house with riches; live in regal pomp.
Yet if your life is unhappy, all these things
Are worth not even the shadow of a vapor
Put in the balance against joy alone.

CHORUS. What new disaster has the King's house suffered?

MESSENGER. Death. And the guilt of death lies on the living.

CHORUS. The guilt of death! Who has been killed? Who killed him?

MESSENGER. Haemon is killed, and by no stranger's hand.

CHORUS. He killed himself? Or did his father kill him?

MESSENGER. He killed himself, enraged by his murderous father.

CHORUS. Tiresias! Now your prophecy is fulfilled.

MESSENGER. Consider, therefore, what remains to do.

CHORUS. There is the Queen, wretched Eurydice.
Perhaps mere chance has brought her from the palace;
Perhaps she has learned the news about her son.

[Enter EURYDICE.]

EURYDICE. Thebans, I heard you talking here together
When I was on my way to greet the goddess,

Pallas Athene, and to pray to her.
Just as I loosed the fastening of the door,
The words that told of my calamity Struck heavily upon my ear. In terror
I fell back fainting in my women's arms.
But now, repeat your story. I shall hear it
As one who is not ignorant of grief.

MESSENGER. My Lady, I will bear witness to what I saw,
And will omit no syllable of the truth.
Why should I comfort you with words that later
Would prove deceitful? Truth is always best.
Across the plain I guided my Lord Creon
To where unpitied Polyneices lay,
A corpse mangled by dogs. Then we besought
Hecate, goddess of the roads, and Pluto
To moderate their wrath, and to show mercy.
We washed the dead with ceremonial water.
Gathering the scattered fragments that remained,
With fresh-cut boughs we burned them. We heaped up
A mound of native earth above his ashes.
Then we approached the cavern of Death's bride,
The rock-floored marriage-chamber. While as yet
We were far distant, someone heard the sound
Of loud lament in that unhallowed place,
And came to tell our master. As the King
Drew near, there floated through the air a voice,
Faint, indistinct, that uttered a bitter cry.
The King burst out in anguish: 'Can it be
That I, in my misery, have become a prophet?
Will this be the saddest road I ever trod?
My son's voice greets me. Quickly, slaves! Go quickly!
When you have reached the sepulcher, get through
The opening where the stones are wrenched away, Get to the mouth of the burial chamber. Look,
See if I know his voice—Haemon's, my son's—
Or if I am deluded by the gods.'
We followed our despairing master's bidding
And in the farthest recess of the tomb
We found Antigone, hanging, with her veil
Noosed round her neck. And with her we found Haemon,
His arms flung round her waist, grieving aloud
For his bride lost in death, his ruined marriage,
His father's deeds. But when his father saw him, Creon cried piteously and going in,
Called to him brokenly: "My son, my son,

1128. Hecate . . . and Pluto: divinities of the underworld.

What have you done? What are you thinking of?
What dreadful thing has driven you out of your mind?
Son, come away. I beg you. I beseech you."
But Haemon glared at him with furious eyes
Instead of answering, spat in his face,
And drew his sword. His father turned to fly
So that he missed his aim. Immediately,
In bitter self-reproach, the wretched boy
Leaned hard against his sword, and drove it deep Into his side. Then while his life yet lingered,
With failing strength he drew Antigone close;
And as he lay there gasping heavily,
Over her white cheek his blood ebbed away.
The dead lie clasped together. He is wedded,
Not in this world but in the house of Death.
He has borne witness that of all the evils
Afflicting man, the worst is lack of wisdom. [Exit EURYDICE.]

CHORUS. What does that mean? Who can interpret it?
The Queen has gone without a single word.

MESSENGER. It startles me. And yet I hope it means That hearing these dreadful things about her son,
She will not let herself show grief in public
But will lament in private with her women.
Schooled in discretion, she will do no wrong.

CHORUS. How can we tell? Surely too great a silence
Is no less ominous than too loud lament.

MESSENGER. Then I will enter. Perhaps she is concealing
Some secret purpose in her passionate heart.
I will find out, for you are right in saying
Too great a silence may be ominous.

[Exit MESSENGER. Enter CREON with ATTENDANTS, carrying the body of HAEMON on a bier.]

CHORUS. Thebans, look there! The King himself draws near,
Bearing a load whose tale is all too clear.
This is a work—if we dare speak our thought—
That not another's but his own hands wrought.

CREON.
O, how may my sin be told?
The stubborn, death-fraught sin of a darkened brain!
Behold us here, behold
Father and son, the slayer and the slain!
Pain, only pain
Has come of my design.
Fate struck too soon; too soon your spirit fled.
My son, my young son, you are lying dead
Not for your folly, but for mine, for mine.

CHORUS. Sir, you have come to learn the right too late.

CREON.

My lesson has been bitter and complete.
Some god has struck me down with crushing weight,
Filling my heart with cruelty and hate,
Trampling my happiness beneath his feet.
Grief, bitter grief, is man's fate.

[Enter MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER. [Indicating HAEMON] Your load is heavy, Sir, but there is more.
That is the burden you are bearing now.
Soon you must bear new woe within your house.

CREON. And what worse misery can follow this?

MESSENGER. Your wife is dead, a mother like her son.
Poor woman, by her own hand she has died.

CREON.

By her own hand she died.
Death, spare me! Can you never have your fill?
Never be satisfied?
Herald of evil, messenger of ill,
Your harsh words kill,
They smite me now anew.
My wife is dead—You tell me my wife is dead.
Death after death is heaped upon my head.
Speak to me, boy. Is what you tell me true?

MESSENGER. It is no longer hidden. Sir, look there.

[The body of EURYDICE is disclosed through the palace doors.]

CREON.

Another horror that makes blind mine eyes!
What further agony has fate in store?
My dead son's body in my arms I bore,
And now beside him his dead mother lies.
I can endure no more.

MESSENGER. There at the altar with a keen-edged knife
She stabbed herself; and as her eyes were darkened,
She wailed the death of Megareus, her son,
Who earlier had met a noble fate;
She wailed for Haemon; then, with her last breath,
You, as the slayer of your sons, she cursed.

CREON.

I am shaken with terror, with terror past belief.
Is there none here to end my anguish? None?
No sword to pierce me? Broken with my grief,
So steeped in agony that we are one.

MESSENGER. Sir, as she died, she burdened you with guilt,
Charging you with the death of both your sons.

1231. Megareus: killed during the siege of the city.

CREON. And by what act of violence did she die?
MESSENGER. Hearing the shrill lament for Haemon's fate,
Deep in her heart she drove the bright blade home.
CREON. [To HAEMON]
I am your slayer, I alone.
I am guilty, only I.
I, and none other, must atone.
Lead me away. The truth I own.
Nothing is left, except to die.
CHORUS. If anything can be good, those words are good.
For when calamity has come upon us,
The thing that is the briefest is the best.
CREON.
Draw near me, death! O longed for death, draw near!
Most welcome destiny, make no delay.
To tell me my last hour, my last breath, is here.
I have no wish to see another day.
CHORUS. Such things are yet to come. We are concerned
With doing what must needs be done today.
The future rests in other hands than ours.
CREON. That is my whole desire. That is my prayer.
CHORUS. No. Do not pray. Men must accept their doom.
CREON.
My life's work there before me lies.
My folly slew my wife, my son.
I know not where to turn mine eyes.
All my misdeeds before me rise.
Lead me away, brought low, undone. [Exit CREON.]

CHORUS.
The crown of happiness is to be wise.
Honor the gods, and the gods' edicts prize.
They strike down boastful men and men grown bold.
Wisdom we learn at last, when we are old.

THUCYDIDES

History of the Peloponnesian War*

The Melian Dialogue†

[The war between Athens and Sparta which began in 431 B.C. came to a temporary stop in 421. The uneasy truce which ensued was only a breathing space in which both sides prepared for the renewal of the war and the decisive struggle. The spirit of Athenian democracy had changed during the hard years of the war; Pericles was dead and his place had been taken by younger and less scrupulous politicians. Thucydides describes the Athenian attack on the small island of Melos, in 416 B.C., an incident which, in Thucydides' hands, is made to reveal the depths of cynicism of the new Athenian policies.]

* Translated by Benjamin Jowett. † From Book V, Chapters 84-116.

. . . The Athenians next made an expedition against the island of Melos[1] with thirty ships of their own, six Chian, and two Lesbian,[2] twelve hundred hoplites[3] and three hundred archers besides twenty mounted archers of their own, and about fifteen hundred hoplites furnished by their allies in the islands. The Melians are colonists of the Lacedaemonians who would not submit to Athens like the other islanders. At first they were neutral and took no part. But when the Athenians tried to coerce them by ravaging their lands they were driven into open hostilities. The generals, Cleomedes the son of Lycomedes and Tisias the son of Tisimachus, encamped with the Athenian forces on the island. But before they did the country any harm they sent envoys to negotiate with the Melians. Instead of bringing these envoys before the people, the Melians desired them to explain their errand to the magistrates and to the chief men.[4] They spoke as follows:—

"Since we are not allowed to speak to the people, lest, forsooth, they should be deceived by seductive and unanswerable arguments which they would hear set forth in a single uninterrupted oration (for we are perfectly aware that this is what you mean in bringing us before a select few), you who are sitting here may as well make assurance yet surer. Let us have no set speeches at all, but do you reply to each several statement of which you disapprove, and criticise it at once. Say first of all how you like this mode of proceeding."

The Melian representatives answered:—"The quiet interchange of explanations is a reasonable thing, and we do not object to that. But your warlike movements, which are present not only to our fears but to our eyes, seem to belie your words. We see that, although you may reason with us, you mean to be our judges; and that at the end of the discussion, if the justice of our cause prevail and we therefore refuse to yield, we may expect war; if we are convinced by you, slavery."

ATHENIANS. Nay, but if you are only going to argue from fancies about the future, or if you meet us with any other purpose than

1. a barren, unimportant island in the Aegean Sea, off the east coast of the Peloponnese.

2. Chios and Lesbos are two large islands off the coast of Asia Minor, which were at this time subject to Athens.

3. heavy infantry.

4. Melos was governed by an oligarchy.

that of looking your circumstances in the face and saving your city, we have done; but if this is your intention we will proceed.

MELIANS. It is an excusable and natural thing that men in our position should have much to say and should indulge in many fancies. But we admit that this conference has met to consider the question of our preservation; and therefore let the argument proceed in the manner which you propose.

ATH. Well, then, we Athenians will use no fine words; we will not go out of our way to prove at length that we have a right to rule, because we overthrew the Persians;[5] or that we attack you now because we are suffering any injury at your hands. We should not convince you if we did; nor must you expect to convince us by arguing that, although a colony of the Lacedaemonians, you have taken no part in their expeditions, or that you have never done us any wrong. But you and we should say what we really think, and aim only at what is possible, for we both alike know that into the discussion of human affairs the question of justice only enters where the pressure of necessity is equal, and that the powerful exact what they can, and the weak grant what they must.

MEL. Well, then, since you set aside justice and invite us to speak of expediency, in our judgment it is certainly expedient that you should respect a principle which is for the common good; and that to every man when in peril a reasonable claim should be accounted a claim of right, and any plea which he is disposed to urge, even if failing of the point a little, should help his cause. Your interest in this principle is quite as great as ours, inasmuch as you, if you fall, will incur the heaviest vengeance, and will be the most terrible example to mankind.

ATH. The fall of our empire, if it should fall, is not an event to which we look forward with dismay; for ruling states such as Lacedaemon are not cruel to their vanquished enemies.[6] And we are fighting not so much against the Lacedaemonians as against our own subjects who may some day rise up and overcome their former masters. But this is a danger which you may leave to us. And we will now endeavor to show that we have come in the interests of our empire, and that in what we are about to say we are only seeking the preservation of your city. For we want to make you ours with the least trouble to ourselves, and it is for the interests of us both that you should not be destroyed.

MEL. It may be your interest to be our masters, but how can it be ours to be your slaves?

5. during the Persian invasion of 480–479 B.C. and during the subsequent offensives against the Persians, which were led by Athens as the most important power in the Delian League.

6. This cynical prophecy turned out to be correct, for after their victory in 404 B.C. the Spartans treated Athens with comparative mildness.

ATH. To you the gain will be that by submission you will avert the worst; and we shall be all the richer for your preservation.

MEL. But must we be your enemies? Will you not receive us as friends if we are neutral and remain at peace with you?

ATH. No, your enmity is not half so mischievous to us as your friendship; for the one is in the eyes of our subjects an argument of our power, the other of our weakness.

MEL. But are your subjects really unable to distinguish between states in which you have no concern, and those which are chiefly your own colonies, and in some cases have revolted and been subdued by you?

ATH. Why, they do not doubt that both of them have a good deal to say for themselves on the score of justice, but they think that states like yours are left free because they are able to defend themselves, and that we do not attack them because we dare not. So that your subjection will give us an increase of security, as well as an extension of empire. For we are masters of the sea, and you who are islanders, and insignificant islanders too, must not be allowed to escape us.

MEL. But do you not recognize another danger? For once more, since you drive us from the plea of justice and press upon us your doctrine of expediency, we must show you what is for our interest, and, if it be for yours also, may hope to convince you:—Will you not be making enemies of all who are now neutrals? When they see how you are treating us they will expect you some day to turn against them; and if so, are you not strengthening the enemies whom you already have, and bringing upon you others who, if they could help, would never dream of being your enemies at all?

ATH. We do not consider our really dangerous enemies to be any of the peoples inhabiting the mainland who, secure in their freedom, may defer indefinitely any measures of precaution which they take against us, but islanders who, like you, happen to be under no control, and all who may be already irritated by the necessity of submission to our empire—these are our real enemies, for they are the most reckless and most likely to bring themselves as well as us into a danger which they cannot but foresee.

MEL. Surely then, if you and your subjects will brave all this risk, you to preserve your empire and they to be quit of it, how base and cowardly it would be in us, who retain our freedom, not to do and suffer anything rather than be your slaves.

ATH. Not so, if you calmly reflect: for you are not fighting against equals to whom you cannot yield without disgrace, but you are taking counsel whether or no you shall resist an overwhelming force. The question is not one of honor but of prudence.

MEL. But we know that the fortune of war is sometimes impartial, and not always on the side of numbers. If we yield now all is over; but if we fight there is yet a hope that we may stand upright.

ATH. Hope is a good comforter in the hour of danger, and when men have something else to depend upon, although hurtful, she is not ruinous. But when her spendthrift nature has induced them to stake their all, they see her as she is in the moment of their fall, and not till then. While the knowledge of her might enable them to be ware of her, she never fails. You are weak and a single turn of the scale might be your ruin. Do not you be thus deluded; avoid the error of which so many are guilty, who, although they might still be saved if they would take the natural means, when visible grounds of confidence forsake them, have recourse to the invisible, to prophecies and oracles and the like, which ruin men by the hopes which they inspire in them.

MEL. We know only too well how hard the struggle must be against your power, and against fortune, if she does not mean to be impartial. Nevertheless we do not despair of fortune; for we hope to stand as high as you in the favor of heaven, because we are righteous, and you against whom we contend are unrighteous; and we are satisfied that our deficiency in power will be compensated by the aid of our allies the Lacedaemonians; they cannot refuse to help us, if only because we are their kinsmen, and for the sake of their own honor. And therefore our confidence is not so utterly blind as you suppose.

ATH. As for the Gods, we expect to have quite as much of their favor as you: for we are not doing or claiming anything which goes beyond common opinion about divine or men's desires about human things. For of the Gods we believe, and of men we know, that by a law of their nature wherever they can rule they will. This law was not made by us, and we are not the first who have acted upon it; we did but inherit it, and shall bequeath it to all time, and we know that you and all mankind, if you were as strong as we are, would do as we do. So much for the Gods; we have told you why we expect to stand as high in their good opinion as you. And then as to the Lacedaemonians—when you imagine that out of very shame they will assist you, we admire the simplicity of your idea, but we do not envy you the folly of it. The Lacedaemonians are exceedingly virtuous among themselves, and according to their national standard of morality. But in respect of their dealings with others, although many things might be said, a word is enough to describe them—of all men whom we know they are the most notorious for identifying what is pleasant with what is honorable, and what is expedient with what is just. But how inconsistent is such a character with your present blind hope of deliverance!

MEL. That is the very reason why we trust them; they will look to their interest, and therefore will not be willing to betray the Melians, who are their own colonists, lest they should be distrusted by their friends in Hellas[7] and play into the hands of their enemies.

ATH. But do you not see that the path of expediency is safe, whereas justice and honor involve danger in practice, and such dangers the Lacedaemonians seldom care to face?

MEL. On the other hand, we think that whatever perils there may be, they will be ready to face them for our sakes, and will consider danger less dangerous where we are concerned. For if they need our aid we are close at hand, and they can better trust our loyal feeling because we are their kinsmen.

ATH. Yes, but what encourages men who are invited to join in a conflict is clearly not the good-will of those who summon them to their side, but a decided superiority in real power. To this no men look more keenly than the Lacedaemonians; so little confidence have they in their own resources that they only attack their neighbors when they have numerous allies, and therefore they are not likely to find their way by themselves to an island, when we are masters of the sea.

MEL. But they may send their allies: the Cretan sea[8] is a large place; and the masters of the sea will have more difficulty in overtaking vessels which want to escape than the pursued in escaping. If the attempt should fail they may invade Attica itself, and find their way to allies of yours whom Brasidas[9] did not reach; and then you will have to fight, not for the conquest of a land in which you have no concern, but nearer home, for the preservation of your confederacy and of your own territory.

ATH. Help may come from Lacedaemon to you as it has come to others, and should you ever have actual experience of it, then you will know that never once have the Athenians retired from a siege through fear of a foe elsewhere. You told us that the safety of your city would be your first care, but we remark that, in this long discussion, not a word has been uttered by you which would give a reasonable man expectation of deliverance. Your strongest grounds are hopes deferred, and what power you have is not to be compared with that which is already arrayed against you. Unless after we have withdrawn you mean to come, as even now you may, to a wiser conclusion, you are showing a great want of sense. For surely you cannot dream of flying to that false sense of honor which has been the ruin of so many when danger and dishonor were staring them in the face. Many men with their eyes still open to the consequences have found the word honor too much for them, and have suffered a mere name to lure them on, until it has drawn upon them real and irretrievable calamities; through their own folly they have incurred a worse dishonor than fortune would have inflicted upon them. If you are wise you will not run this risk; you ought to see that there can be no disgrace in yielding to a great city which invites you to become her ally on reasonable terms, keeping your own land, and merely paying tribute; and that you will certainly gain no honor if, having to choose between two alternatives, safety and war, you obstinately prefer the worse. To maintain our rights against equals, to be politic with superiors, and to be moderate towards inferiors is the path of safety. Reflect once more when we have withdrawn, and say to yourselves over and over again that you are deliberating about your one and only country, which may be saved or may be destroyed by a single decision.

7. Greece.

8. Melos lies some seventy miles north of Crete.

9. a Spartan commander who had stirred up a great deal of trouble among the Athenian subjects in the north of Greece earlier in the war.

The Athenians left the conference: the Melians, after consulting among themselves, resolved to persevere in their refusal, and made answer as follows:—"Men of Athens, our resolution is unchanged; and we will not in a moment surrender that liberty which our city, founded seven hundred years ago, still enjoys; we will trust to the good-fortune which by the favor of the Gods has hitherto preserved us, and for human help to the Lacedaemonians, and endeavor to save ourselves. We are ready however to be your friends, and the enemies neither of you nor of the Lacedaemonians, and we ask you to leave our country when you have made such a peace as may appear to be in the interest of both parties."

Such was the answer of the Melians; the Athenians, as they quitted the conference, spoke as follows:—"Well, we must say, judging from the decision at which you have arrived, that you are the only men who deem the future to be more certain than the present, and regard things unseen as already realized in your fond anticipation, and that the more you cast yourselves upon the Lacedaemonians and fortune, and hope, and trust them, the more complete will be your ruin."

The Athenian envoys returned to the army; and the generals, when they found that the Melians would not yield, immediately commenced hostilities. They surrounded the town of Melos with a wall, dividing the work among the several contingents. They then left troops of their own and of the allies to keep guard both by land and by sea, and retired with the greater part of their army; the remainder carried on the blockade.

. . . The Melians took that part of the Athenian wall which looked towards the agora[10] by a night assault, killed a few men, and brought in as much corn and other necessaries as they could; they then retreated and remained inactive. After this the Athenians set a better watch. So the summer ended.

10. market place.

In the following winter . . . the Melians took another part of the Athenian wall; for the fortifications were insufficiently guarded. Whereupon the Athenians sent fresh troops, under the command of Philocrates the son of Demeas. The place was now closely invested, and there was treachery among the citizens themselves. So the Melians were induced to surrender at discretion. The Athenians thereupon put to death all who were of military age, and made slaves of the women and children. They then colonized the island, sending thither five hundred settlers of their own.

EURIPIDES
(480–406 B.C.)
Medea *

Characters

MEDEA, princess of Colchis and wife of Jason
JASON, son of Aeson, king of Iolcos
TWO CHILDREN of Medea and Jason
KREON, king of Corinth
AIGEUS, king of Athens
NURSE to Medea
TUTOR to Medea's children
MESSENGER
CHORUS OF CORINTHIAN WOMEN

SCENE—In front of Medea's house in Corinth. Enter from the house Medea's NURSE.

NURSE. How I wish the Argo never had reached the land
Of Colchis, skimming through the blue Symplegades,
Nor ever had fallen in the glades of Pelion
The smitten fir-tree to furnish oars for the hands
Of heroes who in Pelias's name attempted
The Golden Fleece! For then my mistress Medea
Would not have sailed for the towers of the land of Iolcos,
Her heart on fire with passionate love for Jason;
Nor would she have persuaded the daughters of Pelias

* Produced in 431 B.C. Our text is a translation by Rex Warner, from The Medea of Euripides, John Lane The Bodley Head, Ltd., London, 1944.

1. Argo: the ship in which Jason and his companions sailed on the quest for the Golden Fleece.

2. Symplegades: clashing rocks, which crushed ships endeavoring to pass between them. They were supposed to be located at the Hellespont, the passage between the Mediterranean and the Black Sea.

3. Pelion: a mountain in the north of Greece near Iolcos, the place from which Jason sailed.

5. Pelias: He seized the kingdom of Iolcos, expelling Aeson, Jason's father. When Jason came to claim his rights, Pelias sent him to get the Golden Fleece.

To kill their father, and now be living here
In Corinth with her husband and children. She gave Pleasure to the people of her land of exile,
And she herself helped Jason in every way.
This is indeed the greatest salvation of all,—
For the wife not to stand apart from the husband.
But now there's hatred everywhere. Love is diseased.
For, deserting his own children and my mistress,
Jason has taken a royal wife to his bed,
The daughter of the ruler of this land, Kreon.
And poor Medea is slighted, and cries aloud on the Vows they made to each other, the right hands clasped
In eternal promise. She calls upon the gods to witness
What sort of return Jason has made to her love.
She lies without food and gives herself up to suffering,
Wasting away every moment of the day in tears.
So it has gone since she knew herself slighted by him.
Not stirring an eye, not moving her face from the ground,
No more than either a rock or surging sea water
She listens when she is given friendly advice.
Except that sometimes she twists back her white neck and Moans to herself, calling out on her father's name,
And her land, and her home betrayed when she came away with A man who now is determined to dishonour her.
Poor creature, she has discovered by her sufferings
What it means to one not to have lost one's own country.
She has turned from the children and does not like to see them.
I am afraid she may think of some dreadful thing,
For her heart is violent. She will never put up with The treatment she is getting. I know and fear her Lest she may sharpen a sword and thrust to the heart,
Stealing into the palace where the bed is made,
Or even kill the king and the new-wedded groom,
And thus bring a greater misfortune on herself.
She's a strange woman. I know it won't be easy
To make an enemy of her and come off best.
But here the children come. They have finished playing.
They have no thought at all of their mother's trouble.

10. kill . . . father: After Jason returned to Iolcos with the Fleece and Medea, Pelias' daughters were persuaded by Medea, who had a reputation as a sorceress, to cut Pelias up and boil the pieces, in order to restore him to youth. The experiment was, of course, unsuccessful, but the son of Pelias expelled Jason and Medea from the kingdom, and they took refuge in Corinth.

11. Corinth: on the isthmus between the Peloponnese and Attica. In Euripides' time it was a wealthy trading city, a commercial rival of Athens.

19. Kreon: Creon.

32. home betrayed: Medea, daughter of the king of Colchis, fell in love with Jason and helped him to take the Golden Fleece away from her own country.

Indeed it is not usual for the young to grieve.

[Enter from the right the slave who is the TUTOR to Medea's two small children. The CHILDREN follow him.]

TUTOR. You old retainer of my mistress's household, Why are you standing here all alone in front of the Gates and moaning to yourself over your misfortune?
Medea could not wish you to leave her alone.

NURSE. Old man, and guardian of the children of Jason,
If one is a good servant, it's a terrible thing
When one's master's luck is out; it goes to one's heart.
So I myself have got into such a state of grief
That a longing stole over me to come outside here
And tell the earth and air of my mistress's sorrows.

TUTOR. Has the poor lady not yet given up her crying?

NURSE. Given up? She's at the start, not half-way through her tears.

TUTOR. Poor fool,—if I may call my mistress such a name,—
How ignorant she is of trouble more to come.

NURSE. What do you mean, old man? You needn't fear to speak.

TUTOR. Nothing. I take back the words which I used just now.

NURSE. Don't, by your beard, hide this from me, your fellow-servant.
If need be, I'll keep quiet about what you tell me.

TUTOR. I heard a person saying, while I myself seemed
Not to be paying attention, when I was at the place
Where the old draught-players sit, by the holy fountain,
That Kreon, ruler of the land, intends to drive
These children and their mother in exile from Corinth.
But whether what he said is really true or not
I do not know. I pray that it may not be true.

NURSE. And will Jason put up with it that his children Should suffer so, though he's no friend to their mother?

TUTOR. Old ties give place to new ones. As for Jason, he
No longer has a feeling for this house of ours.

NURSE. It's black indeed for us, when we add new to old Sorrows before even the present sky has cleared.

TUTOR. But you be silent, and keep all this to yourself.
It is not the right time to tell our mistress of it.

NURSE. Do you hear, children, what a father he is to you?
I wish he were dead,—but no, he is still my master.
Yet certainly he has proved unkind to his dear ones.

TUTOR. What's strange in that? Have you only just discovered That everyone loves himself more than his neighbour?
Some have good reason, others get something out of it.

69. draught-players: checker-players.

So Jason neglects his children for the new bride.
NURSE. Go indoors, children. That will be the best thing.
And you, keep them to themselves as much as possible.
Don't bring them near their mother in her angry mood.
For I've seen her already blazing her eyes at them
As though she meant some mischief and I am sure that She'll not stop raging until she has struck at someone.
May it be an enemy and not a friend she hurts!
[MEDEA is heard inside the house.]
MEDEA. Ah, wretch! Ah, lost in my sufferings,
I wish, I wish I might die.
NURSE. What did I say, dear children? Your mother
Frets her heart and frets it to anger.
Run away quickly into the house,
And keep well out of her sight.
Don't go anywhere near, but be careful
Of the wildness and bitter nature
Of that proud mind.
Go now! Run quickly indoors.
It is clear that she soon will put lightning
In that cloud of her cries that is rising
With a passion increasing. Oh, what will she do, Proud-hearted and not to be checked on her course,
A soul bitten into with wrong?
[The TUTOR takes the children into the house.]
MEDEA. Ah I have suffered
What should be wept for bitterly. I hate you, Children of a hateful mother. I curse you
And your father. Let the whole house crash.
NURSE. Ah, I pity you, you poor creature.
How can your children share in their father's Wickedness? Why do you hate them? Oh children,
How much I fear that something may happen!
Great people's tempers are terrible, always Having their own way, seldom checked,
Dangerous they shift from mood to mood.
How much better to have been accustomed
To live on equal terms with one's neighbours.
I would like to be safe and grow old in a Humble way. What is moderate sounds best,
Also in practice is best for everyone.
Greatness brings no profit to people.
God indeed, when in anger, brings Greater ruin to great men's houses.

[Enter, on the right, a CHORUS OF CORINTHIAN WOMEN. They have come to enquire about MEDEA and to attempt to console her.]

CHORUS. I heard the voice, I heard the cry
Of Colchis' wretched daughter.
Tell me, mother, is she not yet
At rest? Within the double gates Of the court I heard her cry. I am sorry
For the sorrow of this home. O, say, what has happened?

NURSE. There is no home. It's over and done with.
Her husband holds fast to his royal wedding,
While she, my mistress, cries out her eyes
There in her room, and takes no warmth from Any word of any friend.

MEDEA. Oh, I wish
That lightning from heaven would split my head open.
Oh, what use have I now for life?
I would find my release in death
And leave hateful existence behind me.

CHOR. O God and Earth and Heaven!
Did you hear what a cry was that
Which the sad wife sings?
Poor foolish one, why should you long
For that appalling rest?
The final end of death comes fast.
No need to pray for that.
Suppose your man gives honour
To another woman's bed.
It often happens. Don't be hurt.
God will be your friend in this.
You must not waste away
Grieving too much for him who shared your bed.

MEDEA. Great Themis, lady Artemis, behold
The things I suffer, though I made him promise,
My hateful husband. I pray that I may see him,
Him and his bride and all their palace shattered
For the wrong they dare to do me without cause.
Oh, my father! Oh, my country! In what dishonour
I left you, killing my own brother for it.

NURSE. Do you hear what she says, and how she cries
On Themis, the goddess of Promises, and on Zeus, Whom we believe to be the Keeper of Oaths?

159. Themis: justice. Artemis: the protector of women in pain and distress.

165. my own brother: Medea killed him to delay the pursuit when she escaped with Jason.

Of this I am sure, that no small thing
Will appease my mistress's anger.
CHOR. Will she come into our presence?
Will she listen when we are speaking
To the words we say?
I wish she might relax her rage
And temper of her heart.
My willingness to help will never Be wanting to my friends.
But go inside and bring her
Out of the house to us,
And speak kindly to her: hurry,
Before she wrongs her own.
This passion of hers moves to something great.
NURSE. I will, but I doubt if I'll manage
To win my mistress over.
But still I'll attempt it to please you.
Such a look she will flash on her servants
If any comes near with a message,
Like a lioness guarding her cubs.
It is right, I think, to consider
Both stupid and lacking in foresight
Those poets of old who wrote songs
For revels and dinners and banquets,
Pleasant sounds for men living at ease;
But none of them all has discovered
How to put an end with their singing
Or musical instruments grief,
Bitter grief, from which death and disaster
Cheat the hopes of a house. Yet how good
If music could cure men of this! But why raise To no purpose the voice at a banquet? For there is Already abundance of pleasure for men
With a joy of its own.

[The NURSE goes into the house.]

CHOR. I heard a shriek that is laden with sorrow.
Shrilling out her hard grief she cries out Upon him who betrayed both her bed and her marriage.
Wronged, she calls on the gods,
On the justice of Zeus, the oath sworn,
Which brought her away
To the opposite shore of the Greeks
Through the gloomy salt straits to the gateway
Of the salty unlimited sea.

[MEDEA, attended by servants, comes out of the house.]

MEDEA. Women of Corinth, I have come outside to you Lest you should be indignant with me; for I know
That many people are overproud, some when alone,
And others when in company. And those who live Quietly, as I do, get a bad reputation.
For a just judgement is not evident in the eyes
When a man at first sight hates another, before Learning his character, being in no way injured;
And a foreigner especially must adapt himself.
I'd not approve of even a fellow-countryman
Who by pride and want of manners offends his neighbours.
But on me this thing has fallen so unexpectedly,
It has broken my heart. I am finished. I let go
All my life's joy. My friends, I only want to die.
It was everything to me to think well of one man,
And he, my own husband, has turned out wholly vile.
Of all things which are living and can form a judgement
We women are the most unfortunate creatures.
Firstly, with an excess of wealth it is required
For us to buy a husband and take for our bodies
A master; for not to take one is even worse.
And now the question is serious whether we take
A good or bad one; for there is no easy escape
For a woman, nor can she say no to her marriage.
She arrives among new modes of behaviour and manners,
And needs prophetic power, unless she has learnt at home,
How best to manage him who shares the bed with her.
And if we work out all this well and carefully,
And the husband lives with us and lightly bears his yoke,
Then life is enviable. If not, I'd rather die.
A man, when he's tired of the company in his home,
Goes out of the house and puts an end to his boredom
And turns to a friend or companion of his own age.
But we are forced to keep our eyes on one alone.
What they say of us is that we have a peaceful time
Living at home, while they do the fighting in war.
How wrong they are! I would very much rather stand
Three times in the front of battle than bear one child.
Yet what applies to me does not apply to you.
You have a country. Your family home is here.
You enjoy life and the company of your friends.

220. a foreigner . . . himself: Foreign residents were encouraged to come to Athens, but were rarely admitted to the rights of full citizenship, which was a jealously guarded privilege.

229. women: Athenian rights and institutions were made for men; the women had few privileges and almost no legal rights. The following two lines refer to the dowry which had to be provided for the bride.

But I am deserted, a refugee, thought nothing of
By my husband,—something he won in a foreign land.
I have no mother or brother, nor any relation
With whom I can take refuge in this sea of woe.
This much then is the service I would beg from you:
If I can find the means or devise any scheme
To pay my husband back for what he has done to me,—
Him and his father-in-law and the girl who married him,—
Just to keep silent. For in other ways a woman
Is full of fear, defenceless, dreads the sight of cold
Steel; but, when once she is wronged in the matter of love,
No other soul can hold so many thoughts of blood.

CHOR. This I will promise. You are in the right, Medea,
In paying your husband back. I am not surprised at you For being sad.
But look! I see our king Kreon Approaching. He will tell us of some new plan.

[Enter, from the right, KREON, with attendants.]

KREON. You, with that angry look, so set against your husband, Medea, I order you to leave my territories
An exile, and take along with you your two children,
And not to waste time doing it. It is my decree,
And I will see it done. I will not return home
Until you are cast from the boundaries of my land.

MEDEA. Oh, this is the end for me. I am utterly lost.
Now I am in the full force of the storm of hate
And have no harbour from ruin to reach easily.
Yet still, in spite of it all, I'll ask the question:
What is your reason, Kreon, for banishing me?

KREON. I am afraid of you,—why should I dissemble it?—
Afraid that you may injure my daughter mortally.
Many things accumulate to support my feeling.
You are a clever woman, versed in evil arts,
And are angry at having lost your husband's love.
I hear that you are threatening, so they tell me,
To do something against my daughter and Jason
And me, too. I shall take my precautions first.
I tell you, I prefer to earn your hatred now
Than to be soft-hearted and afterwards regret it.

MEDEA. This is not the first time, Kreon. Often previously Through being considered clever I have suffered much.
A person of sense ought never to have his children
Brought up to be more clever than the average.
For, apart from cleverness bringing them no profit,
It will make them objects of envy and ill-will.

If you put new ideas before the eyes of fools
They'll think you foolish and worthless into the bargain;
And if you are thought superior to those who have
Some reputation for learning, you will become hated.
I have some knowledge myself of how this happens;
For being clever, I find that some will envy me,
Others object to me. Yet all my cleverness
Is not so much.
Well, then, are you frightened, Kreon,
That I should harm you? There is no need. It is not
My way to transgress the authority of a king.
How have you injured me? You gave your daughter away
To the man you wanted. O, certainly I hate
My husband, but you, I think, have acted wisely;
Nor do I grudge it you that your affairs go well.
May the marriage be a lucky one! Only let me Live in this land. For even though I have been wronged,
I will not raise my voice, but submit to my betters.

KREON. What you say sounds gentle enough. Still in my heart
I greatly dread that you are plotting some evil,
And therefore I trust you even less than before.
A sharp-tempered woman, or for that matter a man,
Is easier to deal with than the clever type
Who holds her tongue. No. You must go. No need for more Speeches. The thing is fixed. By no manner of means Shall you, an enemy of mine, stay in my country.

MEDEA. I beg you. By your knees, by your new-wedded girl.

KREON. Your words are wasted. You will never persuade me.

MEDEA. Will you drive me out, and give no heed to my prayers?

KREON. I will, for I love my family more than you.

MEDEA. O my country! How bitterly now I remember you!

KREON. I love my country too,—next after my children.

MEDEA. O what an evil to men is passionate love!

KREON. That would depend on the luck that goes along with it.

MEDEA. O God, do not forget who is the cause of this!

KREON. Go. It is no use. Spare me the pain of forcing you.

MEDEA. I'm spared no pain. I lack no pain to be spared me.

KREON. Then you'll be removed by force by one of my men.

MEDEA. No, Kreon, not that! But do listen, I beg you.

KREON. Woman, you seem to want to create a disturbance.

MEDEA. I will go into exile. This is not what I beg for.

KREON. Why then this violence and clinging to my hand?

MEDEA. Allow me to remain here just for this one day,
So I may consider where to live in my exile,
And look for support for my children, since their father

Chooses to make no kind of provision for them.
Have pity on them! You have children of your own.
It is natural for you to look kindly on them.
For myself I do not mind if I go into exile.
It is the children being in trouble that I mind.

KREON. There is nothing tyrannical about my nature,
And by showing mercy I have often been the loser.
Even now I know that I am making a mistake.
All the same you shall have your will. But this I tell you,
That if the light of heaven tomorrow shall see you,
You and your children in the confines of my land,
You die. This word I have spoken is firmly fixed.
But now, if you must stay, stay for this day alone.
For in it you can do none of the things I fear.

[Exit KREON with his attendants.]

CHOR. Oh, unfortunate one! Oh, cruel!
Where will you turn? Who will help you?
What house or what land to preserve you
From ill can you find?
Medea, a god has thrown suffering
Upon you in waves of despair.

MEDEA. Things have gone badly every way. No doubt of that
But not these things this far, and don't imagine so.
There are still trials to come for the new-wedded pair,
And for their relations pain that will mean something
Do you think that I would ever have fawned on that man
Unless I had some end to gain or profit in it?
I would not even have spoken or touched him with my hands.
But he has got to such a pitch of foolishness
That, though he could have made nothing of all my plans
By exiling me, he has given me this one day
To stay here, and in this I will make dead bodies
Of three of my enemies,—father, the girl and my husband.
I have many ways of death which I might suit to them,
And do not know, friends, which one to take in hand;
Whether to set fire underneath their bridal mansion,
Or sharpen a sword and thrust it to the heart,
Stealing into the palace where the bed is made.
There is just one obstacle to this. If I am caught Breaking into the house and scheming against it,
I shall die, and give my enemies cause for laughter.
It is best to go by the straight road, the one in which I am most skilled, and make away with them by poison.
So be it then.

And now suppose them dead. What town will receive me?
What friend will offer me a refuge in his land,
Or the guarantee of his house and save my own life?
There is none. So I must wait a little time yet,
And if some sure defence should then appear for me,
In craft and silence I will set about this murder.
But if my fate should drive me on without help,
Even though death is certain, I will take the sword Myself and kill, and steadfastly advance to crime.
It shall not be,—I swear it by her, my mistress,
Whom most I honour and have chosen as partner,
Hecate, who dwells in the recesses of my hearth,—
That any man shall be glad to have injured me.
Bitter I will make their marriage for them and mournful,
Bitter the alliance and the driving me out of the land.
Ah, come, Medea, in your plotting and scheming
Leave nothing untried of all those things which you know.
Go forward to the dreadful act. The test has come For resolution. You see how you are treated. Never Shall you be mocked by Jason's Corinthian wedding, Whose father was noble, whose grandfather Helios.
You have the skill. What is more, you were born a woman,
And women, though most helpless in doing good deeds,
Are of every evil the cleverest of contrivers.

CHOR. Flow backward to your sources, sacred rivers,
And let the world's great order be reversed.
It is the thoughts of men that are deceitful,
Their pledges that are loose.
Story shall now turn my condition to a fair one,
Women are paid their due.
No more shall evil-sounding fame be theirs.

Cease now, you muses of the ancient singers,
To tell the tale of my unfaithfulness;
For not on us did Phoebus, lord of music,
Bestow the lyre's divine
Power, for otherwise I should have sung an answer
To the other sex. Long time
Has much to tell of us, and much of them.

You sailed away from your father's home,
With a heart on fire you passed

394. Hecate: the patron of witchcraft, sometimes identified with Artemis. Medea has a statue and shrine of Hecate in the house.

403. Helios: the sun, father of Medea's father, Aeëtes.

416. Phoebus: Apollo.

The double rocks of the sea.
And now in a foreign country
You have lost your rest in a widowed bed,
And are driven forth, a refugee
In dishonour from the land.

Good faith has gone, and no more remains
In great Greece a sense of shame.
It has flown away to the sky.
No father's house for a haven
Is at hand for you now, and another queen
Of your bed has dispossessed you and Is mistress of your home.

[Enter JASON, with attendants.]

JASON. This is not the first occasion that I have noticed
How hopeless it is to deal with a stubborn temper.
For, with reasonable submission to our ruler's will,
You might have lived in this land and kept your home.
As it is you are going to be exiled for your loose speaking.
Not that I mind myself. You are free to continue Telling everyone that Jason is a worthless man.
But as to your talk about the king, consider Yourself most lucky that exile is your punishment.
I, for my part, have always tried to calm down
The anger of the king, and wished you to remain.
But you will not give up your folly, continually
Speaking ill of him, and so you are going to be banished.
All the same, and in spite of your conduct, I'll not desert
My friends, but have come to make some provision for you,
So that you and the children may not be penniless
Or in need of anything in exile. Certainly Exile brings many troubles with it. And even If you hate me, I cannot think badly of you.

MEDEA. O coward in every way,—that is what I call you,
With bitterest reproach for your lack of manliness,
You have come, you, my worst enemy, have come to me!
It is not an example of over-confidence
Or of boldness thus to look your friends in the face, Friends you have injured,—no, it is the worst of all Human diseases, shamelessness. But you did well
To come, for I can speak ill of you and lighten
My heart, and you will suffer while you are listening.
And first I will begin from what happened first.
I saved your life, and every Greek knows I saved it,
Who was a ship-mate of yours aboard the Argo,

When you were sent to control the bulls that breathed fire
And yoke them, and when you would sow that deadly field.
Also that snake, who encircled with his many folds
The Golden Fleece and guarded it and never slept,
I killed, and so gave you the safety of the light.
And I myself betrayed my father and my home,
And came with you to Pelias' land of Iolcos.
And then, showing more willingness to help than wisdom,
I killed him, Pelias, with a most dreadful death
At his own daughters' hands, and took away your fear.
This is how I behaved to you, you wretched man,
And you forsook me, took another bride to bed
Though you had children; for, if that had not been,
You would have had an excuse for another wedding.
Faith in your word has gone. Indeed I cannot tell Whether you think the gods whose names you swore by then
Have ceased to rule and that new standards are set up,
Since you must know you have broken your word to me.
O my right hand, and the knees which you often clasped
In supplication, how senselessly I am treated
By this bad man, and how my hopes have missed their mark!
Come, I will share my thoughts as though you were a friend,—
You! Can I think that you would ever treat me well?
But I will do it, and these questions will make you Appear the baser. Where am I to go? To my father's?
Him I betrayed and his land when I came with you.
To Pelias' wretched daughters? What a fine welcome
They would prepare for me who murdered their father!
For this is my position,—hated by my friends
At home, I have, in kindness to you, made enemies
Of others whom there was no need to have injured.
And how happy among Greek women you have made me
On your side for all this! A distinguished husband
I have,—for breaking promises. When in misery
I am cast out of the land and go into exile,
Quite without friends and all alone with my children,
That will be a fine shame for the new-wedded groom,
For his children to wander as beggars and she who saved him.
O God, you have given to mortals a sure method
Of telling the gold that is pure from the counterfeit;
Why is there no mark engraved upon men's bodies,

466. bulls . . . fire: This and the following lines refer to ordeals through which Jason had to pass to win the Fleece, and in which Medea helped him. He had to yoke a team of fire-breathing bulls, then sow a field which immediately sprouted armed warriors, then deal with the snake which guarded the Fleece.

By which we could know the true ones from the false ones?
CHOR. It is a strange form of anger, difficult to cure
When two friends turn upon each other in hatred.
JASON. As for me, it seems I must be no bad speaker.
But, like a man who has a good grip of the tiller, Reef up his sail, and so run away from under
This mouthing tempest, woman, of your bitter tongue.
Since you insist on building up your kindness to me,
My view is that Cypris was alone responsible
Of men and gods for the preserving of my life.
You are clever enough,—but really I need not enter Into the story of how it was love's inescapable
Power that compelled you to keep my person safe.
On this I will not go into too much detail.
In so far as you helped me, you did well enough.
But on this question of saving me, I can prove
You have certainly got from me more than you gave.
Firstly, instead of living among barbarians,
You inhabit a Greek land and understand our ways,
How to live by law instead of the sweet will of force.
And all the Greeks considered you a clever woman.
You were honoured for it; while, if you were living at
The ends of the earth, nobody would have heard of you.
For my part, rather than stores of gold in my house
Or power to sing even sweeter songs than Orpheus, I'd choose the fate that made me a distinguished man.
There is my reply to your story of my labours.
Remember it was you who started the argument.
Next for your attack on my wedding with the princess:
Here I will prove that, first, it was a clever move,
Secondly, a wise one, and, finally, that I made it
In your best interests and the children's. Please keep calm.
When I arrived here from the land of Iolcos,
Involved, as I was, in every kind of difficulty,
What luckier chance could I have come across than this,
An exile to marry the daughter of the king?
It was not,—the point that seems to upset you—that I Grew tired of your bed and felt the need of a new bride;
Nor with any wish to outdo your number of children.
We have enough already. I am quite content.
But,—this was the main reason—that we might live well,
And not be short of anything. I know that all
A man's friends leave him stone-cold if he becomes poor.
Also that I might bring my children up worthily

515. Cypris: Aphrodite, goddess of love.

Of my position, and, by producing more of them
To be brothers of yours, we would draw the families Together and all be happy. You need no children.
And it pays me to do good to those I have now
By having others. Do you think this a bad plan?
You wouldn't if the love question hadn't upset you.
But you women have got into such a state of mind
That, if your life at night is good, you think you have Everything; but, if in that quarter things go wrong,
You will consider your best and truest interests
Most hateful. It would have been better far for men
To have got their children in some other way, and women
Not to have existed. Then life would have been good.

CHOR. Jason, though you have made this speech of yours look well,
Still I think, even though others do not agree,
You have betrayed your wife and are acting badly.

MEDEA. Surely in many ways I hold different views
From others, for I think that the plausible speaker
Who is a villain deserves the greatest punishment.
Confident in his tongue's power to adorn evil,
He stops at nothing. Yet he is not really wise.
As in your case. There is no need to put on the airs
Of a clever speaker, for one word will lay you flat.
If you were not a coward, you would not have married Behind my back, but discussed it with me first.

JASON. And you, no doubt, would have furthered the proposal,
If I had told you of it, you who even now
Are incapable of controlling your bitter temper.

MEDEA. It was not that. No, you thought it was not respectable
As you got on in years to have a foreign wife.

JASON. Make sure of this: it was not because of a woman
I made the royal alliance in which I now live,
But, as I said before, I wished to preserve you
And breed a royal progeny to be brothers
To the children I have now, a sure defence to us.

MEDEA. Let me have no happy fortune that brings pain with it,
Or prosperity which is upsetting to the mind!

JASON. Change your ideas of what you want, and show more sense.
Do not consider painful what is good for you,
Nor, when you are lucky, think yourself unfortunate.

MEDEA. You can insult me. You have somewhere to turn to.
But I shall go from this land into exile, friendless.

JASON. It was what you chose yourself. Don't blame others for it.

MEDEA. And how did I choose it? Did I betray my husband?

JASON. You called down wicked curses on the king's family.
MEDEA. A curse, that is what I am become to your house too.
JASON. I do not propose to go into all the rest of it;
But, if you wish for the children or for yourself
In exile to have some of my money to help you,
Say so, for I am prepared to give with open hand,
Or to provide you with introductions to my friends
Who will treat you well. You are a fool if you do not Accept this. Cease your anger and you will profit.
MEDEA. I shall never accept the favours of friends of yours,
Nor take a thing from you, so you need not offer it.
There is no benefit in the gifts of a bad man.
JASON. Then, in any case, I call the gods to witness that I wish to help you and the children in every way,
But you refuse what is good for you. Obstinately
You push away your friends. You are sure to suffer for it.
MEDEA. Go! No doubt you hanker for your virginal bride,
And are guilty of lingering too long out of her house.
Enjoy your wedding. But perhaps,—with the help of God—
You will make the kind of marriage that you will regret.
[JASON goes out with his attendants.]
CHOR. When love is in excess
It brings a man no honour
Nor any worthiness.
But if in moderation Cypris comes,
There is no other power at all so gracious.
O goddess, never on me let loose the unerring Shaft of your bow in the poison of desire.

Let my heart be wise.
It is the gods' best gift.
On me let mighty Cypris
Inflict no wordy wars or restless anger
To urge my passion to a different love.
But with discernment may she guide women's weddings,
Honouring most what is peaceful in the bed.

O country and home,
Never, never may I be without you,
Living the hopeless life,
Hard to pass through and painful,
Most pitiable of all.
Let death first lay me low and death
Free me from this daylight.
There is no sorrow above
The loss of a native land.

I have seen it myself,
Do not tell of a secondhand story.
Neither city nor friend
Pitied you when you suffered
The worst of sufferings.
O let him die ungraced whose heart
Will not reward his friends,
Who cannot open an honest mind
No friend will he be of mine.

[Enter AIGEUS, king of Athens, an old friend of MEDEA.]

AIGEUS. Medea, greeting! This is the best introduction
Of which men know for conversation between friends.

MEDEA. Greeting to you too, Aigeus, son of King Pandion,
Where have you come from to visit this country's soil?

AIGEUS. I have just left the ancient oracle of Phoebus.

MEDEA. And why did you go to earth's prophetic centre?

AIGEUS. I went to inquire how children might be born to me.

MEDEA. Is it so? Your life still up to this point childless?

AIGEUS. Yes. By the fate of some power we have no children.

MEDEA. Have you a wife, or is there none to share your bed?

AIGEUS. There is. Yes, I am joined to my wife in marriage.

MEDEA. And what did Phoebus say to you about children?

AIGEUS. Words too wise for a mere man to guess their meaning.

MEDEA. Is it proper for me to be told the God's reply?

AIGEUS. It is. For sure what is needed is cleverness.

MEDEA. Then what was his message? Tell me, if I may hear.

AIGEUS. I am not to loosen the hanging foot of the wine-skin . . .

MEDEA. Until you have done something, or reached some country?

AIGEUS. Until I return again to my hearth and house.

MEDEA. And for what purpose have you journeyed to this land?

AIGEUS. There is a man called Pittheus, king of Troezen.

MEDEA. A son of Pelops, they say, a most righteous man.

AIGEUS. With him I wish to discuss the reply of the god.

MEDEA. Yes. He is wise and experienced in such matters.

AIGEUS. And to me also the dearest of all my spear-friends.

MEDEA. Well, I hope you have good luck, and achieve your will.

AIGEUS. But why this downcast eye of yours, and this pale cheek?

MEDEA. O Aigeus, my husband has been the worst of all to me.

AIGEUS. What do you mean? Say clearly what has caused this grief.

MEDEA. Jason wrongs me, though I have never injured him.

647. Aigeus: Aegeus.

663. not to loosen . . . wine-skin: This cryptic phrase probably means "not to have intercourse."

667. Pittheus: Aigeus' father-in-law. Troezen: in the Peloponnese. Corinth was on the way from Delphi to Troezen.

671. spear-friends: allies in war, companions in fighting.

AIGEUS. What has he done? Tell me about it in clearer words.
MEDEA. He has taken a wife to his house, supplanting me.
AIGEUS. Surely he would not dare to do a thing like that.
MEDEA. Be sure he has. Once dear, I now am slighted by him.
AIGEUS. Did he fall in love? Or is he tired of your love?
MEDEA. He was greatly in love, this traitor to his friends.
AIGEUS. Then let him go, if, as you say, he is so bad.
MEDEA. A passionate love,—for an alliance with the king.
AIGEUS. And who gave him his wife? Tell me the rest of it.
MEDEA. It was Kreon, he who rules this land of Corinth.
AIGEUS. Indeed, Medea, your grief was understandable.
MEDEA. I am ruined. And there is more to come: I am banished.
AIGEUS. Banished? By whom? Here you tell me of a new wrong.
MEDEA. Kreon drives me an exile from the land of Corinth.
AIGEUS. Does Jason consent? I cannot approve of this.
MEDEA. He pretends not to, but he will put up with it.
Ah, Aigeus, I beg and beseech you, by your beard
And by your knees I am making myself your suppliant,
Have pity on me, have pity on your poor friend,
And do not let me go into exile desolate,
But receive me in your land and at your very hearth.
So may your love, with God's help, lead to the bearing
Of children, and so may you yourself die happy.
You do not know what a chance you have come on here.
I will end your childlessness, and I will make you able To beget children. The drugs I know can do this.
AIGEUS. For many reasons, woman, I am anxious to do
This favour for you. First, for the sake of the gods,
And then for the birth of children which you promise,
For in that respect I am entirely at my wits' end.
But this is my position: if you reach my land,
I, being in my rights, will try to befriend you.
But this much I must warn you of beforehand:
I shall not agree to take you out of this country;
But if you by yourself can reach my house, then you Shall stay there safely. To none will I give you up.
But from this land you must make your escape yourself,
For I do not wish to incur blame from my friends.
MEDEA. It shall be so. But, if I might have a pledge from you
For this, then I would have from you all I desire.
AIGEUS. Do you not trust me? What is it rankles with you?
MEDEA. I trust you, yes. But the house of Pelias hates me,
And so does Kreon. If you are bound by this oath,
When they try to drag me from your land, you will not Abandon me; but if our pact is only words,

With no oath to the gods, you will be lightly armed,
Unable to resist their summons. I am weak,
While they have wealth to help them and a royal house.
AIGEUS. You show much foresight for such negotiations.
Well, if you will have it so, I will not refuse.
For, both on my side this will be the safest way
To have some excuse to put forward to your enemies,
And for you it is more certain. You may name the gods.
MEDEA. Swear by the plain of Earth, and Helios, father
Of my father, and name together all the gods. . . .
AIGEUS. That I will act or not act in what way? Speak.
MEDEA. That you yourself will never cast me from your land,
Nor, if any of my enemies should demand me,
Will you, in your life, willingly hand me over.
AIGEUS. I swear by the Earth, by the holy light of Helios,
By all the gods, I will abide by this you say.
MEDEA. Enough. And, if you fail, what shall happen to you?
AIGEUS. What comes to those who have no regard for heaven.
MEDEA. Go on your way. Farewell. For I am satisfied,
And I will reach your city as soon as I can,
Having done the deed I have to do and gained my end.
[AIGEUS goes out.]
CHOR. May Hermes, god of travellers, Escort you, Aigeus, to your home!
And may you have the things you wish
So eagerly; for you Appear to me to be a generous man.
MEDEA. God, and God's daughter, justice, and light of Helios!
Now, friends, has come the time of my triumph over
My enemies, and now my foot is on the road.
Now I am confident they will pay the penalty.
For this man, Aigeus, has been like a harbour to me
In all my plans just where I was most distressed.
To him I can fasten the cable of my safety
When I have reached the town and fortress of Pallas.
And now I shall tell to you the whole of my plan.
Listen to these words that are not spoken idly.
I shall send one of my servants to find Jason
And request him to come once more into my sight.
And when he comes, the words I'll say will be soft ones.
I'll say that I agree with him, that I approve
The royal wedding he has made, betraying me.
I'll say it was profitable, an excellent idea.
But I shall beg that my children may remain here:

755. town . . . Pallas: Athens, city of Pallas Athene.

Not that I would leave in a country that hates me
Children of mine to feel their enemies' insults,
But that by a trick I may kill the king's daughter.
For I will send the children with gifts in their hands
To carry to the bride, so as not to be banished,—
A finely woven dress and a golden diadem.
And if she takes them and wears them upon her skin
She and all who touch the girl will die in agony;
Such poison will I lay upon the gifts I send.
But there, however, I must leave that account paid.
I weep to think of what a deed I have to do Next after that; for I shall kill my own children.
My children, there is none who can give them safety.
And when I have ruined the whole of Jason's house,
I shall leave the land and flee from the murder of my Dear children, and I shall have done a dreadful deed.
For it is not bearable to be mocked by enemies.
So it must happen. What profit have I in life?
I have no land, no home, no refuge from my pain.
My mistake was made the time I left behind me
My father's house, and trusted the words of a Greek,
Who, with heaven's help, will pay me the price for that.
For those children he had from me he will never See alive again, nor will he on his new bride Beget another child, for she is to be forced To die a most terrible death by these my poisons.
Let no one think me a weak one, feeble-spirited,
A stay-at-home, but rather just the opposite,
One who can hurt my enemies and help my friends;
For the lives of such persons are most remembered.

CHOR. Since you have shared the knowledge of your plan with us,
I both wish to help you and support the normal
Ways of mankind, and tell you not to do this thing.

MEDEA. I can do no other thing. It is understandable
For you to speak thus. You have not suffered as I have.

CHOR. But can you have the heart to kill your flesh and blood?

MEDEA. Yes, for this is the best way to wound my husband.

CHOR. And you too. Of women you will be most unhappy.

MEDEA. So it must be. No compromise is possible.
[She turns to the NURSE.]
Go, you, at once, and tell Jason to come to me.
You I employ on all affairs of greatest trust.
Say nothing of these decisions which I have made,
If you love your mistress, if you were born a woman.

CHOR. From of old the children of Erechtheus are

808. Erechtheus: an early king of Athens, a son of Hephaestus.

Splendid, the sons of blessed gods. They dwell
In Athens' holy and unconquered land,
Where famous Wisdom feeds them and they pass gaily
Always through that most brilliant air where once, they say,
That golden Harmony gave birth to the nine Pure Muses of Pieria.

And beside the sweet flow of Cephisos' stream,
Where Cypris sailed, they say, to draw the water,
And mild soft breezes breathed along her path,
And on her hair were flung the sweet-smelling garlands
Of flowers of roses by the Lovers, the companions
Of Wisdom, her escort, the helpers of men
In every kind of excellence.

How then can these holy rivers
Or this holy land love you,
Or the city find you a home,
You, who will kill your children,
You, not pure with the rest?
O think of the blow at your children
And think of the blood that you shed.
O, over and over I beg you,
By your knees I beg you do not Be the murderess of your babes!

O where will you find the courage
Or the skill of hand and heart,
When you set yourself to attempt
A deed so dreadful to do?
How, when you look upon them,
Can you tearlessly hold the decision
For murder? You will not be able,
When your children fall down and implore you,
You will not be able to dip
Steadfast your hand in their blood.

[Enter JASON with attendants.]

JASON. I have come at your request. Indeed, although you are Bitter against me, this you shall have: I will listen
To what new thing you want, woman, to get from me.

810. unconquered: It was the Athenians' boast that their descent from the original settlers was uninterrupted by any invasion. There is a topical reference here, for the play was produced in 431 B.C., in a time of imminent war.

809–814. They dwell . . . Pieria: The sentence means that the fortunate balance ("Harmony") of the elements and the genius of the people produced the cultivation of the arts ("the nine pure Muses"). Pieria was a fountain in Boeotia where the Muses were supposed to live.

815. Cephisos: an Athenian river. Cypris, mentioned in the next line, is the goddess of love and therefore of the principle of fertility.

MEDEA. Jason, I beg you to be forgiving towards me
For what I said. It is natural for you to bear with My temper, since we have had much love together.
I have talked with myself about this and I have Reproached myself. 'Fool' I said, 'why am I so mad?
Why am I set against those who have planned wisely?
Why make myself an enemy of the authorities
And of my husband, who does the best thing for me
By marrying royalty and having children who Will be as brothers to my own? What is wrong with me?
Let me give up anger, for the gods are kind to me.
Have I not children, and do I not know that we
In exile from our country must be short of friends?'
When I considered this I saw that I had shown Great lack of sense, and that my anger was foolish.
Now I agree with you. I think that you are wise
In having this other wife as well as me, and I Was mad. I should have helped you in these plans of yours,
Have joined in the wedding, stood by the marriage bed,
Have taken pleasure in attendance on your bride.
But we women are what we are,—perhaps a little Worthless; and you men must not be like us in this,
Nor be foolish in return when we are foolish.
Now I give in, and admit that then I was wrong.
I have come to a better understanding now.
[She turns towards the house.]
Children, come here, my children, come outdoors to us!
Welcome your father with me, and say goodbye to him,
And with your mother, who just now was his enemy,
Join again in making friends with him who loves us.
[Enter the CHILDREN, attended by the TUTOR.]
We have made peace, and all our anger is over.
Take hold of his right hand,—O God, I am thinking
Of something which may happen in the secret future.
O children, will you just so, after a long life,
Hold out your loving arms at the grave? O children,
How ready to cry I am, how full of foreboding!
I am ending at last this quarrel with your father,
And, look, my soft eyes have suddenly filled with tears.

CHOR. And the pale tears have started also in my eyes.
O may the trouble not grow worse than now it is!

JASON. I approve of what you say. And I cannot blame you Even for what you said before. It is natural For a woman to be wild with her husband when he Goes in for secret love. But now your mind has turned

To better reasoning. In the end you have come to The right decision, like the clever woman you are.
And of you, children, your father is taking care.
He has made, with God's help, ample provision for you.
For I think that a time will come when you will be
The leading people in Corinth with your brothers.
You must grow up. As to the future, your father
And those of the gods who love him will deal with that.
I want to see you, when you have become young men,
Healthy and strong, better men than my enemies.
Medea, why are your eyes all wet with pale tears?
Why is your cheek so white and turned away from me?
Are not these words of mine pleasing for you to hear?

MEDEA. It is nothing. I was thinking about these children.

JASON. You must be cheerful. I shall look after them well.

MEDEA. I will be. It is not that I distrust your words,
But a woman is a frail thing, prone to crying.

JASON. But why then should you grieve so much for these children?

MEDEA. I am their mother. When you prayed that they might live
I felt unhappy to think that these things will be.
But come, I have said something of the things I meant
To say to you, and now I will tell you the rest.
Since it is the king's will to banish me from here,—
And for me too I know that this is the best thing,
Not to be in your way by living here or in
The king's way, since they think me ill-disposed to them,—
I then am going into exile from this land;
But do you, so that you may have the care of them,
Beg Kreon that the children may not be banished.

JASON. I doubt if I'll succeed, but still I'll attempt it.

MEDEA. Then you must tell your wife to beg from her father
That the children may be reprieved from banishment.

JASON. I will, and with her I shall certainly succeed.

MEDEA. If she is like the rest of us women, you will.
And I too will take a hand with you in this business,
For I will send her some gifts which are far fairer,
I am sure of it, than those which now are in fashion,
A finely-woven dress and a golden diadem,
And the children shall present them. Quick, let one of you Servants bring here to me that beautiful dress.
[One of her attendants goes into the house.]
She will be happy not in one way, but in a hundred,
Having so fine a man as you to share her bed,

And with this beautiful dress which Helios of old,
My father's father, bestowed on his descendants.
[Enter attendant carrying the poisoned dress and diadem.]
There, children, take these wedding presents in your hands.
Take them to the royal princess, the happy bride,
And give them to her. She will not think little of them.

JASON. No, don't be foolish, and empty your hands of these.
Do you think the palace is short of dresses to wear?
Do you think there is no gold there? Keep them, don't give them Away. If my wife considers me of any value,
She will think more of me than money, I am sure of it.

MEDEA. No, let me have my way. They say the gods themselves
Are moved by gifts, and gold does more with men than words.
Hers is the luck, her fortune that which god blesses;
She is young and a princess; but for my children's reprieve
I would give my very life, and not gold only.
Go children, go together to that rich palace,
Be suppliants to the new wife of your father,
My lady, beg her not to let you be banished.
And give her the dress,—for this is of great importance,
That she should take the gift into her hand from yours.
Go, quick as you can. And bring your mother good news
By your success of those things which she longs to gain.
[JASON goes out with his attendants, followed by the TUTOR and the CHILDREN carrying the poisoned gifts.]

CHOR. Now there is no hope left for the children's lives.
Now there is none. They are walking already to murder.
The bride, poor bride, will accept the curse of the gold,
Will accept the bright diadem.
Around her yellow hair she will set that dress
Of death with her own hands.
The grace and the perfume and glow of the golden robe
Will charm her to put them upon her and wear the wreath,
And now her wedding will be with the dead below,
Into such a trap she will fall,
Poor thing, into such a fate of death and never Escape from under that curse.

You too, O wretched bridegroom, making your match with kings,
You do not see that you bring Destruction on your children and on her,
Your wife, a fearful death.
Poor soul, what a fall is yours!

In your grief too I weep, mother of little children,
You who will murder your own,

In vengeance for the loss of married love
Which Jason has betrayed
As he lives with another wife.

[Enter the TUTOR with the CHILDREN.]

TUTOR. Mistress, I tell you that these children are reprieved,
And the royal bride has been pleased to take in her hands
Your gifts. In that quarter the children are secure.
But come,
Why do you stand confused when you are fortunate?
Why have you turned round with your cheek away from me?
Are not these words of mine pleasing for you to hear?

MEDEA. Oh! I am lost!

TUTOR. That word is not in harmony with my tidings.

MEDEA. I am lost, I am lost!

TUTOR. Am I in ignorance telling you
Of some disaster, and not the good news I thought?

MEDEA. You have told what you have told. I do not blame you.

TUTOR. Why then this downcast eye, and this weeping of tears?

MEDEA. Oh, I am forced to weep, old man. The gods and I,
I in a kind of madness have contrived all this.

TUTOR. Courage! You too will be brought home by your children.

MEDEA. Ah, before that happens I shall bring others home.

TUTOR. Others before you have been parted from their children.
Mortals must bear in resignation their ill luck.

MEDEA. That is what I shall do. But go inside the house,
And do for the children your usual daily work.

[The TUTOR goes into the house. MEDEA turns to her CHILDREN.]

O children, O my children, you have a city,
You have a home, and you can leave me behind you,
And without your mother you may live there for ever.
But I am going in exile to another land
Before I have seen you happy and taken pleasure in you,
Before I have dressed your brides and made your marriage beds
And held up the torch at the ceremony of wedding.
Oh, what a wretch I am in this my self-willed thought!
What was the purpose, children, for which I reared you?
For all my travail and wearing myself away?
They were sterile, those pains I had in the bearing of you.
O surely once the hopes in you I had, poor me,
Were high ones: you would look after me in old age,
And when I died would deck me well with your own hands;
A thing which all would have done. O but now it is gone,
That lovely thought. For, once I am left without you,
Sad will be the life I'll lead and sorrowful for me.

And you will never see your mother again with Your dear eyes, gone to another mode of living.
Why, children, do you look upon me with your eyes?
Why do you smile so sweetly that last smile of all?
Oh, Oh, what can I do? My spirit has gone from me,
Friends, when I saw that bright look in the children's eyes.
I cannot bear to do it. I renounce my plans
I had before. I'll take my children away from This land. Why should I hurt their father with the pain
They feel, and suffer twice as much of pain myself?
No, no, I will not do it. I renounce my plans.
Ah, what is wrong with me? Do I want to let go
My enemies unhurt and be laughed at for it?
I must face this thing. Oh, but what a weak woman
Even to admit to my mind these soft arguments.
Children, go into the house. And he whom law forbids
To stand in attendance at my sacrifices,
Let him see to it. I shall not mar my handiwork.
Oh! Oh!
Do not, O my heart, you must not do these things!
Poor heart, let them go, have pity upon the children.
If they live with you in Athens they will cheer you.
No! By Hell's avenging furies it shall not be,—
This shall never be, that I should suffer my children
To be the prey of my enemies' insolence.
Every way is it fixed. The bride will not escape.
No, the diadem is now upon her head, and she,
The royal princess, is dying in the dress, I know it.
But,—for it is the most dreadful of roads for me
To tread, and them I shall send on a more dreadful still—
I wish to speak to the children.

[She calls the CHILDREN to her.]

Come, children, give Me your hands, give your mother your hands to kiss them.
O the dear hands, and O how dear are these lips to me,
And the generous eyes and the bearing of my children!
I wish you happiness, but not here in this world.
What is here your father took. O how good to hold you!
How delicate the skin, how sweet the breath of children!
Go, go! I am no longer able, no longer
To look upon you. I am overcome by sorrow.

[The CHILDREN go into the house.]

I know indeed what evil I intend to do,
But stronger than all my afterthoughts is my fury,
Fury that brings upon mortals the greatest evils.

[She goes out to the right, towards the royal palace.]

CHOR. Often before
I have gone through more subtle reasons,
And have come upon questionings greater
Than a woman should strive to search out.
But we too have a goddess to help us
And accompany us into wisdom.
Not all of us. Still you will find Among many women a few,
And our sex is not without learning.
This I say, that those who have never Had children, who know nothing of it,
In happiness have the advantage
Over those who are parents.
The childless, who never discover Whether children turn out as a good thing
Or as something to cause pain, are spared
Many troubles in lacking this knowledge.
And those who have in their homes
The sweet presence of children, I see that their lives
Are all wasted away by their worries.
First they must think how to bring them up well and How to leave them something to live on.
And then after this whether all their toil
Is for those who will turn out good or bad,
Is still an unanswered question.
And of one more trouble, the last of all,
That is common to mortals I tell.
For suppose you have found them enough for their living,
Suppose that the children have grown into youth
And have turned out good, still, if God so wills it,
Death will away with your children's bodies,
And carry them off into Hades.
What is our profit, then, that for the sake of Children the gods should pile upon mortals
After all else
This most terrible grief of all?

[Enter MEDEA, from the spectators' right.]

MEDEA. Friends, I can tell you that for long I have waited For the event. I stare towards the place from where The news will come. And now, see one of Jason's servants Is on his way here, and that laboured breath of his Shows he has tidings for us, and evil tidings.

[Enter, also from the right, the MESSENGER.]

MESSENGER. Medea, you who have done such a dreadful thing,

So outrageous, run for your life, take what you can,
A ship to bear you hence or chariot on land.
MEDEA. And what is the reason deserves such flight as this?
MESS. She is dead, only just now, the royal princess,
And Kreon dead too, her father, by your poisons.
MEDEA. The finest words you have spoken. Now and hereafter
I shall count you among my benefactors and friends.
MESS. What! Are you right in the mind? Are you not mad, Woman? The house of the king is outraged by you.
Do you enjoy it? Not afraid of such doings?
MEDEA. To what you say I on my side have something too
To say in answer. Do not be in a hurry, friend,
But speak. How did they die? You will delight me twice
As much again if you say they died in agony.
MESS. When those two children, born of you, had entered in,
Their father with them, and passed into the bride's house,
We were pleased, we slaves who were distressed by your wrongs.
All through the house we were talking of but one thing,
How you and your husband had made up your quarrel.
Some kissed the children's hands and some their yellow hair,
And I myself was so full of my joy that I Followed the children into the women's quarters.
Our mistress, whom we honour now instead of you,
Before she noticed that your two children were there,
Was keeping her eye fixed eagerly on Jason.
Afterwards however she covered up her eyes,
Her cheek paled and she turned herself away from him,
So disgusted was she at the children's coming there.
But your husband tried to end the girl's bad temper,
And said 'You must not look unkindly on your friends.
Cease to be angry. Turn your head to me again.
Have as your friends the same ones as your husband has.
And take these gifts, and beg your father to reprieve
These children from their exile. Do it for my sake.'
She, when she saw the dress, could not restrain herself.
She agreed with all her husband said, and before
He and the children had gone far from the palace,
She took the gorgeous robe and dressed herself in it,
And put the golden crown around her curly locks,
And arranged the set of the hair in a shining mirror,
And smiled at the lifeless image of herself in it.
Then she rose from her chair and walked about the room,
With her gleaming feet stepping most soft and delicate,
All overjoyed with the present. Often and often
She would stretch her foot out straight and look along it.

But after that it was a fearful thing to see.
The colour of her face changed, and she staggered back,
She ran, and her legs trembled, and she only just Managed to reach a chair without falling flat down.
An aged woman servant who, I take it, thought
This was some seizure of Pan or another god, Cried out 'God bless us,' but that was before she saw
The white foam breaking through her lips and her rolling
The pupils of her eyes and her face all bloodless.
Then she raised a different cry from that 'God bless us,'
A huge shriek, and the women ran, one to the king,
One to the newly wedded husband to tell him
What had happened to his bride; and with frequent sound
The whole of the palace rang as they went running.
One walking quickly round the course of a race-track
Would now have turned the bend and be close to the goal,
When she, poor girl, opened her shut and speechless eye,
And with a terrible groan she came to herself.
For a two-fold pain was moving up against her.
The wreath of gold that was resting around her head
Let forth a fearful stream of all-devouring fire,
And the finely-woven dress your children gave to her,
Was fastening on the unhappy girl's fine flesh.
She leapt up from the chair, and all on fire she ran,
Shaking her hair now this way and now that, trying
To hurl the diadem away; but fixedly
The gold preserved its grip, and, when she shook her hair,
Then more and twice as fiercely the fire blazed out.
Till, beaten by her fate, she fell down to the ground,
Hard to be recognised except by a parent.
Neither the setting of her eyes was plain to see,
Nor the shapeliness of her face. From the top of Her head there oozed out blood and fire mixed together.
Like the drops on pine-bark, so the flesh from her bones
Dropped away, torn by the hidden fang of the poison.
It was a fearful sight; and terror held us all
From touching the corpse. We had learned from what had happened.
But her wretched father, knowing nothing of the event,
Came suddenly to the house, and fell upon the corpse,
And at once cried out and folded his arms about her,
And kissed her and spoke to her, saying 'O my poor child,

1147. Pan: As the god of wild nature he was supposed to be the source of the sudden, apparently causeless terror which solitude in wild surroundings may produce, and thence of all kinds of sudden madness. (Compare our word "panic".)

What heavenly power has so shamefully destroyed you?
And who has set me here like an ancient sepulchre,
Deprived of you? O let me die with you, my child!'
And when he had made an end of his wailing and crying,
Then the old man wished to raise himself to his feet;
But, as the ivy clings to the twigs of the laurel,
So he stuck to the fine dress, and he struggled fearfully.
For he was trying to lift himself to his knee,
And she was pulling him down, and when he tugged hard
He would be ripping his aged flesh from his bones.
At last his life was quenched and the unhappy man
Gave up the ghost, no longer could hold up his head.
There they lie close, the daughter and the old father,
Dead bodies, an event he prayed for in his tears.
As for your interests, I will say nothing of them,
For you will find your own escape from punishment.
Our human life I think and have thought a shadow,
And I do not fear to say that those who are held
Wise amongst men and who search the reasons of things
Are those who bring the most sorrow on themselves.
For of mortals there is no one who is happy.
If wealth flows in upon one, one may be perhaps Luckier than one's neighbour, but still not happy.
[Exit.]

CHOR. Heaven, it seems, on this day has fastened many Evils on Jason, and Jason has deserved them.
Poor girl, the daughter of Kreon, how I pity you
And your misfortunes, you who have gone quite away
To the house of Hades because of marrying Jason.

MEDEA. Women, my task is fixed: as quickly as I may
To kill my children, and start away from this land,
And not, by wasting time, to suffer my children
To be slain by another hand less kindly to them.
Force every way will have it they must die, and since
This must be so, then I, their mother, shall kill them.
O arm yourself in steel, my heart! Do not hang back
From doing this fearful and necessary wrong.
O come, my hand, poor wretched hand, and take the sword,
Take it, step forward to this bitter starting point,
And do not be a coward, do not think of them,
How sweet they are, and how you are their mother. Just for This one short day be forgetful of your children,
Afterwards weep; for even though you will kill them,
They were very dear,—O, I am an unhappy woman!
[With a cry she rushes into the house.]

CHOR. O Earth, and the far shining
Ray of the sun, look down, look down upon
This poor lost woman, look, before she raises
The hand of murder against her flesh and blood.
Yours was the golden birth from which She sprang, and now I fear divine Blood may be shed by men.
O heavenly light, hold back her hand,
Cheek her, and drive from out the house
The bloody Fury raised by fiends of Hell.

Vain waste, your care of children;
Was it in vain you bore the babes you loved,
After you passed the inhospitable strait
Between the dark blue rocks, Symplegades?
O wretched one, how has it come,
This heavy anger on your heart,
This cruel bloody mind?
For God from mortals asks a stern
Price for the stain of kindred blood
In like disaster falling on their homes.

[A cry from one of the CHILDREN is heard.]

CHOR. Do you hear the cry, do you hear the children's cry?
O you hard heart, O woman fated for evil!

ONE OF THE CHILDREN. [From within] What can I do and how escape my mother's hands?

ANOTHER CHILD. [From within] O my dear brother, I cannot tell. We are lost.

CHOR. Shall I enter the house? O surely I should Defend the children from murder.

A CHILD. [From within] O help us, in God's name, for now we need your help.
Now, now we are close to it. We are trapped by the sword.

CHOR. O your heart must have been made of rock or steel,
You who can kill
With your own hand the fruit of your own womb.
Of one alone I have heard, one woman alone
Of those of old who laid her hands on her children,
Ino, sent mad by heaven when the wife of Zeus
Drove her out from her home and made her wander;
And because of the wicked shedding of blood
Of her own children she threw Herself, poor wretch, into the sea and stepped away
Over the sea-cliff to die with her two children.
What horror more can be? O women's love,

So full of trouble,
How many evils have you caused already!
[Enter JASON, with attendants.]
JASON. You women, standing close in front of this dwelling,
Is she, Medea, she who did this dreadful deed,
Still in the house, or has she run away in flight?
For she will have to hide herself beneath the earth,
Or raise herself on wings into the height of air,
If she wishes to escape the royal vengeance.
Does she imagine that, having killed our rulers,
She will herself escape uninjured from this house?
But I am thinking not so much of her as for
The children,—her the king's friends will make to suffer
For what she did. So I have come to save the lives
Of my boys, in case the royal house should harm them
While taking vengeance for their mother's wicked deed.
CHOR. O Jason, if you but knew how deeply you are Involved in sorrow, you would not have spoken so.
JASON. What is it? That she is planning to kill me also?
CHOR. Your children are dead, and by their own mother's hand.
JASON. What! This is it? O woman, you have destroyed me.
CHOR. You must make up your mind your children are no more.
JASON. Where did she kill them? Was it here or in the house?
CHOR. Open the gates and there you will see them murdered.
JASON. Quick as you can unlock the doors, men, and undo
The fastenings and let me see this double evil,
My children dead and her,—O her I will repay.
[His attendants rush to the door. MEDEA appears above the house in a chariot drawn by dragons. She has the dead bodies of the children with her.] MEDEA. Why do you batter these gates and try to unbar them, Seeking the corpses and for me who did the deed?
You may cease your trouble, and, if you have need of me,
Speak, if you wish. You will never touch me with your hand,
Such a chariot has Helios, my father's father,
Given me to defend me from my enemies.
JASON. You hateful thing, you woman most utterly loathed
By the gods and me and by all the race of mankind,
You who have had the heart to raise a sword against Your children, you, their mother, and left me childless,—
You have done this, and do you still look at the sun
And at the earth, after these most fearful doings?
I wish you dead. Now I see it plain, though at that time
I did not, when I took you from your foreign home
And brought you to a Greek house, you, an evil thing,

A traitress to your father and your native land.
The gods hurled the avenging curse of yours on me.
For your own brother you slew at your own hearthside,
And then came aboard that beautiful ship, the Argo.
And that was your beginning. When you were married
To me, your husband, and had borne children to me,
For the sake of pleasure in the bed you killed them.
There is no Greek woman who would have dared such deeds,
Out of all those whom I passed over and chose you
To marry instead, a bitter destructive match,
A monster not a woman, having a nature
Wilder than that of Scylla in the Tuscan sea.
Ah! no, not if I had ten thousand words of shame
Could I sting you. You are naturally so brazen.
Go, worker in evil, stained with your children's blood.
For me remains to cry aloud upon my fate,
Who will get no pleasure from my newly-wedded love,
And the boys whom I begot and brought up, never Shall I speak to them alive. Oh, my life is over!

MEDEA. Long would be the answer which I might have made to These words of yours, if Zeus the father did not know
How I have treated you and what you did to me.
No, it was not to be that you should scorn my love,
And pleasantly live your life through, laughing at me;
Nor would the princess, nor he who offered the match,
Kreon, drive me away without paying for it.
So now you may call me a monster, if you wish,
O Scylla housed in the caves of the Tuscan sea
I too, as I had to, have taken hold of your heart.

JASON. You feel the pain yourself. You share in my sorrow.

MEDEA. Yes, and my grief is gain when you cannot mock it.

JASON. O children, what a wicked mother she was to you!

MEDEA. They died from a disease they caught from their father.

JASON. I tell you it was not my hand that destroyed them.

MEDEA. But it was your insolence, and your virgin wedding.

JASON. And just for the sake of that you chose to kill them.

MEDEA. Is love so small a pain, do you think, for a woman?

JASON. For a wise one, certainly. But you are wholly evil.

MEDEA. The children are dead. I say this to make you suffer.

JASON. The children, I think, will bring down curses on you.

MEDEA. The gods know who was the author of this sorrow.

JASON. Yes, the gods know indeed, they know your loathsome heart.

MEDEA. Hate me. But I tire of your barking bitterness.

1318. Scylla: a monster located in the straits between Italy and Sicily, who snatched sailors off passing ships and devoured them.

JASON. And I of yours. It is easier to leave you.
MEDEA. How then? What shall I do? I long to leave you too.
JASON. Give me the bodies to bury and to mourn them.
MEDEA. No, that I will not. I will bury them myself, Bearing them to Hera's temple on the promontory;
So that no enemy may evilly treat them
By tearing up their grave. In this land of Corinth
I shall establish a holy feast and sacrifice
Each year for ever to atone for the blood guilt.
And I myself go to the land of Erechtheus
To dwell in Aigeus' house, the son of Pandion.
While you, as is right, will die without distinction,
Struck on the head by a piece of the Argo's timber,
And you will have seen the bitter end of my love.
JASON. May a Fury for the children's sake destroy you,
And justice, requitor of blood.
MEDEA. What heavenly power lends an ear
To a breaker of oaths, a deceiver?
JASON. O, I hate you, murderess of children.
MEDEA. Go to your palace. Bury your bride.
JASON. I go, with two children to mourn for.
MEDEA. Not yet do you feel it. Wait for the future.
JASON. Oh, children I loved!
MEDEA. I loved them, you did not.
JASON. You loved them, and killed them.
MEDEA. To make you feel pain.
JASON. Oh, wretch that I am, how I long
To kiss the dear lips of my children!
MEDEA. Now you would speak to them, now you would kiss them.
Then you rejected them.
JASON. Let me, I beg you,
Touch my boys' delicate flesh.
MEDEA. I will not. Your words are all wasted.
JASON. O God, do you hear it, this persecution,
These my sufferings from this hateful Woman, this monster, murderess of children?
Still what I can do that I will do:
I will lament and cry upon heaven,
Calling the gods to bear me witness
How you have killed my boys and prevent me from Touching their bodies or giving them burial.
I wish I had never begot them to see them

1357. feast and sacrifice: Some such ceremony was still performed at Corinth in Euripides' time.

Afterwards slaughtered by you.
CHOR. Zeus in Olympus is the overseer
Of many doings. Many things the gods Achieve beyond our judgment. What we thought
Is not confirmed and what we thought not god
Contrives. And so it happens in this story.

Hippolytus*

Characters

APHRODITE, goddess of love
ARTEMIS, virgin goddess of the hunt
THESEUS, king of Athens
PHAEDRA, his wife
HIPPOLYTUS, son of Theseus and the Amazon Hippolyta
ATTENDANT, servant of Hippolytus
NURSE, old woman who cared for Phaedra as a child
MESSENGER

The scene is in Troezen, in front of the palace of King Theseus.† By the gates are two statues, one of Aphrodite and one of Artemis. The goddess Aphrodite speaks.

APHRODITE. Strong am I among mortals, not without a name, the goddess Cypris, who in heaven too is known.
And of those who live and look upon the light of the sun from Pontus to the boundaries that Atlas set,
I give honor to the ones who reverence my power,
and those whose thoughts of me are arrogant I crush.
You will find this holds even among the gods above:
they too are pleased when they receive the praise of men.
And I will show at once that what I say is true.
The son of Theseus from the Amazon his wife,
Hippolytus, brought up by Pittheus, that saintly man,

* Translated by Rex Warner.

† Troezen: City on the Peloponnese across the Saronic Gulf from Athens. Hippolytus has been sent here to be brought up by King Pittheus, and also as an illegitimate son to be removed far from Theseus' new wife. However, as Aphrodite explains below, Theseus and Phaedra are now also living in Troezen.

2. Cypris: So named because Cyprus was the chief center of her cult.

4. Pontus: The Black Sea. boundaries: The Strait of Gibraltar. The whole line means "from the Black Sea to the Atlantic," in effect the world as the Greeks knew it. Atlas: Giant condemned to hold up the sky. He was stationed near the Strait of Gibraltar, where the Atlas Mountains stand on the African side.

10. the Amazon his wife: Hippolyta, queen of the Amazon race of warrior women, conquered by Theseus and made his mistress (though, despite what Aphrodite says, evidently not his wife).

alone of all the people in this land, Troezen, considers me the least important of the gods,
spurns love making and will not join in an embrace.
Instead he worships Phoebus' sister, Artemis, the child of Zeus, and thinks her greatest of the gods,
and always with the virgin goddess in green woods
he clears the land of beasts with his swift hunting dogs, in mightier company than that of human kind.
All this I do not grudge him. Why indeed should I?
But for sinning against me, upon this very day
I shall take vengeance on Hippolytus. The work is begun already; there is not much left to do.
For once he came to Athens from the house of Pittheus to see and to receive the holy mysteries, and then his father's noble and respected wife, Phaedra, first saw him, and she found her heart in the grip of savage passion. This was as I planned it for her.
And before she came into this land of Troezen,
she built upon the rock of Pallas, looking out over this land, a temple to me, the Cyprian.
Her love was absent, but it was for him she made the temple and afterwards she called it by his name.
And now that Theseus, fleeing from the stain of blood of Pallas' murdered sons, has taken on himself one year of foreign exile and has left the land of Cecrops and has sailed to this land with his wife,
now she, poor woman, wastes away in agony,
and, driven from her senses by the stings of love, suffers in silence. No one with her knows her pain.
But this is not the way this love of hers must end.
I shall let Theseus know of it. All will come out.
Then this young man, my enemy, will be destroyed by the curses of his father; for the lord of the sea, Poseidon, gave to Theseus as an honored right that he should pray three times and have his prayer fulfilled.
As for the women, Phaedra, she shall keep her name, but none the less shall die. I shall not think her pain of enough importance to prevent my enemies

25. mysteries: Sacred rites of the initiates of the cult of Demeter, goddess of agriculture and fertility of the land. The center of the cult was Eleusis, located between Troezen and Athens.

30. Pallas: Alternate name of Athena, the patron goddess of Athens; her rock is the Acropolis, the hill on which the gods' temples stood.

35. Pallas' murdered sons: This Pallas is not Athena but Thesus' uncle, whose sons Theseus killed in a war over territorial claims.

37. land of Cecrops: Athens. Cecrops was an early Attic king.

45. Poseidon: God of the sea and of earthquakes, and father of Theseus. Like many of the heroes, Theseus had both a divine and a human father.

from suffering the punishment that I think fit.
But now I see the son of Theseus coming here,
Hippolytus, fresh from his hunting exercise.
I therefore shall be gone. Behind him comes a great and merry band of hunters, singing to Artemis, hymning the goddess's praise. He does not know the gates of Hell are open and this day he sees his last.

[Aphrodite goes out. Hippolytus, carrying a garland in his hand, enters followed by his attendants.]

HIPPOLYTUS. Sing, as you follow me, sing of her heavenly daughter of Zeus, Artemis, in whose care we are.

ATTENDANTS. [Singing] Most holy lady, we worship you, child of the Highest.
We worship you, Lady Artemis,
Leto and Zeus's daughter.
You most beautiful far among maidens, you who in heaven dwell in the space of your father's court, in the golden palace of Zeus, hear us, most beautiful maid among maidens in heaven, most beautiful, Artemis.

[Hippolytus advances to the statue of Artemis in front of the palace.]

HIPPOLYTUS. For you, my lady, I have made and bring to you this wreath of twined flowers from a virgin meadow, a place where never shepherd thought to feed his flocks nor ever came the stroke of iron. Instead the bees cross and recross this virgin meadow in the spring.
And native Shame waters the ground with river dew, and from his garden only those may pluck the flowers who were elect from birth by a wise purity in all things, and never had to learn it. Evil men have no right there. And so, dear lady, take from this reverent hand a binding for your golden hair.
For I alone of men am so distinguished as to be constantly with you and to speak and hear your words.
I hear the voice, but I have never seen your face.
O, let me end my life as I have started it!

[One of his attendants approaches him.]

63. Zeus: King of the gods. Leto was a goddess loved by Zeus, mother of Artemis and Apollo.

76. Shame: The Greek word covers a wider spectrum of feelings than any one English word. It is a feeling of reverence —for other men, for gods, or for nature. Here it is the spirit which tends the meadow, like a gardener.

ATTENDANT. Sir, for "master" is a word I use for gods—if I gave good advice, would you receive it from me?
HIPPOLYTUS. Of course I would. It would be stupid not to do so.
ATTENDANT. Do you know of a rule that is general among men?
HIPPOLYTUS. What rule? What is it you are telling me about?
ATTENDANT. People hate pride and an exclusive attitude.
HIPPOLYTUS. Quite right. An arrogant person is always hated.
ATTENDANT. And people are grateful when you talk to them kindly.
HIPPOLYTUS. Certainly. It does much good, and costs little trouble.
ATTENDANT. And do you think that the same thing is true of gods?
HIPPOLYTUS. Yes, since we mortals live by the same rules as they.
ATTENDANT. Then why do you not say a word to a great goddess?
HIPPOLYTUS. Which one? Be careful that you name what can be named.
ATTENDANT. The one that stands there. The Cyprian at your gates.
HIPPOLYTUS. Since I live cleanly, I greet her from a distance.
ATTENDANT. Yet she is great and proud and known among all men.
HIPPOLYTUS. I do not care for gods men worship in the night.
ATTENDANT. Still you must recognize the honors due to gods.
HIPPOLYTUS. Both among gods and men there are different tastes.
ATTENDANT. Then I wish you happiness, and the sense you ought to have.
HIPPOLYTUS. [Turning away from him] Come on, my friends, and go inside the house and see the banquet is prepared. After a day of hunting a well-spread table does one good. Let someone rub the horses down. When I have had enough to eat,
I shall yoke and drive them out today for exercise.
As for your Cyprian goddess—may she be in luck.
[He goes into the palace. The Attendant remains behind and bows before the statue of Aphrodite.] ATTENDANT. But I (and here I shall not imitate young men) think in a way a slave should think before he speaks.
Let me address my prayers to your holy image, goddess of Cyprus. You should have some pity on one who, because of his youth, with violent feelings speaks nonsense of you. You should pretend not to hear.
Gods should be wiser and more moderate than men.
[He follows the others into the palace. Enter the Chorus of Women of Troezen.]
CHORUS. There is a rock that wells with Ocean's water

98. name what can be named: Hippolytus does not even want to hear Aphrodite's name.

119. Ocean's water: Not sea-water. Ocean was the river encircling the earth from which all fresh-water rivers and springs were believed to flow.

and from its steeps lets fall a flowing stream where pitchers dip, and there one that I knew was plunging red robes in the river dew, spreading the robes to dry on the slab of a hot rock in the sun, and she told me first of the queen.

How she is wasting on a bed of sickness inside her house, and hides her golden head in the shade of a silken veil;
and now for the third day she refrains with her lovely lips from the touch of the grains of Demeter, and secretly suffering, longs to draw in to the pitiful harbor of death.

Are you astray, my lady, possessed by a god—by Pan or Hecate or the terrible Corybantes, or Mountain Mother?
Or are you wasted away for a sin incurred by failing, unsanctified, to sacrifice to the goddess of beasts, Dictynna?
For she is able to range through the waves over the ocean to land on the salt and eddying waters.

Is it your husband, the noble king of Erechtheus' sons?
Is he folded in secret love away from your bed in the house?
Or has some mariner sailed from the port of Crete to this most kindly harbor for sailing men and brought to our queen a message?
And is it in grief for what she has learnt of suffering there in her home that she lies heartsick in her bed?

In women's difficult unstable natures a pitiful helplessness often dwells springing from pangs in the womb and unbalanced thought.

136. Pan: A god of the wild country who might induce madness.

137. Hecate: A name of Artemis as witch, who as goddess of the moon might also be the source of lunacy, especially in women.

138. Corybantes: Priests of Cybele, the Mountain Mother; their frenzied dancing had a hypnotic effect.

141. Dictynna: Artemis.

146. Erechtheus' sons: Athenians. Erechtheus was a legendary early king of Athens.

149. Crete: Phaedra's home. She is the daughter of King Minos and Pasiphae (line 328 and note).

Such an impulse of pain through my loins also has darted, but then I cried to heavenly Artemis, giver of gentle birth, goddess guarding the bow, and she for ever is honored and blessed by me as she goes with the gods.

[Enter Phaedra and her old Nurse. Phaedra lies down on a couch.]

But here at the door is the aged nurse bringing her mistress out of the palace.
The lowering cloud on her brows is darker.
What can it be? I long to discover what can have happened
so to alter the form of the queen.

NURSE. How people suffer! How hateful is illness!
What shall I do for you? What leave undone?
Here is the light for you, here is the bright sky.
Here is your sickbed ready for you outside your doors.
What you wanted was always to come here,
though soon you will hurry back to your bedroom, soon disappointed. Nothing can please you.
Discontented with what you have, you think what you don't have is better.
I would rather be ill than look after an illness.
Illness is simple, but nursing an illness brings grief to the heart and work for the hands.
The life of men is nothing but evil,
nor is there any respite from suffering.
Yet if there is a state better than living, darkness surrounds it and hides it in clouds.
So we show ourselves lovesick indeed for this something that glitters on earth, having no knowledge of different living and no revelation of what is beneath, since there's no direction in idle legends.

PHAEDRA. Lift me upright, give support to my head.
Dear women, the bonds of my limbs are unloosed.
Take hold of my hands and my delicate arms.
Heavy to wear is the veil on my head.
Take it, and let my hair loose on my shoulders.

NURSE. Be patient, my child, and do not so fiercely toss to and fro.
If you keep quiet and are brave in your spirit,
you will find your illness more easy to bear.
It is fated for mortals to suffer.

PHAEDRA. Alas! how I wish I could draw from a dewy fountain a draft of the shining waters, and take my rest in a leafy meadow, lying beneath the shade of the poplars.
NURSE. O my child, what is this you are saying?
Really, you must not before all these people speak and let loose such words ridden by madness.
PHAEDRA. Away to the mountains! I will go to the wild wood, under the pines, where the hounds are hunting,
and pressing their chase on the dappled deer.
O, let me do it! I long to be shouting out to the hounds, and to poise by my yellow hair the Thessalian javelin, and carry the bladed lance in my hand.
NURSE. My child, why ever should such things upset you?
Why should you take such an interest in hunting?
Why should you long for a draft from a fountain?
Here, close by your towers, is a dewy slope,
and from here we can fetch you some water.
PHAEDRA. Artemis, queen of sea-girt Limne, queen of the race-course that echoes with hoof-beats,
O how I long to be there in your lowlands, breaking in the Venetian horses!
NURSE. What are these words that you fling out in madness?
Only just now you were off to the mountains, led by a longing for hunting, and now you yearn for horses on sandy plains away from the sea. It would take some divining to find, my child, which one of the gods holds the reins of your spirit, and drives it astray.
PHAEDRA. What can I have done to make me unhappy?
And whither so driven aside from my right mind?
I am mad, I have fallen through spite of some god,
O, poor wretch that I am.
Cover my face again, dear mother.
I feel dread at the words I have spoken.
Cover it up. Tears start in my eyes, and shame has come over my face.
To come to my senses again is an agony;

207. madness: In fifth-century Athens women of the upper classes were rarely seen outside their own homes: in such a social context Phaedra's wish to run on the mountains would indeed seem strange.

213. Thessalian javelin: This light hunting spear was a product of Thessaly, north central Greece.

220. Limne: The coastal lagoon of Troezen. Hippolytus raced his horses there; like all the places Phaedra mentions, it is a covert reference to her love.

223. Venetian: The city of Venice had not yet been founded, but the district was known by this name and its horses were famous.

yet this madness is evil. The best thing of all is to die, and not know what I'm doing.
NURSE. There, I've covered your face. But, O when will my body be shrouded in death?
Much I have learned by living a long time.
Mortals, I know, should join with each other in loving feelings that are not excessive, just on the surface, not touching the quick of the soul.
Light should the heart's affections lie on us,
quick to cast off and quick to pull tighter.
This is a heavy weight, that one soul should suffer itself for two souls, just as I for my mistress grieve too greatly.
In life, they say, one finds more failure than delight in this unswerving heart's devotion, which conflicts with health.
"Nothing in excess" is better far than counsels of perfection.
Wise men will agree with me.
CHORUS. You aged woman, trusted nurse to this our queen.
We see the unhappy sufferings that Phaedra feels, but what the illness is is still unknown to us.
From you we wish to hear and be informed of it.
NURSE. I have asked and do not know. She does not wish to speak.
CHORUS. Nor what was the beginning of these pains of hers?
NURSE. Just the same thing. On all of this she is silent.
CHORUS. How weak she is, and how her body wastes away!
NURSE. No wonder, since for three days she has touched no food.
CHORUS. Is it some curse of god or that she aims to die?
NURSE. She wants to die, and starves to make an end of life.
CHORUS. It is a strange thing if her husband bears this calmly.
NURSE. She hides her pains from him and says she is not ill.
CHORUS. But when he sees her face, does he not see she is?
NURSE. No. Just now he happens to be away from home.
CHORUS. Can you not try and force some way of finding out what is her illness and what distraction of her mind?
NURSE. I have tried everything and met with no success.
But even now I'll not relax my efforts for her,
so that you too, being here, may bear me witness how true I am to a mistress in her misfortune.
[She turns to Phaedra.]
Come, my dear child, and let us both forget those words we spoke before. You must behave with more kindness, relax that angry frown and change your way of mind;
and I, if in any way I failed to understand,

will let that be, and turn to other better words.
Now, if your illness is the kind that one keeps private,
here are these women ready to assist you in it.
But if your suffering can be disclosed to men, speak, so that we can let the doctors know of it.
Now, come! Why don't you speak? You ought to tell me, child.
If what I say is not right, point it out to me;
otherwise you should agree with my well-meant advice.
Say something, do. Or look at me.—Poor wretch I am!
Women, it does no good, the trouble that we take.
We are still as far away as ever. The last time words could not soften her, and now she will not hear.
[She turns to Phaedra again.]
Yet listen to this. Now, if you like, be more self-willed than is the sea itself. Dying, you will betray your children, leaving them without their share in all their father's wealth. Yes, she, the Amazon huntress, the royal lady, bore a master for your sons,
a bastard aiming at full rights. You know him well.
Hippolytus.

PHAEDRA. Alas!

NURSE. What! This point touches you?

PHAEDRA. Mother, you have destroyed me. Please, I beg of you, never again make mention of this man to me.

NURSE. You see? Your mind is sound, and yet in spite of that you will not help your children and preserve your life.

PHAEDRA. I love my children. Other evils storm my heart.

NURSE. Are your hands pure, my child, from stain of shedding blood?

PHAEDRA. My hands are pure: it is my mind that has the stain.

NURSE. Some enemy brings pain on you by magic means.

PHAEDRA. Against his will and mine a friend is killing me.

NURSE. Is it Theseus who has done some injury to you?

PHAEDRA. Let me be never found to have done him a wrong!

NURSE. What is this fearful thing that drives you on to death?

PHAEDRA. Leave me to sin. It is not against you I sin.

NURSE. I'll never leave you. It is your fault if I fail.

[She throws herself on her knees in front of Phaedra.]

PHAEDRA. What are you doing, clinging to my hands and forcing me?

NURSE. Yes, and I clasp your knees and will not let you go.

PHAEDRA. Poor thing, my words are bad for you to hear, yes, bad.

300. your sons: Phaedra's sons by Theseus were Demophon and Acamas. Demophon succeeded his father on the throne.

305. Mother: Term of familiarity, not to be taken literally.

NURSE. Could anything be worse for me than to lose you?
PHAEDRA. You will be lost. And yet to me this thing gives fame.
NURSE. Yet you hide something good, in spite of all my prayers?
PHAEDRA. Yes, since the glory that I plan proceeds from shame.
NURSE. Then you will be more honored still by telling it.
PHAEDRA. Leave me, I beg you, and let go of my right hand.
NURSE. Never! You will not give me what you ought to give.
PHAEDRA. I will. For I respect your rights in pleading so.
NURSE. Then I'll be silent. Now it is for you to speak.
PHAEDRA. O my mother, what a love, poor thing, you fell into!
NURSE. Is what you mean, my child, her passion for the bull?
PHAEDRA. You too, my wretched sister, Dionysus' wife.
NURSE. What is it, child? You speak ill of your family.
PHAEDRA. And I, the third unhappy one, I too destroyed!
NURSE. I am indeed bewildered. Where will these words end?
PHAEDRA. Where I became unhappy, a long time ago.
NURSE. But still I know no more of what I wish to hear.
PHAEDRA. Ah! I wish that you could say the words I have to say.
NURSE. I am no prophetess to make the dark things clear.
PHAEDRA. What do they mean when they say people are in love?
NURSE. Something most sweet, my child, and also painful too.
PHAEDRA. I must be one who feels the painfulness of it.
NURSE. What's this you say? You are in love, my child?
With whom?
PHAEDRA. There is a man I know, the son of the Amazon . . .
NURSE. Hippolytus?
PHAEDRA. You heard it from your lips, not mine.
NURSE. Ah, child, what can you mean? O, you have ruined me.
Women, this is not to be borne, and I will not bear to live more. Ill day, ill light it is I see.
I shall throw and cast away my body, leave my life and die. I say farewell, since I no longer am.
Against their will, perhaps, but all the same, the wise and chaste love evil. Cypris, then, is not divine, but must be something else more mighty than a god
to have destroyed my mistress, me, and all our house.
CHORUS. Oh, did you hear her? Oh, did you listen to things unutterable, to the queen as she told her woes?

321. fame: She means that keeping her secret is an honorable act, yet the words show (since fame and honor are public matters that she is thinking of confessing to the nurse.

329. mother: Pasiphae, wife of Minos of Crete. She was impregnated by a bull and gave birth to a monster, the Minotaur.

331. sister: Ariadne. She helped Theseus find his way out of the labyrinth after he killed the Minotaur and left Crete with him. But he abandoned her on the island of Naxos and Dionysus became her lover.

O let me die, dear lady, before
I come to a mind like yours! Oh alas!
O poor wretch in your pains!
O troubles in which men live!
You are destroyed, you have brought bad things to the light.
What waits for you now through this long day?
Some new evil will fall on this house.
No longer doubtful the destination of Cypris' will, O unhappy daughter of Crete.

PHAEDRA. You women of Troezen, you who live here upon this verge and entrance to the country of Pelops, before now idly in the watches of the night
I have considered how the life of man is spoilt.
And to my mind it is not through a lack of wit that men go wrong, since, as for being sensible, many are that. But this is how I look at it:
we understand and recognize what things are good,
but do not do them, some because of laziness, others by choosing pleasure of some kind instead of honor. There are many pleasures in our life,— long conversations, being idle (a delightful fault), and shame. There are two kinds of shame,—the one not bad the other a weight on houses. If they were marked out clearly, the two would not be spelt in the same way.
Now, since it happens that I think as I have said, the medicine does not exist by which I was likely to change and fall back from this view of mine.
Now to you too I shall describe my way of thought.
When passion wounded me, I tried to find the way by which I could bear it with most honor. I began in this way,—to keep silent and conceal my pain.
There is no trusting in the tongue, which well enough knows how to criticize the thoughts of other men, yet on its own self oftenest brings suffering.
And then my second resolution was to bear
my folly nobly and by reason conquer it.
And, as a third resource, since by these means I failed to subdue Cypris, I made up my mind to die;
and this (no one will question it) is the best plan.
For I would never wish my good deeds to be hid,
nor to have people watching me when I do ill.
The deed, I knew, was shameful and my own disease;

369. country of Pelops: The Peloponnese, main peninsula of Greece, named for the early Greek king Pelops. Troezen is on its northeastern shore.

380. two kinds of shame: The kind which prevents one from doing wrong, and the shame felt after it is done.

clearly I knew as well that I was a woman, something that's loathed by all. My curses on the wife who first began, by taking lovers, to bring shame upon the marriage bed! It was from noble houses this evil started to descend on womankind.
When what is shameful is condoned by noble people,
then certainly the lower class will think it good.
And then I hate the women who in words are chaste, while hiding secretly their bold dishonest deeds.
O sea-born lady Cypris, how can these ones ever look in the faces of their husbands and not fear and tremble lest the darkness that has covered them and rooms within their houses might not cry aloud?
This is the thing, my friends, that drives me to my death:
lest I be found to have brought shame on my husband and on the children whom I bore. I want them free to live and free to speak and prosperous to dwell in glorious Athens, famous for their mother's sake.
Consciousness of a father's or a mother's sins enslaves a man, however stout his heart may be.
And this alone, they say, to those who have it, can be matched with life itself,—a good and upright mind.
Time, at some moment, must bring evil men to light, holding to them, as to the face of some young girl,
a mirror up. May I be never seen with them!

CHORUS. Ah, how what's wise and chaste is honored everywhere, and among men it bears the fruit of good report!

NURSE. My mistress, as you saw, just now the news of your predicament filled me with sudden dreadful fear.
But now I think that I was silly. Among men one's second thoughts are in a way the wiser ones.
To you nothing outrageous or unheard-of has happened. It is the goddess' anger strikes at you.
You are in love. What's strange in that? Most people are.
And then because of love will you destroy your life?
There'll be no point in loving those who are close to us
now or in future, if one has to die for it.
Cypris is irresistible when in full force,
but gently visits those whose spirits yield to her;
and when she finds a man who's proud and arrogant,
of course she seizes him and makes a mock of him.
She ranges through the air, and in the surge of sea
there Cypris is, and everything proceeds from her.
And she it is who plants in us and gives desire from which all we inhabitants of earth are born.

Indeed those people who possess the books of old writers and are themselves great readers of their works know how Zeus once desired to have the joys of love with Semele, and know how once fair-shining Dawn snatched up to heaven Cephalus to join the gods, and all this out of passion; and yet, all the same,
they dwell in heaven, do not shun the paths of gods,
and are, I think, quite pleased to yield to what has passed.
Will you object? Your father then should have made you on special terms, or else controlled by other gods, if you will not consent to follow these known laws.
How many men, and wise ones, are there, do you think,
who see their beds defiled, and pretend not to see?
How many fathers who assist their erring sons in finding love affairs? Amongst the wise this is a general rule,—to hide what is not fair to see.
Nor should men try to be too strict about their lives.
They cannot even make the roofs, with which their homes are covered, absolutely right. And you, fallen to such a state, how can you hope to swim out clear?
No, if the good in you is greater than the bad,
you, being only human, will do very well.
So, please, my dear child, give up these bad thoughts of yours.
Give up your arrogance, for it is nothing else
but arrogance to wish to have more strength than gods.
Love, and be bold. It is a god that willed all this.
You may be ill, but find a way to come out well.
Charms do exist and words that soothe and sway the mind.
We shall discover medicine for this ill of yours.
Indeed it's true that men would still be looking for it, unless it was we women could find out the way.

CHORUS. Phaedra, she tells you things that are more useful to you in your present distress. Yet I think you are right.
And you will find this view of mine more hard to bear than are her words, more painful too to listen to.

PHAEDRA. This is the thing that ruins the well-ordered towns and homes of men,—words spoken too persuasively.
For people should not say what charms the listener's ear
but what will bring to those who hear it good report.

NURSE. Why this grand language? What you need is not fine words
but to find out as fast as possible about

449. Semele: Theban princess, the mother, by Zeus, of Dionysus (Bacchus).

450. Cephalus: The young man carried off by the dawn goddess, also sometimes called Tithonus (as in Virgil, The Aeneid, IV, 806 p. 631).

the man, and us to tell him the straight story of you.
For if it was not that your life was in this state of peril, if you were a woman more controlled,
I never would, because of love and your delights, have urged you on so far; but now the struggle is to save your life, and I cannot be blamed for this.

PHAEDRA. What awful things you say! Will you please keep your mouth shut, and never again speak such disgraceful words.

NURSE. Disgraceful, yes, but better for you than your fine words, and a better deed if I can save your life than save your name, to glory in which name you'd die.

PHAEDRA. Please, not to me, I beg you (you speak well, but foully) go any further now. My heart is well prepared by love, and, if you speak so well of shameful things,
I shall be swept away by what I fly from now.

NURSE. If this is what you think, you ought not to have sinned.
You have. Then listen to me, for the next best thing is to give way. I have at home some soothing drafts for love,—the thought has only just occurred to me,— and these, without dishonor, doing no harm to your wits, will free you from your sickness, if you will be brave.
But I must have something from him whom you desire,
some mark, either a lock of hair or piece of clothing,
so from the two of you to make consentment one.

PHAEDRA. Is this a drug to drink or ointment to put on?

NURSE. I do not know. Be happy and never mind, my child.

PHAEDRA. I am afraid that you may be too clever in all this.

NURSE. Be sure you would fear everything. What do you fear?

PHAEDRA. That you might tell some word of this to Theseus' son.

NURSE. Leave me alone, my child. I shall arrange things well.

[She turns to go into the palace but first addresses the statue of Aphrodite.]

Only be you my helper, lady of the sea, Cypris! As for what else I have within my mind it will be enough to tell it to our friends indoors.

[She goes into the palace.]

CHORUS. Love, O Love, you that make well to the eyes drops of desire, you that bring sweet delight into the hearts that you with your force invade, never to me appear in catastrophe,

504. soothing drafts: Love charms and potions were well known in the ancient world. Usually, however, their purpose was to arouse love, not, as here, to control it. In fact, the Nurse is prevaricating: she intends to tell Hippolytus of Phaedra's love and try to win him over.

517. lady of the sea: Aphrodite was born from the sea.

never in discord come!
Since there exists no bolt of the fire and no weightier bolt of the stars than that arrow of Aphrodite hurled out of the hands of Love,
Love, the child of the Highest.

Useless it is that still by Alpheus' stream, Useless it is by Phoebus's Pythian shrines for the land of Hellas to sacrifice more and more blood of oxen, when we neglect to give the honor that's due to Love, Love, the ruler of men, he who keeps the keys of Aphrodite's pleasantest dwelling-place, he who ravages on his way, bringing to mortals all catastrophes at his coming.

The girl in Oichalia,
a maiden unyoked to love, unmarried as yet and husbandless, Cypris took and loosed her from home in ships, and, a fugitive thing, like a nymph or Bacchante, she gave her,
with blood and with fire and murder for wedding hymns, to Alcmene's child.
Poor wretch she was in her marriage!

O holy fortress of Thebes,
O fountain of Dirce, you well could witness the force of Cypris' coming.
For with thunder and lightning flash
she brought to her bed the mother of Bacchus, the Zeusborn, and gave her a wedding with death for a fate. She breathes in terror on all and flies on her way like a bee.

[Phaedra goes to the door of the palace and listens.]

530. Alpheus: The river of Olympia, site of the great temple of Zeus and of the Olympic games.
531. Phoebus' Pythian shrines: The temple of Apollo at Delphi.
532. Hellas: Greece.
540. girl in Oichalia: Iole, daughter of King Eurytus. To win her, Heracles sacked the city and killed her father and brother.
544. Bacchante: Ecstatic worshipper of Bacchus (Dionysus).
546. Alcmene: Mother of Heracles.
550. Dirce: The spring at Thebes.
553. mother of Bacchus: Semele. Pregnant by Zeus, who was invisible when he visited her, she asked to see him in his divine shape. She had her wish, but was blasted to ashes by his lightening.

PHAEDRA. Be silent, women! O now, I am really ruined!
CHORUS. What is it, Phaedra, frightens you inside your house?
PHAEDRA. Be quiet. Let me hear the voice of those inside.
CHORUS. I will. Though this beginning seems to me not good.
PHAEDRA. Oh! Oh! alas! alas!
O wretched thing I am in these my sufferings!
CHORUS. What are the words you speak? What is the tale you tell?
Say what speech it is, my lady, that frightens you so,
tearing into your heart.
PHAEDRA. O I am lost! Just stand beside these gates, and there listen to all the uproar falling on the house.
CHORUS. You are there by the door. You it is who must tell of the words that come from within.
Tell me what can it be, what evil is here.
PHAEDRA. He shouts aloud, the son of the huntress Amazon, Hippolytus, and to my nurse says dreadful things.
CHORUS. Yes, I can hear the voice; yet cannot clearly tell whence came the cry to you, came to you through the gates.
PHAEDRA. O listen, clearly now he calls her "procuress of evil and betrayer of her master's bed."
CHORUS. O, I weep for your pain. Lady, you are betrayed.
How can I find you help?
Secret things are revealed, and you are lost . . .
PHAEDRA. Alas! Alas!
CHORUS. By your friends betrayed.
PHAEDRA. She has destroyed me, telling him of my distress, kindly, not nobly, seeking to relieve my pain.
CHORUS. What now? What will you do, caught so much in a trap?
PHAEDRA. I do not know, except for one thing,—that quick death remains the only cure for all my present pain.

[Phaedra retires. Hippolytus, with the Nurse following him, comes in.]

HIPPOLYTUS. O mother Earth and you unfoldings of the sun,
I have heard the unspeakable sound of most foul words.
NURSE. Be silent, child, lest someone notice your cries.
HIPPOLYTUS. I have heard dreadful things. How can I hold my tongue?
NURSE. I beg you, by this right hand of yours, and this strong arm.
HIPPOLYTUS. Take your hands off me! Do not dare to touch my clothes.
NURSE. I implore you by your knees. Do not be my ruin.
HIPPOLYTUS. How can I, if, as you pretend, your words were good?
NURSE. O child, this story is not fit for all to hear.
HIPPOLYTUS. More hearers the more honor, when the news is good.

NURSE. O child, you must respect the oath you swore to me.
HIPPOLYTUS. It was my tongue that swore: my mind has made no oath.
NURSE. O child, what will you do? Will you destroy your friends?
HIPPOLYTUS. Your words revolt me. No bad person is my friend.
NURSE. Have pity! It is natural, my child, to make mistakes.
HIPPOLYTUS. O Zeus, why did you house them in the light of day, women, man's evil, a false glittering counterfeit?
For if you wished to propagate the race of men,
this should not have been brought about by women's means.
Instead men should have offered in exchange their wealth within your temples,—gold or silver or a weight of bronze,—and bought their children for the price they paid, each at its proper value. And then they could live in free and easy homes and have no need of wives.
This makes it clear how great an evil a woman is:
the father who breeds and educates one pays a dowry too that she may live elsewhere and he be free from pain.
And then the man who takes this curse inside his house delights in adding fine adornments to her shape, worthless itself, spends time in finding dresses for her,
the fool, and wastes away the substance of his house.
He's in a cleft stick; for, if he can marry well and likes his new relations, then his wife will be a bitter thing; and, if his wife is good, he'll find worthless relations, bad and good luck counterpoised.
Easiest for him who has settled in his home a wife whose mind's a total blank, a simple useless thing.
I hate a clever woman, and in my house never would have one with more ideas than women ought to have.
For Cypris inculcates more often evil ways among the clever ones, whereas the helpless kind are barred from loose behavior by their lack of wit.
No servant ever should have access to a wife:
their company should be some biting speechless beast,
so that they could not even speak to anyone,
nor get an answer back from those whom they address.
But as it is wives who are bad make their bad plots at home, and then their servants carry them outside.
Like you, you miserable wretch, who came to me to make arrangements for my father's sacred bed.
With running water I shall wash my ears and wipe away your words. How could I ever be so base,
I, who, just hearing you, must think myself unclean?

620. cleft stick: Dilemma.

Be sure what saves you, woman, is my sense of right.
If, carelessly, I had not bound myself by oaths, for sure I should have told my father of all this.
And now, so long as Theseus is away from home,
I shall be absent too, and keep a silent tongue;
and then, returning with my father, I shall watch
how you will meet his eye, you and your mistress too.
Yes, I shall know, having tasted of your shamelessness.
I would destroy you all,—never shall have enough of hating women, though they say that I'm always saying the same thing. Women too are always bad.
Either let someone teach them to be self-controlled or else allow me still to tread them under foot.

[Hippolytus goes out. Phaedra comes forward.]

PHAEDRA. O sad they are, unlucky, the fates that women have!
Now that our hopes are betrayed, what art
what words can we find to loose the knot of his speech?
The verdict is given. O earth, and light!
Where can I go to escape my fate?
How, dear friends, can I hide my pain?
Which of the gods would succor me now? What man can appear to stand beside me as fellow worker in evil deeds? O no, my life's disaster stays with me still and cannot be escaped.
I am the most unlucky one of women.

CHORUS. Alas! it is all over. They miscarried, those arts of your servant, lady. Things are bad indeed.

PHAEDRA. [To the Nurse] You wicked woman, you destroyer of your friends, what have you done to me? I pray my parent Zeus may blot you out entirely with a blow of fire!
Did I not tell you, seeing in advance your mind,
to make no mention of what now has brought me shame?
But you had no restraint, and now no longer can I die with a good name. I greatly need some new device.
Hippolytus, with anger sharpening his mind,
will speak against me, tell his father of your sins,
and tell the aged Pittheus of my sufferings,
and fill the whole land with the shameful story of it.
My curse on you, and on all those who are so keen to help friends in dishonest ways against their will!

NURSE. You, lady, can reproach me for the wrong I did;
the hurt you feel is stronger than your power to judge.
Yet I too can reply to this, if you will hear.

670. parent: Her father Minos was a son of Zeus.

I brought you up and seek your good. I tried to find medicine for your disease, and found not what I wished.
Had I been lucky, I should have been thought most wise since brains are measured by the way events fall out.
PHAEDRA. Is this your sense of right and proper speech to me,— to wound me first, and then admit as much in words?
NURSE. Our speeches are too long. I have been indiscreet.
Yet from all this, my child, there is a safe way out.
PHAEDRA. Stop talking. You have given me before advice that was dishonest, and your action too was bad.
So now begone out of my sight, think of yourself;
and I shall act with honor in my own affairs.
And now I ask you, noble daughters of Troezen, to listen to my prayers and grant me this request,— to hide in silence all that you have heard of here.
CHORUS. I swear by mighty Artemis, the child of Zeus, not ever to bring any of your woes to light.
PHAEDRA. You have spoken fairly. Now, searching my mind, I find one way and one alone to meet my present pass, so as to leave my children honor in their lives and help myself in what has happened to me now.
For I shall never put my Cretan home to shame or, after these disgraceful doings, come within the sight of Theseus, just to save one single life.
CHORUS. What evil without cure do you intend to do?
PHAEDRA. To die; but how to die is what I now shall plan.
CHORUS. O do not say such words!
PHAEDRA. You must give good advice.
In parting from my life upon this very day
I shall give joy to Cypris who is destroying me.
Bitter has been the love which brings me my defeat, yet I, in death, shall prove at least an evil thing to another, so that he may learn not to be proud in my misfortune. He will have a share with me in this complaint of mine, and so learn modest ways.
[Phaedra goes into the palace.]
CHORUS. O I would be in aerial hiding-places, that a god might set me there in the flying flocks, myself a bird on the wing!
I would be borne on high to the waves of the sea on the Adriatic shore, to Eridanus' waters, where

725. Eridanus: The river Po. Phaethon, son of Helios, the sun, begged permission to drive his father's chariot across the sky. He crashed near the river Eridanus: his sisters, the Heliades (daughters of Helios), wept for him and were turned into poplar trees on the river bank; their tears turned to amber as they fell into the water. The legend reflects the fact that amber came from the Baltic into Greece via the area around the mouth of the Po.

into the dark-blue stream, pitying Phaethon, the luckless Heliades melt in their bright and amber-shining tears.

Or might I make my way to the apple gardens of the singing Hesperides, where the dark sea's lord ends the journeys of ships!
There he dwells in the terrible verge of heaven that Atlas holds with his arms, and ambrosial fountains flow from the resting places of Zeus, from his palace halls where life-giving holy earth still for the gods increases their happiness.

White-winged vessel from Crete that, through the salt of the wave and the beat of the sea bore my mistress away from her happy home with a prize of unfortunate love!
Surely ill-starred both ways, or at least from Crete, to famous Athens it winged its way,
and there on Munychian shores they tied the ends of their twisted ropes and set their feet on the land.

For that Aphrodite broke her heart with the terrible sickness of passion impure.
Now, since she is overladen with hard events,
she will tie to her bridal roof
the hanging noose of a rope, and fit it tight to the white of her neck, being filled with shame at the face of the hateful goddess.
First she will choose good fame and to rid her heart of the pains of love.

[A Servant is heard crying out inside the palace.]

SERVANT. Oh! Oh!
Come here and help, all you that are about the house!
Our mistress and the wife of Theseus is hanged.

CHORUS. Alas! Alas! It is all over, now no more

730. Hesperides: Nymphs who guarded the golden apples of eternal youth in a garden at the Western end of the Mediterranean, from which the sea-god Nereus forbade passage of ships into the Atlantic. (Greek ships did of course occasionally pass through the strait of Gibraltar, but did not venture far beyond.)

736. ambrosial: Divine, from ambrosia, the food of the gods.

737. resting places of Zeus: It was in this Western garden that the marriage of Zeus and Hera was consummated. The golden apple tree was a wedding gift from Earth.

744. Munychia: The old harbor of Athens.

the royal lady lives, hanged in the swinging noose.
SERVANT. Be quick! Let someone bring a knife with double edge with which we can unloose the knot about her neck.
CHORUS. What should we do, my friends? Do you think, we should go inside and loose our lady from the choking rope?
SEMI-CHORUS. Why should we? Are there not young men as servants there?
By being over-zealous we may risk our lives.
SERVANT. Set the limbs straight, and so lay out this wretched body.
Sad for my master is this housekeeping of hers.
CHORUS. Now she is dead, I hear it, this unhappy woman.
Already they lay out her body as a corpse.
[Enter Theseus with his attendants. Since he has been on some religious journey, he is wearing a garland on his head.] THESEUS. Do you know, women, what this uproar means indoors?
A noise of wailing from my servants reached my ears.
Strange that they do not think it right to unbar the gates and kindly greet me back from my religious way.
Surely no ill has happened to aged Pittheus?
He is already far advanced in life, yet still,
were he to leave us, it would be a grief to me.
CHORUS. Theseus, this is a thing that does not touch the old.
It is the death of youth that will bring pain to you.
THESEUS. Alas! Not that my children's life is stolen away?
CHORUS. They live. Their mother,—sad, most sad for you—is dead.
THESEUS. What do you say? My wife dead? How then did she die?
CHORUS. She fastened up a running noose to hang herself.
THESEUS. Had grief frozen her blood, or did some evil come to her?
CHORUS. So much I know, no more. I too have only just,
Theseus, approached your house in mourning for your loss.
THESEUS. Ah, why then have I set this crown of woven leaves upon my head, unlucky in my holy voyage?
Come, men, undo the bolts that bar the double doors!
Loosen the chains, that I may see this bitter sight of my dead wife who, by her death, has destroyed me.
[The doors are opened and the body of Phaedra is discovered.]
CHORUS. Oh, alas, poor lady, your pitiful fate!
You have suffered and done
a deed that can utterly ruin this house.

O reckless your doing, this violent death in the sinful event, overthrown,
O pitiful, by your own hand!
Which god, my poor lady, has taken the light from your life?
THESEUS. O I weep for my pain! O my city, this is the worst of the things I have suffered. O fate, how heavy have you fallen on me and my house,
a spreading stain unknown from some avenging power, or rather a murderer's blow taking the life from my life.
And an ocean of evil, poor wretch, is in front of my eyes so great that I can never more swim clear of it nor cross beyond the wave of this catastrophe.
Alas! my wife, what word can I find,
how can I name your burden of fate?
For like a bird you slipped out of the hand away from me and leaped a sheer leap to the house of death.
O how pitiful is this suffering! O, alas!
Out of the past somewhere I am reaping the fate sent by a god for the sins of someone who lived of old.
CHORUS. My lord, these evils have not come to you alone.
You have lost a worthy wife, and so have many more.
THESEUS. Below the earth, in the cloud that's below the earth
I wish to dwell in the dark, I wish to die, now separated from your dear companionship;
for, perishing, you have destroyed more than yourself.
O, what news can I hear? Whence, poor wife, did it come,
the fate of death to your heart?
Can someone tell me what was done? Or does my royal house uselessly shelter numbers of my serving men?
O, my heart aches for you!
O I pity the grief I have seen in my home.
It is not to be borne and not to be told. I am lost.
My home is empty and my children motherless.
You have left me, left me behind, dearest of women and best that the ray of the sun sees, or the star-faced moon in the night.
CHORUS. Alas, unhappy, the pain that fills the house!
Streaming with tears my eyes melt for your fate. And for long
I tremble at the woe that will come next.
THESEUS. Ha!
What can this mean, this letter that is hanging down from her dear hand? Has she some news she wants to tell?
Surely she has written down, poor thing, her will about the children and my love, and made me some request.

Poor creature, be at rest! No woman in the world will enter Theseus' bed or come within his house.
And now the prints of that gold signet ring she had,
she who no longer lives,—these seem to touch my heart.
Come, let me break the fastenings about the seals and see what thing it is this letter wants to say.

CHORUS. Alas! Alas! Here now a god brings on evil news in its turn. To me no fate of life deserves to be lived after this that is done.
For I speak of our master's home, alas, alas,
as being destroyed, as being a thing of the past.
O god, if such there be, do not betray this house but listen to my prayer; for, like a prophetess, from omens I can see the evil on its way.

THESEUS. O what a fearful wrong upon the top of wrong!
Unspeakable, insufferable, O alas!

CHORUS. What is it? Speak if I may share the news at all.

THESEUS. This letter cries and cries what cannot be forgot.
Where can I leave my weight of woe? O, I am lost indeed, utterly lost! What a speaking strain in her writing I saw! Ah me!

CHORUS. Alas, the word you speak leads on the way to pain.

THESEUS. I can keep it no longer behind the gates of my lips, this evil so deadly, so hard to be mended.
Oh, my city!
Hippolytus has dared to violate my bed
by force and shown contempt for Zeus's holy eye.
O now Poseidon, father, you who promised me the power to curse three times, with one of these do you destroy my son, and let him not survive this day.
Do this, if you indeed gave me the power to curse.

CHORUS. My lord, recall that curse, I beg you, back again.
Soon you will see that you were wrong. O listen to me!

THESEUS. It is impossible. And also I shall drive him from this land. By one or other fate he will be crushed. Either Poseidon, honoring my curse, will end his life and send him to the gates of Hell, or else, in exile from this land and wandering abroad, he will live through a hard and bitter life.

[Enter Hippolytus with his attendants.]

CHORUS. Look, here Hippolytus, your son, has come himself at the right time. Relax your cruel anger, lord Theseus, and make the best decision for your house.

HIPPOLYTUS. I heard your cry, my father, and have come to you with all speed. Yet I do not know what thing it is for which you grieve. This I would like to learn from you.

O, what is this? My father, now I see your wife lying dead there. This is a thing to wonder at.
She whom only just now I parted from, she who not long ago was looking on the light of day!
What happened to her? In what way was she destroyed?
Father, it is from you I wish to learn of this.
You do not speak? Yet silence does no good in pain;
for, when the heart desires to hear of everything,
it must in trouble also be inquisitive.
Then, father, surely it cannot be right to hide your misery from friends and even more than friends.

THESEUS. O how men uselessly and often go astray!
Why give instruction in the many countless arts,
use all devices, make inventions of all kinds, while one thing is not known and never studied yet—
to teach intelligence to those who have no sense?

HIPPOLYTUS. Some clever expert you must mean, who has the power to force wisdom those who are deprived of it.
But, father, this is not the time for sophistry.
I fear your sufferings must have deranged your speech.

THESEUS. Alas! there should have been for men some certain sign to mark their friends, some way of reading in their minds which one is true and which one not a friend at all;
everyone should have had two different tones of voice, one for his plain just dealings, one for all the rest.
Then words from false minds could have been compared and judged by what was true, and I should not have been deceived.

HIPPOLYTUS. No, surely none of my friends has spoken ill of me into your ear? And, innocent, am I diseased?
Sir, I am all amazed, and what amazes me is your strange words that seem to leave the path of sense.

THESEUS. O mind of man! To what lengths will it not proceed?
Where will a bound be set to reckless arrogance?
For if in every generation this swells up,
if the younger comes to an excess of shame beyond the former generation, then the gods will have to add another world to this one, which will hold the evil men who are by nature all depraved.
Look at this young man here, who, though he is my son, has brought pollution to my bed, and without doubt is proved the greatest villain by this woman's death.

And now, since any way your presence stains the air,
turn your head here, and let your father see your face.
So you are he who, as a man marked out, consorts with gods? You are the chaste one, all untouched by sin?
I certainly will not believe your boasting words or be a fool to credit gods with ignorance.
Now boast away, try to impose on people with your meatless meals, take Orpheus for your lord and join the revel, worshipping the smoke of countless books.
You are found out. And people of your sort I bid all men avoid. You are of those who seek their prey by pompous language while you scheme your shameful deeds.
She's dead. And do you think that this will make you safe?
No, you mean creature. This is where you are most caught.
For where will you find oaths, where words to be more strong for your acquittal than this argument of her?
You will pretend she hated you, and say bastards and true-born children are by nature enemies.
That would suggest she bargained badly with her life,
through hating you to throw away what she loved best.
Or will you say that folly does not go with men but is a part of woman's nature? I know well young men no more reliable than women are when Cypris brings confusion to their youthful hearts, although they have advantages by being men.
But why should I thus meet you in a strife of words,
When this dead body here is surest evidence?
Go! Leave this land, an exile, quick as you can do, and neither enter god-built Athens nor the bounds of any country over which my spear holds sway.
I have suffered from you, and if I am worsted by you, then Sinis of the Isthmus can deny the fact I ever killed him, say it was an empty boast, and Sciron's rocks that fall into the sea can say

932. impose on: Deceive.

933. Orpheus: The followers of Orpheus, a legendary musician, were members of an ascetic sect which practised vegetarianism, carried out frequent purificatory rituals, and appealed to the authority of sacred books (supposed to be written by Orpheus). Hippolytus is not of course an Orphic (as a hunter, for example, he is not likely to have been a vegetarian) but he is a sexual ascetic, or rather, his father now believes, a hypocrite who merely claimed to be one. Since most Greeks regarded Orphic cultists as imposters, Euripides has Theseus employ against his son the vocabulary of abuse normally reserved for the Orphic priests and devotees.

957. Sinis: A famous brigand killed by Theseus when he was a young hero. Sinis used to ask travelers to help him bend a pine tree top down to the ground: he would then let go, and the victim would be catapulted to his death.

959. Sciron: Another monster killed by the young Theseus. Sciron would make travelers on the cliff-road to Athens wash his feet: he would then kick them over the cliff-top to their deaths. The cliff, or promontory, is mentioned below in the messenger's speech (line 1145).

I am not heavy on the doers of bad deeds.
CHORUS. How can I say that anyone at all of men is happy? What was first is overturned again.
HIPPOLYTUS. Father, the rage and tension in your heart make me afraid. As for the charge, there are good arguments, yet, when examined, then it is not fair at all.
I have no skill at making speeches to a crowd and am wiser with a few who are my own equals.
This too is natural. Those who among the wise are fools show more intelligence in speaking to a crowd. Yet, all the same, since I am in this pass, I am bound to loose my tongue. And I shall start my speech from where you first attacked me surreptitiously, thinking to injure me and give me no reply.
You see this light and earth. In them there is not one, deny it as you may, who is more pure than I.
For, first, I know how to give reverence to the gods and to have friends who will not try to injure me, whose sense of shame prevents them asking what is bad or aiding their associates in wicked deeds.
I, father, do not mock at those with whom I live,
but, near or far, am still a friend in the same way.
One thing has never touched me,—what you think my guilt.
This body to this moment is unstained by love.
I do not know the action, except what I hear in talk or see in pictures, and I have no wish to know about such things. I have a virgin soul.
Perhaps my purity does not convince your mind.
Then you must show in what way I became corrupt.
Was it this woman's body was more beautiful than that of all the rest? Or did I hope to make your house my own by taking on an heiress' bed?
Could I be such a fool, so quite outside my mind?
Or do wise-minded men enjoy the sweets of power?
They do not. For, when power is absolute, it will always corrupt the minds of men who feel its charm.
For me, I'd choose to win in the Hellenic games first prize, and in my city be the second man, and so live happy always with my noble friends.
This means an active life with no danger attached,
and gives more pleasure than life of supreme power.
One thing in my defence I have not said. The rest
you know. But, if I had a witness like myself,

996. Hellenic games: The great athletic games, the most famous of which were those held at Olympia.

and if this woman saw the light when I was tried, then, looking at the evidence, you would have seen which was the guilty. Now, I swear to you by Zeus, guardian of oaths, by earth's floor, that I never touched your wife, nor could have wished to, nor conceived the thought.
And may I die inglorious, without a name, without a house or city, exiled and wandering, and, after death, let neither sea nor land receive my body, if in truth I am a wicked man.
And, if it was from terror that she threw away her life, I do not know. More than this I must not say.
She has controlled herself, though lacking in the power;
I have the power, but have made bitter use of it.

CHORUS. You have said enough to turn away the charge from you, swearing an oath, no small conviction, to the gods.

THESEUS. Is he some wizard or enchanter who believes that by his even temper he can get his way over my spirit, after having wronged his sire?

HIPPOLYTUS. This too in you, my father, fills me with surprise.
If I had been your father and you been my son,
I should have killed you, not punished you with exile,
if you had dared to lay your hands upon my wife.

THESEUS. That is just like you. No, you shall not die like this,
according to the law you frame to suit yourself.
For a quick death is easiest for wicked men.
But, wandering in exile from your father's land, abroad you will live through a hard and bitter life.
For this is the correct reward for wicked men.

HIPPOLYTUS. Alas! What will you do? Will you not wait for time to inform against me? Will you drive me from the land?

THESEUS. Yes, and beyond the sea and bounds that Atlas made, if I might do it, so I hate the sight of you.

HIPPOLYTUS. Will you not test the truth by oaths or guarantees or words of seers, but banish me without a trial?

THESEUS. This letter here, with no prophetic stamp on it, is evidence enough against you. As for birds that flit above my head, I take no stock of that.

HIPPOLYTUS. O gods, why then can I not loose my lips,
I who by you am ruined, you whom I revere?
I cannot. Even then I'd fail to move the minds
I should move, and would vainly break the oath I swore.

THESEUS. Oh, these grand airs of yours will drive me to my grave!
Will you not go, and leave at once your father's house?

1038. birds: Prophets interpreted the flight of birds to foretell the future.

HIPPOLYTUS. O where then can I turn, poor wretch? Which of my friends will take me to his house, exiled on such a charge?
THESEUS. One who enjoys receiving guests who will defile other men's wives and take their share in deeds of shame.
HIPPOLYTUS. Ah! This goes to my heart and brings me near to tears, that I should look so bad and you should think me so.
THESEUS. The time to groan and feel the future was the time you dared commit an outrage on your father's wife.
HIPPOLYTUS. O palace, how I wish that you would cry aloud for me, and witness whether I am really bad!
THESEUS. You wisely look for witnesses that have no voice.
[He points to the dead body.]
This fact that does not speak proclaims your wickedness.
HIPPOLYTUS. Alas!
I wish that I could stand in front of my own self and see my face. I would have wept for what I feel.
THESEUS. Yes, you are much more trained in worshipping yourself than in honoring your father with an honest mind.
HIPPOLYTUS. O my poor mother, bitter was your birth of me!
Let bastards never be among the friends I have!
THESEUS. Drag him out, slaves! Do you not hear? For long
I have been ordering this man to leave my land.
HIPPOLYTUS. The first of them who touches me will suffer for it.
Thrust me away yourself, if this is what you will.
THESEUS. That is what I shall do, if you will not obey.
No trace of pity for your exile touches me.
[Exit Theseus.]
HIPPOLYTUS. Then it is fixed, it seems. O, what a wretch I am!
I know the truth, but do not know how I can speak.
O child of Leto, dearest to me of the gods, who rested with me, hunted with me, must I leave great Athens as an exile? O farewell, you land and city of Erechtheus! O, Troezenian plains, what happiness you gave me as I grew up here!
Farewell! I see you for the last time as I speak.
Now come, my friends and young companions of this land, speak to me now and see me on my way abroad.
Never will you behold a man more pure than I,
even although my father does not think it so.
[Exit Hippolytus with his friends and attendants.]
CHORUS. Greatly indeed it will ease me of grief, when it comes to my mind, the thought of the gods.
Yet, though guessing in hope at their wisdom,

I am downcast again when I look at the fortunes and actions of mortals, for they alter, now here and now there;
man's life has no fixed station but is mutable always.

I wish when I make my prayers this fate from the gods might be mine—to have wealth for my lot and a heart unacquainted with grief.
And the thoughts in my mind should not be too subtle, nor counterfeit either;
but, easily willing to alter my ways as the morrow comes,
I should always be happy.

No more can I look with a mind undisturbed upon things unexpected, now the brightest of stars of Hellas, of Athens,—we saw it—is sent by the rage of his father to foreign countries abroad.
O sands of the shores of my city, O glades in the mountains where he slew wild beasts with his swift-footed hounds, and holy Dictynna was with him!

No more will you stand in the chariot drawn by Venetian fillies on the Limnean track, holding in with your foot the wild horses.
And the sleepless strain of the lyre will cease in your father's house.
Unwreathed in the green of the forest are the coverts of Leto's child.
In your exile the contest is ended of maidens who vied for your love.

O for your misfortune I shall pass in tears my ill-fated fate.
Useless, poor mother, was your birth of him.
My anger falls on the gods.
Alas, you band of the Graces, why have you sent him away from this house, from his native land,

1119. Graces: The Graces, goddesses whose province is art and beauty, should have protected Hippolytus, instead of letting him go.

he, quite without guilt in this evil?

[A Messenger, one of Hippolytus' attendants approaches.]

CHORUS. But now I see one of Hippolytus' men.
He comes up to the house in haste with a wild look.

MESSENGER. Women, which is the way for me to go to find Theseus, this country's king? If you know where he is, then tell me of it. Is he now inside the house?

CHORUS. I see him there coming himself outside the house.

MESSENGER. Theseus, I bring you tidings that will make you think, you and your citizens that live in Athens' town and in the boundaries of this Troezenian land.

THESEUS. What is it? Can it be that some fresh blow of fate has come upon these twin and neighboring towns of mine?

MESSENGER. Let me speak plain. Hippolytus no more exists.
He sees the light, but life is hanging by a thread.

THESEUS. Who killed him? Was it one who hated him because his wife, like mine, was violated and defiled?

MESSENGER. It was the chariot he drove that caused his death; that, and the curses from your mouth which you called down from the sea's governor, your father, on your son.

THESEUS. Gods! O Poseidon, so in very truth you were my father, since you heard the prayer I made to you!
How did he die? Tell me. What was the way in which the trap of Justice closed on him who shamed me so?

MESSENGER. We were beside the promontory where the waves beat on the shore, and combing down the horses' manes, weeping, because a messenger had come to say that now no longer must Hippolytus set foot within this land, condemned by you to sad exile.
And then he came himself with the same strain of tears to us upon the shore, and at his heels there came with him a countless band of friends of his own age.
For long he did not cease lamenting. Then he said:
"Why do I rave? My father's words must be obeyed.
Prepare my yoke of horses for the chariot, attendants. In this city I have no more right."
And then each one of us pressed onward with the work, and, quicker than it takes to tell, we had the mares standing all ready harnessed in our master's sight.
Then from the chariot rail he snatches up the reins, plants his feet firmly in the sockets on the floor,
and, stretching out his hands, he first addressed the gods:
"O Zeus, if I am sinful, let me cease to live, and let my father know that he is wronging me either when I am dead or while I see the light."
And straight away he took into his hands the goad and laid it on the horses, while we men ran on close to the chariot's reins in escort to our lord, on the straight road to Argos and Epidaurus.

Now, when we reached the open country just beyond the frontier of this land, there is a stretch of shore that lies already facing the Saronic gulf.
Here from the ground a roar like Zeus' thunderclap came sounding heavy round us, terrible to hear.
The horses raised their heads and pricked their ears right up into the air, and on us fell a lively fear, wondering what the sound could be. And when we looked along the foaming shores, we saw a monstrous wave towering up to the sky, so big it took away
the view of Sciron's promontory from my eyes.
It hid the Isthmus and Asclepius' rock.
Next, swelling up and surging onward, with, all round,
a mass of foam, and with the roaring of the sea,
it neared the shore where stood the four-horse chariot.
And, in the very surge and breaking of the flood,
the wave threw up a bull, a fierce and monstrous thing,
and with his bellowing the land was wholly filled, and fearful re-echoed. As for us who saw the sight, it seemed too much for eyes to look upon.
Immediately a dreadful panic seized the steeds.
My master, with his long experience of how horses behave, gripped tightly in his hands the reins and pulled upon them, like a boatman pulls his oar, knotting the straps behind him and leaning back on them.
But the horses, taking in their teeth the fiery bits, carried him on by force and took no care at all either of master hand or of the knotted reins or of the welded chariot, and, if he steered their course, as with a tiller, to the smoother bits of ground,
then in their faces there appeared, to turn them back,
the bull, and drove the four-horse team all mad with fear.
And, if they rushed with maddened minds upon the rocks, he silently drew near the chariot, and ran alongside, till, forcing the wheel against a stone, he overthrew the car and hurled the driver out.
Then all was huddled in a mass. The naves of wheels and axle pins together flew into the air.
Hippolytus himself, entangled in the reins, tied in inextricable bonds, was dragged along,
his dear head dashed upon the rocks, his flesh all torn,

1169. Argos . . . Epidaurus: Cities west of Troezen.

1181. Asclepius' rock: The acropolis of Epidaurus, where there was a famous shrine of the healing god Asclepius.

and crying out words terrible for us to hear.
"O stop, you horses that were fed within my stalls!
Do not wipe out my life! Alas, my father's curse!
Will no one come to me and save a noble man?"
And many of us longed to do so, but we were left far behind. Yet in the end he was set free somehow or other from the bonds of these fine reins, and fell down with a little life left in him still.
The horses and that awful monster of a bull had disappeared somewhere along the rocky ground.
My lord, I am a slave within your house, and yet this is a thing that I shall never be induced to think,—that your son really was a wicked man:
no, not if all the race of women hung themselves,
or if all Ida's pines were filled with written words,
I'd not believe it, since I know that he is good.

CHORUS. Now the disaster of fresh evil is fulfilled.
From fate and from necessity there's no escape.

THESEUS. In hatred for the man who met this fate I was pleased with your news. But now I feel a reverent awe both towards the gods and him, since he was born of me;
and by these evils I am neither pleased nor grieved.

MESSENGER. What are we now to do to please you? Shall we bring this suffering creature here, or what are we to do?
Think carefully. And my advice to you would be not to be cruel to your own son in his pain.

THESEUS. Bring him to me, that I may see before my eyes him who denied that he had made my bed his own, that I by words and acts of gods may prove him wrong.

CHORUS. The unbending minds of gods and men, Cypris, are prisoners to you,
and with you goes on wheeling swiftest wing
the gleaming feathered god.
He flies above the earth, above
the salt resounding sea.
Love brings enchantment when in shine of gold and winged he comes upon the maddened heart.
He charms the tribes of mountain beasts, beasts of the sea and all that earth supplies, all creatures brightened by the seeing sun;
men too, and, Cypris, you alone rule over all with sovereign power.

[The goddess Artemis appears.]

1225. Ida's pines: Ida is the great mountain range near Troy. Pine-wood tablets, covered with wax, were used as writing materials.

1243. feathered god: Eros (Love), whose arrows created love in humans and gods.

ARTEMIS. You I address and bid you to listen, great son of Aigeus!
The daughter of Leto, I, Artemis, speak to you.
Why are you foolishly pleased with this, Theseus, you who have wickedly murdered your son, led to believe by your wife's false words uncertain things? You have gained certain ruin.
How you would wish in the depths of the earth to hide your body in shame, or, changing your life to the air, be a bird and keep far away from this pain!
Since among good men there is certainly no lot in life for you.
Hear, Theseus, now the state of ill in which you are.
Be sure I do not gain from it and I shall cause you pain.
But for this reason I have come, to make you see how your son's heart was pure, that he may die with fame, and make you see the savage passion of your wife or, in a way, the nobleness; for she was pricked by sting of that most hateful of the gods to us who love a virgin life, and she desired your son.
She tried by resolution to beat Cypris down,
and then was lost, unwilling, by her nurse's craft,
who under oath informed your son of her disease.
And he, just as was right, neither was influenced by what she said, nor, when by you he was maligned, would break his pledged word, since his nature fears the gods.
But she, your wife, in fear lest she might be found out, Wrote a false story down and by this trick of hers destroyed your son, yet all the same persuaded you.

THESEUS. Alas!

ARTEMIS. Does the tale, Theseus, bite your heart? Yet quietly wait and hear what follows, that you may lament still more.
You know you have three certain curses from your sire,
and one of them, you wicked man, you have misused against your son. It might have been against a foe.
Your father, the sea's king, with honorable mind, gave what he had to give since he had promised it.
But both to him and me your wickedness is clear.
You did not wait for guarantees or words of seers, made no examination, nor by course of time allowed enquiry, but, more quickly than you ought, you laid the curse upon your son and took his life.

THESEUS. O lady, I am lost.

ARTEMIS. Your deed is dreadful. Yet

1254. son of Aigeus: Theseus.

Still there may be forgiveness here even for you.
It was the will of Cypris that these things should be, to sate her rage. There is this rule among the gods,— that none of us will check another god's desire when it is shown. Instead we always stand aside.
Be sure that if I did not fear the power of Zeus
I never would have sunk to such a depth of shame as to allow the death of him who is to me dearest of men. As for your sin, first the fact of ignorance frees you from guilt of evil thought.
And then your wife, who now is dead, poured out her words of evidence so much that they persuaded you.
And on you chiefly now has broken all this ill, but I too feel the pain. The gods do not rejoice when good men die. As for the wicked, we destroy them, and their houses and the children that they have.

[Hippolytus is carried in by his attendants.]

CHORUS. See! Here the wretched sufferer comes.
His youthful flesh and golden hair have lost their beauty. O what pain, what double grief has fallen on these halls and swooped on them from heaven!

HIPPOLYTUS. Alas! Alas!
I in my misery all disfigured by unjust curse of an unjust father,
I am destroyed. Alas! Alas!
Through my head goes a darting anguish, spasms leap within my brain.
Stop! Let me rest my weary body.
Hateful my clariot, hateful my horses fed from my hand!
You have slain and destroyed me.
O, my servants, gently, I beg you touch my bruised flesh with your hands!
Who is it standing there at my right side?
Lift me up carefully, raise me together, me the unfortunate, me the cursed one by fault of my father. O Zeus, do you see it?
I who was holy, I who was reverent,
I who surpassed all men in my purity,
am going to certain death under ground, losing my life. O useless the efforts
I made out of kindness in service to men!
Oh! Oh!
It is the pain, the pain coming over me.

Leave me to suffer!
O let Death, the Healer, come for me!
O you are killing me, doubling my pain.
How I long for a two-edged spear blade to cut through my body and bring my life to its rest!
O sad the curse my father laid upon me.
It is the sin of bloody ancestors, of forefathers in ancient times, that comes down from the past on me and will not stay.
Yet why on me all guiltless of these sins?
Alas, what should I say?
How can I free my life from this insufferable pain?
O let the black of death and night of fate lull me, unhappy, to my sleep!

ARTEMIS. Poor youth, how you are yoked together with your pain!
It was the goodness of your heart destroyed your life.

HIPPOLYTUS. Ha!
O heavenly breath of fragrance! Even in my pains
I feel your presence, and my body grows more light.
Is Artemis, the goddess, present in this place?

ARTEMIS. Poor youth, she is, and loves you more than all the gods.

HIPPOLYTUS. You see me, lady, and my state, my wretched state?

ARTEMIS. I see you, but my eyes are not allowed to weep.

HIPPOLYTUS. No more the huntsman for you and the serving man . . .

ARTEMIS. No more. Yet in your dying you are dear to me.

HIPPOLYTUS. No more to guard your statues or to drive your steeds

ARTEMIS. No. It was cruel Cypris wished these things to be.

HIPPOLYTUS. Alas! I recognize the god who took my life.

ARTEMIS. Jealous of honor, angry at your living pure.

HIPPOLYTUS. Alone, I see, she has destroyed all three of us.

ARTEMIS. Yes. You, your father, and his wife, the third of you.

HIPPOLYTUS. Then I must weep too for my father's sufferings.

ARTEMIS. It was the counsel of a god deceived his mind.

HIPPOLYTUS. Unhappy father in this suffering of yours!

THESEUS. My son. I am destroyed and have no joy in life.

HIPPOLYTUS. More than myself, I grieve for you and your mistake.

THESEUS. I wish that I, my child, could die instead of you.

HIPPOLYTUS. Bitter the gifts your sire, Poseidon, gave to you.

THESEUS. I wish that it had never mounted to my lips.

HIPPOLYTUS. Why so? You would have killed me, angry as you were.

THESEUS. Yes, for the gods had cheated me of my good sense.
HIPPOLYTUS. Alas!
I wish the race of men had power to curse the gods.
ARTEMIS. Be satisfied. For no, not in the dark of earth shall I allow, at Cypris' pleasure, rage to light upon your body unavenged; and this because of your godfearingness and of your noble mind.
For I shall take from her with my own hand the one of mortals whom above all others she loves best,
and so with my unerring bow become avenged.
And now on you, unhappy one, for all your pains
I shall bestow the greatest honors in this land of Troezen. For unmarried girls, before they wed, shall cut their hair to do you honor. You will have for ages long the harvest of their mourning tears.
And always among maidens there will be desire to make their songs of you. It will not pass away or nameless sink to silence, Phaedra's love for you.
And you, O child of aged Aigeus, I bid take your son up in your arms and give him your embrace.
It was against your will you slew him, and it is natural for men to err when gods point out the way.
And you, Hippolytus, I counsel not to hate your father, for you know the fate by which you died.
Farewell! For I am not allowed to see the dead, or stain my eye with the last gasps of dying men,
and you I see already near that evil thing.
HIPPOLYTUS. O farewell, blessed maiden, go upon your way.
Easily now you leave our long companionship.
I end my quarrel with my father, as you bid,
and as in old times also I obeyed your words.
[Artemis goes out.]
Ah! Ah! Already darkness settles on my eyes.
Take hold of me, my father. Keep my body straight.
THESEUS. My son, what are you doing to me in my pain?
HIPPOLYTUS. Now I am dying. Now I see the gates of Hell.
THESEUS. O will you leave me here with heart unpurified?
HIPPOLYTUS. I will not, since I free you from the stain of blood.
THESEUS. What? You will set me free from guilt of shedding blood?
HIPPOLYTUS. I call the archer Artemis to witness it.
THESEUS. Dear son, how noble to your father's eyes you are.
HIPPOLYTUS. Pray that your true-born children may be like to me.

1392–1393. Artemis must be referring to her part in the death of Adonis, Aphrodite's human love.

1397–1398. unmarried girls: This was, in fact, a religious ceremony in Athens. As in the end of the Medea, the tragedy celebrates the mythical basis of a cult.

THESEUS. I weep for your good heart, your true and upright mind.
HIPPOLYTUS. Farewell to you too, father! O, a long farewell!
THESEUS. O my son, do not leave me! Summon up your strength.
HIPPOLYTUS. My strength is done and finished, father, and I die.
Now quickly with my garments hide away my face.
[Hippolytus dies.]
THESEUS. O famous bounds of Athens and of Pallas' land,
How great a man is this that you will lose! Alas!
How often, Cypris, shall I think of your ill deeds!
CHORUS. This is a grief that is common to all of us.
and came unexpected.
Many the tears that now will be falling, since for great men mourning voices still last longer.

ARISTOPHANES

(448?–380? B.C.)

Lysistrata*

Characters in the Play†

LYSISTRATA, CALONICE, MYRRHINE } Athenian women
LAMPITO, a Spartan woman
LEADER of the Chorus of Old Men
CHORUS of Old Men
LEADER of the Chorus of Old Women
CHORUS of Old Women
ATHENIAN MAGISTRATE
THREE ATHENIAN WOMEN
CINESIAS, an Athenian, husband of Myrrhine
SPARTAN HERALD
SPARTAN AMBASSADORS ATHENIAN AMBASSADORS
TWO ATHENIAN CITIZENS
CHORUS of Athenians
CHORUS of Spartans

* From Greek Literature in Translation by W. J. Oates and C. T. Murphy. Translation by Charles T. Murphy. Longmans, Green & Co., Inc., 1944. Used by permission of David McKay Company, Inc.

† As is usual in ancient comedy, the leading characters have significant names. Lysistrata is "She who disbands the armies"; Myrrhine's name is chosen to suggest myrton, a Greek word meaning pudenda muliebria; Lampito is a celebrated Spartan name; Cinesias, although a real name in Athens, is chosen to suggest a Greek verb kinein, to move, then to make love, to have intercourse, and the name of his deme, Paionidai, suggests the verb paiein, which has about the same significance.

SCENE: In Athens, beneath the Acropolis. In the center of the stage is the Propylaea, or gate-way to the Acropolis; to one side is a small grotto, sacred to Pan. The Orchestra represents a slope leading up to the gate-way.

It is early in the morning. LYSISTRATA is pacing impatiently up and down.

LYSISTRATA. If they'd been summoned to worship the God of Wine, or Pan, or to visit the Queen of Love, why, you couldn't have pushed your way through the streets for all the timbrels.[1] But now there's not a single woman here—except my neighbour; here she comes.

[Enter CALONICE.]

Good day to you, Calonice.

CALONICE. And to you, Lysistrata. [Noticing LYSISTRATA'S impatient air] But what ails you? Don't scowl, my dear; it's not becoming to you to knit your brows like that.

LYSISTRATA. [Sadly] Ah, Calonice, my heart aches; I'm so annoyed at us women. For among men we have a reputation for sly trickery—

CALONICE. And rightly too, on my word!

LYSISTRATA. —but when they were told to meet here to consider a matter of no small importance, they lie abed and don't come.

CALONICE. Oh, they'll come all right, my dear. It's not easy for a woman to get out, you know. One is working on her husband, another is getting up the maid, another has to put the baby to bed, or wash and feed it.

LYSISTRATA. But after all, there are other matters more important than all that.

CALONICE. My dear Lysistrata, just what is this matter you've summoned us women to consider? What's up? Something big?

LYSISTRATA. Very big.

CALONICE. [Interested] Is it stout, too?

LYSISTRATA. [Smiling] Yes indeed—both big and stout.

CALONICE. What? And the women still haven't come?

LYSISTRATA. It's not what you suppose; they'd have come soon enough for that. But I've worked up something, and for many a sleepless night I've turned it this way and that.

CALONICE. [In mock disappointment] Oh, I guess it's pretty fine and slender, if you've turned it this way and that.

LYSISTRATA. So fine that the safety of the whole of Greece lies in us women.

CALONICE. In us women? It depends on a very slender reed then.

LYSISTRATA. Our country's fortunes are in our hands; and whether the Spartans shall perish—

CALONICE. Good! Let them perish, by all means.

1. timbrels: These instruments were used in most orgiastic cults, especially in the worship of Dionysus, the "God of Wine."

LYSISTRATA. —and the Boeotians shall be completely annihilated.

CALONICE. Not completely! Please spare the eels.[2]

LYSISTRATA. As for Athens, I won't use any such unpleasant words. But you understand what I mean. But if the women will meet here—the Spartans, the Boeotians, and we Athenians—then all together we will save Greece.

CALONICE. But what could women do that's clever or distinguished? We just sit around all dolled up in silk robes, looking pretty in our sheer gowns and evening slippers.

LYSISTRATA. These are just the things I hope will save us: these silk robes, perfumes, evening slippers, rouge, and our chiffon blouses.

CALONICE. How so?

LYSISTRATA. So never a man alive will lift a spear against the foe—

CALONICE. I'll get a silk gown at once.

LYSISTRATA. —or take up his shield—

CALONICE. I'll put on my sheerest gown!

LYSISTRATA. —or sword.

CALONICE. I'll buy a pair of evening slippers.

LYSISTRATA. Well then, shouldn't the women have come?

CALONICE. Come? Why, they should have flown here.

LYSISTRATA. Well, my dear, just watch: they'll act in true Athenian fashion—everything too late! And now there's not a woman here from the shore or from Salamis.[3]

CALONICE. They're coming. I'm sure; at daybreak they were laying —to their oars to cross the straits.

LYSISTRATA. And those I expected would be the first to come—the women of Acharnae[4]—they haven't arrived.

CALONICE. Yet the wife of Theagenes[5] means to come: she consulted Hecate about it. [Seeing a group of women approaching] But look! Here come a few. And there are some more over here. Hurrah! Where do they come from?

LYSISTRATA. From Anagyra.[6]

CALONICE. Yes indeed! We've raised up quite a stink from Anagyra anyway.

[Enter MYRRHINE in haste, followed by several other women.]

MYRRHINE. [Breathlessly] Have we come in time, Lysistrata? What do you say? Why so quiet?

LYSISTRATA. I can't say much for you, Myrrhine, coming at this hour on such important business.

2. Eels were a favorite Athenian delicacy from the Boeotian lakes; eels were then very rare in Athens because of the war.

3. just across the bay from Piraeus, the port of Athens.

4. a large village a few miles northwest of Athens.

5. was a very superstitious Athenian (perhaps he was sitting in the audience) who never went out without consulting the shrine of Hecate at his doorstep.

6. a district south of Athens. It was also the name of a bad-smelling shrub and the phrase "to stir up the anagyra" was proverbially used to describe people who brought trouble on themselves by interfering.

MYRRHINE. Why, I had trouble finding my girdle in the dark. But if it's so important, we're here now; tell us.

LYSISTRATA. No. Let's wait a little for the women from Boeotia and the Peloponnesus.

MYRRHINE. That's a much better suggestion. Look! Here comes Lampito now.

[Enter LAMPITO with two other women.]

LYSISTRATA. Greetings, my dear Spartan friend. How pretty you look, my dear. What a smooth complexion and well-developed figure! You could throttle an ox.

LAMPITO. Faith, yes, I think I could. I take exercises and kick my heels against my bum. [She demonstrates with a few steps of the Spartan "bottom-kicking" dance.]

LYSISTRATA. And what splendid breasts you have.

LAMPITO. La! You handle me like a prize steer.

LYSISTRATA. And who is this young lady with you?

LAMPITO. Faith, she's an Ambassadress from Boeotia.

LYSISTRATA. Oh yes, a Boeotian, and blooming like a garden too.

CALONICE. [Lifting up her skirt] My word! How neatly her garden's weeded!

LYSISTRATA. And who is the other girl?

LAMPITO. Oh, she's a Corinthian swell.

MYRRHINE. [After a rapid examination] Yes indeed. She swells very nicely [Pointing] here and here.

LAMPITO. Who has gathered together this company of women?

LYSISTRATA. I have.

LAMPITO. Speak up, then. What do you want?

MYRRHINE. Yes, my dear, tell us what this important matter is.

LYSISTRATA. Very well, I'll tell you. But before I speak, let me ask you a little question.

MYRRHINE. Anything you like.

LYSISTRATA. [Earnestly] Tell me: don't you yearn for the fathers of your children, who are away at the wars? I know you all have husbands abroad.

CALONICE. Why, yes; mercy me! my husband's been away for five months in Thrace keeping guard on—Eucrates.[7]

MYRRHINE. And mine for seven whole months in Pylus.[8]

LAMPITO. And mine, as soon as ever he returns from the fray, readjusts his shield and flies out of the house again.

LYSISTRATA. And as for lovers, there's not even a ghost of one left. Since the Milesians revolted from us,[9] I've not even seen an eight-inch dingus to be a leather consolation for us widows. Are you willing, if I can find a way, to help me end the war?

7. Eucrates: We have no details on this campaign in Thrace.

8. Pylus: a point on the west coast of the Peloponnese held by an Athenian garrison.

9. The city of Miletus, an Athenian ally ever since the Persian war, had deserted the Athenian cause in the previous year. The objects Lysistrata speaks of were supposed to be manufactured there.

MYRRHINE. Goodness, yes! I'd do it, even if I had to pawn my dress and—get drunk on the spot!

CALONICE. And I, even if I had to let myself be split in two like a flounder.

LAMPITO. I'd climb up Mt. Taygetus[10] if I could catch a glimpse of peace.

LYSISTRATA. I'll tell you, then, in plain and simple words. My friends, if we are going to force our men to make peace, we must do without—

MYRRHINE. Without what? Tell us.

LYSISTRATA. Will you do it?

MYRRHINE. We'll do it, if it kills us.

LYSISTRATA. Well, then we must do without sex altogether. [General consternation] Why do you turn away? Where go you? Why turn so pale? Why those tears? Will you do it or not? What means this hesitation?

MYRRHINE. I won't do it! Let the war go on.

CALONICE. Nor I! Let the war go on.

LYSISTRATA. So, my little flounder? Didn't you say just now you'd split yourself in half?

CALONICE. Anything else you like. I'm willing, even if I have to walk through fire. Anything rather than sex. There's nothing like it, my dear.

LYSISTRATA. [To MYRRHINE] What about you?

MYRRHINE. [Sullenly] I'm willing to walk through fire, too.

LYSISTRATA. Oh vile and cursed breed! No wonder they make tragedies about us: we're naught but "love-affairs and bassinets."[11] But you, my dear Spartan friend, if you alone are with me, our enterprise might yet succeed. Will you vote with me?

LAMPITO. 'Tis cruel hard, by my faith, for a woman to sleep alone without her nooky; but for all that, we certainly do need peace.

LYSISTRATA. O my dearest friend! You're the only real woman here.

CALONICE. [Wavering] Well, if we do refrain from—[Shuddering] what you say (God forbid!), would that bring peace?

LYSISTRATA. My goodness, yes! If we sit at home all rouged and powdered, dressed in our sheerest gowns, and neatly depilated, our men will get excited and want to take us; but if you don't come to them and keep away, they'll soon make a truce.

LAMPITO. Aye; Menelaus caught sight of Helen's naked breast and dropped his sword, they say.

CALONICE. What if the men give us up?

LYSISTRATA. "Flay a skinned dog,"[12] as Pherecrates says.

10. The mountain which towers over Sparta.

11. In the Tyro of Sophocles, which had recently been produced, the heroine, who had borne twin sons to the god Poseidon, left them exposed in a bassinet.

12. a proverb for useless activity Pherecrates: a fifth-century comic poet.

CALONICE. Rubbish! These make-shifts are no good. But suppose they grab us and drag us into the bedroom?

LYSISTRATA. Hold on to the door.

CALONICE. And if they beat us?

LYSISTRATA. Give in with a bad grace. There's no pleasure in it for them when they have to use violence. And you must torment them in every possible way. They'll give up soon enough; a man gets no joy if he doesn't get along with his wife.

MYRRHINE. If this is your opinion, we agree.

LAMPITO. As for our own men, we can persuade them to make a just and fair peace; but what about the Athenian rabble? Who will persuade them not to start any more monkey-shines?

LYSISTRATA. Don't worry. We guarantee to convince them.

LAMPITO. Not while their ships are rigged so well and they have that mighty treasure in the temple of Athene.

LYSISTRATA. We've taken good care for that too: we shall seize the Acropolis today. The older women have orders to do this, and while we are making our arrangements, they are to pretend to make a sacrifice and occupy the Acropolis.

LAMPITO. All will be well then. That's a very fine idea.

LYSISTRATA. Let's ratify this, Lampito, with the most solemn oath.

LAMPITO. Tell us what oath we shall swear.

LYSISTRATA. Well said. Where's our Policewoman? [To a Scythian slave] What are you gaping at? Set a shield upside-down here in front of me, and give me the sacred meats.

CALONICE. Lysistrata, what sort of an oath are we to take?

LYSISTRATA. What oath? I'm going to slaughter a sheep over the shield, as they do in Aeschylus.[13]

CALONICE. Don't, Lysistrata! No oaths about peace over a shield.

LYSISTRATA. What shall the oath be, then?

CALONICE. How about getting a white horse somewhere and cutting out its entrails for the sacrifice?

LYSISTRATA. White horse indeed!

CALONICE. Well then, how shall we swear?

MYRRHINE. I'll tell you: let's place a large black bowl upside-down and then slaughter—a flask of Thasian wine.[14] And then let's swear—not to pour in a single drop of water.

LAMPITO. Lord! How I like that oath!

LYSISTRATA. Someone bring out a bowl and a flask.

[A slave brings the utensils for the sacrifice.]

CALONICE. Look, my friends! What a big jar! Here's a cup that

13. In Aeschylus' Seven against Thebes, the enemy champions are described as swearing loyalty to each other and slaughtering a bull so that the blood flowed into the hollow of a shield.

14. strong wine from the island of Thasos in the northern Aegean. In Athens the wife was in charge of the household supplies and it is a frequent Aristophanic joke to present her as addicted to the bottle.

'twould give me joy to handle. [She picks up the bowl.]

LYSISTRATA. Set it down and put your hands on our victim. [As CALONICE places her hands on the flask] O Lady of Persuasion and dear Loving Cup, graciously vouchsafe to receive this sacrifice from us women. [She pours the wine into the bowl.]

CALONICE. The blood has a good colour and spurts out nicely.

LAMPITO. Faith, it has a pleasant smell, too.

MYRRHINE. Oh, let me be the first to swear, ladies![15]

CALONICE. No, by our Lady! Not unless you're allotted the first turn.

LYSISTRATA. Place all your hands on the cup, and one of you repeat on behalf of all what I say. Then all will swear and ratify the oath. I will suffer no man, be he husband or lover,

CALONICE. I will suffer no man, be he husband or lover,

LYSISTRATA. To approach me all hot and horny. [As CALONICE hesitates] Say it!

CALONICE. [Slowly and painfully] To approach me all hot and horny. O Lysistrata, I feel so weak in the knees!

LYSISTRATA. I will remain at home unmated,

CALONICE. I will remain at home unmated,

LYSISTRATA. Wearing my sheerest gown and carefully adorned,

CALONICE. Wearing my sheerest gown and carefully adorned,

LYSISTRATA. That my husband may burn with desire for me.

CALONICE. That my husband may burn with desire for me.

LYSISTRATA. And if he takes me by force against my will,

CALONICE. And if he takes me by force against my will,

LYSISTRATA. I shall do it badly and keep from moving.

CALONICE. I shall do it badly and keep from moving.

LYSISTRATA. I will not stretch my slippers toward the ceiling,

CALONICE. I will not stretch my slippers toward the ceiling,

LYSISTRATA. Nor will I take the posture of the lioness on the knife-handle.

CALONICE. Nor will I take the posture of the lioness on the knife-handle.

LYSISTRATA. If I keep this oath, may I be permitted to drink from this cup,

CALONICE. If I keep this oath, may I be permitted to drink from this cup,

LYSISTRATA. But if I break it, may the cup be filled with water.

CALONICE. But if I break it, may the cup be filled with water.

LYSISTRATA. Do you all swear to this?

ALL. I do, so help me!

LYSISTRATA. Come then, I'll just consummate this offering. [She takes a long drink from the cup.]

CALONICE. [Snatching the cup away] Shares, my dear! Let's drink to our continued friendship.

15. first to swear: and so the first to drink.

[A shout is heard from off-stage.]

LAMPITO. What's that shouting?

LYSISTRATA. That's what I was telling you: the women have just seized the Acropolis. Now, Lampito, go home and arrange matters in Sparta; and leave these two ladies here as hostages. We'll enter the Acropolis to join our friends and help them lock the gates.

CALONICE. Don't you suppose the men will come to attack us?

LYSISTRATA. Don't worry about them. Neither threats nor fire will suffice to open the gates, except on the terms we've stated.

CALONICE. I should say not! Else we'd belie our reputation as unmanageable pests.

[LAMPITO leaves the stage. The other women retire and enter the Acropolis through the Propylaea.]

[Enter the CHORUS OF OLD MEN, carrying fire-pots and a load of heavy sticks.]

LEADER OF MEN. Onward, Draces, step by step, though your shoulder's aching.
Cursèd logs of olive-wood, what a load you're making!

FIRST SEMI-CHORUS OF OLD MEN. [Singing]
Aye, many surprises await a man who lives to a ripe old age;
For who could suppose, Strymodorus my lad, that the women we've nourished (alas!),
Who sat at home to vex our days,
Would seize the holy image here
And occupy this sacred shrine,
With bolts and bars, with fell design,
To lock the Propylaea?

LEADER OF MEN. Come with speed, Philourgus, come! to the temple hast'ning.
There we'll heap these logs about in a circle round them,
And whoever has conspired, raising this rebellion,
Shall be roasted, scorched, and burnt, all without exception,
Doomed by one unanimous vote—but first the wife of Lycon.[16]

SECOND SEMI-CHORUS. [Singing]
No, no! by Demeter, while I'm alive, no woman shall mock at me.
Not even the Spartan Cleomenes,[17] our citadel first to seize,
Got off unscathed; for all his pride
And haughty Spartan arrogance,
He left his arms and sneaked away,

16. The ancient commentaries tell us that she was called Rhodia and was not too careful about her reputation.

17. Cleomenes: In 508 B.C., the Athenians expelled the tyrant Hippias and were about to install a democratic regime under the leadership of Cleisthenes when the oligarchic party appealed to Sparta for help. The Spartan king Cleomenes invaded Attica, seized the city, and began a purge of the democrats. A popular uprising, however, forced him into the Acropolis, where he was besieged; after two days he was allowed to withdraw with his troops and Cleisthenes began the reforms which established the democracy.

Stripped to his shirt, unkempt, unshav'd,
With six years' filth still on him.

LEADER OF MEN. I besieged that hero bold, sleeping at my station, Marshalled at these holy gates sixteen deep against him.
Shall I not these cursèd pests punish for their daring,
Burning these Euripides-and-God-detested women?[18]
Aye! or else may Marathon overturn my trophy.[19]

FIRST SEMI-CHORUS. [Singing]

There remains of my road
Just this brow of the hill;
There I speed on my way.
Drag the logs up the hill, though we've got no ass to help.
(God! my shoulder's bruised and sore!)
Onward still must we go Blow the fire! Don't let it go out
Now we're near the end of our road.

ALL. [Blowing on the fire-pots]
Whew! Whew! Drat the smoke!

SECOND SEMI-CHORUS. [Singing]

Lord, what smoke rushing forth
From the pot, like a dog
Running mad, bites my eyes!
This must be Lemnos-fire.[20] What a sharp and stinging smoke!
Rushing onward to the shrine Aid the gods. Once for all Show your mettle, Laches my boy!
To the rescue hastening all!

ALL. [Blowing on the fire-pots] Whew! Whew! Drat the smoke!

[The chorus has now reached the edge of the Orchestra nearest the stage, in front of the Propylaea. They begin laying their logs and fire-pots on the ground.]

LEADER OF MEN. Thank heaven, this fire is still alive. Now let's first put down these logs here and place our torches in the pots to catch; then let's make a rush for the gates with a battering-ram. If the women don't unbar the gate at our summons, we'll have to smoke them out.

Let me put down my load. Ouch! That hurts! [To the audience] Would any of the generals in Samos[21] like to lend a hand with this log? [Throwing down a log] Well, that won't break

18. Euripides is always presented in Aristophanic comedy as a misogynist and hence hated by women in return. There does not seem to be any foundation for Aristophanes' view, though Euripides' realistic (if sympathetic) presentation of women may possibly have enraged Athenian society ladies.

19. If the chorus really fought at Marathon, they are very old men. The trophy was on a high mound which covered the Athenian dead and is still in place.

20. Lemnos: a volcanic island in the Aegean.

21. at this time, the headquarters of the Athenian fleet.

my back any more, at any rate. [Turning to his fire-pot] Your job, my little pot, is to keep those coals alive and furnish me shortly with a red-hot torch.

O mistress Victory, be my ally and grant me to rout these audacious women in the Acropolis.

[While the men are busy with their logs and fires, the CHORUS OF OLD WOMEN enters, carrying pitchers of water.]

LEADER OF WOMEN. What's this I see? Smoke and flames? Is that a fire ablazing?

Let's rush upon them. Hurry up! They'll find us women ready.

FIRST SEMI-CHORUS OF OLD WOMEN. [Singing]

With wingèd foot onward I fly,
Ere the flames consume Neodice;
Lest Critylla be overwhelmed
By a lawless, accurst herd of old men.
I shudder with fear. Am I too late to aid them?
At break of the day filled we our jars with water
Fresh from the spring, pushing our way straight through the crowds. Oh, what a din!
Mid crockery crashing, jostled by slave-girls,
Sped we to save them, aiding our neighbours,
Bearing this water to put out the flames.

SECOND SEMI-CHORUS OF OLD WOMEN. [Singing]

Such news I've heard: doddering fools
Come with logs, like furnace-attendants,
Loaded down with three hundred pounds,
Breathing many a vain, blustering threat,
That all these abhorred sluts will be burnt to charcoal.
O goddess, I pray never may they be kindled;
Grant them to save Greece and our men; madness and war help them to end.
With this as our purpose, golden-plumed Maiden,
Guardian of Athens, seized we thy precinct.
Be my ally, Warrior-maiden,
'Gainst these old men, bearing water with me.

[The women have now reached their position in the Orchestra, and their LEADER advances toward the LEADER OF THE MEN.]

LEADER OF WOMEN. Hold on there! What's this, you utter scoundrels? No decent, God-fearing citizens would act like this.

LEADER OF MEN. Oho! Here's something unexpected: a swarm of women have come out to attack us.

LEADER OF WOMEN. What, do we frighten you? Surely you don't think we're too many for you. And yet there are ten thousand times more of us whom you haven't even seen.

LEADER OF MEN. What say, Phaedria?[22] Shall we let these women wag their tongues? Shan't we take our sticks and break them over their backs?

LEADER OF WOMEN. Let's set our pitchers on the ground; then if anyone lays a hand on us, they won't get in our way.

LEADER OF MEN. By God! If someone gave them two or three smacks on the jaw, like Bupalus,[23] they wouldn't talk so much!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Go on, hit me, somebody! Here's my jaw! But no other bitch will bite a piece out of you before me.

LEADER OF MEN. Silence! or I'll knock out your—senility!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Just lay one finger on Stratyllis, I dare you!

LEADER OF MEN. Suppose I dust you off with this fist? What will you do?

LEADER OF WOMEN. I'll tear the living guts out of you with my teeth.

LEADER OF MEN. No poet is more clever than Euripides: "There is no beast so shameless as a woman."

LEADER OF WOMEN. Let's pick up our jars of water, Rhodippe.

LEADER OF MEN. Why have you come here with water, you detestable slut?

LEADER OF WOMEN. And why have you come with fire, you funeral vault? To cremate yourself?

LEADER OF MEN. To light a fire and singe your friends.

LEADER OF WOMEN. And I've brought water to put out your fire.

LEADER OF MEN. What? You'll put out my fire?

LEADER OF WOMEN. Just try and see!

LEADER OF MEN. I wonder: shall I scorch you with this torch of mine?

LEADER OF WOMEN. If you've got any soap, I'll give you a bath.

LEADER OF MEN. Give me a bath, you stinking hag?

LEADER OF WOMEN. Yes—a bridal bath!

LEADER OF MEN. Just listen to her! What crust!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Well, I'm a free citizen.

LEADER OF MEN. I'll put an end to your bawling. [The men pick up their torches.]

LEADER OF WOMEN. You'll never do jury-duty[24] again. [The women pick up their pitchers.]

LEADER OF MEN. Singe her hair for her!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Do your duty, water! [The women empty their pitchers on the men.]

LEADER OF MEN. Ow! Ow! For heaven's sake!

22. a man's name; the remark is addressed to another member of the male chorus.

23. a sixth-century sculptor, the target of the poet Hipponax's satirical attacks.

24. paid attendance at the courts, the usual source of income for older Athenians.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Is it too hot?

LEADER OF MEN. What do you mean "hot"? Stop! What are you doing?

LEADER OF WOMEN. I'm watering you, so you'll be fresh and green.

LEADER OF MEN. But I'm all withered up with shaking.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Well, you've got a fire; why don't you dry yourself?

[Enter an Athenian MAGISTRATE, accompanied by four Scythian policemen.[25]]

MAGISTRATE. Have these wanton women flared up again with their timbrels and their continual worship of Sabazius?[26] Is this another Adonis-dirge[27] upon the roof-tops—which we heard not long ago in the Assembly? That confounded Demostratus was urging us to sail to Sicily, and the whirling women shouted, "Woe for Adonis!" And then Demostratus said we'd best enroll the infantry from Zacynthus, and a tipsy woman on the roof shrieked, "Beat your breasts for Adonis!" And that vile and filthy lunatic forced his measure through. Such license do our women take.

LEADER OF MEN. What if you heard of the insolence of these women here? Besides their other violent acts, they threw water all over us, and we have to shake out our clothes just as if we'd leaked in them.

MAGISTRATE. And rightly, too, by God! For we ourselves lead the women astray and teach them to play the wanton; from these roots such notions blossom forth. A man goes into the jeweler's shop and says, "About that necklace you made for my wife, goldsmith: last night, while she was dancing, the fastening-bolt slipped out of the hole. I have to sail over to Salamis today; if you're free, do come around tonight and fit in a new bolt for her." Another goes to the shoe-maker, a strapping young fellow with manly parts, and says, "See here, cobbler, the sandal-strap chafes my wife's little—toe; it's so tender. Come around during the siesta and stretch it a little, so she'll be more comfortable." Now we see the results of such treatment: here I'm a special Councillor and need money to procure oars for the galleys; and I'm locked out of the Treasury by these women.

25. the regular police of Athens. They carried bows and arrows.

26. The cult of the oriental deity Sabazius had been recently introduced in Athens. It was considered somewhat disorderly and immoral by religious conservatives.

27. the lament of the women for Adonis (Tammuz), another oriental cult. When the great expedition to Sicily set sail, the women were mourning the death of Adonis—a bad omen which proved all too true. Demostratus was one of the supporters of the expedition (the most prominent was Alcibiades) and he proposed to enroll heavy armed infantry from the island of Zacynthus, off the west coast of Greece, on the way to Sicily.

But this is no time to stand around. Bring up crow-bars there! I'll put an end to their insolence. [To one of the policemen] What are you gaping at, you wretch? What are you staring at? Got an eye out for a tavern, eh? Set your crow-bars here to the gates and force them open. [Retiring to safe distance] I'll help from over here.

[The gates are thrown open and LYSISTRATA comes out followed by several other women.]

LYSISTRATA. Don't force the gates; I'm coming out of my own accord. We don't need crow-bars here; what we need is good sound common-sense.

MAGISTRATE. Is that so, you strumpet? Where's my policeman? Officer, arrest her and tie her arms behind her back.

LYSISTRATA. By Artemis, if he lays a finger on me, he'll pay for it, even if he is a public servant.

[The policeman retires in terror.]

MAGISTRATE. You there, are you afraid? Seize her round the waist —and you, too. Tie her up, both of you!

FIRST WOMAN. [As the second policeman approaches LYSISTRATA] By Pandrosus,[28] if you but touch her with your hand, I'll kick the stuffings out of you.

[The second policeman retires in terror.]

MAGISTRATE. Just listen to that: "kick the stuffings out." Where's another policeman? Tie her up first, for her chatter.

SECOND WOMAN. By the Goddess of the Light, if you lay the tip of your finger on her, you'll soon need a doctor.

[The third policeman retires in terror.]

MAGISTRATE. What's this? Where's my policeman? Seize her too. I'll soon stop your sallies.

THIRD WOMAN. By the Goddess of Tauros,[29] if you go near her, I'll tear out your hair until it shrieks with pain.

[The fourth policeman retires in terror.]

MAGISTRATE. Oh, damn it all! I've run out of policemen. But women must never defeat us. Officers, let's charge them all together. Close up your ranks!

[The policemen rally for a mass attack.]

LYSISTRATA. By heaven, you'll soon find out that we have four companies of warrior-women, all fully equipped within!

MAGISTRATE. [Advancing] Twist their arms off, men!

LYSISTRATA. [Shouting] To the rescue, my valiant women!
O sellers-of-barley-green-stuffs-and-eggs,
O sellers-of-garlic, ye keepers-of-taverns, and vendors-of-bread, Grapple! Smite! Smash!
Won't you heap filth on them? Give them a tongue-lashing!

[The women beat off the policemen.]

28. a mythical Athenian princess. 29. Artemis.

Halt! Withdraw! No looting on the field.

MAGISTRATE. Damn it! My police-force has put up a very poor show.

LYSISTRATA. What did you expect? Did you think you were attacking slaves? Didn't you know that women are filled with passion?

MAGISTRATE. Aye, passion enough—for a good strong drink!

LEADER OF MEN. O chief and leader of this land, why spend your words in vain?

Don't argue with these shameless beasts. You know not how we've fared:

A soapless bath they've given us; our clothes are soundly soaked.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Poor fool! You never should attack or strike a peaceful girl.

But if you do, your eyes must swell. For I am quite content
To sit unmoved, like modest maids, in peace and cause no pain;
But let a man stir up my hive, he'll find me like a wasp.

CHORUS OF MEN. [Singing]

O God, whatever shall we do with creatures like Womankind?
This can't be endured by any man alive. Question them!
Let us try to find out what this means.
To what end have they seized on this shrine,
This steep and rugged, high and holy,
Undefiled Acropolis?

LEADER OF MEN. Come, put your questions; don't give in, and probe her every statement.

For base and shameful it would be to leave this plot untested.

MAGISTRATE. Well then, first of all I wish to ask her this: for what purpose have you barred us from the Acropolis?

LYSISTRATA. To keep the treasure safe, so you won't make war on account of it.

MAGISTRATE. What? Do we make war on account of the treasure?

LYSISTRATA. Yes, and you cause all our other troubles for it, too. Peisander[30] and those greedy office-seekers keep things stirred up so they can find occasions to steal. Now let them do what they like: they'll never again make off with any of this money.

MAGISTRATE. What will you do?

LYSISTRATA. What a question! We'll administer it ourselves.

MAGISTRATE. You will administer the treasure?

LYSISTRATA. What's so strange in that? Don't we administer the household money for you?

MAGISTRATE. That's different.

LYSISTRATA. How is it different?

MAGISTRATE. We've got to make war with this money.

LYSISTRATA. But that's the very first thing: you mustn't make war.

30. a leader of the war party.

MAGISTRATE. How else can we be saved?

LYSISTRATA. We'll save you.

MAGISTRATE. You?

LYSISTRATA. Yes, we!

MAGISTRATE. God forbid!

LYSISTRATA. We'll save you, whether you want it or not.

MAGISTRATE. Oh! This is terrible!

LYSISTRATA. You don't like it, but we're going to do it none the less.

MAGISTRATE. Good God! it's illegal!

LYSISTRATA. We will save you, my little man!

MAGISTRATE. Suppose I don't want you to?

LYSISTRATA. That's all the more reason.

MAGISTRATE. What business have you with war and peace?

LYSISTRATA. I'll explain.

MAGISTRATE. [Shaking his fist] Speak up, or you'll smart for it.

LYSISTRATA. Just listen, and try to keep your hands still.

MAGISTRATE. I can't. I'm so mad I can't stop them.

FIRST WOMAN. Then you'll be the one to smart for it.

MAGISTRATE. Croak to yourself, old hag! [To LYSISTRATA] Now then, speak up.

LYSISTRATA. Very well. Formerly we endured the war for a good long time with our usual restraint, no matter what you men did. You wouldn't let us say "boo," although nothing you did suited us. But we watched you well, and though we stayed at home we'd often hear of some terribly stupid measure you'd proposed. Then, though grieving at heart, we'd smile sweetly and say, "What was passed in the Assembly today about writing on the treaty-stone?"[31] "What's that to you?" my husband would say. "Hold your tongue!" And I held my tongue.

FIRST WOMAN. But I wouldn't have—not I!

MAGISTRATE. You'd have been soundly smacked, if you hadn't kept still.

LYSISTRATA. So I kept still at home. Then we'd hear of some plan still worse than the first; we'd say, "Husband, how could you pass such a stupid proposal?" He'd scowl at me and say, "If you don't mind your spinning, your head will be sore for weeks. War shall be the concern of Men."[32]

MAGISTRATE. And he was right, upon my word!

LYSISTRATA. Why right, you confounded fool, when your proposals were so stupid and we weren't allowed to make suggestions?

"There's not a man left in the country," says one. "No, not one," says another. Therefore all we women have decided in council to make a common effort to save Greece. How long should

31. The text of a treaty was inscribed on a stone which was set up in a public place.

32. War shall be the concern of Men: Hector to Andromache, Iliad VI, 492.

we have waited? Now, if you're willing to listen to our excellent proposals and keep silence for us in your turn, we still may save you.

MAGISTRATE. We men keep silence for you? That's terrible; I won't endure it!

LYSISTRATA. Silence!

MAGISTRATE. Silence for you, you wench, when you're wearing a snood? I'd rather die!

LYSISTRATA. Well, if that's all that bothers you—here! take my snood and tie it round your head. [During the following words the women dress up the MAGISTRATE in women's garments.] And now keep quiet! Here, take this spinning-basket, too, and card your wool with robes tucked up, munching on beans. War shall be the concern of Women!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Arise and leave your pitchers, girls; no time is this to falter.
We too must aid our loyal friends; our turn has come for action.

CHORUS OF WOMEN. [Singing]
I'll never tire of aiding them with song and dance; never may Faintness keep my legs from moving to and fro endlessly.
For I yearn to do all for my friends;
They have charm, they have wit, they have grace,
With courage, brains, and best of virtues—
Patriotic sapience.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Come, child of manliest ancient dames, offspring of stinging nettles, Advance with rage unsoftened; for fair breezes speed you onward.

LYSISTRATA. If only sweet Eros and the Cyprian Queen of Love shed charm over our breasts and limbs and inspire our men with amorous longing and priapic spasms, I think we may soon be called Peacemakers among the Greeks.

MAGISTRATE. What will you do?

LYSISTRATA. First of all, we'll stop those fellows who run madly about the Marketplace in arms.

FIRST WOMAN. Indeed we shall, by the Queen of Paphos.[33]

LYSISTRATA. For now they roam about the market, amid the pots and greenstuffs, armed to the teeth like Corybantes.[34]

MAGISTRATE. That's what manly fellows ought to do!

LYSISTRATA. But it's so silly: a chap with a Gorgon-emblazoned shield buying pickled herring.

FIRST WOMAN. Why, just the other day I saw one of those long-haired dandies who command our cavalry ride up on horseback and pour into his bronze helmet the egg-broth he'd bought from an old dame. And there was a Thracian slinger too, shaking his lance like Tereus[35]; he'd scared the life out of the poor fig-peddler and was gulping down all her ripest fruit.

33. Aphrodite.

34. the armed priests of the goddess Cybele.

MAGISTRATE. How can you stop all the confusion in the various states and bring them together?

LYSISTRATA. Very easily.

MAGISTRATE. Tell me how.

LYSISTRATA. Just like a ball of wool, when it's confused and snarled: we take it thus, and draw out a thread here and a thread there with our spindles; thus we'll unsnarl this war, if no one prevents us, and draw together the various states with embassies here and embassies there.

MAGISTRATE. Do you suppose you can stop this dreadful business with balls of wool and spindles, you nit-wits?

LYSISTRATA. Why, if you had any wits, you'd manage all affairs of state like our wool-working.

MAGISTRATE. How so?

LYSISTRATA. First you ought to treat the city as we do when we wash the dirt out of a fleece: stretch it out and pluck and thrash out of the city all those prickly scoundrels; aye, and card out those who conspire and stick together to gain office, pulling off their heads. Then card the wool, all of it, into one fair basket of good-will, mingling in the aliens residing here, any loyal foreigners, and anyone who's in debt to the Treasury; and consider that all our colonies lie scattered round about like remnants; from all of these collect the wool and gather it together here, wind up a great ball, and then weave a good stout cloak for the democracy.

MAGISTRATE. Dreadful! Talking about thrashing and winding balls of wool, when you haven't the slightest share in the war!

LYSISTRATA. Why, you dirty scoundrel, we bear more than twice as much as you. First, we bear children and send off our sons as soldiers.

MAGISTRATE. Hush! Let bygones be bygones!

LYSISTRATA. Then, when we ought to be happy and enjoy our youth, we sleep alone because of your expeditions abroad. But never mind us married women: I grieve most for the maids who grow old at home unwed.

MAGISTRATE. Don't men grow old, too?

LYSISTRATA. For heaven's sake! That's not the same thing. When a man comes home, no matter how grey he is, he soon finds a girl to marry. But woman's bloom is short and fleeting; if she doesn't grasp her chance, no man is willing to marry her and she sits at home a prey to every fortune-teller.

MAGISTRATE. [Coarsely] But if a man can still get it up—

35. a mythical king of Thrace. Thracian mercenaries had served in the Athenian ranks during the war.

LYSISTRATA. See here, you: what's the matter? Aren't you dead yet? There's plenty of room for you. Buy yourself a shroud and I'll bake you a honey-cake.[36] [Handing him a copper coin for his passage across the Styx] Here's your fare! Now get yourself a wreath.

[During the following dialogue the women dress up the MAGISTRATE as a corpse.]

FIRST WOMAN. Here, take these fillets.

SECOND WOMAN. Here, take this wreath.

LYSISTRATA. What do you want? What's lacking? Get moving; off to the ferry! Charon is calling you; don't keep him from sailing.

MAGISTRATE. Am I to endure these insults? By God! I'm going straight to the magistrates to show them how I've been treated.

LYSISTRATA. Are you grumbling that you haven't been properly laid out? Well, the day after tomorrow we'll send around all the usual offerings early in the morning.

[The MAGISTRATE goes out still wearing his funeral decorations. LYSISTRATA and the women retire into the Acropolis.]

LEADER OF MEN. Wake, ye sons of freedom, wake! 'Tis no time for sleeping. Up and at them, like a man! Let us strip for action.

[The CHORUS OF MEN remove their outer cloaks.]

CHORUS OF MEN. [Singing]

Surely there is something here greater than meets the eye;
For without a doubt I smell Hippias'[37] tyranny.
Dreadful fear assails me lest certain bands of Spartan men,
Meeting here with Cleisthenes,[38] have inspired through treachery
All these god-detested women secretly to seize Athens' treasure in the temple, and to stop that pay Whence I live at my ease.

LEADER OF MEN. Now isn't it terrible for them to advise the state and chatter about shields, being mere women?

And they think to reconcile us with the Spartans—men who hold nothing sacred any more than hungry wolves. Surely this is a web of deceit, my friends, to conceal an attempt at tyranny. But they'll never lord it over me; I'll be on my guard and from now on,

"The blade I bear A myrtle spray shall wear."

I'll occupy the market under arms and stand next to Aristogeiton.[39] Thus I'll stand beside him. [He strikes the pose of the famous

36. The dead were provided with a honey cake to throw to Cerberus, the three-headed dog which guarded the entry to the underworld. The copper coin was to pay the fare required by Charon, the ferryman over the river Styx.

37. the last tyrant of Athens, driven out in 510 B.C.

38. not the great reformer who set up the democracy, but a contemporary of Aristophanes, notorious for his effeminacy (and therefore suspect as a fellow-conspirator of the women).

39. one of the two heroes of the democracy who assassinated Hipparchus, the brother of the tyrant Hippias. A drinking song which was frequently heard at Athenian banquets ran: "In a branch of myrtle, I'll hide my sword, like Harmodius and Aristogeiton, who killed the tyrant, and made Athens free."

statue of the tyrannicides, with one arm raised.] And here's my chance to take this accurst old hag and—[Striking the LEADER OF WOMEN] smack her on the jaw!

LEADER OF WOMEN. You'll go home in such a state your Ma won't recognize you!

Ladies all, upon the ground let us place these garments.

[The CHORUS OF WOMEN remove their outer garments.]

CHORUS OF WOMEN. [Singing]

Citizens of Athens, hear useful words for the state.
Rightly; for it nurtured me in my youth royally.
As a child of seven years carried I the sacred box;[40]
Then I was a Miller-maid, grinding at Athene's shrine;
Next I wore the saffron robe and played Brauronia's Bear;
And I walked as Basket-bearer, wearing chains of figs,
As a sweet maiden fair.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Therefore, am I not bound to give good advice to the city?

Don't take it ill that I was born a woman, if I contribute something better than our present troubles. I pay my share; for I contribute MEN. But you miserable old fools contribute nothing, and after squandering our ancestral treasure, the fruit of the Persian Wars, you make no contribution in return. And now, all on account of you, we're facing ruin.

What, muttering, are you? If you annoy me, I'll take this hard, rough slipper and—[Striking the LEADER OF MEN] smack you on the jaw!

CHORUS OF MEN. [Singing]

This is outright insolence! Things go from bad to worse.
If you're men with any guts, prepare to meet the foe.
Let us strip our tunics off! We need the smell of male Vigour. And we cannot fight all swaddled up in clothes.
[They strip off their tunics.]
Come then, my comrades, on to the battle, ye who once to Leipsydrion[41] came;
Then ye were MEN. Now call back your youthful vigour.
With light, wingèd footstep advance,
Shaking old age from your frame.

LEADER OF MEN. If any of us give these wenches the slightest hold,

40. This and the next four lines describe the religious duties of a well-born Athenian girl. The sacred box contained religious objects connected with the worship of Athena in the Erechtheum. The miller-maids ground flour for sacred cakes. At Brauron in Attica, young girls who represented themselves as bears (the saffron robe was a substitute for a more primitive bearskin) worshipped Artemis. In the Panathenaic procession certain selected girls carried baskets on their heads.

41. the base of the aristocratic family of the Almaeonidae (the family of Pericles) in their first attempt to overthrow Hippias.

they'll stop at nothing: such is their cunning.

They will even build ships and sail against us, like Artemisia.[42] Or if they turn to mounting, I count our Knights as done for: a woman's such a tricky jockey when she gets astraddle, with a good firm seat for trotting. Just look at those Amazons that Micon[43] painted, fighting on horseback against men!

But we must throw them all in the pillory—[Seizing and choking the LEADER OF WOMEN] grabbing hold of yonder neck!

CHORUS OF WOMEN. [Singing]

'Ware my anger! Like a boar 'twill rush upon you men.
Soon you'll bawl aloud for help, you'll be so soundly trimmed!
Come, my friends, let's strip with speed, and lay aside these robes;
Catch the scent of women's rage. Attack with tooth and nail!
[They strip off their tunics.]
Now then, come near me, you miserable man! you'll never eat garlic or black beans again.
And if you utter a single hard word, in rage I will "nurse" you as once
The beetle[44] requited her foe.

LEADER OF WOMEN. For you don't worry me; no, not so long as my Lampito lives and our Theban friend, the noble Ismenia.

You can't do anything, not even if you pass a dozen—decrees! You miserable fool, all our neighbours hate you. Why, just the other day when I was holding a festival for Hecate, I invited as playmate from our neighbours the Boeotians a charming, well-bred Copaic—eel. But they refused to send me one on account of your decrees.

And you'll never stop passing decrees until I grab your foot and—[Tripping up the LEADER OF MEN] toss you down and break your neck!

[Here an interval of five days is supposed to elapse. LYSISTRATA comes out from the Acropolis]

LEADER OF WOMEN. [Dramatically] Empress[45] of this great emprise and undertaking, Why come you forth, I pray, with frowning brow?

LYSISTRATA. Ah, these cursèd women! Their deeds and female notions make me pace up and down in utter despair.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Ah, what sayest thou?

LYSISTRATA. The truth, alas! the truth.

42. queen of Halicarnassus in Asia Minor. She played a prominent part in Xerxes' invasion of Greece and her ships fought at Salamis.

43. a painter who had lately decorated several public buildings with frescos. The battles of the Greeks and Amazons were favorite subjects of sculptors and painters all through the fifth century.

44. In a fable of Aesop the beetle revenges itself on the eagle by breaking its eggs.

45. The tone of the following passage is mock-tragic.

LEADER OF WOMEN. What dreadful tale hast thou to tell thy friends?
LYSISTRATA. 'Tis shame to speak, and not to speak is hard.
LEADER OF WOMEN. Hide not from me whatever woes we suffer.
LYSISTRATA. Well then, to put it briefly, we want—laying!
LEADER OF WOMEN. O Zeus, Zeus!
LYSISTRATA. Why call on Zeus? That's the way things are. I can no longer keep them away from the men, and they're all deserting. I caught one wriggling through a hole near the grotto of Pan, another sliding down a rope, another deserting her post; and yesterday I found one getting on a sparrow's back to fly off to Orsilochus,[46] and had to pull her back by the hair. They're digging up all sorts of excuses to get home. Look, here comes one of them now. [A woman comes hastily out of the Acropolis.] Here you! Where are you off to in such a hurry?
FIRST WOMAN. I want to go home. My very best wool is being devoured by moths.
LYSISTRATA. Moths? Nonsense! Go back inside.
FIRST WOMAN. I'll come right back; I swear it. I just want to lay it out on the bed.
LYSISTRATA. Well, you won't lay it out, and you won't go home, either.
FIRST WOMAN. Shall I let my wool be ruined?
LYSISTRATA. If necessary, yes. [Another woman comes out.]
SECOND WOMAN. Oh dear! Oh dear! My precious flax! I left it at home all unpeeled.
LYSISTRATA. Here's another one, going home for her "flax." Come back here!
SECOND WOMAN. But I just want to work it up a little and then I'll be right back.
LYSISTRATA. No indeed! If you start this, all the other women will want to do the same. [A third woman comes out.]
THIRD WOMAN. O Eilithyia, gooddess of travail, stop my labour till I come to a lawful spot![47]
LYSISTRATA. What's this nonsense?
THIRD WOMAN. I'm going to have a baby—right now!
LYSISTRATA. But you weren't even even pregnant yesterday.
THIRD WOMAN. Well, I am today. O Lysistrata, do send me home to see a midwife, right away.
LYSISTRATA. What are you talking about? [Putting her hand on her stomach] What's this hard lump here?
THIRD WOMAN. A little boy.
LYSISTRATA. My goodness, what have you got there? It seems hollow; I'll just find out. [Pulling aside her robe] Why, you silly goose,

46. the sparrow, Aphrodite's bird, pulled her chariot. Orsilochus ran a house of ill-fame.

47. lawful spot: The Acropolis was holy ground, and would be polluted by either birth or death.

you've got Athene's sacred helmet there. And you said you were having a baby!

THIRD WOMAN. Well, I am having one, I swear!

LYSISTRATA. Then what's this helmet for?

THIRD WOMAN. If the baby starts coming while I'm still in the Acropolis, I'll creep into this like a pigeon and give birth to it there.

LYSISTRATA. Stuff and nonsense! It's plain enough what you're up to. You just wait here for the christening of this—helmet.

THIRD WOMAN. But I can't sleep in the Acropolis since I saw the sacred snake.[48]

FIRST WOMAN. And I'm dying for lack of sleep: the hooting of the owls[49] keeps me awake.

LYSISTRATA. Enough of these shams, you wretched creatures. You want your husbands, I suppose. Well, don't you think they want us? I'm sure they're spending miserable nights. Hold out, my friends, and endure for just a little while. There's an oracle that we shall conquer, if we don't split up. [Producing a roll of paper] Here it is.

FIRST WOMAN. Tell us what it says.

LYSISTRATA. Listen.

"When in the length of time the Swallows shall gather together,
Fleeing the Hoopoe's amorous flight and the Cockatoo shunning,
Then shall your woes be ended and Zeus who thunders in heaven Set what's below on top—"

FIRST WOMAN. What? Are we going to be on top?

LYSISTRATA. "But if the Swallows rebel and flutter away from the temple, Never a bird in the world shall seem more wanton and worthless."

FIRST WOMAN. That's clear enough, upon my word!

LYSISTRATA. By all that's holy, let's not give up the struggle now. Let's go back inside. It would be a shame, my dear friends, to disobey the oracle.

[The women all retire to the Acropolis again.]

CHORUS OF MEN. [Singing]

I have a tale to tell,
Which I know full well.
It was told me
In the nursery.

Once there was a likely lad,

48. A snake was kept in the Erechtheum.

49. the sacred bird of Athene.

Melanion they name him;
The thought of marriage made him mad,
For which I cannot blame him.[50]

So off he went to mountains fair;
(No women to upbraid him!)
A mighty hunter of the hare,
He had a dog to aid him.

He never came back home to see
Detested women's faces.
He showed a shrewd mentality.
With him I'd fain change places!

ONE OF THE MEN. [To one of the women] Come here, old dame. give me a kiss.
WOMAN. You'll ne'er eat garlic, if you dare!
MAN. I want to kick you—just like this!
WOMAN. Oh, there's a leg with bushy hair!
MAN. Myronides and Phormio[51]
Were hairy—and they thrashed the foe.

CHORUS OF WOMEN. [Singing]
I have another tale,
With which to assail
Your contention
'Bout Melanion.

Once upon a time a man Named Timon[52] left our city,
To live in some deserted land.
(We thought him rather witty.)

He dwelt alone amidst the thorn;
In solitude he brooded.
From some grim Fury he was born:
Such hatred he exuded.

He cursed you men, as scoundrels through
And through, till life he ended.
He couldn't stand the sight of YOU!
But women he befriended.

50. The chorus of men here recasts a well-known myth for its own purposes. In the myth it was Atalanta who avoided marriage, challenging her suitors to a foot race which she always won; Melanion threw a golden apple in front of her; when she stopped to pick it up, she lost the race to him.

51. successful Athenian generals.

52. the famous misanthrope, the subject of Shakespeare's play. There is no evidence that he "befriended" women his hatred seems to have been directed at the whole human race.

WOMAN. [To one of the men] I'll smash your face in, if you like.
MAN. Oh no, please don't! You frighten me.
WOMAN. I'll lift my foot—and thus I'll strike.
MAN. Aha! Look there! What's that I see?
WOMAN. Whate'er you see, you cannot say
That I'm not neatly trimmed today.
[LYSISTRATA appears on the wall of the Acropolis.]
LYSISTRATA. Hello! Hello! Girls, come here quick!
[Several women appear beside her.]
WOMAN. What is it? Why are you calling?
LYSISTRATA. I see a man coming: he's in a dreadful state. He's mad with passion. O Queen of Cyprus, Cythera, and Paphos, just keep on this way!
WOMAN. Where is the fellow?
LYSISTRATA. There, beside the shrine of Demeter.
WOMAN. Oh yes, so he is. Who is he?
LYSISTRATA. Let's see. Do any of you know him?
MYRRHINE. Yes indeed. That's my husband, Cinesias.
LYSISTRATA. It's up to you, now: roast him, rack him, fool him, love him—and leave him! Do everything, except what our oath forbids.
MYRRHINE. Don't worry; I'll do it.
LYSISTRATA. I'll stay here to tease him and warm him up a bit. Off with you.
[The other women retire from the wall. Enter CINESIAS followed by a slave carrying a baby. CINESIAS is obviously in great pain and distress.]
CINESIAS. [Groaning] Oh-h! Oh-h-h! This is killing me! O God, what tortures I'm suffering!
LYSISTRATA. [From the wall] Who's that within our lines?
CINESIAS. Me.
LYSISTRATA. A man?
CINESIAS. [Pointing] A man, indeed!
LYSISTRATA. Well, go away!
CINESIAS. Who are you to send me away?
LYSISTRATA. The captain of the guard.
CINESIAS. Oh, for heaven's sake, call out Myrrhine for me.
LYSISTRATA. Call Myrrhine? Nonsense! Who are you?
CINESIAS. Her husband, Cinesias of Paionidai.
LYSISTRATA. [Appearing much impressed] Oh, greetings, friend. Your name is not without honour here among us. Your wife is always talking about you, and whenever she takes an egg or an apple, she says, "Here's to my dear Cinesias!"
CINESIAS. [Quivering with excitement] Oh, ye gods in heaven!
LYSISTRATA. Indeed she does! And whenever our conversations turn to men, your wife immediately says, "All others are mere rubbish compared with Cinesias."

CINESIAS. [Groaning] Oh! Do call her for me.

LYSISTRATA. Why should I? What will you give me?

CINESIAS. Whatever you want. All I have is yours—and you see what I've got.

LYSISTRATA. Well then, I'll go down and call her. [She descends.]

CINESIAS. And hurry up! I've had no joy of life ever since she left home. When I go in the house, I feel awful: everything seems so empty and I can't enjoy my dinner. I'm in such a state all the time!

MYRRHINE. [From behind the wall] I do love him so. But he won't let me love him. No, no! Don't ask me to see him!

CINESIAS. O my darling, O Myrrhine honey, why do you do this to me? [MYRRHINE appears on the wall.] Come down here!

MYRRHINE. No, I won't come down.

CINESIAS. Won't you come, Myrrhine, when I call you?

MYRRHINE. No; you don't want me.

CINESIAS. Don't want you? I'm in agony!

MYRRHINE. I'm going now.

CINESIAS. Please don't! At least, listen to your baby. [To the baby] Here you, call your mamma! [Pinching the baby]

BABY. Ma-ma! Ma-ma! Ma-ma!

CINESIAS. [To MYRRHINE] What's the matter with you? Have you no pity for your child, who hasn't been washed or fed for five whole days?

MYRRHINE. Oh, poor child; your father pays no attention to you.

CINESIAS. Come down then, you heartless wretch, for the baby's sake.

MYRRHINE. Oh, what it is to be a mother! I've got to come down, I suppose. [She leaves the wall and shortly reappears at the gate.]

CINESIAS. [To himself] She seems much younger, and she has such a sweet look about her. Oh, the way she teases me! And her pretty, provoking ways make me burn with longing

MYRRHINE. [Coming out of the gate and taking the baby]. O my sweet little angel. Naughty papa! Here, let Mummy kiss you, Mamma's little sweetheart! [She fondles the baby lovingly.]

CINESIAS. [In despair] You heartless creature, why do you do this? Why follow these other women and make both of us suffer so? [He tries to embrace her.]

MYRRHINE. Don't touch me!

CINESIAS. You're letting all our things at home go to wrack and ruin.

MYRRHINE. I don't care.

CINESIAS. You don't care that your wool is being plucked to pieces by the chickens?

MYRRHINE. Not in the least.

CINESIAS. And you haven't celebrated the rites of Aphrodite for ever so long. Won't you come home?

MYRRHINE. Not on your life, unless you men make a truce and stop the war.

CINESIAS. Well then, if that pleases you, we'll do it.

MYRRHINE. Well then, if that pleases you, I'll come home—afterwards! Right now I'm on oath not to.

CINESIAS. Then just lie down here with me for a moment.

MYRRHINE. No—[In a teasing voice] and yet, I won't say I don't love you.

CINESIAS. You love me? Oh, do lie down here, Myrrhine dear!

MYRRHINE. What, you silly fool! in front of the baby?

CINESIAS. [Hastily thrusting the baby at the slave] Of course not. Here—home! Take him Manes! [The slave goes off with the baby.] See, the baby's out of the way. Now won't you lie down?

MYRRHINE. But where, my dear?

CINESIAS. Where? The grotto of Pan's a lovely spot.

MYRRHINE. How could I purify myself before returning to the shrine?

CINESIAS. Easily: just wash here in the Clepsydra.[53]

MYRRHINE. And then, shall I go back on my oath?

CINESIAS. On my head be it! Don't worry about the oath.

MYRRHINE. All right, then. Just let me bring out a bed.

CINESIAS. No, don't. The ground's all right.

MYRRHINE. Heavens, no! Bad as you are, I won't let you lie on the bare ground. [She goes into the Acropolis.]

CINESIAS. Why, she really loves me; it's plain to see.

MYRRHINE. [Returning with a bed] There! Now hurry up and lie down. I'll just slip off this dress. But—let's see: oh yes, I must fetch a mattress.

CINESIAS. Nonsense! No mattress for me.

MYRRHINE. Yes indeed! It's not nice on the bare springs.

CINESIAS. Give me a kiss.

MYRRHINE. [Giving him a hasty kiss] There! [She goes.]

CINESIAS. [In mingled distress and delight] Oh-h! Hurry back!

MYRRHINE. [Returning with a mattress] Here's the mattress; lie down on it. I'm taking my things off now—but—let's see: you have no pillow.

CINESIAS. I don't want a pillow!

MYRRHINE. But I do. [She goes.]

CINESIAS. Cheated again, just like Heracles and his dinner![54]

MYRRHINE. [Returning with a pillow] Here, lift your head. [To her-

53. a spring on the Acropolis.

54. The point of this proverb seems to be that the hero is such a glutton that his hosts are never quick enough with their entertainment.

self, wondering how else to tease him] Is that all?

CINESIAS. Surely that's all! Do come here, precious!

MYRRHINE. I'm taking off my girdle. But remember: don't go back on your promise about the truce.

CINESIAS. Hope to die, if I do.

MYRRHINE. You don't have a blanket.

CINESIAS. [Shouting in exasperation] I don't want one! I WANT TO—

MYRRHINE. Sh-h! There, there, I'll be back in a minute. [She goes.]

CINESIAS. She'll be the death of me with these bed-clothes.

MYRRHINE. [Returning with a blanket] Here, get up.

CINESIAS. I've got this up!

MYRRHINE. Would you like some perfume?

CINESIAS. Good heavens, no! I won't have it!

MYRRHINE. Yes, you shall, whether you want it or not. [She goes.]

CINESIAS. O lord! Confound all perfumes anyway!

MYRRHINE. [Returning with a flask] Stretch out your hand and put some on.

CINESIAS. [Suspiciously] By God, I don't much like this perfume. It smells of shilly-shallying, and has no scent of the marriage-bed.

MYRRHINE. Oh dear! This is Rhodian perfume I've brought.

CINESIAS. It's quite all right dear. Never mind.

MYRRHINE. Don't be silly! [She goes out with the flask.]

CINESIAS. Damm the man who first concocted perfumes!

MYRRHINE. [Returning with another flask] Here, try this flask.

CINESIAS. I've got another one all ready for you. Come, you wretch, lie down and stop bringing me things.

MYRRHINE. All right; I'm taking off my shoes. But, my dear, see that you vote for peace.

CINESIAS. [Absently] I'll consider it. [MYRRHINE runs away to the Acropolis.] I'm ruined! The wretch has skinned me and run away! [Chanting, in tragic style] Alas! Alas! Deceived, deserted by this fairest of women, whom shall I—lay? Ah, my poor little child, how shall I nurture thee? Where's Cynalopex?[55] I needs must hire a nurse!

LEADER OF MEN. [Chanting] Ah, wretched man, in dreadful wise beguiled, bewrayed, thy soul is sore distressed. I pity thee, alas! alas! What soul, what loins, what liver could stand this strain? How firm and unyielding he stands, with naught to aid him of a morning.

CINESIAS. O lord! O Zeus! What tortures I endure!

LEADER OF MEN. This is the way she's treated you, that vile and cursèd wanton.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Nay, not vile and cursèd, but sweet and dear.

LEADER OF MEN. Sweet, you say? Nay, hateful, hateful!

55. a local brothel-keeper.

CINESIAS. Hateful indeed! O Zeus, Zeus!
Seize her and snatch her away,
Like a handful of dust, in a mighty,
Fiery tempest! Whirl her aloft, then let her drop Down to the earth, with a crash, as she falls—
On the point of this waiting Thingummybob! [He goes out.]

[Enter a Spartan HERALD, in an obvious state of excitement, which he is doing his best to conceal.]

HERALD. Where can I find the Senate or the Prytanes?[56] I've got an important message.

[The Athenian MAGISTRATE enters.]

MAGISTRATE. Say there, are you a man or Priapus?[57]

HERALD. [In annoyance] I'm a herald, you lout! I've come from Sparta about the truce.

MAGISTRATE. Is that a spear you've got under your cloak?

HERALD. No, of course not!

MAGISTRATE. Why do you twist and turn so? Why hold your cloak in front of you? Did you rupture yourself on the trip?

HERALD. By gum, the fellow's an old fool.

MAGISTRATE. [Pointing] Why, you dirty rascal, you're all excited.

HERALD. Not at all. Stop this tom-foolery.

MAGISTRATE. Well, what's that I see?

HERALD. A Spartan message-staff.[58]

MAGISTRATE. Oh, certainly! That's just the kind of message-staff I've got. But tell me the honest truth: How are things going in Sparta?

HERALD. All the land of Sparta is up in arms—and our allies are up, too. We need Pellene.[59]

MAGISTRATE. What brought this trouble on you? A sudden Panic?

HERALD. No, Lampito started it and then all the other women in Sparta with one accord chased their husbands out of their beds.

MAGISTRATE. How do you feel?

HERALD. Terrible. We walk around the city bent over like men lighting matches in a wind. For our women won't let us touch them until we all agree and make peace throughout Greece.

MAGISTRATE. This is a general conspiracy of the women; I see it now. Well, hurry back and tell the Spartans to send ambassadors here with full powers to arrange a truce. And I'll go tell the Council to choose ambassadors from here; I've got a little something here that

56. Prytanes: the permanent committee of the Council (Senate).

57. a god whose grossly phallic statue was set to guard orchards and gardens.

58. an encoding device. The papyrus was wrapped round the staff on a spiral and the message could be read only when the papyrus was wound round an exactly similar staff.

59. a city held by the Athenians and claimed by the Spartans; also the name of a famous Athenian prostitute.

will soon persuade them!

HERALD. I'll fly there; for you've made an excellent suggestion.

[The HERALD and the MAGISTRATE depart on opposite sides of the stage.]

LEADER OF MEN. No beast or fire is harder than womankind to tame.
Nor is the spotted leopard so devoid of shame.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Knowing this, you dare provoke us to attack?
I'd be your steady friend, if you'd but take us back.

LEADER OF MEN. I'll never cease my hatred keen of womankind.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Just as you will. But now just let me help you find That cloak you threw aside. You look so silly there Without your clothes. Here, put it on and don't go bare.

LEADER OF MEN. That's very kind, and shows you're not entirely bad.
But I threw off my things when I was good and mad.

LEADER OF WOMEN. At last you seem a man, and won't be mocked, my lad.
If you'd been nice to me, I'd take this little gnat
That's in your eye and pluck it out for you, like that.

LEADER OF MEN. So that's what's bothered me and bit my eye so long!
Please dig it out for me. I own that I've been wrong.

LEADER OF WOMEN. I'll do so, though you've been a most ill-natured brat.
Ye gods! See here! A huge and monstrous little gnat!

LEADER OF MEN. Oh, how that helps! For it was digging wells in me.
And now it's out, my tears can roll down hard and free.

LEADER OF WOMEN. Here, let me wipe them off, although you're such a knave
And kiss me.

LEADER OF MEN. No!

LEADER OF WOMEN. Whate'er you say, a kiss I'll have. [She kisses him.]

LEADER OF MEN. Oh, confound these women! They've a coaxing way about them.
He was wise and never spoke a truer word, who said,
"We can't live with women, but we cannot live without them."
Now I'll make a truce with you. We'll fight no more: instead,
I will not injure you if you do me no wrong.
And now let's join our ranks and then begin a song.

COMBINED CHORUS. [Singing]

Athenians, we're not prepared,
To say a single ugly word

About our fellow-citizens.
Quite the contrary: we desire but to say and to do
Naught but good. Quite enough are the ills now on hand.

Men and women, be advised:
If anyone requires Money—minae two or three—
We've got what he desires.

My purse is yours, on easy terms:
When Peace shall reappear,
Whate'er you've borrowed will be due.
So speak up without fear.

You needn't pay me back, you see,
If you can get a cent from me!

We're about to entertain
Some foreign gentlemen;
We've soup and tender, fresh-killed pork.
Come round to dine at ten.

Come early; wash and dress with care,
And bring the children, too.
Then step right in, no "by your leave."
We'll be expecting you.

Walk in as if you owned the place.
You'll find the door—shut in your face!

[Enter a group of Spartan Ambassadors; they are in the same desperate condition as the Herald in the previous scene.]

LEADER OF CHORUS. Here come the envoys from Sparta, sprouting long beards and looking for all the world as if they were carrying pig-pens in front of them.

Greetings, gentlemen of Sparta. Tell me, in what state have you come?

SPARTAN. Why waste words? You can plainly see what state we're come in!

LEADER OF CHORUS. Wow! You're in a pretty high-strung condition, and it seems to be getting worse.

SPARTAN. It's indescribable. Won't someone please arrange a peace for us—in any way you like.

LEADER OF CHORUS. Here come our own, native ambassadors, crouching like wrestlers and holding their clothes in front of them; this seems an athletic kind of malady.

[Enter several Athenian Ambassadors.]

ATHENIAN. Can anyone tell us where Lysistrata is? You see our condition.

LEADER OF CHORUS. Here's another case of the same complaint. Tell me, are the attacks worse in the morning?

ATHENIAN. No, we're always afflicted this way. If someone doesn't soon arrange this truce, you'd better not let me get my hands on—Cleisthenes!

LEADER OF CHORUS. If you're smart, you'll arrange your cloaks so none of the fellows who smashed the Hermae[60] can see you.

SPARTAN. Right you are; a very good suggestion.

ATHENIAN. Greetings, Spartan. We've suffered dreadful things.

SPARTAN. My dear fellow, we'd have suffered still worse if one of those fellows had seen us in this condition.

ATHENIAN. Well, gentlemen, we must get down to business. What's your errand here?

SPARTAN. We're ambassadors about peace.

ATHENIAN. Excellent; so are we. Only Lysistrata can arrange things for us; shall we summon her?

SPARTAN. Aye, and Lysistratus too, if you like.

LEADER OF CHORUS. No need to summon her, it seems. She's coming out of her own accord.

[Enter LYSISTRATA accompanied by a statue of a nude female figure, which represents Reconciliation.]

Hail, noblest of women; now must thou be
A judge shrewd and subtle, mild and severe,
Be sweet yet majestic: all manners employ.
The leaders of Hellas, caught by thy love-charms
Have come to thy judgment, their charges submitting.

LYSISTRATA. This is no difficult task, if one catch them still in amorous passion, before they've resorted to each other. But I'll soon find out. Where's Reconciliation? Go, first bring the Spartans here, and don't seize them rudely and violently, as our tactless husbands used to do, but as befits a woman, like an old, familiar friend; if they won't give you their hands, take them however you can. Then go fetch these Athenians here, taking hold of whatever they offer you. Now then, men of Sparta, stand here beside me, and you Athenians on the other side, and listen to my words.

60. small statues of the god Hermes equipped with phalloi, which stood at the door of most Athenian houses. Just before the great expedition left for Sicily, rioters (probably oligarchic conspirators opposed to the expedition) smashed many of these statues.

I am a woman, it is true, but I have a mind; I'm not badly off in native wit, and by listening to my father and my elders, I've had a decent schooling.

Now I intend to give you a scolding which you both deserve. With one common font you worship at the same altars, just like brothers, at Olympia, at Thermopylae, at Delphi—how many more might I name, if time permitted;—and the Barbarians stand by waiting with their armies; yet you are destroying the men and towns of Greece.

ATHENIAN. Oh, this tension is killing me!

LYSISTRATA. And now, men of Sparta,—to turn to you—don't you remember how the Spartan Pericleidas came here once as a suppliant, and sitting at our altar, all pale with fear in his crimson cloak, begged us for an army?[61] For all Messene had attacked you and the god sent an earthquake too? Then Cimon went forth with four thousand hoplites and saved all Lacedaemon. Such was the aid you received from Athens, and now you lay waste the country which once treated you so well.

ATHENIAN. [Hotly] They're in the wrong, Lysistrata, upon my word, they are!

SPARTAN. [Absently, looking at the statue of Reconciliation] We're in the wrong. What hips! How lovely they are!

LYSISTRATA. Don't think I'm going to let you Athenians off. Don't you remember how the Spartans came in arms when you were wearing the rough, sheepskin cloak of slaves and slew the host of Thessalians, the comrades and allies of Hippias?[62] Fighting with you on that day, alone of all the Greeks, they set you free and instead of a sheepskin gave your folk a handsome robe to wear.

SPARTAN. [Looking at LYSISTRATA] I've never seen a more distinguished woman.

ATHENIAN. [Looking at Reconciliation] I've never seen a more voluptuous body!

LYSISTRATA. Why then, with these many noble deeds to think of, do you fight each other? Why don't you stop this villainy? Why not make peace? Tell me, what prevents it?

SPARTAN. [Waving vaguely at Reconciliation] We're willing, if you're willing to give up your position on yonder flank.

LYSISTRATA. What position, my good man?

SPARTAN. Pylus; we've been panting for it for ever so long.

ATHENIAN. No, by God! You shan't have it!

LYSISTRATA. Let them have it, my friend.

61. After a disastrous earthquake the Spartans were in great danger as a result of a rebellion of their serfs, the Helots. The Athenians under Cimon sent a large force of soldiers to help them (464 B.C.).

62. Hippias the tyrant had allowed exiled democrats to return to Attica but they had to stay outside the city and wear sheepskins so that they could readily be identified. With the help of Spartan soldiers the exiles and the people of Attica finally defeated the Thessalian troops of Hippias.

ATHENIAN. Then, what shall we have to rouse things up?

LYSISTRATA. Ask for another place in exchange.

ATHENIAN. Well, let's see: first of all [Pointing to various parts of Reconciliation's anatomy] give us Echinus[63] here, this Maliac Inlet in back there, and these two Megarian legs.

SPARTAN. No, by heavens! You can't have everything, you crazy fool!

LYSISTRATA. Let it go. Don't fight over a pair of legs.

ATHENIAN. [Taking off his cloak] I think I'll strip and do a little planting now.

SPARTAN. [Following suit] And I'll just do a little fertilizing, by gosh!

LYSISTRATA. Wait until the truce is concluded. Now if you've decided on this course, hold a conference and discuss the matter with your allies.

ATHENIAN. Allies? Don't be ridiculous! They're in the same state we are. Won't all our allies want the same thing we do—to jump in bed with their women?

SPARTAN. Ours will, I know.

ATHENIAN. Especially the Carystians,[64] by God!

LYSISTRATA. Very well. Now purify yourselves, that your wives may feast and entertain you in the Acropolis; we've provisions by the basketful. Exchange your oaths and pledges there, and then each of you may take his wife and go home.

ATHENIAN. Let's go at once.

SPARTAN. Come on, where you will.

ATHENIAN. For God's sake, let's hurry!

[They all go into the Acropolis.]

CHORUS. [Singing.]

Whate'er I have of coverlets
And robes of varied hue
And golden trinkets,—without stint
I offer them to you.

Take what you will and bear it home,
Your children to delight,
Or if your girl's a Basket-maid;
Just choose whate'er's in sight.

There's naught within so well secured
You cannot break the seal
And bear it off; just help yourselves;
No hesitation feel.

63. Like Pylus (on the "flank" of the Peloponnese), these names are all double-barrelled references to territories in dispute in the war and salient portions of the anatomy of Reconciliation.

64. The people of Carystus on the island of Euboea were supposed to be of pre-Hellenic stock and therefore primitive and savage.

But you'll see nothing, though you try,
Unless you've sharper eyes than I!

If anyone needs bread to feed
A growing family,
I've lots of wheat and full-grown loaves;
So just apply to me.

Let every poor man who desires
Come round and bring a sack
To fetch the grain; my slave is there
To load it on his back.

But don't come near my door, I say.
Beware the dog, and stay away!

[An ATHENIAN enters carrying a torch; he knocks at the gate.]

ATHENIAN. Open the door! [To the CHORUS, which is clustered around the gate] Make way, won't you! What are you hanging around for? Want me to singe you with this torch? [To himself] No; it's a stale trick, I won't do it! [To the audience] Still, if I've got to do it to please you, I suppose I'll have to take the trouble.

[A SECOND ATHENIAN comes out of the gate.]

SECOND ATHENIAN. And I'll help you.

FIRST ATHENIAN. [Waving his torch at the CHORUS] Get out! Go bawl your heads off! Move on there, so the Spartans can leave in peace when the banquet's over.

[They brandish their torches until the CHORUS leaves the Orchestra.]

SECOND ATHENIAN. I've never seen such a pleasant banquet: the Spartans are charming fellows, indeed they are! And we Athenians are very witty in our cups.

FIRST ATHENIAN. Naturally: for when we're sober we're never at our best. If the Athenians would listen to me, we'd always get a little tipsy on our embassies. As things are now, we go to Sparta when we're sober and look around to stir up trouble. And then we don't hear what they say—and as for what they don't say, we have all sorts of suspicions. And then we bring back varying reports about the mission. But this time everything is pleasant; even if a man should sing the Telamon-song when he ought to sing "Cleitagoras,"[65] we'd praise him and swear it was excellent.

[The two CHORUSES return, as a CHORUS OF ATHENIANS and a CHORUS OF SPARTANS.]

65. At an Athenian banquet each guest in turn, when the time came to sing, was supposed to cap the singer before him by choosing an appropriate drinking song.

Here they come back again. Go to the devil, you scoundrels!

SECOND ATHENIAN. Get out, I say! They're coming out from the feast.

[Enter the Spartan and Athenian envoys, followed by LYSISTRATA and all the women.]

SPARTAN. [To one of his fellow-envoys] My good fellow, take up your pipes; I want to do a fancy two-step and sing a jolly song for the Athenians.

ATHENIAN. Yes, do take your pipes, by all means. I'd love to see you dance.

SPARTAN. [Singing and dancing with the CHORUS OF SPARTANS]

These youths inspire
To song and dance, O Memory;
Stir up my Muse, to tell how we
And Athens' men, in our galleys clashing
At Artemisium,[66] 'gainst foemen dashing
In godlike ire,
Conquered the Persian and set Greece free.

Leonidas
Led on his valiant warriors
Whetting their teeth like angry boars.
Abundant foam on their lips was flow'ring,
A stream of sweat from their limbs was show'ring.
The Persian was Numberless as the sand on the shores.

O Huntress[67] who slayest the beasts in the glade,
O Virgin divine, hither come to our truce,
Unite us in bonds which all time will not loose.
Grant us to find in this treaty, we pray,
An unfailing source of true friendship today,
And all of our days, helping us to refrain
From weaseling tricks which bring war in their train.
Then hither, come hither! O huntress maid.

LYSISTRATA. Come then, since all is fairly done, men of Sparta, lead away your wives, and you, Athenians, take yours. Let every man stand beside his wife, and every wife beside her man, and then, to celebrate our fortune, let's dance. And in the future, let's take care to avoid these misunderstandings.

CHORUS OF ATHENIANS. [Singing and dancing]

Lead on the dances, your graces revealing.
Call Artemis hither, call Artemis' twin,

66. the indecisive naval battle which took place off the coast while Leonidas held the pass at Thermopylae.

67. Artemis.

Leader of dances, Apollo the Healing, Kindly God—hither! let's summon him in!

Nysian Bacchus call,
Who with his Maenads, his eyes flashing fire,
Dances, and last of all
Zeus of the thunderbolt flaming, the Sire.
And Hera in majesty,
Queen of prosperity.

Come, ye Powers who dwell above Unforgetting, our witnesses be
Of Peace with bonds of harmonious love—
The Peace which Cypris has wrought for me.
Alleluia! Io Paean!
Leap in joy—hurrah! hurrah!
'Tis victory—hurrah! hurrah!
Euoi! Euoi! Euai! Euai!

LYSISTRATA. [To the Spartans] Come now, sing a new song to cap ours.
CHORUS OF SPARTANS. [Singing and dancing]
Leaving Taygetus fair and renown'd,
Muse of Laconia,[68] hither come:
Amyclae's god[69] in hymns resound,
Athene of the Brazen Home,[70]
And Castor and Pollux, Tyndareus' sons,
Who sport where Eurotas[71] murmuring runs.

On with the dance! Heia! Ho!
All leaping along,
Mantles a-swinging as we go!
Of Sparta our song.
There the holy chorus ever gladdens,
There the beat of stamping feet,
As our winsome fillies, lovely maidens,
Dance, beside Eurotas' banks a-skipping,— Nimbly go to and fro
Hast'ning, leaping feet in measures tripping,
Like the Bacchae's revels, hair a-streaming.
Leda's child, divine and mild,
Leads the holy dance, her fair face beaming.
On with the dance! as your hand Presses the hair
Streaming away unconfined.

68. the Spartan region.
69. Amyclae: part of Sparta.
70. the bronze-plated temple of Athena in Sparta.
71. the river of Sparta.

Leap in the air
Light as the deer; footsteps resound
Aiding our dance, beating the ground.
Praise Athene, Maid divine, unrivalled in her might,
Dweller in the Brazen Home, unconquered in the fight.
[All go out singing and dancing.]

PLATO

(429?–347 B.C.)

The Apology of Socrates*

How you, O Athenians, have been affected by my accusers, I cannot tell; but I know that they almost made me forget who I was—so persuasively did they speak; and yet they have hardly uttered a word of truth. But of the many falsehoods told by them, there was one which quite amazed me;—I mean when they said that you should be upon your guard and not allow yourselves to be deceived by the force of my eloquence. To say this, when they were certain to be detected as soon as I opened my lips and proved myself to be anything but a great speaker, did indeed appear to me most shameless—unless by the force of eloquence they mean the force of truth; for if such is their meaning, I admit that I am eloquent. But in how different a way from theirs! Well, as I was saying, they have scarcely spoken the truth at all; but from me you shall hear the whole truth: not, however, delivered after their manner in a set oration duly ornamented with words and phrases. No, by heaven! but I shall use the words and arguments which occur to me at the moment; for I am confident in the justice of my cause: at my time of life I ought not to be appearing before you, O men of Athens, in the character of a juvenile orator—let no one expect it of me. And I must beg of you to grant me a favour:—If I defend myself in my accustomed manner, and you hear me using the words which I have been in the habit of using in the agora,[1] at the tables of the money-changers, or anywhere else, I would ask you not to be surprised, and not to interrupt me on this account. For I am more than seventy years of age, and appearing now for the first time in a court of law, I am quite a stranger to the language of the place; and therefore I would have you regard me as if I were really a stranger, whom you would excuse if he spoke in his native tongue, and after the fashion of his country:—Am I making an unfair request of you? Never mind the manner, which may or may not be good; but think only of the truth of my words, and give heed to that: let the speaker speak truly and the judge decide justly.

* Translated by Benjamin Jowett. "Apology" means "defense."

1. the market place.

And first, I have to reply to the older charges[2] and to my first accusers, and then I will go on to the later ones. For of old I have had many accusers, who have accused me falsely to you during many years; and I am more afraid of them than of Anytus and his associates, who are dangerous, too, in their own way. But far more dangerous are the others, who began when you were children, and took possession of your minds with their falsehoods, telling of one Socrates, a wise man, who speculated about the heaven above, and searched into the earth beneath, and made the worse appear the better cause.[3] The disseminators of this tale are the accusers whom I dread; for their hearers are apt to fancy that such enquirers do not believe in the existence of the gods. And they are many, and their charges against me are of ancient date, and they were made by them in the days when you were more impressible than you are now—in childhood, or it may have been in youth—and the cause when heard went by default, for there was none to answer. And hardest of all, I do not know and cannot tell the names of my accusers; unless in the chance case of a Comic poet.[4] All who from envy and malice have persuaded you—some of them having first convinced themselves—all this class of men are most difficult to deal with; for I cannot have them up here, and cross-examine them, and therefore I must simply fight with shadows in my own defence, and argue when there is no one who answers. I will ask you then to assume with me, as I was saying, that my opponents are of two kinds; one recent, the other ancient: and I hope that you will see the propriety[5] of my answering the latter first, for these accusations you heard long before the others, and much oftener.

Well, then, I must make my defence, and endeavor to clear away in a short time, a slander which has lasted a long time. May I succeed, if to succeed be for my good and yours, or likely to avail me in my cause! The task is not an easy one; I quite understand the

2. Socrates had been the object of much criticism and satire for many years before the trial. He here disregards legal forms and announces that he will deal first with the prejudices that lie behind the formal charge that has been brought against him.

3. He was accused by some of his enemies of being a materialist philosopher who speculated about the physical nature of the universe, and by others of being one of the Sophists, professional teachers of rhetoric and other subjects, many of whom taught methods which were more effective than honest. (See footnotes 7 and 29, on Protagoras and Anaxagoras.)

4. He is referring to the poet Aristophanes, whose play The Clouds (produced in 423 B.C.) is a broad satire on Socrates and his associates, and a good example of the prejudice Socrates is dealing with, for it presents him propounding fantastic theories about matter and religion, and teaching students how to avoid payment of debts.

5. He says this with his tongue in his cheek, for he is actually paying no attention to legal propriety. This becomes clearer below, where he goes so far as to paraphrase the actual terms of the indictment and put into the mouths of his accusers the prejudice he claims is the basis of their action.

nature of it. And so leaving the event with God, in obedience to the law I will now make my defence.

I will begin at the beginning, and ask what is the accusation which has given rise to the slander of me, and in fact has encouraged Meletus to prefer this charge against me. Well, what do the slanderers say? They shall be my prosecutors, and I will sum up their words in an affidavit: 'Socrates is an evil-doer, and a curious person, who searches into things under the earth and in heaven, and he makes the worse appear the better cause; and he teaches the aforesaid doctrines to others.' Such is the nature of the accusation: it is just what you have yourselves seen in the comedy of Aristophanes, who has introduced a man whom he calls Socrates, going about and saying that he walks in air,[6] and talking a deal of nonsense concerning matters of which I do not pretend to know either much or little—not that I mean to speak disparagingly of any one who is a student of natural philosophy. I should be very sorry if Meletus could bring so grave a charge against me. But the simple truth is, O Athenians, that I have nothing to do with physical speculations. Very many of those here present are witnesses to the truth of this, and to them I appeal. Speak then, you who have heard me, and tell your neighbours whether any of you have ever known me hold forth in few words or in many upon such matters. . . . You hear their answer. And from what they say of this part of the charge you will be able to judge of the truth of the rest.

As little foundation is there for the report that I am a teacher, and take money;[7] this accusation has no more truth in it than the other. Although, if a man were really able to instruct mankind, to receive money for giving instruction would, in my opinion, be an honour to him. There is Gorgias[8] of Leontium, and Prodicus[9] of Ceos, and Hippias[10] of Elis, who go the round of the cities, and are able to persuade the young men to leave their own citizens by whom they might be taught for nothing, and come to them whom they not only pay, but are thankful if they may be allowed to pay them. There is at this time a Parian[11] philosopher residing in

6. In the comedy of Aristophanes Socrates first appears suspended in a basket, and when asked what he is doing replies, "I walk in air and contemplate the sun." He explains that only by suspending his intelligence can he investigate celestial matters.

7. Unlike Socrates, who beggared himself in the quest for truth, the professional teachers made great fortunes. The wealth of Protagoras, the first of the Sophists who demanded fees, was proverbial.

8. from Leontium in Sicily; he was famous as the originator of an antithetical, ornate prose style which had great influence.

9. from Ceos, an island in the Aegean; he taught rhetoric and was well-known for his pioneering grammatical studies.

10. from Elis, in the Peloponnese; he claimed to be able to teach any and all subjects, including handicrafts.

11. from Paros, a small island in the Aegean.

Athens, of whom I have heard; and I came to hear of him in this way:—I came across a man who has spent a world of money on the Sophists, Callias, the son of Hipponicus, and knowing that he had sons, I asked him: 'Callias,' I said, 'if your two sons were foals or calves, there would be no difficulty in finding some one to put over them; we should hire a trainer of horses, or a farmer probably, who would improve and perfect them in their own proper virtue and excellence; but as they are human beings, whom are you thinking of placing over them? Is there any one who understands human and political virtue? You must have thought about the matter, for you have sons; is there any one?' 'There is,' he said. 'Who is he?' said I; 'and of what country? and what does he charge?' 'Evenus the Parian,' he replied; 'he is the man, and his charge is five minae.'[12] Happy is Evenus, I said to myself; if he really has this wisdom, and teaches at such a moderate charge. Had I the same, I should have been very proud and conceited; but the truth is that I have no knowledge of the kind.

I dare say, Athenians, that some one among you will reply, 'Yes, Socrates, but what is the origin of these accusations which are brought against you; there must have been something strange which you have been doing? All these rumours and this talk about you would never have arisen if you had been like other men: tell us, then, what is the cause of them, for we should be sorry to judge hastily of you.' Now I regard this as a fair challenge, and I will endeavour to explain to you the reason why I am called wise and have such an evil fame. Please to attend then. And although some of you may think that I am joking, I declare that I will tell you the entire truth. Men of Athens, this reputation of mine has come of a certain sort of wisdom which I possess. If you ask me what kind of wisdom, I reply, wisdom such as may perhaps be attained by man, for to that extent I am inclined to believe that I am wise; whereas the persons of whom I was speaking have a superhuman wisdom, which I may fail to describe, because I have it not myself; and he who says that I have, speaks falsely, and is taking away my character. And here, O men of Athens, I must beg you not to interrupt me, even if I seem to say something extravagant. For the word which I will speak is not mine. I will refer you to a witness who is worthy of credit; that witness shall be the God of Delphi[13]—he will tell you about my wisdom, if I have any, and of what sort it is. You must have known Chaerephon;[14] he was early a friend of mine, and also a friend of yours, for he shared in the recent exile of the people,[15] and returned with you. Well, Chaerephon, as you

12. a relatively moderate sum; Protagoras is said to have charged a hundred minae for a course of instruction.

13. the oracle of Apollo at Delphi.

14. one of Socrates' closest associates; he appears in Aristophanes' comedy.

15. Chaerephon was an enthusiastic know, was very impetuous in all his doings, and he went to Delphi and boldly asked the oracle to tell him whether—as I was saying, I must beg you not to interrupt—he asked the oracle to tell him whether any one was wiser than I was, and the Pythian prophetess answered, that there was no man wiser. Chaerephon is dead himself; but his brother, who is in court, will confirm the truth of what I am saying.

Why do I mention this? Because I am going to explain to you why I have such an evil name. When I heard the answer, I said to myself, What can the god mean? and what is the interpretation of his riddle? for I know that I have no wisdom, small or great. What then can he mean when he says that I am the wisest of men? And yet he is a god, and cannot lie; that would be against his nature. After long consideration, I thought of a method of trying the question. I reflected that if I could only find a man wiser than myself, then I might go to the god with a refutation in my hand. I should say to him, 'Here is a man who is wiser than I am; but you said that I was the wisest.' Accordingly I went to one who had the reputation of wisdom, and observed him—his name I need not mention; he was a politician whom I selected for examination—and the result was as follows: When I began to talk with him, I could not help thinking that he was not really wise, although he was thought wise by many, and still wiser by himself; and thereupon I tried to explain to him that he thought himself wise, but was not really wise; and the consequence was that he hated me, and his enmity was shared by several who were present and heard me. So I left him, saying to myself, as I went away: Well, although I do not suppose that either of us knows anything really beautiful and good, I am better off than he is,—for he knows nothing, and thinks that he knows; I neither know nor think that I know. In this latter particular, then, I seem to have slightly the advantage of him. Then I went to another who had still higher pretensions to wisdom, and my conclusion was exactly the same. Whereupon I made another enemy of him, and of many others besides him.

Then I went to one man after another, being not unconscious of the enmity which I provoked, and I lamented and feared this: But necessity was laid upon me,—the word of God, I thought, ought to be considered first. And I said to myself, Go I must to all who appear to know, and find out the meaning of the oracle. And I swear to you, Athenians, by the dog I swear![16]—for I must tell you the truth—the result of my mission was just this: I found that enough partisan of the democratic regime to have to go into exile in 404 B.C. when the Thirty Tyrants carried on an oligarchic reign of terror. The phrase "the recent exile of the people" refers to the exile into which all known champions of democracy were forced until the democracy was restored.

16. a euphemistic oath (compare, "by George").

the men most in repute were all but the most foolish; and that others less esteemed were really wiser and better. I will tell you the tale of my wanderings and of the 'Herculean' labours, as I may call them, which I endured only to find at last the oracle irrefutable. After the politicians, I went to the poets; tragic, dithyrambic,[17] and all sorts. And there, I said to myself, you will be instantly detected; now you will find out that you are more ignorant than they are. Accordingly, I took them some of the most elaborate passages in their own writings, and asked what was the meaning of them—thinking that they would teach me something. Will you believe me? I am almost ashamed to confess the truth, but I must say that there is hardly a person present who would not have talked better about their poetry than they did themselves. Then I knew that not by wisdom do poets write poetry, but by a sort of genius and inspiration; they are like diviners or soothsayers who also say many fine things, but do not understand the meaning of them.[18] The poets appeared to me to be much in the same case; and I further observed that upon the strength of their poetry they believed themselves to be the wisest of men in other things in which they were not wise. So I departed, conceiving myself to be superior to them for the same reason that I was superior to the politicians.

At last I went to the artisans, for I was conscious that I knew nothing at all, as I may say, and I was sure that they knew many fine things; and here I was not mistaken, for they did know many things of which I was ignorant, and in this they certainly were wiser than I was. But I observed that even the good artisans fell into the same error as the poets;—because they were good workmen they thought that they also knew all sorts of high matters, and this defect in them overshadowed their wisdom; and therefore I asked myself on behalf of the oracle, whether I would like to be as I was, neither having their knowledge nor their ignorance, or like them in both; and I made answer to myself and to the oracle that I was better off as I was.

This inquisition has led to my having many enemies of the worst and most dangerous kind, and has given occasion also to many calumnies. And I am called wise, for my hearers always imagine that I myself possess the wisdom which I find wanting in others: but the truth is, O men of Athens, that God only is wise; and by his answer he intends to show that the wisdom of men is worth little or nothing; he is not speaking of Socrates, he is only using my name by way of illustration, as if he said, He, O men, is the wisest, who, like Socrates, knows that his wisdom is in truth worth

17. The dithyramb was a short performance by a chorus, produced, like tragedy, at state expense and at a public festival.

18. For a fuller exposition of this famous theory of poetic inspiration see Plato's Ion.

nothing. And so I go about the world, obedient to the god, and search and make enquiry into the wisdom of any one, whether citizen or stranger, who appears to be wise; and if he is not wise, then in vindication of the oracle I show him that he is not wise; and my occupation quite absorbs me, and I have no time to give either to any public matter of interest or to any concern of my own, but I am in utter poverty by reason of my devotion to the god.

There is another thing:—young men of the richer classes, who have not much to do, come about me of their own accord; they like to hear the pretenders examined, and they often imitate me, and proceed to examine others; there are plenty of persons, as they quickly discover, who think that they know something, but really know little or nothing; and then those who are examined by them instead of being angry with themselves are angry with me: This confounded Socrates, they say; this villainous misleader of youth! —and then if somebody asks them, Why, what evil does he practice or teach? they do not know, and cannot tell; but in order that they may not appear to be at a loss, they repeat the ready-made charges which are used against all philosophers about teaching things up in the clouds and under the earth, and having no gods, and making the worse appear the better cause; for they do not like to confess that their pretence of knowledge has been detected—which is the truth; and as they are numerous and ambitious and energetic, and are drawn up in battle array and have persuasive tongues, they have filled your ears with their loud and inveterate calumnies. And this is the reason why my three accusers, Meletus and Anytus and Lycon, have set upon me; Meletus, who has a quarrel with me on behalf of the poets; Anytus, on behalf of the craftsmen and politicians; Lycon,[19] on behalf of the rhetoricians: and as I said at the beginning, I cannot expect to get rid of such a mass of calumny all in a moment. And this, O men of Athens, is the truth and the whole truth; I have concealed nothing, I have dissembled nothing. And yet, I know that my plainness of speech makes them hate me, and what is their hatred but a proof that I am speaking the truth?—Hence has arisen the prejudice against me; and this is the reason of it, as you will find out either in this or in any future enquiry.

I have said enough in my defence against the first class of my accusers; I turn to the second class. They are headed by Meletus, that good man and true lover of his country, as he calls himself. Against these, too, I must try to make a defence:—Let their affidavit be read: it contains something of this kind: It says that Socrates is a doer of evil, who corrupts the youth; and who does not believe in the gods of the state, but has other new divinities[20] of his own.

19. the three accusers. Anytus was a prominent politician; the connection of Meletus with poetry and of Lycon with rhetoric is known only from this passage.

20. The precise meaning of the

Such is the charge; and now let us examine the particular counts. He says that I am a doer of evil, and corrupt the youth; but I say, O men of Athens, that Meletus is a doer of evil, in that he pretends to be in earnest when he is only in jest, and is so eager to bring men to trial from a pretended zeal and interest about matters in which he really never had the smallest interest. And the truth of this I will endeavour to prove to you.

Come hither, Meletus, and let me ask a question[21] of you. You think a great deal about the improvement of youth?

Yes, I do.

Tell the judges, then, who is their improver; for you must know, as you have taken the pains to discover their corrupter, and are citing and accusing me before them. Speak, then, and tell the judges who their improver is.—Observe, Meletus, that you are silent, and have nothing to say. But is not this rather disgraceful, and a very considerable proof of what I was saying, that you have no interest in the matter? Speak up, friend, and tell us who their improver is.

The laws.

But that, my good sir, is not my meaning. I want to know who the person is, who, in the first place, knows the laws.

The judges,[22] Socrates, who are present in court.

What, do you mean to say, Meletus, that they are able to instruct and improve youth?

Certainly they are.

What, all of them, or some only and not others?

All of them.

By the goddess Here,[23] that is good news! There are plenty of improvers, then. And what do you say of the audience,—do they improve them?

Yes, they do.

And the senators?[24]

---

charge is not clear. As this translation indicates, the Greek words may mean "new divinities," with a reference to Socrates' famous inner voice, which from time to time warned him against action on which he had decided. Or the words may mean "practicing strange rites," though this charge is difficult to understand. In any case, the importance of the phrase is that it implies religious belief of some sort and can later be used against Meletus when he loses his head and accuses Socrates of atheism.

21. Socrates avails himself of his right to interrogate the accuser. He is, of course, a master in this type of examination, for he has spent his life in the practice of puncturing inflated pretensions and exposing logical contradictions in the arguments of his adversaries. He is here fulfilling his earlier promise to defend himself in the manner to which he has been accustomed and use the words which he has been in the habit of using in the agora (p. 521).

22. the jury. There was no judge in the Athenian law court. The Athenian jury was large; in this trial it probably consisted of five hundred citizens. In the following questions Socrates forces Meletus to extend the capacity to improve the youth to successively greater numbers, until it appears that the entire citizen body is a good influence and Socrates the only bad one. Meletus is caught in the trap of his own demagogic appeal.

23. Hera.

24. the members of the standing council of the assembly, five hundred in number.

Yes, the senators improve them.

But perhaps the members of the assembly[25] corrupt them?—or do they too improve them?

They improve them.

Then every Athenian improves and elevates them; all with the exception of myself; and I alone am their corrupter? Is that what you affirm?

That is what I stoutly affirm.

I am very unfortunate if you are right. But suppose I ask you a question: How about horses?[26] Does one man do them harm and all the world good? Is not the exact opposite the truth? One man is able to do them good, or at least not many;—the trainer of horses, that is to say, does them good, and others who have to do with them rather injure them? Is not that true, Meletus, of horses, or any other animals? Most assuredly it is; whether you and Anytus say yes or no. Happy indeed would be the condition of youth if they had one corrupter only, and all the rest of the world were their improvers. But you, Meletus, have sufficiently shown that you never had a thought about the young: your carelessness is seen in your not caring about the very things which you bring against me.

And now, Meletus, I will ask you another question—by Zeus I will: Which is better, to live among bad citizens, or among good ones? Answer, friend, I say; the question is one which may be easily answered. Do not the good do their neighbours good, and the bad do them evil?

Certainly.

And is there any one who would rather be injured than benefited by those who live with him? Answer, my good friend, the law requires you to answer—does any one like to be injured?

Certainly not.

And when you accuse me of corrupting and deteriorating the youth, do you allege that I corrupt them intentionally or unintentionally?

Intentionally, I say.

But you have just admitted that the good do their neighbours good, and evil do them evil. Now, is that a truth which your superior wisdom has recognized thus early in life, and am I, at my age, in such darkness and ignorance as not to know that if a man with whom I have to live is corrupted by me, I am very likely to be harmed by him; and yet I corrupt him, and intentionally, too—so you say, although neither I nor any other human being is ever likely to be convinced by you. But either I do not corrupt them, or I

25. the sovereign body in the Athenian constitution, theoretically an assembly of the whole citizen body.

26. This simple analogy is typical of the Socratic method; he is still defending himself in his accustomed manner.

corrupt them unintentionally; and on either view of the case you lie. If my offence is unintentional, the law has no cognizance of unintentional offences: you ought to have taken me privately, and warned and admonished me; for if I had been better advised, I should have left off doing what I only did unintentionally—no doubt I should; but you would have nothing to say to me and refused to teach me. And now you bring me up in this court, which is not a place of instruction, but of punishment.

It will be very clear to you, Athenians, as I was saying, that Meletus has no care at all, great or small, about the matter. But still I should like to know, Meletus, in what I am affirmed to corrupt the young. I suppose you mean, as I infer from your indictment, that I teach them not to acknowledge the gods which the state acknowledges, but some other new divinities or spiritual agencies in their stead. These are the lessons by which I corrupt the youth, as you say.

Yes, that I say emphatically.

Then, by the gods, Meletus, of whom we are speaking, tell me and the court, in somewhat plainer terms, what you mean! for I do not as yet understand whether you affirm that I teach other men to acknowledge some gods, and therefore that I do believe in gods, and am not an entire atheist—this you do not lay to my charge,—but only you say that they are not the same gods which the city recognizes—the charge is that they are different gods. Or, do you mean that I am an atheist simply, and a teacher of atheism?

I mean the latter—that you are a complete atheist.[27]

What an extraordinary statement! Why do you think so, Meletus? Do you mean that I do not believe in the godhead of the sun or moon, like other men?

I assure you, judges, that he does not: for he says that the sun is stone, and the moon earth.[28]

Friend Meletus, you think that you are accusing Anaxagoras: and you have but a bad opinion of the judges, if you fancy them illiterate to such a degree as not to know that these doctrines are found in the books of Anaxagoras[29] the Clazomenian, which are full of them. And so, forsooth, the youth are said to be taught them by Socrates, when there are not unfrequently exhibitions of them at the theatre[30] (price of admission one drachma at the most); and

27. Meletus jumps at the most damaging charge, and falls into the trap.

28. Meletus falls back on the old prejudices which Socrates claims are the real indictment against him.

29. a fifth-century philosopher from Clazomenae in Asia Minor. He was an intimate friend of Pericles, but this did not save him from indictment for impiety. He was condemned, and forced to leave Athens. He is famous for his doctrine that matter was set in motion and ordered by Intelligence (Nous), which, however, did not create it. He also declared that the sun was a mass of red-hot metal larger than the Peloponnese, and that there were hills and ravines on the moon.

30. I.e., the doctrines of Anaxagoras are reflected in the works of the tragic they might pay their money, and laugh at Socrates if he pretends to father these extraordinary views. And so, Meletus, you really think that I do not believe in any god?

I swear by Zeus that you believe absolutely in none at all.

Nobody will believe you, Meletus, and I am pretty sure that you do not believe yourself. I cannot help thinking, men of Athens, that Meletus is reckless and impudent, and that he has written this indictment in a spirit of mere wantonness and youthful bravado. Has he not compounded a riddle, thinking to try me? He said to himself:—I shall see whether the wise Socrates will discover my facetious contradiction, or whether I shall be able to deceive him and the rest of them. For he certainly does appear to me to contradict himself in the indictment as much as if he said that Socrates is guilty of not believing in the gods, and yet of believing in them—but this is not like a person who is in earnest.

I should like you, O men of Athens, to join me in examining what I conceive to be his inconsistency; and do you, Meletus, answer. And I must remind the audience of my request that they would not make a disturbance[31] if I speak in my accustomed manner:

Did ever man, Meletus, believe in the existence of human things, and not of human beings? . . . I wish, men of Athens, that he would answer, and not be always trying to get up an interruption. Did ever any man believe in horsemanship, and not in horses? or in flute-playing, and not in flute-players? No, my friend; I will answer to you and to the court, as you refuse to answer for yourself. There is no man who ever did. But now please to answer the next question: Can a man believe in spiritual and divine agencies, and not in spirits or demigods?

He cannot.

How lucky I am to have extracted that answer, by the assistance of the court! But then you swear in the indictment that I teach and believe in divine or spiritual agencies (new or old, no matter for that); at any rate, I believe in spiritual agencies,—so you say and swear in the affidavit; and yet if I believe in divine beings, how can I help believing in spirits or demigods;—must I not? To be sure I must; and therefore I may assume that your silence gives consent. Now what are spirits or demigods? are they not either gods or the sons of gods?

Certainly they are.

But this is what I call the facetious riddle invented by you: the poets; or the words may mean simply that Anaxagoras' book was on sale at the theater.

31. The disturbance is presumably due to the frustration of the enemies of Socrates, who see him assuming complete control of the proceedings and turning them into a street-corner argument of the type in which he is invincible.

demigods or spirits are gods, and you say first that I do not believe in gods, and then again that I do believe in gods; that is, if I believe in demigods. For if the demigods are the illegitimate sons of gods, whether by the nymphs or by any other mothers, of whom they are said to be the sons—what human being will ever believe that there are no gods if they are the sons of gods? You might as well affirm the existence of mules, and deny that of horses and asses. Such nonsense, Meletus, could only have been intended by you to make trial of me. You have put this into the indictment because you had nothing real of which to accuse me. But no one who has a particle of understanding will ever be convinced by you that the same men can believe in divine and superhuman things, and yet not believe that there are gods and demigods and heroes.

I have said enough in answer to the charge of Meletus: any elaborate defence is unnecessary; but I know only too well how many are the enmities which I have incurred, and this is what will be my destruction if I am destroyed;—not Meletus, nor yet Anytus, but the envy and detraction of the world, which has been the death of many good men, and will probably be the death of many more; there is no danger of my being the last of them.

Some one will say: And are you not ashamed, Socrates, of a course of life which is likely to bring you to an untimely end? To him I may fairly answer: There you are mistaken: a man who is good for anything ought not to calculate the chance of living or dying; he ought only to consider whether in doing anything he is doing right or wrong—acting the part of a good man or of a bad. Whereas, upon your view, the heroes who fell at Troy were not good for much, and the son of Thetis[32] above all, who altogether despised danger in comparison with disgrace; and when he was so eager to slay Hector, his goddess mother said to him, that if he avenged his companion Patroclus, and slew Hector, he would die himself—'Fate,' she said, in these or the like words, 'waits for you next after Hector;' he, receiving this warning, utterly despised danger and death, and instead of fearing them, feared rather to live in dishonour, and not to avenge his friend. 'Let me die forthwith,' he replies, 'and be avenged of my enemy, rather than abide here by the beaked ships, a laughing-stock and a burden of the earth.' Had Achilles any thought of death and danger? For wherever a man's place is, whether the place which he has chosen or that in which he has been placed by a commander, there he ought to remain in hour of danger; he should not think of death or of anything but of disgrace. And this, O men of Athens, is a true saying.

Strange, indeed, would be my conduct, O men of Athens, if I who, when I was ordered by the generals whom you chose to command me at Potidaea and Amphipolis and Delium,[33] remained where they placed me, like any other man, facing death—if now, when, as I conceive and imagine, God orders me to fulfil the philosopher's mission of searching into myself and other men, I were to desert my post through fear of death, or any other fear; that would indeed be strange, and I might justly be arraigned in court for denying the existence of the gods, if I disobeyed the oracle because I was afraid of death, fancying that I was wise when I was not wise. For the fear of death is indeed the pretence of wisdom, and not real wisdom, being a pretence of knowing the unknown; and no one knows whether death, which men in their fear apprehend to be the greatest evil, may not be the greatest good. Is not this ignorance of a disgraceful sort, the ignorance which is the conceit that man knows what he does not know? And in this respect only I believe myself to differ from men in general, and may perhaps claim to be wiser than they are:—that whereas I know but little of the world below,[34] I do not suppose that I know: but I do know that injustice and disobedience to a better, whether God or man, is evil and dishonourable, and I will never fear or avoid a possible good rather than a certain evil. And therefore if you let me go now, and are not convinced by Anytus, who said that since I had been prosecuted I must be put to death (or if not that I ought never to have been prosecuted at all); and that if I escape now, your sons will all be utterly ruined by listening to my words—if you say to me, Socrates, this time we will not mind Anytus, and you shall be let off, but upon one condition, that you are not to enquire and speculate in this way any more, and that if you are caught doing so again you shall die:—if this was the condition on which you let me go, I should reply: Men of Athens, I honour and love you; but I shall obey God rather than you, and while I have life and strength I shall never cease from the practice and teaching of philosophy, exhorting any one whom I meet and saying to him after my manner: You, my friend,—a citizen of the great and mighty and wise city of Athens,—are you not ashamed of heaping up the greatest amount of money and honour and reputation, and caring so little about wisdom and truth and the greatest improvement of the soul, which you never regard or heed at all? And if the person with whom I am arguing, says: Yes, but I do care; then I do not leave him or let him go at once; but I proceed to interrogate and examine and cross-examine him, and if I think that he has no virtue in him, but only says that he has, I reproach him with undervaluing the greater, and overvaluing the less. And I shall repeat the same words to every one whom I meet, young and old, citizen and alien, but especially to the citizens, inasmuch as they are my brethren. For know that this is the command of God; and I believe that no greater good has ever happened in the state than my service to the God. For I do nothing but go about persuading you all, old and young alike, not to take thought for your persons or your properties, but first and chiefly to care about the greatest improvement of the soul. I tell you that virtue is not given by money, but that from virtue comes money and every other good of man, public as well as private. This is my teaching, and if this is the doctrine which corrupts the youth, I am a mischievous person. But if any one says that this is not my teaching, he is speaking an untruth. Wherefore, O men of Athens, I say to you, do as Anytus bids or not as Anytus bids, and either acquit me or not; but whichever you do, understand that I shall never alter my ways, not even if I have to die many times.

32. Achilles. See the Iliad, Book XVIII, ll. 94 ff.

33. three of the battles in the Peloponnesian War in which Socrates had fought as an infantryman. The battle at Potidaea (in northern Greece) occurred in 432 B.C. (For a fuller account of Socrates' conduct there see Plato's Symposium.) The date of the battle at Amphipolis (in northern Greece) is uncertain. The battle at Delium (in central Greece) took place in 424 B.C.

34. the next world. The dead were supposed to carry on a sort of existence below the earth.

Men of Athens, do not interrupt,[35] but hear me; there was an understanding between us that you should hear me to the end: I have something more to say, at which you may be inclined to cry out; but I believe that to hear me will be good for you, and therefore I beg that you will not cry out. I would have you know, that if you kill such an one as I am, you will injure yourselves more than you will injure me. Nothing will injure me, not Meletus nor yet Anytus—they cannot, for a bad man is not permitted to injure a better than himself. I do not deny that Anytus may, perhaps, kill him, or drive him into exile, or deprive him of civil rights; and he may imagine, and others may imagine, that he is inflicting a great injury upon him: but there I do not agree. For the evil of doing as he is doing—the evil of unjustly taking away the life of another—is greater far.

And now, Athenians, I am not going to argue for my own sake, as you may think, but for yours, that you may not sin against the God by condemning me, who am his gift to you. For if you kill me you will not easily find a successor to me, who, if I may use such a ludicrous figure of speech, am a sort of gadfly, given to the state by God; and the state is a great and noble steed who is tardy in his motions owing to his very size, and requires to be stirred into life. I am that gadfly which God has attached to the state, and all day long and in all places am always fastening upon you, arousing and persuading and reproaching you. You will not easily find another like me, and therefore I would advise you to spare me. I dare say that you may feel out of temper (like a person who is suddenly awakened from sleep), and you think that you might easily strike me dead as Anytus advises, and then you would sleep on for the remainder of your lives, unless God in his care of you sent you another gadfly. When I say that I am given to you by God, the proof of my mission is this:—if I had been like other men, I should not have neglected all my own concerns or patiently seen the neglect of them during all these years, and have been doing yours, coming to you individually like a father or elder brother, exhorting you to regard virtue; such conduct, I say, would be unlike human nature. If I had gained anything, or if my exhortations had been paid, there would have been some sense in my doing so; but now, as you will perceive, not even the impudence of my accusers dares to say that I have ever exacted or sought pay of any one; of that they have no witness. And I have a sufficient witness to the truth of what I say—my poverty.

35. The disturbance this time is presumably more general, for Socrates is defying the court and the people.

Some one may wonder why I go about in private giving advice and busying myself with the concerns of others, but do not venture to come forward in public and advise the state. I will tell you why. You have heard me speak at sundry times and in divers places of an oracle or sign which comes to me, and is the divinity which Meletus ridicules in the indictment. This sign, which is a kind of voice, first began to come to me when I was a child; it always forbids but never commands me to do anything which I am going to do. This is what deters me from being a politician. And rightly, as I think. For I am certain, O men of Athens, that if I had engaged in politics, I should have perished long ago, and done no good either to you or to myself. And do not be offended at my telling you the truth: for the truth is, that no man who goes to war with you or any other multitude, honestly striving against the many lawless and unrighteous deeds which are done in a state, will save his life; he who will fight for the right, if he would live even for a brief space, must have a private station and not a public one.

I can give you convincing evidence of what I say, not words only, but what you value far more—actions. Let me relate to you a passage of my own life which will prove to you that I should never have yielded to injustice from any fear of death, and that 'as I should have refused to yield' I must have died at once. I will tell you a tale of the courts, not very interesting perhaps, but nevertheless true. The only office of state which I ever held, O men of Athens, was that of senator:[36] the tribe Antiochis,[37] which is my tribe, had the

36. The Council of the Five Hundred consisted of fifty members of each of the ten tribes into which the population was divided. Each tribal delegation acted as a standing committee of the whole body for a part of the year. The members of this standing committee were called Prytanes. In acting as a member of the council Socrates was not "engaging in politics" but simply fulfilling his duty as a citizen when called upon.

37. Socrates' tribe, like the other nine, was named after a mythical hero, in this case Antiochus.

presidency at the trial of the generals who had not taken up the bodies of the slain after the battle of Arginusae;[38] and you proposed to try them in a body, contrary to law, as you all thought afterwards; but at the time I was the only one of the Prytanes who was opposed to the illegality, and I gave my vote against you; and when the orators threatened to impeach and arrest me, and you called and shouted, I made up my mind that I would run the risk, having law and justice with me, rather than take part in your injustice because I feared imprisonment and death. This happened in the days of the democracy.[39] But when the oligarchy of the Thirty[40] was in power, they sent for me and four others into the rotunda,[41] and bade us bring Leon the Salaminian from Salamis,[42] as they wanted to put him to death. This was a specimen of the sort of commands which they were always giving with the view of implicating as many as possible in their crimes; and then I showed, not in word only but in deed, that, if I may be allowed to use such an expression, I cared not a straw for death, and that my great and only care was lest I should do an unrighteous or unholy thing. For the strong arm of that oppressive power did not frighten me into doing wrong; and when we came out of the rotunda the other four went to Salamis and fetched Leon, but I went quietly home. For which I might have lost my life, had not the power of the Thirty shortly afterwards come to an end. And many will witness to my words.

Now do you really imagine that I could have survived all these years, if I had led a public life, supposing that like a good man I had always maintained the right and had made justice, as I ought, the first thing? No indeed, men of Athens, neither I nor any other man. But I have been always the same in all my actions, public as well as private, and never have I yielded any base compliance to those who are slanderously termed my disciples, or to any other. Not that I have any regular disciples. But if any one likes to come and hear me while I am pursuing my mission, whether he be young or old, he is not excluded. Nor do I converse only with those who pay; but any one, whether he be rich or poor, may ask and answer me and listen

38. an Athenian naval victory over Sparta, in 406 B.C. The Athenian commanders failed to pick up the bodies of a large number of Athenians whose ships had been destroyed. Whether they were prevented from doing so by the wind or simply neglected this duty in the excitement of victory is not known; in any case, the Athenian population suspected the worst and put all ten generals on trial, not in a court of law but before the assembly. The generals were tried not individually, but in a group, and condemned to death. The six who had returned to Athens were executed, among them a son of Pericles.

39. Socrates gives two instances of his political actions, one under the democracy and one under the Thirty Tyrants. In both cases, he was in opposition to the government.

40. In 404 B.C., with Spartan backing, the Thirty Tyrants (as they were known to their enemies) ruled for eight months over a defeated Athens. Prominent among them was Critias, who had been one of the rich young men who listened eagerly to Socrates.

41. the circular building in which the Prytanes held their meetings.

42. Athenian territory, an island off Piraeus, the port of Athens.

to my words; and whether he turns out to be a bad man or a good one, neither result can be justly imputed to me; for I never taught or professed to teach him anything. And if any one says that he has ever learned or heard anything from me in private which all the world has not heard, let me tell you that he is lying.

But I shall be asked, Why do people delight in continually conversing with you? I have told you already, Athenians, the whole truth about this matter: they like to hear the cross-examination of the pretenders to wisdom; there is amusement in it. Now this duty of cross-examining other men has been imposed upon me by God; and has been signified to me by oracles, visions, and in every way in which the will of divine power was ever intimated to any one. This is true, O Athenians; or, if not true, would be soon refuted. If I am or have been corrupting the youth, those of them who are now grown up and become sensible that I gave them bad advice in the days of their youth should come forward as accusers, and take their revenge; or if they do not like to come themselves, some of their relatives, fathers, brothers, or other kinsmen, should say what evil their families have suffered at my hands. Now is their time. Many of them I see in the court. There is Crito,[43] who is of the same age and of the same deme[44] with myself, and there is Critobulus his son, whom I also see. Then again there is Lysanias of Sphettus, who is the father of Aeschines—he is present; and also there is Antiphon of Cephisus, who is the father of Epigenes; and there are the brothers of several who have associated with me. There is Nicostratus the son of Theosdotides, and the brother of Theodotus (now Theodotus himself is dead, and therefore he, at any rate, will not seek to stop him); and there is Paralus the son of Demodocus, who had a brother Theages; and Adeimantus the son of Ariston, whose brother Plato[45] is present; and Aeantodorus, who is the brother of Apollodorus, whom I also see. I might mention a great many others, some of whom Meletus should have produced as witnesses in the course of his speech; and let him still produce them, if he has forgotten—I will make way for him. And let him say, if he has any testimony of the sort which he can produce. Nay, Athenians, the very opposite is the truth. For all these are ready to witness on behalf of the corrupter, of the injurer of their kindred, as Meletus and Anytus call me; not the corrupted youth only—there might have been a motive for that—but their uncorrupted elder relatives. Why should they too support me with their testimony? Why, indeed, except for the sake of truth and justice, and because they know that I am speaking the truth, and that Meletus is a liar.

Well, Athenians, this and the like of this is all the defence which

43. a friend of Socrates who later tried to persuade him to escape from prison.

44. precinct; the local unit of Athenian administration.

45. the writer of the Apology.

I have to offer. Yet a word more. Perhaps there may be some one who is offended at me, when he calls to mind how he himself on a similar, or even a less serious occasion, prayed and entreated the judges with many tears, and how he produced his children in court, which was a moving spectacle, together with a host of relations and friends;[46] whereas I, who am probably in danger of my life, will do none of these things. The contrast may occur to his mind, and he may be set against me, and vote in anger because he is displeased at me on this account. Now if there be such a person among you,—mind, I do not say that there is,—to him I may fairly reply: My friend, I am a man, and like other men, a creature of flesh and blood, and not 'of wood or stone,' as Homer says;[47] and I have a family, yes, and sons, O Athenians, three in number, one almost a man, and two others who are still young; and yet I will not bring any of them hither in order to petition you for an acquittal. And why not? Not from any self-assertion or want of respect for you. Whether I am or am not afraid of death is another question, of which I will not now speak. But, having regard to public opinion, I feel that such conduct would be discreditable to myself, and to you, and to the whole state. One who has reached my years, and who has a name for wisdom, ought not to demean himself. Whether this opinion of me be deserved or not, at any rate the world has decided that Socrates is in some way superior to other men. And if those among you who are said to be superior in wisdom and courage, and any other virtue, demean themselves in this way, how shameful is their conduct! I have seen men of reputation, when they have been condemned, behaving in the strangest manner: they seemed to fancy that they were going to suffer something dreadful if they died, and that they could be immortal if you only allowed them to live; and I think that such are a dishonour to the state, and that any stranger coming in would have said of them that the most eminent men of Athens, to whom the Athenians themselves give honour and command, are no better than women. And I say that these things ought not to be done by those of us who have a reputation; and if they are done, you ought not to permit them; you ought rather to show that you are far more disposed to condemn the man who gets up a doleful scene and makes the city ridiculous, than him who holds his peace.

But, setting aside the question of public opinion, there seems to be something wrong in asking a favour of a judge, and thus procuring an acquittal, instead of informing and convincing him. For his

46. The accepted ending of the speech for the defense was an unrestrained appeal to the pity of the jury. Socrates' refusal to make it is another shock for the prejudices of the audience.

47. In the Odyssey, Book XIX, ll. 162–163, Penelope says to her husband Odysseus (who is disguised as a beggar), "Tell me of your family and where you come from. For you did not spring from an oak or a rock, as the old saying goes."

duty is, not to make a present of justice, but to give judgment; and he has sworn that he will judge according to the laws, and not according to his own good pleasure; and we ought not to encourage you, nor should you allow yourself to be encouraged, in this habit of perjury—there can be no piety in that. Do not then require me to do what I consider dishonourable and impious and wrong, especially now, when I am being tried for impiety on the indictment of Meletus. For if, O men of Athens, by force of persuasion and entreaty I could overpower your oaths, then I should be teaching you to believe that there are no gods, and in defending should simply convict myself of the charge of not believing in them. But that is not so—far otherwise. For I do believe that there are gods, and in a sense higher than that in which any of my accusers believe in them. And to you and to God I commit my cause, to be determined by you as is best for you and me.[48]

There are many reasons why I am not grieved, O men of Athens, at the vote of condemnation. I expected it, and am only surprised that the votes are so nearly equal; for I had thought that the majority against me would have been far larger; but now, had thirty votes gone over to the other side, I should have been acquitted. And I may say, I think, that I have escaped Meletus. I may say more; for without the assistance of Anytus and Lycon, any one may see that he would not have had a fifth part of the votes,[49] as the law requires, in which case he would have incurred a fine of a thousand drachmae.

And so he proposes death as the penalty. And what shall I propose on my part, O men of Athens? Clearly that which is my due. And what is my due? What return shall be made to the man who has never had the wit to be idle during his whole life; but has been careless of what the many care for—wealth, and family interests, and military offices, and speaking in the assembly, and magistracies, and plots, and parties. Reflecting that I was really too honest a man to be a politician and live, I did not go where I could do no good to you or to myself; but where I could do the greatest good privately to every one of you, thither I went, and sought to persuade every man among you that he must look to himself, and seek virtue and wisdom before he looks to his private interests, and look to the state before he looks to the interests of the state; and that this should be the order which he observes in all his actions. What shall be done to such an one? Doubtless some good thing, O men of Athens, if he has his reward; and the good should be of a kind suitable to him. What would be a reward suitable to a poor man who is your benefactor, and who desires leisure that he may instruct you? There can be no reward so fitting as maintenance in the Prytaneum,[50] O men of Athens, a reward which he deserves far more than the citizen who has won the prize at Olympia in the horse or chariot race, whether the chariots were drawn by two horses or by many. For I am in want, and he has enough; and he only gives you the appearance of happiness, and I give you the reality. And if I am to estimate the penalty fairly, I should say that maintenance in the Prytaneum is the just return.

48. The jury reaches a verdict of guilty. It appears from what Socrates says later that the jury was split, 280 for this verdict and 220 against it. The penalty is to be settled by the jury's choice between the penalty proposed by the prosecution and that offered by the defense. The jury itself cannot propose a penalty. Meletus demands death. Socrates must propose the lightest sentence he thinks he can get away with, but one heavy enough to satisfy the majority of the jury who voted him guilty. The prosecution probably expects him to propose exile from Athens, but Socrates surprises them.

49. Socrates jokingly divides the votes against him into three parts, one for each of his three accusers, and points out that Meletus' votes fall below the minimum necessary to justify the trial.

Perhaps you think that I am braving you in what I am saying now, as in what I said before about the tears and prayers. But this is not so. I speak rather because I am convinced that I never intentionally wronged any one, although I cannot convince you—the time has been too short; if there were a law at Athens, as there is in other cities, that a capital cause should not be decided in one day,[51] then I believe that I should have convinced you. But I cannot in a moment refute great slander; and, as I am convinced that I never wronged another, I will assuredly not wrong myself. I will not say of myself that I deserve any evil, or propose any penalty. Why should I? Because I am afraid of the penalty of death which Meletus proposes? When I do not know whether death is a good or an evil, why should I propose a penalty which would certainly be an evil? Shall I say imprisonment? And why should I live in prison, and be the slave of the magistrates of the year—of the Eleven?[52] Or shall the penalty be a fine, and imprisonment until the fine is paid? There is the same objection. I should have to lie in prison, for money I have none, and cannot pay. And if I say exile (and this may possibly be the penalty which you will affix), I must indeed be blinded by the love of life, if I am so irrational as to expect that when you, who are my own citizens, cannot endure my discourses and words, and have found them so grievous and odious that you will have no more of them, others are likely to endure me. No indeed, men of Athens, that is not very likely. And what a life should I lead, at my age, wandering from city to city, ever changing my place of exile, and always being driven out! For I am quite sure that wherever I go, there, as here, the young men will flock to me; and if I drive them away, their elders will drive me out at their request; and if I

50. the place in which the Prytanes, as representatives of the city, entertained distinguished visitors and winners at the athletic contests at Olympia.

51. There was such a law in Sparta.

52. a committee which had charge of prisons and of public executions.

let them come, their fathers and friends will drive me out for their sakes.

Some one will say: Yes, Socrates, but cannot you hold your tongue, and then you may go into a foreign city, and no one will interfere with you? Now I have great difficulty in making you understand my answer to this. For if I tell you that to do as you say would be a disobedience to the God, and therefore that I cannot hold my tongue, you will not believe that I am serious; and if I say again that daily to discourse about virtue, and of those other things about which you hear me examining myself and others, is the greatest good of man, and that the unexamined life is not worth living, you are still less likely to believe me. Yet I say what is true, although a thing of which it is hard for me to persuade you. Also, I have never been accustomed to think that I deserve to suffer any harm. Had I money I might have estimated the offence at what I was able to pay, and not have been much the worse. But I have none, and therefore I must ask you to proportion the fine to my means. Well, perhaps I could afford a mina,[53] and therefore I propose that penalty: Plato, Crito, Critobulus, and Appollodorus, my friends here, bid me say thirty minae, and they will be the sureties. Let thirty minae be the penalty; for which sum they will be ample security to you.[54]

Not much time will be gained, O Athenians, in return for the evil name which you will get from the detractors of the city, who will say that you killed Socrates, a wise man; for they will call me wise, even although I am not wise, when they want to reproach you. If you had waited a little while, your desire would have been fulfilled in the course of nature. For I am far advanced in years, as you may perceive, and not far from death. I am speaking now not to all of you, but only to those who have condemned me to death. And I have another thing to say to them: You think that I was convicted because I had no words of the sort which would have procured my acquittal—I mean, if I had thought fit to leave nothing undone or unsaid. Not so; the deficiency which led to my conviction was not of words—certainly not. But I had not the boldness or impudence or inclination to address you as you would have liked me to do, weeping and wailing and lamenting, and saying and doing many things which you have been accustomed to hear from others, and

53. It is almost impossible to express the value of ancient money in modern terms. A mina was a considerable sum; in Aristotle's time (fourth century B.C.) one mina was recognized as a fair ransom for a prisoner of war.

54. The jury decides for death (according to a much later source, the vote this time was 300 to 200). The decision is not surprising in view of Socrates' intransigence. Socrates now makes a final statement to the court.

which, as I maintain, are unworthy of me. I thought at the time that I ought not to do anything common or mean when in danger: nor do I now repent of the style of my defence; I would rather die having spoken after my manner, than speak in your manner and live. For neither in war nor yet at law ought I or any man to use every way of escaping death. Often in battle there can be no doubt that if a man will throw away his arms, and fall on his knees before his pursuers, he may escape death; and in other dangers there are other ways of escaping death, if a man is willing to say and do anything. The difficulty, my friends, is not to avoid death, but to avoid unrighteousness; for that runs faster than death. I am old and move slowly, and the slower runner has overtaken me, and my accusers are keen and quick, and the faster runner, who is unrighteousness, has overtaken them. And now I depart hence condemned by you to suffer the penalty of death,—they too go their ways condemned by the truth to suffer the penalty of villainy and wrong; and I must abide by my award—let them abide by theirs. I suppose that these things may be regarded as fated,—and I think that they are well.

And now, O men who have condemned me, I would fain prophesy to you; for I am about to die, and in the hour of death men are gifted with prophetic power.[55] And I prophesy to you who are my murderers, that immediately after my departure punishment far heavier than you have inflicted on me will surely await you. Me you have killed because you wanted to escape the accuser, and not to give an account of your lives. But that will not be as you suppose: far otherwise. For I say that there will be more accusers of you than there are now;[56] accusers whom hitherto I have restrained: and as they are younger they will be more inconsiderate with you, and you will be more offended at them. If you think that by killing men you can prevent some one from censuring your evil lives, you are mistaken; that is not a way of escape which is either possible or honourable; the easiest and the noblest way is not to be disabling others, but to be improving yourselves. This is the prophecy which I utter before my departure to the judges who have condemned me.

Friends, who would have acquitted me, I would like also to talk with you about the thing which has come to pass, while the magistrates are busy, and before I go to the place at which I must die. Stay then a little, for we may as well talk with one another while there is time. You are my friends, and I should like to show you

55. as the dying Hector foretells the death of Achilles; see the Iliad, Book XXII, ll. 355–360.

56. Socrates' prophecy was fulfilled, for all of the many different philosophical schools of the early fourth century claimed descent from Socrates and developed one or another aspect of his teachings.

the meaning of this event which has happened to me. O my judges —for you I may truly call judges—I should like to tell you of a wonderful circumstance. Hitherto the divine faculty of which the internal oracle is the source has constantly been in the habit of opposing me even about trifles, if I was going to make a slip or error in any matter; and now as you see there has come upon me that which may be thought, and is generally believed to be, the last and worst evil. But the oracle made no sign of opposition, either when I was leaving my house in the morning, or when I was on my way to the court, or while I was speaking, at anything which I was going to say; and yet I have often been stopped in the middle of a speech, but now in nothing I either said or did touching the matter in hand has the oracle opposed me. What do I take to be the explanation of this silence? I will tell you. It is an intimation that what has happened to me is a good, and that those of us who think that death is an evil are in error. For the customary sign would surely have opposed me had I been going to evil and not to good.

Let us reflect in another way, and we shall see that there is great reason to hope that death is a good; for one of two things—either death is a state of nothingness and utter unconsciousness, or, as men say, there is a change and migration of the soul from this world to another. Now if you suppose that there is no consciousness, but a sleep like the sleep of him who is undisturbed even by dreams, death will be an unspeakable gain. For if a person were to select the night in which his sleep was undisturbed even by dreams, and were to compare with this the other days and nights of his life, and then were to tell us how many days and nights he had passed in the course of his life better and more pleasantly than this one, I think that any man, I will not say a private man, but even the great king will not find many such days or nights, when compared with the others. Now if death be of such a nature, I say that to die is gain; for eternity is then only a single night. But if death is the journey to another place, and there, as men say, all the dead abide, what good, O my friends and judges, can be greater than this? If indeed when the pilgrim arrives in the world below, he is delivered from the professors of justice in this world, and finds the true judges who are said to give judgment there, Minos and Rhadamanthus and Aeacus and Triptolemus,[57] and other sons of God who were righteous in their own life, that pilgrimage will be worth making. What would not a man give if he might converse with Orpheus and

57. Minos appears as a judge of the dead in Homer's Odyssey, Book XI; Rhadamanthus and Aeacus, like Minos, were models of just judges in life and after death; Triptolemus, the mythical inventor of agriculture, is associated with judgment in the next world only in this passage. The first three are sons of Zeus.

Musaeus[58] and Hesiod[59] and Homer? Nay, if this be true, let me die again and again. I myself, too, shall have a wonderful interest in there meeting and conversing with Palamedes, and Ajax[60] the son of Telamon, and any other ancient hero who has suffered death through an unjust judgment; and there will be no small pleasure, as I think, in comparing my own sufferings with theirs. Above all, I shall then be able to continue my search into true and false knowledge; as in this world, so also in the next and I shall find out who is wise, and who pretends to be wise, and is not. What would not a man give, O judges, to be able to examine the leader of the great Trojan expedition; or Odysseus or Sisyphus,[61] or numberless others, men and women too! What infinite delight would there be in conversing with them and asking them questions! In another world they do not put a man to death for asking questions: assuredly not. For besides being happier than we are, they will be immortal, if what is said is true.

Wherefore, O judges, be of good cheer about death, and know of a certainty, that no evil can happen to a good man, either in life or after death. He and his are not neglected by the gods; nor has my own approaching end happened by mere chance. But I see clearly that the time had arrived when it was better for me to die and be released from trouble; wherefore the oracle gave no sign. For which reason, also, I am not angry with my condemners, or with my accusers; they have done me no harm, although they did not mean to do me any good; and for this I may gently blame them.

Still I have a favour to ask of them. When my sons are grown up, I would ask you, O my friends, to punish them; and I would have you trouble them, as I have troubled you, if they seem to care about riches, or anything more than about virtue; or if they pretend to be something when they are really nothing,—then reprove them, as I have reproved you, for not caring about that for which they ought to care, and thinking that they are something when they are really nothing. And if you do this, both I and my sons will have received justice at your hands.

The hour of departure has arrived, and we go our ways—I to die, and you to live. Which is better God only knows.

58. legendary poets and religious teachers.

59. early Greek poet (eighth century B.C.?) who wrote The Works and Days, a didactic poem containing precepts for the farmer.

60. both victims of unjust trials. Palamedes, one of the Greek chieftains at Troy, was unjustly executed for treason on the false evidence of his enemy Odysseus, and Ajax committed suicide after the arms of the dead Achilles were adjudged to his enemy Odysseus as the bravest warrior on the Greek side.

61. Odysseus was the most cunning of the Greek chieftains at Troy, the hero of Homer's Odyssey; Sisyphus, was famous for his unscrupulousness and cunning. Each is presumably an example of the man who "pretends to be wise, and is not."

Crito*

Persons of the Dialogue

SOCRATES CRITO

SCENE—The prison of Socrates.

SOCRATES. Why have you come at this hour, Crito?[1] It must be quite early?

CRITO. Yes, certainly.

SOC. What is the exact time?

CR. The dawn is breaking.

SOC. I wonder that the keeper of the prison would let you in.

CR. He knows me, because I often come, Socrates; moreover, I have done him a kindness.

SOC. And are you only just arrived?

CR. No, I came some time ago.

SOC. Then why did you sit and say nothing, instead of at once awakening me?

CR. I should not have liked myself, Socrates, to be in such great trouble and unrest as you are—indeed I should not: I have been watching with amazement your peaceful slumbers; and for that reason I did not awake you, because I wished to minimize the pain. I have always thought you to be of a happy disposition; but never did I see anything like the easy, tranquil manner in which you bear this calamity.

SOC. Why, Crito, when a man has reached my age[2] he ought not to be repining at the approach of death.

CR. And yet other old men find themselves in similar misfortunes, and age does not prevent them from repining.

SOC. That is true. But you have not told me why you come at this early hour.

CR. I come to bring you a message which is sad and painful; not, as I believe, to yourself, but to all of us who are your friends, and saddest of all to me.

SOC. What? Has the ship come from Delos,[3] on the arrival of which I am to die?

CR. No, the ship has not actually arrived, but she will probably be here to-day, as persons who have come from Sunium tell me that they left her there; and therefore to-morrow, Socrates, will be the last day of your life.

SOC. Very well, Crito, if such is the will of God, I am willing; but my belief is that there will be a delay of a day.

* Translated by Benjamin Jowett.

1. an Athenian of ample means, the same age as Socrates, who offered to stand surety for him at his trial.

2. Socrates was seventy years old.

3. Socrates' execution had been delayed by an annual religious ceremony. A ship had been dispatched to the island of Delos (a center of the worship of Apollo) and until it returned no public execution could take place.

CR. Why do you think so?

SOC. I will tell you. I am to die on the day after the arrival of the ship.

CR. Yes; that is what the authorities say.

SOC. But I do not think that the ship will be here until to-morrow; this I infer from a vision which I had last night, or rather only just now, when you fortunately allowed me to sleep.

CR. And what was the nature of the vision?

SOC. There appeared to me the likeness of a woman, fair and comely, clothed in bright raiment, who called to me and said: O Socrates, The third day hence to fertile Phthia shalt thou go.[4]

CR. What a singular dream, Socrates!

SOC. There can be no doubt about the meaning, Crito, I think.

CR. Yes; the meaning is only too clear. But, oh! my beloved Socrates, let me entreat you once more to take my advice and escape. For if you die I shall not only lose a friend who can never be replaced, but there is another evil: people who do not know you and me will believe that I might have saved you if I had been willing to give money,[5] but that I did not care. Now, can there be a worse disgrace than this—that I should be thought to value money more than the life of a friend? For the many will not be persuaded that I wanted you to escape, and that you refused.

SOC. But why, my dear Crito, should we care about the opinion of the many? Good men, and they are the only persons who are worth considering, will think of these things truly as they occurred.

CR. But you see, Socrates, that the opinion of the many must be regarded, for what is now happening shows that they can do the greatest evil to any one who has lost their good opinion.

SOC. I only wish it were so, Crito; and that the many could do the greatest evil; for then they would also be able to do the greatest good—and what a fine thing this would be! But in reality they can do neither; for they cannot make a man either wise or foolish; and whatever they do is the result of chance.

CR. Well, I will not dispute with you; but please tell me, Socrates, whether you are not acting out of regard to me and your other friends: are you not afraid that if you escape from prison we may get into trouble with the informers[6] for having stolen you away, and lose either the whole or a great part of our property; or that even a worse evil may happen to us? Now, if you fear on our account, be at ease; for in order to save you, we ought surely to run this, or even a greater risk; be persuaded, then, and do as I say.

4. Socrates adapts the words of Achilles, who, threatening to leave Troy, declares that "on the third day thereafter we might raise generous Phthia." (Iliad, Book IX, l. 363.)

5. to bribe the jailers and "fix" the politicians, as he explains below.

6. private citizens who made a living by detecting and prosecuting breaches of the laws.

SOC. Yes, Crito, that is one fear which you mention, but by no means the only one.

CR. Fear not—there are persons who are willing to get you out of prison at no great cost; and as for the informers, they are far from being exorbitant in their demands—a little money will satisfy them. My means, which are certainly ample, are at your service, and if you have a scruple about spending all mine, here are strangers[7] who will give you the use of theirs; and one of them, Simmias the Theban, has brought a large sum of money for this very purpose; and Cebes and many others are prepared to spend their money in helping you to escape. I say, therefore, do not hesitate on our account, and do not say, as you did in the court,[8] that you will have a difficulty in knowing what to do with yourself anywhere else. For men will love you in other places to which you may go, and not in Athens only; there are friends of mine in Thessaly,[9] if you like to go to them, who will value and protect you, and no Thessalian will give you any trouble. Nor can I think that you are at all justified, Socrates, in betraying your own life when you might be saved; in acting thus you are playing into the hands of your enemies, who are hurrying on your destruction. And further I should say that you are deserting your own children; for you might bring them up and educate them; instead of which you go away and leave them, and they will have to take their chance; and if they do not meet with the usual fate of orphans, there will be small thanks to you. No man should bring children into the world who is unwilling to persevere to the end in their nurture and education. But you appear to be choosing the easier part, not the better and manlier, which would have been more becoming in one who professes to care for virtue in all his actions, like yourself. And indeed, I am ashamed not only of you, but of us who are your friends, when I reflect that the whole business will be attributed entirely to our want of courage. The trial need never have come on,[10] or might have been managed differently; and this last act, or crowning folly, will seem to have occurred through our negligence and cowardice, who might have saved you, if we had been good for anything; and you might have saved yourself, for there was no difficulty at all. See now, Socrates, how sad and discreditable are the consequences, both to us and you. Make up your mind then, or rather have your mind already made up, for the time of deliberation is over, and there is only one thing to be done, which must be done this very night, and if we delay at all will be no longer practicable or possible; I beseech you therefore, Socrates, be persuaded by me, and do as I say.

7. foreigners. Simmias and Cebes both came from Thebes.
8. See pp. 540–41.
9. in the north; an uncivilized part of Greece.
10. Crito probably means that Socrates could have left Athens as soon as proceedings were started.

SOC. Dear Crito, your zeal is invaluable, if a right one; but if wrong, the greater the zeal the greater the danger; and therefore we ought to consider whether I shall or shall not do as you say. For I am and always have been one of those natures who must be guided by reason, whatever the reason may be which upon reflection appears to me to be the best; and now that this chance has befallen me, I cannot repudiate my own words: the principles which I have hitherto honoured and revered I still honour, and unless we can at once find other and better principles, I am certain not to agree with you; no, not even if the power of the multitude could inflict many more imprisonments, confiscations, deaths, frightening us like children with hobgoblin terrors. What will be the fairest way of considering the question? Shall I return to your old argument about the opinions of men?—we are saying that some of them are to be regarded, and others not. Now were we right in maintaining this before I was condemned? And has the argument which was once good now proved to be talk for the sake of talking—mere childish nonsense? That is what I want to consider with your help, Crito:—whether, under my present circumstances, the argument appears to be in any way different or not; and is to be allowed by me or disallowed. That argument, which, as I believe, is maintained by many persons of authority, was to the effect, as I was saying, that the opinions of some men are to be regarded, and of other men not to be regarded. Now you, Crito, are not going to die to-morrow—at least, there is no human probability of this—and therefore you are disinterested and not liable to be deceived by the circumstances in which you are placed. Tell me then, whether I am right in saying that some opinions, and the opinions of some men only, are to be valued, and that other opinions, and the opinions of other men, are not to be valued. I ask you whether I was right in maintaining this?

CR. Certainly.

SOC. The good are to be regarded, and not the bad?

CR. Yes.

SOC. And the opinions of the wise are good, and the opinions of the unwise are evil?

CR. Certainly.

SOC. And what was said about another matter? Is the pupil who devotes himself to the practice of gymnastics supposed to attend to the praise and blame and opinion of every man, or of one man only—his physician or trainer, whoever he may be?

CR. Of one man only.

SOC. And he ought to fear the censure and welcome the praise of that one only, and not of the many?

CR. Clearly so.

SOC. And he ought to act and train, and eat and drink in the way which seems good to his single master who has understanding, rather than according to the opinion of all other men put together?

CR. True.

SOC. And if he disobeys and disregards the opinion and approval of the one, and regards the opinion of the many who have no understanding, will he not suffer evil?

CR. Certainly he will.

SOC. And what will the evil be, whither tending and what affecting, in the disobedient person?

CR. Clearly, affecting the body; that is what is destroyed by the evil.

SOC. Very good; and is not this true, Crito, of other things which we need not separately enumerate? In questions of just and unjust, fair and foul, good and evil, which are the subjects of our present consultation, ought we to follow the opinion of the many and to fear them; or the opinion of the one man who has understanding? ought we not to fear and reverence him more than all the rest of the world: and if we desert him shall we not destroy and injure that principle in us which may be assumed to be improved by justice and deteriorated by injustice;—there is such a principle?

CR. Certainly there is, Socrates.

SOC. Take a parallel instance:—if, acting under the advice of those who have no understanding, we destroy that which is improved by health and is deteriorated by disease, would life be worth having? And that which has been destroyed is—the body?

CR. Yes.

SOC. Could we live, having an evil and corrupted body?

CR. Certainly not.

SOC. And will life be worth having, if that higher part of man be destroyed, which is improved by justice and depraved by injustice? Do we suppose that principle, whatever it may be in man, which has to do with justice and injustice, to be inferior to the body?

CR. Certainly not.

SOC. More honourable than the body?

CR. Far more.

SOC. Then, my friend, we must not regard what the many say of us: but what he, the one man who has understanding of just and unjust, will say, and what the truth will say. And therefore you begin in error when you advise that we should regard the opinion of the many about just and unjust, good and evil, honourable and dishonourable,—'Well,' some one will say, 'but the many can kill us.'

CR. Yes, Socrates; that will clearly be the answer.

SOC. And it is true: but still I find with surprise that the old argument is unshaken as ever. And I should like to know whether I may say the same of another proposition—that not life, but a good life, is to be chiefly valued?

CR. Yes, that also remains unshaken.

SOC. And a good life is equivalent to a just and honourable one—that holds also?

CR. Yes, it does.

SOC. From these premisses I proceed to argue the question whether I ought or ought not to try and escape without the consent of the Athenians: and if I am clearly right in escaping, then I will make the attempt; but if not, I will abstain. The other considerations which you mention, of money and loss of character and the duty of educating one's children, are, I fear, only the doctrines of the multitude, who would be as ready to restore people to life, if they were able, as they are to put them to death—and with as little reason. But now, since the argument has thus far prevailed, the only question which remains to be considered is, whether we shall do rightly either in escaping or in suffering others to aid in our escape and paying them in money and thanks, or whether in reality we shall not do rightly; and if the latter, then death or any other calamity which may ensue on my remaining here must not be allowed to enter into the calculation.

CR. I think that you are right, Socrates; how then shall we proceed?

SOC. Let us consider the matter together, and do you either refute me if you can, and I will be convinced; or else cease, my dear friend, from repeating to me that I ought to escape against the wishes of the Athenians: for I highly value your attempts to persuade me to do so, but I may not be persuaded against my own better judgment. And now please to consider my first position, and try how you can best answer me.

CR. I will.

SOC. Are we to say that we are never intentionally to do wrong, or that in one way we ought and in another we ought not to do wrong, or is doing wrong always evil and dishonourable, as I was just now saying, and as has been already acknowledged by us? Are all our former admissions which were made within a few days to be thrown away? And have we, at our age, been earnestly discoursing with one another all our life long only to discover that we are no better than children? Or, in spite of the opinion of the many, and in spite of consequences whether better or worse, shall we insist on the truth of what was then said, that injustice is always an evil and dishonour to him who acts unjustly? Shall we say so or not?

CR. Yes.

SOC. Then we must do no wrong?

CR. Certainly not.

SOC. Nor when injured injure in return, as the many imagine; for we must injure no one at all?

CR. Clearly not.

SOC. Again, Crito, may we do evil?

CR. Surely not, Socrates.

SOC. And what of doing evil in return for evil, which is the morality of the many—is that just or not?

CR. Not just.

SOC. For doing evil to another is the same as injuring him?

CR. Very true.

SOC. Then we ought not to retaliate or render evil for evil to any one, whatever evil we may have suffered from him. But I would have you consider, Crito, whether you really mean what you are saying. For this opinion has never been held, and never will be held, by any considerable number of persons; and those who are agreed and those who are not agreed upon this point have no common ground, and can only despise one another when they see how widely they differ. Tell me, then, whether you agree with and assent to my first principle, that neither injury nor retaliation nor warding off evil by evil is ever right. And shall that be the premiss of our argument? Or do you decline and dissent from this? For so I have ever thought, and continue to think; but, if you are of another opinion, let me hear what you have to say. If, however, you remain of the same mind as formerly, I will proceed to the next step.

CR. You may proceed, for I have not changed my mind.

SOC. Then I will go on to the next point, which may be put in the form of a question:—Ought a man to do what he admits to be right, or ought he to betray the right?

CR. He ought to do what he thinks right.

SOC. But if this is true, what is the application? In leaving the prison against the will of the Athenians, do I wrong any? or rather do I not wrong those whom I ought least to wrong? Do I not desert the principles which were acknowledged by us to be just—what do you say?

CR. I cannot tell, Socrates; for I do not know.

SOC. Then consider the matter in this way:—Imagine that I am about to play truant (you may call the proceeding by any name which you like), and the laws and the government come and interrogate me: 'Tell us, Socrates,' they say, 'what are you about? are you not going by an act of yours to overturn us—the laws, and the whole state, as far as in you lies? Do you imagine that a state can subsist and not be overthrown, in which the decisions of law have no power, but are set aside and trampled upon by individuals?' What will be our answer, Crito, to these and the like words? Any one, and especially a rhetorician, will have a good deal to say on behalf of the law which requires a sentence to be carried out. He will argue that this law should not be set aside; and shall we reply, 'Yes; but the state has injured us and given an unjust sentence.' Suppose I say that?

CR. Very good, Socrates.

SOC. 'And was that our agreement with you?' the law would answer; 'or were you to abide by the sentence of the state?' And if I were to express my astonishment at their words, the law would probably add: 'Answer, Socrates, instead of opening your eyes—you are in the habit of asking and answering questions. Tell us,—What complaint have you to make against us which justifies you in attempting to destroy us and the state? In the first place did we not bring you into existence? Your father married your mother by our aid and begat you. Say whether you have any objection to urge against those of us who regulate marriage?' None, I should reply. 'Or against those of us who after birth regulate the nurture and education of children, in which you also were trained? Were not the laws, which have the charge of education, right in commanding your father to train you in music[11] and gymnastic?' Right, I should reply. 'Well then, since you were brought into the world and nurtured and educated by us, can you deny in the first place that you are our child and slave, as your fathers were before you? And if this is true you are not on equal terms with us; nor can you think that you have a right to do to us what we are doing to you. Would you have any right to strike or revile or do any other evil to your father or your master, if you had one, because you have been struck or reviled by him, or received some other evil at his hands?—you would not say this? And because we think right to destroy you, do you think that you have any right to destroy us in return, and your country as far as in you lies? Will you, O professor of true virtue, pretend that you are justified in this? Has a philosopher like you failed to discover that our country is more to be valued and higher and holier far than mother or father or any ancestor, and more to be regarded in the eyes of the gods and of men of understanding? also to be soothed, and gently and reverently entreated when angry, even more than a father, and either to be persuaded, or if not persuaded, to be obeyed? And when we are punished by her, whether with imprisonment or stripes, the punishment is to be endured in silence; and if she leads us to wounds or death in battle, thither we follow as is right; neither may any one yield or retreat or leave his rank, but whether in battle or in a court of law, or in any other place, he must do what his city and his country order him; or he must change their view of what is just: and if he may do no violence to his father or mother, much less may he do violence to his country.' What answer shall we make to this, Crito? Do the laws speak truly, or do they not?

11. The Greek term includes literature as well as music.

CR. I think that they do.

SOC. Then the laws will say, 'Consider, Socrates, if we are speaking truly that in your present attempt you are going to do us an injury. For, having brought you into the world, and nurtured and educated you, and given you and every other citizen a share in every good which we had to give, we further proclaim to any Athenian by the liberty which we allow him, that if he does not like us when he has become of age and has seen the ways of the city, and made our acquaintance, he may go where he pleases and take his goods with him. None of us laws will forbid him or interfere with him. Any one who does not like us and the city, and who wants to emigrate to a colony or to any other city, may go where he likes, retaining his property. But he who has experience of the manner in which we order justice and administer the state, and still remains, has entered into an implied contract that he will do as we command him. And he who disobeys us is, as we maintain, thrice wrong; first, because in disobeying us he is disobeying his parents; secondly, because we are the authors of his education; thirdly, because he has made an agreement with us that he will duly obey our commands; and he neither obeys them nor convinces us that our commands are unjust; and we do not rudely impose them, but give him the alternative of obeying or convincing us;—that is what we offer, and he does neither.

'These are the sort of accusations to which, as we were saying, you, Socrates, will be exposed if you accomplish your intentions; you, above all other Athenians.' Suppose now I ask, why I rather than anybody else? they will justly retort upon me that I above all other men have acknowledged the agreement. 'There is clear proof,' they will say, 'Socrates, that we and the city were not displeasing to you. Of all Athenians you have been the most constant resident in the city, which, as you never leave, you may be supposed to love. For you never went out of the city either to see the games, except once when you went to the Isthmus,[12] or to any other place unless when you were on military service; nor did you travel as other men do. Nor had you any curiosity to know other states or their laws: your affections did not go beyond us and our state; we were your special favourites, and you acquiesced in our government of you; and here in this city you begat your children, which is a proof of your satisfaction. Moreover, you might in the course of the trial, if you had liked, have fixed the penalty at banishment; the state which refuses to let you go now would have let you go then. But you pretended that you preferred death to exile, and that you were not unwilling to die. And now you have forgotten these fine sentiments, and pay no respect to us the laws, of whom you are the destroyer; and are doing what only a miserable slave would do, running away and turning your back upon the compacts and agreements which you made as a citizen. And first of all answer this very question: Are we right in saying that you agreed to be governed according to us in deed, and not in word only? Is that true or not?' How shall we answer, Crito? Must we not assent?

12. Nothing is known of this journey.

CR. We cannot help it, Socrates.

SOC. Then will they not say: 'You, Socrates, are breaking the covenants and agreements which you made with us at your leisure, not in any haste or under any compulsion or deception, but after you have had seventy years to think of them, during which time you were at liberty to leave the city, if we were not to your mind, or if our covenants appeared to you to be unfair. You had your choice, and might have gone either to Lacedaemon or Crete, both which states are often praised by you for their good government, or to some other Hellenic or foreign state. Whereas you, above all other Athenians, seemed to be so fond of the state, or, in other words, of us her laws (and who would care about a state which has no laws?), that you never stirred out of her; the halt, the blind, the maimed were not more stationary in her than you were. And now you run away and forsake your agreements. Not so, Socrates, if you will take our advice; do not make yourself ridiculous by escaping out of the city.

'For just consider, if you transgress and err in this sort of way, what good will you do either to yourself or to your friends? That your friends will be driven into exile and deprived of citizenship, or will lose their property, is tolerably certain; and you yourself, if you fly to one of the neighboring cities, as, for example, Thebes or Megara, both of which are well governed, will come to them as an enemy, Socrates, and their government will be against you, and all patriotic citizens will cast an evil eye upon you as a subverter of the laws, and you will confirm in the minds of the judges the justice of their own condemnation of you. For he who is a corrupter of the laws is more than likely to be a corrupter of the young and foolish portion of mankind. Will you then flee from well-ordered cities and virtuous men? and is existence worth having on these terms? Or will you go to them without shame, and talk to them, Socrates? And what will you say to them? What you say here about virtue and justice and institutions and laws being the best things among men? Would that be decent of you? Surely not. But if you go away from well-governed states to Crito's friends in Thessaly, where there is great disorder and licence, they will be charmed to hear the tale of your escape from prison, set off with ludicrous particulars of the manner in which you were wrapped in a goatskin or some other disguise, and metamorphosed as the manner is of runaways; but will there be no one to remind you that in your old age you were not ashamed to violate the most sacred laws from a miserable desire of a little more life? Perhaps not, if you keep them in a good temper; but if they are out of temper you will hear many degrading things; you will live, but how?—as the flatterer of all men, and the servant of all men; and doing what?—eating and drinking in Thessaly, having gone abroad in order that you may get a dinner. And where will be your fine sentiments about justice and virtue? Say that you wish to live for the sake of your children—you want to bring them up and educate them—will you take them into Thessaly and deprive them of Athenian citizenship? Is this the benefit which you will confer upon them? Or are you under the impression that they will be better cared for and educated here if you are still alive, although absent from them; for your friends will take care of them? Do you fancy that if you are an inhabitant of Thessaly they will take care of them, and if you are an inhabitant of the other world that they will not take care of them? Nay; but if they who call themselves friends are good for anything, they will—to be sure they will.

'Listen, then, Socrates, to us who have brought you up. Think not of life and children first, and of justice afterwards, but of justice first, that you may be justified before the princes of the world below.[13] For neither will you nor any that belong to you be happier or holier or juster in this life, or happier in another, if you do as Crito bids. Now you depart in innocence, a sufferer and not a doer of evil; a victim, not of the laws but of men. But if you go forth, returning evil for evil, and injury for injury, breaking the covenants and agreements which you have made with us, and wronging those whom you ought least of all to wrong, that is to say, yourself, your friends, your country, and us, we shall be angry with you while you live, and our brethren, the laws of the world below, will receive you as an enemy; for they will know that you have done your best to destroy us. Listen, then, to us and not to Crito.'

This, dear Crito, is the voice which I seem to hear murmuring in my ears, like the sound of the flute in the ears of the mystic;[14] that voice, I say, is humming in my ears, and prevents me from hearing any other. And I know that anything more which you may say will be vain. Yet speak, if you have anything to say.

CR. I have nothing to say, Socrates.

SOC. Leave me then, Crito, to fulfil the will of God, and to follow whither he leads.

13. the judges of the dead.

14. like the worshipers at the mysteries, who seem to hear the flutes still playing, after they have stopped.

Phaedo*

[The Death of Socrates]

[The narrator, Phaedo, who was present at the execution of Socrates, gives his friend Echecrates an account of Socrates' last hours. Many of his friends were with him on that day, among them Crito and two Theban philosophers, Simmias and Cebes. These two engaged him in an argument about the immortality of the soul, which Socrates succeeded in proving to their satisfaction. He concluded with an account of the next world, describing the place of reward for the virtuous and of punishment for the wicked. The opening words of the following selection are his conclusion of the argument.]

A man of sense ought not to say, nor will I be very confident, that the description which I have given of the soul and her mansions is exactly true. But I do say that, inasmuch as the soul is shown to be immortal, he may venture to think, not improperly or unworthily, that something of the kind is true. The venture is a glorious one, and he ought to comfort himself with words like these, which is the reason why I lengthen out the tale. Wherefore, I say, let a man be of good cheer about his soul, who having cast away the pleasures and ornaments of the body as alien to him and working harm rather than good, has sought after the pleasures of knowledge; and has arrayed the soul, not in some foreign attire, but in her own proper jewels, temperance, and justice, and courage, and nobility, and truth—in these adorned she is ready to go on her journey to the world below, when her hour comes. You, Simmias and Cebes, and all other men, will depart at some time or other. Me already, as a tragic poet would say, the voice of fate calls. Soon I must drink the poison;[1] and I think that I had better repair to the bath first, in order that the women may not have the trouble of washing my body after I am dead.

When he had done speaking, Crito said: And have you any commands for us, Socrates—anything to say about your children, or any other matter in which we can serve you?

Nothing particular, Crito, he replied: only, as I have always told you, take care of yourselves; that is a service which you may be ever rendering to me and mine and to all of us, whether you promise to do so or not. But if you have no thought for yourselves, and care not to walk according to the rule which I have prescribed for you,

* Translated by Benjamin Jowett.

1. hemlock. This was the regular method of execution at Athens. The action of the poison is described below.

not now for the first time, however much you may profess or promise at the moment, it will be of no avail.

We will do our best, said Crito: And in what way shall we bury you?

In any way that you like; but you must get hold of me, and take care that I do not run away from you. Then he turned to us, and added with a smile:—I cannot make Crito believe that I am the same Socrates who have been talking and conducting the argument; he fancies that I am the other Socrates whom he will soon see, a dead body—and he asks, How shall he bury me? And though I have spoken many words in the endeavour to show that when I have drunk the poison I shall leave you and go to the joys of the blessed, —these words of mine, with which I was comforting you and myself, have had, as I perceive, no effect upon Crito. And therefore I want you to be surety for me to him now, as at the trial he was surety to the judges for me: but let the promise be of another sort; for he was surety for me to the judges that I would remain, and you must be my surety to him that I shall not remain, but go away and depart; and then he will suffer less at my death, and not be grieved when he sees my body being burned or buried. I would not have him sorrow at my hard lot, or say at the burial, Thus we lay out Socrates, or, Thus we follow him to the grave or bury him; for false words are not only evil in themselves, but they inflict the soul with evil. Be of good cheer then, my dear Crito, and say that you are burying my body only, and do with that whatever is usual, and what you think best.

When he had spoken these words, he arose and went into a chamber to bathe; Crito followed him and told us to wait. So we remained behind, talking and thinking of the subject of discourse, and also of the greatness of our sorrow; he was like a father of whom we were being bereaved, and we were about to pass the rest of our lives as orphans. When he had taken the bath his children were brought to him (he had two young sons and an elder one); and the women of his family also came, and he talked to them and gave them a few directions in the presence of Crito; then he dismissed them and returned to us.

Now the hour of sunset was near, for a good deal of time had passed while he was within. When he came out, he sat down with us again after his bath, but not much was said. Soon the jailer, who was the servant of the Eleven, entered and stood by him, saying:—To you, Socrates, whom I know to be the noblest and gentlest and best of all who ever came to this place, I will not impute the angry feeling of other men, who rage and swear at me, when, in obedience to the authorities, I bid them drink the poison—indeed, I am sure that you will not be angry with me; for others, as you are aware, and not I, are to blame. And so fare you well, and try to bear lightly what must needs be—you know my errand. Then bursting into tears he turned away and went out.

Socrates looked at him and said: I return your good wishes, and will do as you bid. Then turning to us, he said, How charming the man is: since I have been in prison he has always been coming to see me, and at times he would talk to me, and was as good to me as could be, and now see how generously he sorrows on my account. We must do as he says, Crito; and therefore let the cup be brought, if the poison is prepared: if not, let the attendant prepare some.

Yet, said Crito, the sun is still upon the hill-tops, and I know that many a one has taken the draught late, and after the announcement has been made to him, he has eaten and drunk, and enjoyed the society of his beloved: do not hurry—there is time enough.

Socrates said: Yes, Crito, and they of whom you speak are right in so acting, for they think that they will be gainers by the delay; but I am right in not following their example, for I do not think that I should gain anything by drinking the poison a little later; I should only be ridiculous in my own eyes for sparing and saving a life which is already forfeit. Please then to do as I say, and not to refuse me.

Crito made a sign to the servant, who was standing by; and he went out, and having been absent for some time, returned with the jailer carrying the cup of poison. Socrates said: You, my good friend, who are experienced in these matters, shall give me directions how I am to proceed. The man answered: You have only to walk about until your legs are heavy, and then to lie down, and the poison will act. At the same time he handed the cup to Socrates, who in the easiest and gentlest manner, without the least fear or change of colour or feature, looking at the man with all his eyes, Echecrates, as his manner was,[2] took the cup and said: What do you say about making a libation[3] out of this cup to any god? May I, or not? The man answered: We only prepare, Socrates, just so much as we deem enough. I understand, he said: but I may and must ask the gods to prosper my journey from this to the other world—even so—and so be it according to my prayer. Then raising the cup to his lips, quite readily and cheerfully he drank off the poison. And hitherto most of us had been able to control our sorrow; but now when we saw him drinking, and saw too that he had finished the draught, we could no longer forbear, and in spite of myself my own tears were flowing fast; so that I covered my face and wept, not for him, but at the thought of my own calamity in having to part from such a friend.

2. Socrates was famous for his projecting eyes and his intent stare.

3. He asks if he may pour a little of it out in honor of the gods, as if it were wine.

Nor was I the first; for Crito, when he found himself unable to restrain his tears, had got up, and I followed; and at that moment, Apollodorus, who had been weeping all the time, broke out in a loud and passionate cry which made cowards of us all. Socrates alone retained his calmness: What is this strange outcry? he said. I sent away the women mainly in order that they might not misbehave in this way, for I have been told that a man should die in peace. Be quiet then, and have patience. When we heard his words we were ashamed, and refrained our tears; and he walked about until, as he said, his legs began to fail, and then he lay on his back, according to directions, and the man who gave him the poison now and then looked at his feet and legs; and after a while he pressed his foot hard, and asked him if he could feel; and he said, No; and then his leg, and so upwards and upwards, and showed us that he was cold and stiff. And he felt them himself, and said: When the poison reaches the heart, that will be the end. He was beginning to grow cold about the groin, when he uncovered his face, for he had covered himself up, and said—they were his last words—he said: Crito, I owe a cock to Asclepius;[4] will you remember to pay the debt? The debt shall be paid, said Crito; is there anything else? There was no answer to this question; but in a minute or two a movement was heard, and the attendants uncovered him; his eyes were set, and Crito closed his eyes and mouth.

Such was the end, Echecrates, of our friend; concerning whom I may truly say, that of all men of his time whom I have known, he was the wisest and justest and best.

4. a cock to Asclepius: a sacrifice to the god of healing, perhaps as a thank offering for the painlessness of his death.

ARISTOTLE

(384–322 B.C.)

Poetics*

. . . Tragedy, then, is an imitation of an action that is serious, complete, and of a certain magnitude; in language embellished with each kind of artistic ornament, the several kinds being found in separate parts of the play; in the form of action, not of narrative; through pity and fear effecting the proper purgation[1] of these emo-

* Selected passages. Our text is the translation by S. H. Butcher, published by the Oxford University Press.

1. The Greek word is katharsis. This is probably the most disputed passage in European literary criticism. There are two main schools of interpretation; they differ in their understanding of the metaphor implied in the word katharsis. Some critics take the word to mean "purification," implying a metaphor from the religious process of purification from guilt; the passions are "purified" by the tragic performance since the excitement of these passions by the performance weakens them and reduces them to just proportions in the individual. (This theory was supported by tions. By 'language embellished,' I mean language into which rhythm, 'harmony,' and song enter. By 'the several kinds in separate parts,' I mean, that some parts are rendered through the medium of verse alone, others again with the aid of song.

Now as tragic imitation implies persons acting, it necessarily follows, in the first place, that Scenic equipment will be a part of Tragedy. Next, Song and Diction, for these are the means of imitation. By 'Diction' I mean the mere metrical arrangement of the words: as for 'Song,' it is a term whose full sense is well understood.

Again, Tragedy is the imitation of an action; and an action implies personal agents, who necessarily possess certain qualities both of character and thought. It is these that determine the qualities of actions themselves; these—thought and character—are the two natural causes from which actions spring: on these causes, again, all success or failure depends. Hence, the Plot is the imitation of the action—for by plot I here mean the arrangement of the incidents. By Character I mean that in virtue of which we ascribe certain qualities to the agents. By Thought, that whereby a statement is proved, or a general truth expressed. Every Tragedy, therefore, must have six parts, which parts determine its quality—namely, Plot, Character, Diction, Thought, Scenery, Song. Two of the parts constitute the means of imitation, one the manner, and three the objects of imitation. And these complete the list. These elements have been employed, we may say, by almost all poets; in fact, every play contains Scenic accessories as well as Character, Plot, Diction, Song, and Thought.

But most important of all is the structure of the incidents. For Tragedy is an imitation, not of men, but of an action and of life—of happiness and misery; and happiness and misery consist in action, the end of human life being a mode of action, not a quality. Now the characters of men determine their qualities, but it is by their actions that they are happy or the reverse. Dramatic action, therefore, is not with a view to the representation of character: character comes in as subsidiary to the action. Hence the incidents and the plot are the end of a tragedy; and the end[2] is the chief thing of all. Again, without action there cannot be a tragedy; there may be without character. . . .

These principles being established, let us now discuss the proper structure of the Plot, since this is the first, and also the most important part of Tragedy.

---

the German critic Lessing.) Others take the metaphor to be medical, reading the word as "purging" and interpreting the phrase to mean that the tragic performance excites the emotions only to allay them, thus ridding the spectator of the disquieting emotions from which he suffers in everyday life; tragedy thus has a therapeutic effect.

2. purpose.

Now, according to our definition, Tragedy is an imitation of an action, that is complete, and whole, and of a certain magnitude; for there may be a whole that is wanting in magnitude. A whole is that which has beginning, middle, and end. A beginning is that which does not itself follow anything by causal necessity, but after which something naturally is or comes to be. An end, on the contrary, is that which itself naturally follows some other thing, either by necessity, or in the regular course of events, but has nothing following it. A middle is that which follows something as some other thing follows it. A well constructed plot, therefore, must neither begin nor end at haphazard, but conform to the type here described. . . .

Unity of plot does not, as some persons think, consist in the unity of the hero. For infinitely various are the incidents in one man's life, which cannot be reduced to unity; and so, too, there are many actions of one man out of which we cannot make one action. Hence the error, as it appears, of all poets who have composed a Heracleid, a Theseid, or other poems of the kind. They imagine that as Heracles was one man, the story of Heracles ought also to be a unity. . . .

It is, moreover, evident from what has been said, that it is not the function of the poet to relate what has happened, but what may happen—what is possible according to the law of probability or necessity. The poet and the historian differ not by writing in verse or in prose. The work of Herodotus[3] might be put into verse, and it would still be a species of history, with metre no less than without it. The true difference is that one relates what has happened, the other what may happen. Poetry, therefore, is a more philosophical and a higher thing than history: for poetry tends to express the universal, history the particular. The universal tells us how a person of given character will on occasion speak or act, according to the law of probability or necessity; and it is this universality at which Poetry aims in giving expressive names to the characters. The particular is—for example—what Alcibiades did or suffered. . . .

Of all plots and actions the episodic are the worst. I call a plot episodic in which the episodes or acts succeed one another without probable or necessary sequence. Bad poets compose such pieces by their own fault, good poets, to please the players; for, as they write for competing rivals, they draw out the plot beyond its capacity, and are often forced to break the natural continuity. . . .

Plots are either simple or complicated; for such too, in their very nature, are the actions of which the plots are an imitation. An action which is one and continuous in the sense above defined,

3. the fifth-century historian of the Persian wars.

I call Simple, when the turning point is reached without Reversal of Fortune or Recognition:[4] Complicated, when it is reached with Reversal of Fortune, or Recognition, or both. These last should arise from the internal structure of the plot, so that what follows should be the necessary or probable result of the preceding action. It makes all the difference whether one event is the consequence of another, or merely subsequent to it.

A reversal of fortune is, as we have said, a change by which a train of action produces the opposite of the effect intended; and that, according to our rule of probability or necessity. Thus in the Oedipus, the messenger,[5] hoping to cheer Oedipus, and to free him from his alarms about his mother, reveals his[6] origin, and so produces the opposite effect. . . .

A Recognition, as the name indicates, is a change from ignorance to knowledge, producing love or hate between the persons destined by the poet for good or bad fortune. The best form of recognition is coincident with a reversal of fortune, as in the Oedipus. . . .

As the sequel to what has already been said, we must proceed to consider what the poet should aim at, and what he should avoid, in constructing his plots; and by what means Tragedy may best fulfil its function.

A perfect tragedy should, as we have seen, be arranged not on the simple but on the complex plan. It should, moreover, imitate actions which excite pity and fear, this being the distinctive mark of tragic imitation. It follows plainly, in the first place, that the change of fortune presented must not be the spectacle of a perfectly good man brought from prosperity to adversity: for this moves neither pity nor fear; it simply shocks us. Nor, again, that of a bad man passing from adversity to prosperity: for nothing can be more alien to the spirit of Tragedy; it possesses no single tragic quality; it neither satisfies the moral sense, nor calls forth pity or fear. Nor, again, should the downfall of the utter villain be exhibited. A plot of this kind would, doubtless, satisfy the moral sense, but it would inspire neither pity nor fear; for pity is aroused by unmerited misfortune, fear by the misfortune of a man like ourselves. Such an event, therefore, will be neither pitiful nor terrible. There remains, then, the character between these two extremes—that of a man who is not eminently good and just, yet whose misfortune is brought about not by vice or depravity, but by some error or frailty. He must be one who is highly renowned and prosperous—a personage like Oedipus, Thyestes, or other illustrious men of such families.

4. defined in the following paragraph.
5. Messenger 1.
6. Oedipus'.

A well constructed plot should, therefore, be single, rather than double as some maintain. The change of fortune should be not from bad to good, but, reversely, from good to bad. It should come about as the result not of vice, but of some great error or frailty, in a character either such as we have described, or better rather than worse. The practice of the stage bears out our view. At first the poets recounted any legends that came in their way. Now, tragedies are founded on the story of a few houses—on the fortunes of Alcmaeon, Oedipus, Orestes, Meleager, Thyestes, Telephus, and those others who have done or suffered something terrible. A tragedy, then, to be perfect according to the rules of art should be of this construction. Hence they are in error who censure Euripides just because he follows this principle in his plays, many of which end unhappily. It is, as we have said, the right ending. The best proof is that on the stage and in dramatic competition, such plays, if they are well represented, are most tragic in their effect; and Euripides, faulty as he is in the general management of his subject, yet is felt to be the most tragic of poets. . . .

As in the structure of the plot, so too in the portraiture of character, the poet should always aim either at the necessary or the probable. Thus a person of a given character should speak or act in a given way, by the rule either of necessity or of probability; just as this event should follow that by necessary or probable sequence. It is therefore evident that the unravelling of the plot, no less than the complication, must be brought about by the plot itself, and not by Machinery[7]—as in the Medea, or in the Return of the Greeks[8] in the Iliad. Machinery should be employed only for events external to the drama—either such as are previous to it and outside the sphere of human knowledge, or subsequent to it and which need to be foretold and announced; for to the gods we ascribe the power of seeing all things. Within the action there must be nothing irrational. If the irrational cannot be excluded, it should be outside the scope of the tragedy. Such is the irrational element in the Oedipus of Sophocles. . . .

The Chorus too should be regarded as one of the actors; it should be an integral part of the whole, and share in the action, in the manner not of Euripides but of Sophocles. As for the later poets, their choral songs pertain as little to the subject of the piece as to that of any other tragedy. They are, therefore, sung as mere inter-

7. literally the machine which was employed in the theater to show the gods flying in space. It has come to mean any implausible way of solving the complications of the plot. Medea escapes from Corinth "on the machine" in her magic chariot.

8. Aristotle refers to an incident in the second book of the Iliad; an attempt of the Greek rank and file to return home and abandon the siege is arrested by the intervention of Athene. (If it were a drama she would appear "on the machine.")

ludes—a practice first begun by Agathon. Yet what difference is there between introducing such choral interludes, and transferring a speech, or even a whole act, from one play to another? . . .

LUCRETIUS

(99?–55 B.C.)

On the Nature of Things (De rerum natura)

Book III. [Against the Fear of Death]*

Death
Is nothing to us, has no relevance
To our condition, seeing that the mind
Is mortal. Just as, long ago, we felt
Not the least touch of trouble when the wars
Were raging all around the shaken earth
And from all sides the Carthaginian hordes Poured forth to battle, and no man ever knew
Whose subject he would be in life or death,
Which doom, by land or sea, would strike him down,
So, when we cease to be, and body and soul,
Which joined to make us one, have gone their ways,
Their separate ways, nothing at all can shake
Our feelings, not if earth were mixed with sea
Or sea with sky. Perhaps the mind or spirit,
After its separation from our body,
Has some sensation; what is that to us?
Nothing at all, for what we knew of being,
Essence, identity, oneness, was derived
From body's union with spirit, so, if time,
After our death, should some day reunite
All of our present particles, bring them back
To where they now reside, give us once more
The light of life, this still would have no meaning
For us, with our self-recollection gone.
As we are now, we lack all memory
Of what we were before, suffer no wound
From those old days. Look back on all that space

* Translated by Rolfe Humphries.

836. Carthaginian hordes: In the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.) between Rome and the north African city of Carthage. In this decisive struggle for the domination of the western Mediterranean, the Carthaginian general Hannibal invaded Italy and came close to taking Rome. Lucretius is writing some hundred and fifty years after these events.

Of time's immensity, consider well
What infinite combinations there have been In matter's ways and groupings. How easy, then,
For human beings to believe we are Compounded of the very selfsame motes,
Arranged exactly in the selfsame ways
As once we were, our long-ago, our now Being identical. And yet we keep
No memory of that once-upon-a-time,
Nor can we call it back; somewhere between
A break occurred, and all our atoms went Wandering here and there and far away
From our sensations. If there lies ahead
Tough luck for any man, he must be there,
Himself, to feel its evil, but since death
Removes this chance, and by injunction stops
All rioting of woes against our state,
We may be reassured that in our death
We have no cause for fear, we cannot be Wretched in nonexistence. Death alone
Has immortality, and takes away
Our mortal life. It does not matter a bit
If we once lived before.

So, seeing a man
Feel sorry for himself, that after death
He'll be a rotting corpse, laid in a tomb,
Succumb to fire, or predatory beasts,
You'll know he's insincere, just making noise,
With rancor in his heart, though he believes,
Or tries to make us think so, that death ends all.
And yet, I'd guess, he contradicts himself,
He does not really see himself as gone,
As utter nothingness, but does his best—
Not really understanding what he's doing—
To have himself survive, for, in his life,
He will project a future, a dark day
When beast or bird will lacerate his corpse.
So he feels sorry for himself; he fails
To make the real distinction that exists Between his castoff body, and the man
Who stands beside it grieving, and imputes
Some of his sentimental feelings to it.
Resenting mortal fate, he cannot see
That in true death he'll not survive himself

To stand there as a mourner, stunned by grief
That he is burned or mangled. If in death
It's certainly no pleasure to be mauled
By beak of bird or fang of beast, I'd guess
It's no voluptuous revel to be laid
Over the flames, or packed in honey and ice,
Stiff on the surface of a marble slab,
Or buried under a great mound of earth.

And men behave the same way at a banquet,
Holding the cups or garlanding the brows,
And sighing from the heart, "Ah, life is short
For puny little men, and when it goes
We cannot call it back," as if they thought
The main thing wrong, after their death, will be
That they are very thirsty, or may have A passionate appetite for who knows what.
"No longer will you happily come home
To a devoted wife, or children dear
Running for your first kisses, while your heart
Is filled with sweet unspoken gratitude.
You will no longer dwell in happy state,
Their sword and shield. Poor wretch," men tell themselves,
"One fatal day has stolen all your gains."
But they don't add, "And all your covetings."
If they could see this clearly, follow it With proper reasoning, their minds would be Free of great agony and fear, "As now
You lie asleep in death, forevermore
You will be quit of any sickening pain,
While we, who stood beside your funeral pyre,
Have, with no consolation, mourned your death
In sorrow time will never heal." Well, then,
Ask of your dead what bitterness he finds
In sleep and quiet; why should anyone Wear himself out in everlasting grief?
No man, when body and soul are lost in sleep,
Finds himself missing, or conducts a search
For his identity; for all we know,
For all we care, that sleep might last forever
And we would never list ourselves as missing.

906. honey: Used in an expensive type of embalming.

936–947: The only difference between sleep and death is that in sleep the atoms of which we are composed are still in ordered motion and combination, while in death they are scattered; in both states we are equally unconscious.

Yet, all this while, our motes, our atoms, wander
Not far from sense-producing shift and stir,
And suddenly we come to wakefulness.
So we must think of death as being nothing,
As less than sleep, or less than nothing, even,
Since our array of matter never stirs
To reassemble, once the chill of death
Has taken over.

Hark! The voice of Nature
Is scolding us: "What ails you, little man,
Why this excess of self-indulgent grief,
This sickliness? Why weep and groan at death?
If you have any sense of gratitude
For a good life, if you can't claim her gifts
Were dealt you in some kind of riddled jar
So full of cracks and holes they leaked away
Before you touched them, why not take your leave
As men go from a banquet, fed to the full
On life's good feast, come home, and lie at ease,
Free from anxiety? Alas, poor fool,
If, on the other hand, all of your joys
Are gone, and life is only wretchedness, Why try to add more to it? Why not make A decent end? There's nothing, it would seem,
My powers can contrive for your delight.
The same old story, always. If the years
Don't wear your body, don't corrode your limbs
With lassitude, if you keep living on
For centuries, if you never die at all,
What's in it for you but the same old story
Always, and always? " How could we reply
To this, except to say that Nature's case
Is argued to perfection? Now suppose
Some older man, a senior citizen,
Were plaintiff, wretcheder than he ought to be,
Lamenting death, would Nature not be right
To cry him down, with even sharper voice,
"Why, you old scoundrel, take those tears of yours
Somewhere away from here, cut out the whining.
You have had everything from life, and now
You find you're going to pieces. You desire,
Always, what isn't there; what is, you scorn,
So life has slipped away from you, incomplete,

Unsatisfactory, and here comes death,
An unexpected summoner, to stand
Beside you, long before you want to leave,
Long, long, before you think you've had enough.
Let it all go, act as becomes your age,
Be a great man, composed; give in; you must."
Such a rebuke from Nature would be right,
For the old order yields before the new,
All things require refashioning from others.
No man goes down to Hell's black pit; we need Matter for generations yet to come,
Who, in their turn, will follow you, as men
Have died before you and will die hereafter.
So one thing never ceases to arise
Out of another; life's a gift to no man
Only a loan to him. Look back at time—
How meaningless, how unreal!—before our birth.
In this way Nature holds before our eyes
The mirror of our future after death.
Is this so grim, so gloomy? Is it not
A rest more free from care than any sleep?

Now all those things which people say exist
In Hell, are really present in our lives.
The story says that Tantalus, the wretch,
Frozen in terror, fears the massive rock
Balanced in air above him. It's not true.
What happens is that in our lives the fear,
The silly, vain, ridiculous fear of gods,
Causes our panic dread of accident.
No vultures feed on Tityos, who lies Sprawled out for them in Hell; they could not find
In infinite eternities of time
What they are searching for in that great bulk,
Nine acres wide, or ninety, or the spread Of all the globe. No man can ever bear Eternal pain, nor can his body give Food to the birds forever. We do have A Tityos in ourselves, and lie, in love,
Torn and consumed by our anxieties,
Our fickle passions. Sisyphus, too, is here

1006. Tantalus: A different version of Tantalus' punishment from that given in the Odyssey (XI, 655–667 and note, p. 297).

1012. Tityos: See Odyssey, XI, 647–645.

1022. Sisyphus: See Odyssey, XI, 668–675 and note, p. 297.

In our own lives; we see him as the man
Bent upon power and office, who comes back Gloomy and beaten after every vote.
To seek for power, such an empty thing,
And never gain it, suffering all the while,
This is to shove uphill the stubborn rock
Which over and over comes bouncing down again
To the flat levels where it started from.
Or take another instance: when we feed
A mind whose nature seems unsatisfied,
Never content, with all the blessings given
Through season after season, with all the charms
And graces of life's harvest, this, I'd say,
Is to be like those young and lovely girls,
The Danaids, trying in vain to fill
Their leaky jars with water. Cerberus,
The Furies, and the dark, and the grim jaws
Of Tartarus, belching blasts of heat—all these Do not exist at all, and never could.
But here on earth we do fear punishment
For wickedness, and in proportion dread
Our dreadful deeds, imagining all too well Being cast down from the Tarpeian Rock,
Jail, flogging, hangmen, brands, the rack, the knout;
And even though these never touch us, still
The guilty mind is its own torturer
With lash and rowel, can see no end at all
To suffering and punishment, and fears
These will be more than doubled after death.
Hell does exist on earth—in the life of fools.

You well might think of saying to yourself:
"Even good Ancus closed his eyes on the light—
A better man than you will ever be,
You reprobate—and many lords and kings
Rulers of mighty nations, all have died.
Even that monarch, who once paved the way

1037. Danaids: The fifty daughters of Danaus, who murdered their husbands. They were condemned to carry water in a sieve.

1038. Cerberus: The dog which guarded the gates of hell.

1039. the Furies: Female spirits of revenge, also said to inflict tortures on the spirits of the dead (such as Sisyphus and Tantalus).

1040. Tartarus: The place of punishment for the wicked in the lower world.

1045. Tarpeian rock: A cliff at Rome from which traitors were hurled.

1046. knout: Whip.

1049. rowel: Spiked wheel, as on a spur.

1054. Ancus: The fourth of the legendary kings of Rome.

Making the sea a highway for his legions
Where foot and horse alike could march dry-shod
While the deep foamed and thundered at the outrage,
Even he, great Xerxes, died and left the light,
And Scipio, the thunderbolt of war,
Terror of Carthage, gave his bones to earth
As does the meanest lackey. Add to these Philosophers and artists, all the throng
Blessed by the Muses; Homer's majesty Lies low in the same sleep as all the rest.
Democritus, warned by a ripe old age
That, with his memory, his powers of mind
Were also failing, gave himself to death;
And Epicurus perished, that great man Whose genius towered over all the rest,
Making their starry talents fade and die
In his great sunlight. Who are you, forsooth,
To hesitate, resent, protest your death?
Your life is death already, though you live
And though you see, except that half your time
You waste in sleep, and the other half you snore
With eyes wide open, forever seeing dreams,
Forever in panic, forever lacking wit
To find out what the trouble is, depressed,
Or drunk, or drifting aimlessly around."

Men seem to feel some burden on their souls,
Some heavy weariness; could they but know
Its origin, its cause, they'd never live
The way we see most of them do, each one Ignorant of what he wants, except a change,
Some other place to lay his burden down.
One leaves his house to take a stroll outdoors
Because the household's such a deadly bore,
And then comes back, in six or seven minutes—
The street is every bit as bad. Now what?
He has his horses hitched up for him, drives,
Like a man going to a fire, full-speed,

1059. highway: The reference is to the bridge over the Hellespont built by Xerxes, king of Persia, for his invasion of Greece in 480 B.C.

1063. Scipio: The Roman general who defeated Hannibal at Zama in 202 B.C.

1069. Democritus: A Greek philosopher; one of the pioneers of the atomic theory on which the doctrines of Epicurus (and Lucretius) were based. According to tradition he starved himself to death when he was over ninety years old.

1072. Epicurus: Greek philosopher (342–270 B.C.) whose philosophy is presented in Lucretius' poem.

1075. forsooth: Indeed.

Off to his country-place, and when he gets there
Is scarcely on the driveway, when he yawns,
Falls heavily asleep, oblivious
To everything, or promptly turns around,
Whips back to town again. So each man flees Himself, or tries to, but of course that pest
Clings to him all the more ungraciously.
He hates himself because he does not know
The reason for his sickness; if he did,
He would leave all this foolishness behind,
Devote his study to the way things are,
The problem being his lot, not for an hour,
But for all time, the state in which all men
Must dwell forever and ever after death.

Finally, what's this wanton lust for life
To make us tremble in dangers and in doubt?
All men must die, and no man can escape.
We turn and turn in the same atmosphere
In which no new delight is ever shaped
To grace our living; what we do not have Seems better than everything else in all the world
But should we get it, we want something else.
Our gaping thirst for life is never quenched.
We have to know what luck next year will bring,
What accident, what end. But life, prolonged,
Subtracts not even one second from the term
Of death's continuance. We lack the strength
To abbreviate that eternity. Suppose
You could contrive to live for centuries,
As many as you will. Death, even so,
Will still be waiting for you; he who died
Early this morning has as many years
Interminably before him, as the man,
His predecessor, has, who perished months
Or years, or even centuries ago.

1106. the way things are: The translator's rendering of the poem's title.

CICERO

(106–43 B.C.)

On the Republic (De republica)*

The Dream of Scipio

On landing in Africa [1]—I had gone there, as you both know, as a military tribune[2] in the Fourth Legion for the consul Manius Manilius[3]—there was nothing that I wanted so much as to meet King Masinissa,[4] who for the best of reasons[5] was a great friend of our family. When I came to his house the old man burst into tears as he embraced me and then lifting his eyes to heaven cried: "Thanks give I to thee, O Sun supreme, and to you, ye other dwellers in the skies, that before I take my leave of this life I see in my kingdom and under my own roof P. Cornelius Scipio whose very name refreshes me; for never from my heart has faded the memory of that great and unconquerable hero!"[6] Then, we spent the whole day in conversing together—I asking him about his kingdom and he questioning me in turn about our country.

And later, after we had dined amidst regal state we prolonged our talk until far into the night. The old man would talk about nothing except of Africanus and remembered not only all that he had done but all as well that he had said. Then, when we had parted to take our rest a sleep much deeper than was usual fell upon me, for I was weary from my journey and had stayed awake until very late. And then—(I suppose it was a result of what we had been talking about; for it happens often that the things that we have been thinking and speaking of bring about something in our sleep. So Ennius[7] relates in his dream about Homer, of whom in hours of wakefulness he used so often to think and speak)—Africanus stood there before me, in figure familiar to me from his bust[8] rather than from life. I shuddered with dread as I recognized

* Written from 54 B.C. on; published before 51 B.C. Our selection is the principal surviving fragment of this work. This translation by H. A. Rice is here first published.

1. The speaker is Publius Cornelius Scipio Africanus the Younger, the Roman general who led the legions to victory in the Third Punic War (149–146 B.C.), which resulted in the final subjugation of Rome's rival in the West, Carthage. He is supposed to be speaking at a conversation which took place twenty years later; he tells the story of what happened to him in the first year of the war which made his name, when he was an undistinguished junior officer.

2. officer on the staff of a legion.

3. The consuls were the two chief magistrates at home, and commanders of the armies in the field. Scipio was later to replace Manius Manilius as commander.

4. king of Numidia; he became a trusted ally of the Romans in the Second Punic War (218–201 B.C.). He was a close friend of the first Scipio Africanus, who had adopted as his grandson the Scipio who tells this story.

5. among others because the elder Scipio had enlarged his dominions.

6. the elder Scipio.

7. Roman epic poet (239–169 B.C.) who began his epic of Roman history with an account of Homer's appearance to him in a dream.

8. The Roman aristocrat displayed him but he said, "Be calm, Scipio, and have no fear, but fail not to remember the things that I shall tell.

"Do you see that city[9] which by me was forced to kneel before the Roman people and is now renewing battle as of old and will not rest in peace?" And from a place high up above, studded with stars and blazing with light, he pointed to Carthage far below. "To the siege of that city you are now marching, a soldier almost in the ranks. Two years from now you will destroy it as consul in command, and will win thereby a surname which hitherto you have held as a legacy from me.[10] And then, after you have blotted out Carthage, celebrated your triumph and become censor[11] and gone as legate[12] to Egypt, Syria, Asia and Greece, you will be chosen, while absent,[13] consul for the second time, complete a mighty war and destroy Numantia.[14] But just when you have been driven in triumph up to the Capitol, you will find the state in turmoil through the schemings of a grandson of mine.[15]

"It is here, Africanus, that you must needs show to our country the lustre of your genius, your capacity and your wisdom. But at that hour, I foresee, the path of your destiny divides. For when the years of your life have completed seven times eight circlings of the sun and those two numbers, each for a different reason, held to be perfect,[16] have fulfilled the sum allotted for you in the revolving ordained by fate, then the whole state will turn to you alone and to the name you bear. To you will turn the eyes of the senate, of all good citizens, allies and Latins, and you will be the man on whom alone the salvation of the state will depend. In a word, it will be your duty to bring back order in the state as dictator[17]—if only you escape the impious hands of your own kinsmen."[18] A cry burst from Laelius at this and deep groans from the others,[19] but Scipio, gently smiling, continued, "Hush, I beg of you! Do not rouse me from my sleep. Listen a while and hear the rest."

the busts of his ancestors in his house.

9. Carthage.

10. Hitherto he has been called Africanus in virtue of his adoption by the elder Scipio; after the capture of Carthage he will deserve the name by his own deeds.

11. the magistrate in charge of the senatorial rolls, who passed judgment on the senators' moral and financial fitness to continue in office.

12. ambassador.

13. He would be elected to the office without campaigning for it.

14. in Spain; it was destroyed in 133 B.C.

15. the agrarian reformer Tiberius Gracchus, son of Africanus' daughter Cornelia. His land law (enacted in 133 B.C.) restricted the holdings of the wealthy families and provided for the resettlement of small landholders. His law marked the beginning of the century of internal struggle which was to end in the establishment of authoritarian power at Rome. Scipio is here made to speak of him from a conservative standpoint, which is in character, and was Cicero's own standpoint too.

16. Both these numbers were regarded as especially important in various mystical and philosophical systems. Scipio is fifty-six years old at the imagined time of the dialogue.

17. a temporary constitutional office; in times of crisis the Senate appointed a dictator for a specific term.

18. Scipio died in 129 B.C. while trying to bring about a compromise between the two parties; there was a rumor that his death was the work of the partisans of Gracchus.

19. the audience to whom Scipio is talking.

"But hold fast to this, Africanus, that you may be more eager to defend the state: For all those who have guarded, aided, and increased the welfare of their fatherland there is a place reserved in heaven, where they shall dwell in happiness forever. For to that all-ruling God whose power is over all that is there is nothing that is done on earth more acceptable than those meetings for conference of men joined together by the bond of law which are called states. Those who guide and preserve these have come from this heaven and to it they return."

At this, though I was filled with fear more at the thought of treachery from my own kin than by dread of death, I asked whether he and my father Paulus[20] and the others whom we deem to be dead were really living. "In all truth," said he, "they live, for they have made their escape from the fetters of the body as though out of a prison: it is that life of yours—you call it life—that is really death. Do you not see yonder your father Paulus coming to greet you?" When I saw him, I wept a flood of tears, but he embracing and kissing me bade me not to weep.

As soon as I could overcome my weeping and was able to speak I cried, "Tell me, best and most saintly of fathers, since here is life, as I hear Africanus say, why should I linger longer on earth? Why should I not make haste to join you here?" "That may not be," he replied, "for until that God, whose dominion is all that you can see, shall free you from the prison-house of the body, there can be for you no entrance here. For to men life has been given for this purpose, that they shall be care-takers of that sphere called the earth, which you see in the centre of this abode of the divine, and to them a soul has been given out of those never-dying fires which you call planets and stars, which, perfect in their form as spheres, are informed by souls divine and, in their orbits ordained, complete their courses with a motion marvellous in its swiftness. Therefore you, O Publius, and all good men must keep that soul in the guardianship of the body and must not seek to set forth from the life of men save at the bidding of him by whom it was entrusted to you, lest you be found to have fled from the trust imposed upon man by God.

"Rather do you, O Scipio, do as your grandfather here and as I who begat you have done: cherish righteousness and that loyalty, so greatly due to parents and kinsmen but most of all to one's fatherland. That is the life that is the road to the sky overhead and to this gathering of those whose life on earth has been lived. There are they who, lightened of the body's burden, now dwell in that place which you see yonder (it was a circle of light shining out with a radiant glory among the other fires) which you of earth call by a term learned from the Greeks, the Milky Way."

20. Scipio's father won a decisive victory at Pydna, in Greece, in 168 B.C.

To me, as I surveyed from that point all that I could see, wondrous and glorious was the sight. There were those stars that we never see from the earth, all larger than we have ever imagined, of these the smallest was one farthest from heaven[21] and nearest to the earth, shining with a reflected light. Much larger than the earth were these starry spheres: to me the earth seemed so small in comparison that I felt ashamed of our empire which includes but a single point on its surface.

As I gazed more and more intently upon the earth, Africanus said, "Tell me, how long will your mind devote itself to the earth below? Do you not see into what lofty heights you have come? Before you are the nine circles or rather spheres which bind together all that is. Of these the outermost is that of the heavens, enclosing all the rest—the God supreme guarding and embracing all the other spheres; within it are included the stars in their courses, revolving without ceasing. Beneath it are the seven other spheres whirling in their course opposite to that of the heaven. Of these one is that which among men is called Saturn. Next comes that radiance so helpful and healthful to mankind that men call Jupiter. Beneath this, red and fearful to mankind, is the star that you call Mars. Next below, almost midway between heaven and earth, is the sun, the leader, chief and ruler of the other lights, the soul of the universe and its controlling power, of such greatness of size that he fills all things and floods them with his light. In his train as companions are the orbits of Venus and Mercury, and in the lowest of the spheres the moon revolves, lighted by the rays of the sun. But below this there is nothing that is not impermanent and doomed to die save only the souls bestowed by nature's gift on the race of men, while above all things are imperishable. For that central sphere the earth, which is the ninth, is motionless and of all things the lowest, and toward it all bodies tend because of their weight."

As I gazed with awe at these marvellous things I said as soon as I could recover from my amazement, "But what is that wondrous sound, so loud and sweet, that fills my ears?"

"That," said he, "is that harmony of the spheres, produced by the sweep of their onward motion, with the intervals between them unequal but composed, by the blending of notes high with low in exact proportion, to produce various harmonies. For not in silence can such mighty motions speed on their way, and it is nature's will that the lowest spheres sound forth in heaviest tones and those above in highest. So that this uppermost sphere of the heavens bearing the stars, since it revolves at greater speed, moves apace with notes of highest pitch, while that one of the moon, the lowest, gives out the lowest tones; for the earth, ninth of the spheres, remains without motion in its fixed place in the centre of the universe. But the other eight spheres, two of which move at the same rate,[22] send out seven different sounds,—that number which is the key of almost everything. It is this harmony that inspired men have reproduced both on strings and in songs and thus have won a return to this place, as have those others who during their life on earth have devoted outstanding gifts to the pursuit of things divine. To this music our human ears, though filled with it, have become deaf—for there is no duller sense in man than that of hearing. So it is that where the Nile falls headlong from those lofty mountains at the place called the Cataracts, the race of men that lives nearby has, because of the loudness of the sound, lost its power of hearing. So this sound so glorious, made by the revolving at the highest speed of the whole universe, cannot be heard by human ears, just as you cannot look directly at the sun, since your sight is blinded by its radiance."

21. the moon.

Though I marvelled at these things, I yet kept turning my eyes again and again back to the earth.

Then Africanus continued: "You are still, I see, fixing your eyes upon the abode and the home of men. If it seems a small thing, as it is, to you, keep rather your eyes upon these things of the heavens, scorning those of mankind. For what glory can you gain from what men say, what fame worth striving for? The earth, as you can see, is inhabited in but scattered parts and these small, while between those spots, as it were, where men dwell, stretch vast desert places. Those who inhabit the earth are from each other so widely apart that no word can spread from one group to another, for some live in parts slantwise,[23] others crosswise,[24] and some even opposite[25] to you; from these surely there is no glory that you can hope to have.

"You can see besides, that the earth is girdled and encircled by zones of a sort, of which the two that are farthest apart, supported by the opposite poles of the sky, are both held fast in bonds of ice, while that middle and widest one is scorched by the blazing heat of the sun. Two of the zones are fit for habitation; of these the southern, where men dwell whose footprints press against yours, has no concern for you; while if you consider this northern one inhabited by you, see how small a part of it belongs to you. For that whole stretch of earth which you hold, narrow from north to south and wider from east to west, is in fact only a small island surrounded by that sea which you call the Atlantic, the Great Sea, or the Ocean. See how small it is, in spite of its lordly name. Do you suppose that your name or that of anyone of our people has ever passed from

22. Mercury and Venus.

23. in the opposite (southern) temperate zone of the same hemisphere.

24. in the same (northern) temperate zone of the opposite hemisphere.

25. in the opposite temperate zone of the opposite hemisphere.

those lands that are cultivated and known to us and scaled the Caucasus which you see there, or crossed beyond the Ganges? Who among those who dwell in those remote lands of the rising or the setting sun, or of the farthest north or south will ever hear your name? With these left out you see, surely, within what narrow limits the fame for which you long can spread. And how long will even those who now speak about you continue to do so?

"Why, even if generations yet to be should want to pass on to those yet unborn the praises of anyone of us received from their fathers, still, because of the floods and conflagrations that are bound at certain intervals to happen on the earth, we could not count upon a long-lasting fame among men, much less an endless one. Yet how much does it concern you to be spoken of by those who come after you when you have never been mentioned by those who have lived before you?

"Indeed they were not fewer than the men of now and surely were better; especially since not one of those by whom our names can now be heard will, after a year has passed, have any memory of it. For men generally reckon a year by the circling of only one of the stars, that is, the sun: but when all the stars have come back to the point where they started and have, at long intervals, restored the same arrangement of the whole heavens, then comes about that which can truly be called a completed year.[26] How many generations of men are included in such a year I would not venture to say. For as the sun seemed to men to fail of its light and to be eclipsed at the hour when the soul of Romulus[27] made its way to these shining heights, so when the sun shall again be eclipsed at the same point and the same hour, then, since all the planets and stars will have returned to their starting point you can be assured that such a year has been completed. But you may be sure that one twentieth[28] of such a year has not yet passed.

"If, therefore, you despair of a return to this place where all belongs to great and noble men, of what worth, I ask you, is that fame of yours among men? It can hardly extend to the smallest part of a single year. So if you will but fix your gaze on things on high and on this eternal home and dwelling-place, you will cease to listen to the talking of the common herd, nor will you longer put your trust in the rewards that men can bestow for what you have done; let rather the charm of virtue itself lead you on to the only true glory; whatever men may say of you leave to them; they will say it anyway, and all that they have to say will be confined within those narrow limits which you see: all that they say about any man has not been

26. reckoned by ancient authorities at from twelve thousand to fifteen thousand years.

27. the traditional founder of the city of Rome; the legendary date of his death is 716 B.C.

28. from the death of Romulus to the supposed time of Scipio's dream is 567 years.

for long, for it dies with them and is blotted out by the forgetfulness of those who come after them." As he said this, "If it is true, Africanus," said I, "that for those who have well served their country there lies open a path to heaven here, then, though from my boyhood I have tried to follow in the footsteps of my father and of you and to be worthy of your fame, now indeed with such a reward before my eyes I shall strive with even greater zeal." "Strive on," said he, "and be assured that you are not, though your body is, born but to die; for that form which your body shows is not your true self: the spirit within each man is the man himself—not the bodily form to which one can point. Know then that you are divine, for that is divine which throbs with life, feels, remembers, foresees, which rules, controls, and makes to move the body over which it has been placed in charge; as over this universe rules that supreme God; so this mortal body is made to move by a deathless soul within.

"For that which is ever in motion is eternal, but that which sets in motion something else but is itself moved by a force outside it, must needs, when the cause of its motion ends, cease to live. Only that therefore which gives itself motion ceases not to move, since it never abandons itself: more than that, it is for all other things that move, the first cause and beginning of their motion. Of a first cause there is of course no beginning, for it is from this first cause that all things begin, while it can never take its beginning from anything else; for it would not be a first cause if it found its beginning outside itself. Moreover because it never had a beginning it will never have an end. For if a first cause were destroyed it could never be born again from anything else, nor could it create another thing from itself, since only from a first cause must everything begin to be. So it follows that motion must begin from that which is self-moving: this can neither be born nor die: otherwise all heaven above would fall and all nature cease to be since they are endowed with no power from which they can receive a beginning of motion.

"Since then that which is self-moving is everlasting, who would dare deny that this is the essential nature given to living spirits? For everything that is set in motion by an outside force is without a spirit within it, but that which is animated by spirit is moved by its own power within, for this is the essential property and power of spirit,—which, since it is the only thing among all things that moves itself, cannot have had a beginning nor can it ever have an end. Devote this, then, to the highest tasks! Of these surely the noblest are those on behalf of one's fatherland: a spirit dedicated and devoted to these will swiftly wing its way to this, its own abode and home. And more swiftly will it speed here if, while still prisoned in the body, it soars above it and fixing its gaze on things beyond, it rids itself as much as is in its power from the body. The souls of those, however, who have surrendered to the pleasures of the body as slaves to them and who at the bidding of desires of the body have transgressed the laws of gods and men, when they have left their bodies, flit about the earth below, and do not return to this place until after they have, through many ages, suffered retribution." He left me then, and I awoke from my sleep.

VIRGIL
(70–19 B.C.)
The Aeneid*

Book I

I sing of arms and of a man: his fate had made him fugitive; he was the first to journey from the coasts of Troy as far as Italy and the Lavinian shores.
Across the lands and waters he was battered beneath the violence of High Ones, for the savage Juno's unforgetting anger;
and many sufferings were his in war—until he brought a city into being and carried in his gods to Latium;
from this have come the Latin race, the lords of Alba, and the ramparts of high Rome.

Tell me the reason, Muse: what was the wound to her divinity, so hurting her that she, the queen of gods, compelled a man remarkable for goodness to endure

* Abridged. Left unfinished when the poet died in 19 B.C. Translated by Allen Mandelbaum.

1. a man: Aeneas, one of the Trojan champions in the fight for Troy, son of Aphrodite (Venus) and Anchises, a member of the royal house of Troy. Aeneas survived the fall of the city and set off in search of another home. After years of wandering he settled in Italy, and from his line sprang, in the fullness of time, the founders of Rome.

4. Lavinian shores: The west coast of Italy in the vicinity of Rome, named after the nearby city of Lavinium. Lavinia is the name of the Italian princess whom Aeneas is eventually to marry.

7. Juno: The Latin equivalent of Hera, wife of the ruler of the gods, Zeus. As in the Iliad, she is a bitter enemy of the Trojans.

10. Latium: The coastal plain on which Rome is situated.

12. Alba: The city of Alba Longa was to be founded by Aeneas' son Ascanius, and from it were to come Romulus and Remus, the builders of Rome.

13. Muse: Goddess of epic poetry, and the source of poetic inspiration.

so many crises, meet so many trials?
Can such resentment hold the minds of gods?

There was an ancient city they called Carthage—a colony of refugees from Tyre—a city facing Italy, but far away from Tiber's mouth: extremely rich and, when it came to waging war, most fierce.
This land was Juno's favorite—it is said—more dear than her own Samos; here she kept her chariot and armor; even then the goddess had this hope and tender plan;
for Carthage to become the capital of nations, if the Fates would just consent.
But she had heard that, from the blood of Troy,
a race had come that some day would destroy the citadels of Tyre; from it, a people would spring, wide-ruling kings, men proud in battle and destined to annihilate her Libya.
The Fates had so decreed. And Saturn's daughter—in fear of this, remembering the old war that she had long since carried on at Troy for her beloved Argos (and, indeed, the causes of her bitterness, her sharp and savage hurt, had not yet left her spirit;
for deep within her mind lie stored the judgment of Paris and the wrong done to her scorned beauty, the breed she hated, and the honors that had been given ravished Ganymede)— was angered even more; for this, she kept far off from Latium the Trojan remnant left by the Greeks and pitiless Achilles.
For long years they were cast across all waters,

19. Carthage: Founded in North Africa by the Phoenicians who came from Tyre and Sidon in Palestine. It was their chief colony in the western Mediterranean. In the third and second centuries B.C. Carthage fought a series of bitter wars against Rome for the domination of the area. Carthage was captured and destroyed by the Romans in 146 B.C.

22. Tiber: The river which flows through Rome.

24. Samos: Greek island in the Aegean, famous as a center for the worship of Hera (Juno).

29. Fates: Goddesses who controlled human destinies and the powers of the gods.

34. Libya: Africa (i.e., Carthage).

35. Saturn's daughter: Juno. Saturn (Greek Kronos) was the father of Jupiter and Juno.

38. Argos: Greece.

41. judgment of Paris: Paris, son to King Priam of Troy, was chosen to judge which was the most beautiful goddess—Hera, Aphrodite, or Athene. All three attempted to bribe him, but Aphrodite's promise, the love of Helen, prevailed, and he awarded her the prize.

44. Ganymede: A beautiful Trojan boy taken up into heaven by Jupiter (or Zeus) to be his favorite.

fate-driven, wandering from sea to sea.
It was so hard to found the race of Rome.

* * *

[Aeneas Arrives in Carthage]

[The story opens with a storm, provoked by Juno's agency, which scatters Aeneas' fleet off Sicily and separates him from his companions. He lands on the African coast near Carthage. Setting out with his friend Achates to explore the country, he meets his mother, Venus (Aphrodite), who tells him that the rest of his ships are safe and directs him to the city just founded by Dido, the queen of Carthage. Venus surrounds Aeneas and Achates with a cloud so that they can see without being seen.]

Meanwhile Aeneas and the true Achates press forward on their path. They climb a hill that overhangs the city, looking down upon the facing towers. Aeneas marvels at the enormous buildings, once mere huts, and at the gates and tumult and paved streets.
The eager men of Tyre work steadily;
some build the city walls or citadel—they roll up stones by hand; and some select the place for a new dwelling, marking out its limits with a furrow; some make laws, establish judges and a sacred senate;
some excavate a harbor; others lay the deep foundations for a theater, hewing tremendous pillars from the rocks,
high decorations for the stage to come.
Just as the bees in early summer, busy beneath the sunlight through the flowered meadows, when some lead on their full-grown young and others press out the flowing honey, pack the cells with sweet nectar, or gather in the burdens of those returning; some, in columns, drive
the drones, a lazy herd, out of the hives;
the work is fervent, and the fragrant honey is sweet with thyme. "How fortunate are those whose walls already rise!" Aeneas cries while gazing at the rooftops of the city.
Then, sheltered by a mist, astoundingly, he enters in among the crowd, mingling together with the Tyrians. No one sees him.

624. Tyrians: Phoenicians, Carthaginians.

Just at the center of the city stood a thickly shaded wood; this was the place where, when they landed, the Phoenicians first—hurled there by whirlwind and by wave—dug up, an omen that Queen Juno had pointed out:
the head of a fierce stallion. This had meant the nation's easy wealth and fame in war throughout the ages. Here Sidonian Dido was building a stupendous shrine for Juno, enriched with gifts and with the goddess' statue,
where flights of steps led up to brazen thresholds;
the architraves were set on posts of brass;
the grating hinges of the doors were brass.
Within this grove, the sights—so strange to him—
have, for the first time, stilled Aeneas' fear;
here he first dared to hope he had found shelter,
to trust more surely in his shattered fortunes.
For while he waited for the queen, he studied everything in that huge sanctuary, marveling at a city rich enough for such a temple, at the handiwork of rival artists, at their skillful tasks.
He sees the wars of Troy set out in order:
the battles famous now through all the world,
the sons of Atreus and of Priam, and Achilles, savage enemy to both.
He halted. As he wept, he cried: "Achates, where on this earth is there a land, a place that does not know our sorrows? Look! There is Priam!
Here, too, the honorable finds its due and there are tears for passing things; here, too, things mortal touch the mind. Forget your fears;
this fame will bring you some deliverance."
He speaks. With many tears and sighs he feeds his soul on what is nothing but a picture.

He watched the warriors circling Pergamus:
here routed Greeks were chased by Trojan fighters and here the Phrygian troops pursued by plumed Achilles in his chariot. Nearby, sobbing, he recognized the snow-white canvas

636. architraves: That part of the roof bearing directly on the tops of columns.
649. sons of Atreus: Agamemnon and Menelaus. of Priam: Many, among them Hector.
660. Pergamus: The citadel of Troy.

tents of King Rhesus—with his men betrayed, while still in their first sleep, and then laid waste, with many dead, by bloody Diomedes,
who carried off their fiery war horses before they had a chance to taste the pastures of Troy, or drink the waters of the Xanthus.

Elsewhere young Troilus, the unhappy boy—
he is matched unequally against Achilles—runs off, his weapons lost. He is fallen flat; his horses drag him on as he still clings fast to his empty chariot, clasping the reins. His neck, his hair trail on the ground, and his inverted spear inscribes the dust.
Meanwhile the Trojan women near the temple of Pallas, the unkindly; hair disheveled, sad, beating at their breasts, as suppliants, they bear the robe of offering. The goddess averts her face, her eyes fast to the ground.

Three times Achilles had dragged Hector round the walls of Troy, selling his lifeless body for gold. And then, indeed, Aeneas groans within the great pit of his chest, deeply;
for he can see the spoils, the chariot,
the very body of his friend, and Priam pleading for Hector with defenseless hands.
He also recognized himself in combat with the Achaean chiefs, then saw the Eastern battalions and the weapons of black Memnon.
Penthesilea in her fury leads the ranks of crescent-shielded Amazons.
She flashes through her thousands; underneath her naked breast, a golden girdle; soldier-virgin and queen, daring to war with men.

But while the Dardan watched these scenes in wonder,
while he was fastened in a stare, astonished,

665. Rhesus: King of Thrace, who came to the help of Troy just before the end of the war. An oracle proclaimed that if his horses ate Trojan grass and drank the water of the river Xanthus, Troy would not fall. Odysseus and Diomedes went into the Trojan lines at night, killed the king, and stole the horses.

671. Troilus: A son of Priam.

679. Pallas: Athena (Minerva), goddess hostile to the Trojans.

692. Memnon: King of the Aethiopians, who fought on the Trojan side.

693. Penthesilea: Queen of the Amazons, killed by Achilles.

696. girdle: Belt.

698. Dardan: Trojan, after the ancestor of the Trojan kings, Dardanus.

the lovely-bodied Dido neared the temple,
a crowding company of youths around her.
And just as, on the banks of the Eurotas or though the heights of Cynthus, when Diana incites her dancers, and her followers, a thousand mountain-nymphs, press in behind her,
she wears a quiver slung across her shoulder;
and as she makes her way, she towers over all other goddesses; gladness excites Latona's silent breast: even so, Dido;
so, in her joy, she moved among the throng
as she urged on the work of her coming kingdom.

And then below the temple's central dome—facing the doorway of the goddess, guarded by arms—she took her place on a high throne.
Dido was dealing judgments to her people and giving laws, apportioning the work of each with fairness or by drawing lots;
when suddenly Aeneas sees, as they press forward through that mighty multitude, Sergestus, Antheus, and the brave Cloanthus, and other Trojans whom the black whirlwind had scattered on the waters, driven far to other coasts. Aeneas is astounded;
both joy and fear have overcome Achates.
They burned to join right hands with their companions,
but this strange happening confuses them.
They stay in hiding, screened by folds of fog,
and wait to see what fortune found their friends,
on what beach they have left the fleet, and why they come; for these were men who had been chosen from all the ships to ask for grace, who now made for the temple door with loud outcries.

When they had entered and received their leave to speak in Dido's presence, then the eldest, Ilioneus, calmly began: "O Queen, whom Jupiter has granted this: to bring to being a new city, curbing haughty nations by justice—we, unhappy Trojans,

702. Eurotas: A river near Sparta where Artemis (Diana) was worshipped. Cynthian: Cynthus is a mountain on the island of Delos, Diana's birthplace.

709. Latona: (Leto), mother of Diana.

720. Antheus . . . Cloanthus: Aeneas' captains from whom he had been parted by the storm.

men carried by the winds across all seas, beg you to keep the terror of fire from our fleet, to spare a pious race, to look on us with kindliness. We do not come to devastate your homes and with the sword to loot the household gods of Libya or to drive down stolen booty toward the beaches That violence is not within our minds;
such arrogance is not for the defeated.
There is a place the Greeks have named Hesperia, an ancient land with strong arms and fat soil.
Its colonists were the Oenotrians.
Now rumor runs that their descendants call that nation 'Italy,' after their leader.
Our prows were pointed there when suddenly, rising upon the surge, stormy Orion drove us against blind shoals; and insolent south winds then scattered us, undone by brine, across the crushing sea, the pathless rocks
A few of us have drifted to your shores.
What kind of men are these? Or is your country so barbarous that it permits this custom?
We are denied the shelter of the beach;
they goad us into war; they will not let us set foot upon the border of their land.
If you despise the human race and mortal weapons, then still consider that the gods remember right and wrong. We had a king, Aeneas, none more just, no one more pious,
no man his better in the arts of war.
If fate has saved this man, if he still feeds upon the upper air, if he is not laid low to rest among the cruel Shades, then we are not afraid and you will not repent if you compete with him in kindness.
Within Sicilian territory, too,
are fields and cities and the famed Acestes, born of the blood of Troy. Let us haul up our fleet, smashed by the winds, along your beaches and fit out timber from your forests, trim
our oars; and if we find our king and comrades

748. Hesperia: Italy, literally, "the western country."
750. Oenotrians: The original inhabitants of Italy.
752. leader: Italus.
754. Orion: The setting of this constellation in November signalled the onset of stormy weather at sea.
771. Shades: Spirits of the dead.
775. Acestes: A Sicilian king; his mother was a Trojan, and he had offered Aeneas a home in his dominions.

and are allowed to turn toward Italy and Latium, then let us sail out gladly.
But if our shelter there has been denied us,
and you, the finest father of the Trojans, were swallowed by the sea of Libya, and no hope is left us now for Iülus, then at least let us seek out again the straits of Sicily, the land from which we sailed.
There houses wait for us, and King Acestes."
So spoke Ilioneus. The others sons of Dardanus approved his words with shouts.

Then Dido softly, briefly answers him:
"O Teucrians, enough of fear, cast out your cares. My kingdom is new; hard circumstances have forced me to such measures for our safety, to post guards far and wide along our boundaries.
But who is ignorant of Aeneas' men?
Who has not heard of Troy, its acts and heroes,
the flames of that tremendous war? We Tyrians do not have minds so dull, and we are not beyond the circuit of the sun's yoked horses.
Whatever you may choose—Hesperia and the fields of Saturn, or the land of Eryx and King Acestes—I shall send you safe with escort, I shall help you with my wealth.
And should you want to settle in this kingdom on equal terms with me, then all the city
I am building now is yours. Draw up your ships.
I shall allow no difference between the Tyrian and the Trojan. Would your king, Aeneas, too, were present, driven here by that same south wind. I, in fact, shall send my trusted riders out along the shores, to comb the farthest coast of Libya and to see if, cast out of the waters, he is wandering through the forests or the cities."

The words of Dido stir the brave Achates and father Aeneas; long since, both of them had burned to break free from their cloud. Achates

785. Iülus: Ascanius, Aeneas' son.
792. Teucrians: Trojans; named after a Trojan King called Teucer.
800. the sun's yoked horses: The sun was believed to be a brilliant chariot pulled across the sky.
802. Saturn: An old legend connected Italy with Saturn (Cronos), the father of Jupiter (Zeus). The "age of Saturn" was the Golden Age. Eryx: in Sicily.

speaks first to his companion: "Goddess-born,
what counsel rises in your spirit now?
You see that everything is safe, our ships and sailors saved. And only one is missing, whom we ourselves saw sink among the waves.
All else is as your mother said it would be."

Yet he was hardly done when suddenly the cloud that circled them is torn; it clears away to open air. And there Aeneas stood, glittering in that bright light, his face and shoulders like a god's. Indeed, his mother had breathed upon her son becoming hair, the glow of a young man, and in his eyes, glad handsomeness: such grace as art can add to ivory, or such as Parian marble or silver shows when set in yellow gold.

But then, surprising all, he tells the queen:
"The man you seek is here. I stand before you,
Trojan Aeneas, torn from Libyan waves.
O you who were alone in taking pity on the unutterable trials of Troy, who welcome us as allies to your city and home—a remnant left by Geeeks, harassed by all disasters known on land and sea, in need of everything—we cannot, Dido, repay you, then, with gratitude enough to match your merits, neither we nor any Dardans scattered over this great world.
May gods confer on you your due rewards,
if deities regard the good, if justice and mind aware of right count anywhere.
What happy centuries gave birth to you?
What splendid parents brought you into being?
While rivers run into the sea and shadows still sweep the mountain slopes and stars still pasture upon the sky, your name and praise and honor shall last, whatever be the lands that call me."
This said, he gives his right hand to his friend Ilioneus; his left he gives Serestus;
then turns to brave Cloanthus and brave Gyas.

822. missing: One ship, captained by Orontes, was sunk in the storm in sight of Aeneas.

833. Parian: The island of Paros was famous for its marble.

First at the very sight of him, and then at all he had endured, Sidonian Dido was startled. And she told the Trojan this:
"You, goddess-born, what fortune hunts you down through such tremendous trials? What violence has forced you onto these ferocious shores?
Are you that same Aeneas, son of Dardan Anchises, whom the gracious Venus bore beside the banks of Phrygian Simois?
Indeed, I still remember banished Teucer, a Greek who came to Sidon from his native kingdom, when with the help of Belus he was seeking out new realms (my father Belus was plundering then, as victor, wealthy Cyprus).
And even then I learned of Troy's disaster,
and of your name and of the kings of Greece.
And though he was the Trojans' enemy, Teucer would often praise the Teucrians and boast that he was born of their old race.
Thus, young men, you are welcome to our halls.
My destiny, like yours, has willed that I,
a veteran of hardships, halt at last in this country. Not ignorant of trials,
I now can learn to help the miserable."

So Dido speaks. At once she leads Aeneas into the royal palace and announces her offerings in the temples of the gods.
But meanwhile she does not neglect his comrades.
She sends down to the beaches twenty bullocks,
a hundred fat lambs with their ewes, and Bacchus' glad gift of wine. Within the palace gleam the furnishings of royal luxury;
the feast is readied in the atrium.
And there are draperies of noble purple woven with art; and plate of massive silver upon the tables; and, engraved in gold,
the sturdy deeds of Dido's ancestors,
a long, long line of happenings and heroes traced from the first beginnings of her race.

---

867. Simois: One of the rivers of Troy.

868. Teucer: A Greek warrior who fought at Troy and afterward was exiled from his home. He founded a city on the island of Cyprus. (Not related to the Trojan king, Teucer.)

888. Bacchus: God of wine.

891. atrium: The Roman word for the principal room of a mansion.

[At the banquet which Dido gives for Aeneas, he relates, at her request, the story of the fall of Troy.]

Book II

[The Fall of Troy]

A sudden silence fell on all of them;
their eyes were turned, intent on him. And father Aeneas, from his high couch, then began:

"O Queen—too terrible for tongues the pain you ask me to renew, the tale of how the Danaans could destroy the wealth of Troy, that kingdom of lament: for I myself saw these sad things; I took large part in them.
What Myrmidon or what Dolopian, what soldier even of the harsh Ulysses, could keep from tears in telling such a story?
But now the damp night hurries from the sky into the sea; the falling stars persuade to sleep. But if you long so much to learn our suffering, to hear in brief the final calamity of Troy—although my mind, remembering, recoils in grief, and trembles,
I shall try.

"The captains of the Danaans, now weak with war and beaten back by fate,
and with so many gliding years gone by,
are able to construct, through the divine art of Minerva, a mountainous horse.
They weave its ribs with sawed-off beams of fir, pretending that it is an offering for safe return. At least, that is their story.
Then in the dark sides of the horse they hide men chosen from the sturdiest among them;
they stuff their soldiers in its belly, deep in that vast cavern: Greeks armed to the teeth.

"Before their eyes lies famous Tenedos, an island prosperous and powerful as long as Priam's kingdoms held their own,

6. Danaans: Greeks.
9. Myrmidon: A solider of Achilles' contingent. Dolopian: The men of Neoptolemos (Pyrrhus), Achilles' son.
10. Ulysses: Odysseus.
20. years gone by: Troy fell in the tenth year of the siege.
22. Minerva: Athena.

but now only a bay, a treacherous ships' anchorage. And here the Argives sail to hide themselves along that lonely shore.
We thought that they had left, to seek Mycenae before the wind. And all of Troy is free of long lament. The gates are opened wide;
gladly we go to see the Doric camp, deserted places, the abandoned sands.
For here a squadron of Dolopians, here fierce Achilles once had pitched his tent;
and here their ships were anchored; here they fought.
Some wonder at the deadly gift to maiden
Minerva, marveling at the horse's bulk; Thymoetes was the first of us to urge that it be brought within the walls and set inside the citadel. He so advised either through treachery or else because the fates of Troy had willed this course. But Capys and those with sounder judgment counsel us to cast the Greek device into the sea, or to set fire to this suspicious gift,
or else to pierce and probe that hollow belly.
The doubting crowd is split into two factions.

"The lead is taken by Laocoön.
He hurries from the citadel's high point excitedly; and with a mob around him, from far off he calls out: 'Poor citizens, what wild insanity is this? Do you believe the enemy have sailed away?
Or think that any Grecian gifts are free of craft? Is this the way Ulysses acts?
Either Achaeans hide, shut in this wood, or else this is an engine built against our walls to spy upon our houses or to batter down our city from above; some trickery is here. Trojans, do not trust in the horse. Whatever it may be,
I fear the Greeks, even when they bring gifts.'
And as he spoke he hurled his massive shaft with heavy force against the side, against the rounded, jointed belly of the beast.

36. Mycenae: The city ruled by Agamemnon.
39. Doric: Greek.
56. Laocoön: Trojan priest of Neptune (Poseidon), the sea god.

It quivered when it struck the hollow cavern, which groaned and echoed. Had the outcome not been fated by the gods, and had our minds not wandered off, Laocoön would then have made our sword points foul the Argive den;
and, Troy, you would be standing yet and you,
high fort of Priam, you would still survive.

"Meanwhile with many shouts some Dardan shepherds were dragging to the king a youth they had found.
His hands were bound behind his back; he was a stranger who had surrendered willingly, that he might bring about this very thing and open Troy to the Achaeans; he was sure of spirit, set for either end:
to win through stratagems or meet his death.
From every side the young of Troy rush out,
all swarming in their eagerness to see him, contending in their taunts against the captive.
Now listen to the treachery of the Danaans and learn from one the wickedness of all.
For as he stood with every eye upon him, uneasy and unarmed, and looked around while taking in the Phrygian ranks'—'What land,' he cries, 'what seas can now receive me? What awaits my misery? I have no place among the Danaans; and in bitterness the Trojans ask for vengeance, for my blood as penalty.' His lamentation turned our feelings. Every violence was checked.
We urge him on to speak, to tell us who his family may be, what word he brings,
what is he hoping for as prisoner.
At last he lays aside his fear and speaks:

" 'O King, I shall hide nothing of the truth, whatever comes of it for me. I'll not deny that I am born an Argive; this I first confess. For fortune made of Sinon a miserable man but not a man of faithlessness and falsehood. Now by chance you may have heard men talk of Palamedes,

78. Argive: Greek.
113. Palamedes: A Greek warrior who advised Agamemnon to abandon the war against Troy; his downfall was engineered by Ulysses (Odysseus), who planted forged proofs of dealings with the enemy in his tent.

the son of Belus, famous, glorious;
though he was innocent, the Greeks condemned him to death on lying evidence, false charges, simply because he had opposed the war.
Now that his light is lost, his killers mourn him.
When I was young, my father—a poor man—sent me to serve in arms as a companion to Palamedes, our close relative.
And while my kinsman's realm was safe and sure and while his word was strong in the king's council,
I was respected and I shared his fame.
But after he had left these upper shores,
a victim of the sharp Ulysses' envy
(no man is ignorant of what I tell),
I dragged my bitter life through grief and darkness,
I raged within me at the doom of my innocent friend. And in my madness I did not keep silent, but I swore to act as his avenger if I found the chance, if ever I returned to my homeland of Argos as a victor. With my words
I stirred up bitter hatred; and for this
I first was touched by threats; from that time, too, Ulysses menaced me with fresh complaints;
the words he spread among the army were ambiguous; aware of his own guilt, he looked for weapons. And he did not stop until, with Calchas as his tool—but why do I tell over this unwelcome story, this useless tale? Why do I hold you back?
If you consider all Achaeans one,
it is enough for you that I am Grecian.
Then take your overdue revenge at once:
for this is what the Ithacan would wish;
the sons of Atreus—they would pay for this.'

"But then indeed we burn to know, to ask the reasons; we were far too ignorant of so much wickedness, of Greek deception.
Trembling, he carries on. His words are false:

" 'The Greeks have often wanted to abandon the plain of Troy, to slip away, to flee,

141. [illegible] The priest and prophet of the Greek army.

147. Ithacan: Ulysses.

weary of this long war: would that they had!
But each time they were blocked by bitter tempests across the waters, terrified because the south wind beat against their sails. Above all, when this high horse you see was ready, built of maple beams, storm clouds droned through the heavens.
Bewildered, we send out Eurypylus to ask the oracle of Phoebus; from the shrine he brings back these grim words to us:
"By blood and by the slaying of a virgin, Grecians, you stilled the winds when you first came to Troy; by blood seek out your homeward way.
The only offering that is suitable:
an Argive life." And when the army heard this oracle, they were amazed; within the Grecians' deepest marrow cold fear shuddered.
For whom has fate prepared this end? Whose life does Phoebus want? At this, with much fanfare the Ithacan drags out the prophet Calchas before the crowd and asks of him what are the god's demands. And many now foretold to me this schemer's ruthless villainy; they saw—but unprotestingly—what was to come. For twice-five days the seer is still, secluded in his tent; his tongue refuses to name a single Greek or to betray death's victim. Finally, with difficulty and driven by the Ithacan's loud urgings, as they had planned, he breaks his silence and assigns me to the altar. All approved; what each feared for himself he now endured when someone else was singled out for ruin.

" 'And now the day of horror was at hand;
the rites were being readied for me: cakes of salt and garlands round my temples. I confess, I snatched myself from death; I broke my bonds; and in a muddy pond, unseen, nightlong I hid among the rushes, waiting for them to sail away—if only that could be! And now there is no hope for me

161. Eurypylus: A minor Greek chieftain.
162. Phoebus: Apollo, god of prophecy, music, medicine, and later of the sun.
164. virgin: Iphigenia, daughter of Agamemnon, who sacrificed her to gain favorable winds to sail on to Troy.
188. cakes of salt: In the Roman sacrificial rite salted meal was sprinkled on the victim's head.

to see my old country, my tender sons, my longed-for father, on whom they may levy the punishment for my escape, making poor victims pay for my crime with their death.
I beg you, therefore, by the High Ones, by the powers that know the truth, and by whatever still uncontaminated trust is left to mortals, pity my hard trials, pity a soul that carries undeserved sorrows.'

"We grant life to his tears and, more, our mercy.
And Priam is the first to have the fetters and tight chains taken off the fugitive;
he speaks to him with words of friendliness:
'Whoever you may be, from this time on forget the Greeks you lost; you are one of us.
And answer truthfully the things I ask:
Why have they built this massive horse? Who was its maker? And what are they after? What religious gift is it? Or engine of war?'

"He stopped. The other, schooled in Grecian guile and wiles, lifts his unfettered hands to heaven:
'You everlasting fires,' he cries, 'and your inviolable power, be my witness;
you altars, savage swords that I escaped,
you garlands of the gods I wore as victim, it now is right for me to break the holy oath of my loyalty and right for me to hate the Greeks, to bring all things to light, whatever they conceal. I am no longer bound to obey the laws of my own country.
But, Troy, you must hold fast what you have promised;
preserved, preserve your word to me, if now
I tell the truth and so repay you fully.

" 'The only hope and confidence the Danaans had ever had in undertaking war lay in the help of Pallas. But in fact, since that time when the godless Diomedes,
the son of Tydeus, first went with Ulysses, inventor of impieties, and tried to tear down from its sacred shrine the fateful Palladium, when they cut down the guardians

230. Pallas: Minerva (Athena).
235. Palladium: A statue of Pallas, kept in her shrine at Troy. There was an oracle which stated that Troy could not be captured as long as it remained in place.

of that high citadel with ruthless hands, daring to touch the virgin goddess' garlands—
since then the Danaans' hopes have ebbed away, receding, falling back; their force is broken;
the mind of Pallas has not turned toward them.
The omens of her change were not uncertain.
No sooner was her image in the Grecian camp site than salt sweat poured across its body and quivering flames blazed from its staring eyes;
and then, amazingly, three times the goddess herself sprang from the ground witrh trembling shaft and shield. And straightway Calchas warns them that they must try out the seas in flight, that Troy could never be destroyed by Argive arms unless fresh auspices were brought from Argos; that would regain the favor of the gods who first helped bring the curving keels from Greece.
Then with the wind they sought their native land, Mycenae, to make ready gods and weapons as their companions, to recross the seas, to come back suddenly. For so had Calchas interpreted the omens. And he warned them to build this effigy as their atonement for the Palladium, to serve as payment for their outrage against the goddess' image, to expiate so great a sacrilege.
But he instructed them to make this mass of interwoven timbers so immense and built it up so high to heaven that it cannot pass the gate, can never be received within Troy's walls, never protect the people under its old sanctity.
For if your hands should harm Minerva's gift, then vast destruction (may the gods turn this their prophecy against the priest's own lips!) would fall on Priam's kingdom and the Phrygians;
but if it climbed by your hands into Troy,
then Asia would repel the Greeks and, more,
advance in war as far as Pelops' walls;
this is the doom that waits for our descendants.'

"Such was the art of perjured Sinon, so insidious, we trusted what he told.
So we were taken in by snares, forced tears—

250. auspices: Omens. Argos: Greece.
258. this effigy: The wooden horse.
274. Pelops: The legendary founder of the dynasty of Agamemnon.

yes, we, whom neither Diomedes nor Achilles of Larissa could defeat, nor ten long years, a thousand-galleyed fleet.

"Now yet another and more dreadful omen is thrust at us, bewilders our blind hearts.
Laocoön, by lot named priest of Neptune, was sacrificing then a giant bull upon the customary altars, when two snakes with endless coils, from Tenedos strike out across the tranquil deep (I shudder to tell what happened), resting on the waters, advancing shoreward side by side; their breasts erect among the waves, their blood-red crests are higher than the breakers. And behind, the rest of them skims on along the sea;
their mighty backs are curved in folds. The foaming salt surge is roaring. Now they reach the fields.
Their eyes are drenched with blood and fire—they burn.
They lick their hissing jaws with quivering tongues.
We scatter at the sight, our blood is gone.
They strike a straight line toward Laocoön.
At first each snake entwines the tiny bodies of his two sons in an embrace, then feasts its fangs on their defenseless limbs. The pair next seize upon Laocoön himself, who nears to help his sons, carrying weapons.
They wind around his waist and twice around his throat. They throttle him with scaly backs; their heads and steep necks tower over him.
He struggles with his hands to rip their knots,
his headbands soaked in filth and in dark venom,
while he lifts high his hideous cries to heaven,
just like the bellows of a wounded bull when it has fled the altar, shaking off an unsure ax. But now the snakes escape:
twin dragons, gliding to the citadel of cruel Pallas, her high shrines. They hide beneath the goddess' feet, beneath her shield.

"At this, a stranger terror takes its way through every trembling heart. Laocoön has justly paid the penalty—they say—for outrage, since his spearhead had profaned

280. Larissa: A city in Thessaly, the homeland of Achilles.

the sacred oak, his cursed shaft been cast against the horse's back. Their cry is that the image must be taken to the temple, the favor of the goddess must be sought.

"We break the walls and bare the battlements.
We set to work; beneath the horse's feet
we fasten sliding wheels; about its neck we stretch out ropes of hemp. And fat with weapons, the engine of our fate climbs up the rampart.
And boys and unwed girls surround it, singing their sacred chants, so glad to touch the cable.
The horse glides, menacing, advancing toward the center of the city. O my land, o Ilium, the home of gods and Dardan walls long renowned in war, four times it stalled before the gateway, at the very threshold;
four times the arms clashed loud inside its belly.
Nevertheless, heedless, blinded by frenzy,
we press right on and set the inauspicious monster inside the sacred fortress. Even then can Cassandra chant of what will come with lips the gods had doomed to disbelief by Trojans. That day was our last—and yet, helpless, we crown the altars of the gods with festive branches all about the city.

"Meanwhile the heavens wheel, night hurries from Ocean and clothes within its giant shadow
the earth, the sky, the snares of Myrmidons.
The silent Trojans lie within their city as sleep embraces their exhausted bodies.

"And now from Tenedos the Argive army were moving in their marshaled ships, beneath the friendly silence of the tranquil moon, seeking familiar shores. The royal galley has signaled with its beacon torches; Sinon, shielded by the unkindly destinies of gods, can secretly set free the Danaans out of the monster's womb, the pinewood prison.
The horse, thrown open, gives them back to air.
They exit gladly from the hollow timber:

341. Cassandra: Daughter of Priam, endowed with prophetic powers but condemned never to be believed.
334. Ilium: Troy.

Thessandrus, Sthenelus, the captains; fierce Ulysses, gliding down the lowered rope;
and Thoas, Acamas, and then the grandson of Peleus, Neoptolemus; the chieftain Machaon, Menelaus, then Epeos, the very maker of the stratagem.
They fall upon the city buried deep in wine and sleep. The guards cut down, the gates thrown open, they can welcome their companions and gather the conspirators in one.

"It was the hour when for troubled mortals rest—sweetest gift of gods that glides to men—has just begun. Within my sleep, before my eyes there seemed to stand, in tears and sorrow, Hector as once he was, dismembered by the dragging chariot, black with bloodied dust; his swollen feet were pierced by thongs. Oh this was Hector, and how different he was from Hector back from battle, putting on Achilles' spoils, or Hector when he flung his Phrygian firebrands at Dardan prows!
His beard unkempt, his hair was thick with blood, he bore the many wounds he had received around his homeland's walls. And I myself seemed then to weep, to greet him with sad words:
'O light of Troy, o Trojans' trusted hope!
What long delay has held you back? From what seashores, awaited Hector, have you come?
For, weary with the many deaths of friends, the sorrows of your men, your city, how our eyes hold fast to you! What shameful cause defaced your tranquil image? Why these wounds?'

"He wastes no words, no time on useless questions—but drawing heavy sighs from deep within,
'Ah, goddess-born, take flight,' he cries, 'and snatch yourself out of these flames. The enemy has gained the walls; Troy falls from her high peak.
Our home, our Priam—these have had their due:
could Pergamus be saved by any prowess, then my hand would have served. But Troy entrusts

364. Neoptolemus: Son of Achilles.
380. Achilles' spoils: The armor of Achilles, stripped from the dead Patroklos.

her holy things and household gods to you;
take them away as comrades of your fortunes, seek out for them the great walls that at last,
once you have crossed the sea, you will establish.'
So Hector speaks; then from the inner altars he carries out the garlands and great Vesta and, in his hands, the fire that never dies.

"Meanwhile the howls of war confound the city.
And more and more—although my father's house was far, withdrawn, and screened by trees—the roar is sharper, the dread clash of battle grows.
I start from sleep and climb the sloping roof above the house. I stand, alerted: just as when, with furious south winds, a fire has fallen on a wheat field, or a torrent that hurtles from a mountain stream lays low the meadows, low the happy crops, and low the labor of the oxen, dragging forests headlong—and even then, bewildered and unknowing, perched upon a rock, the shepherd will listen to the clamor. Now indeed the truth is plain, the guile of Greece made clear.
The spacious palace of Deiphobus has fallen, victim of the towering Vulcan.
And now Ucalegon's, his neighbor, burns;
and wide Sigeum's harbor gleams with fire.
The cries of men are high, the trumpets clang.

"Insane, I seize my weapons. There's no sense in weapons, yet my spirit burns to gather a band for battle, to rush out against the citadel with my companions. Rage and anger drive my mind. My only thought:
how fine a thing it is to die in arms.

"But Panthus, slipping past the Grecian swords—Panthus, the son of Othrys, priest of Phoebus within the citadel—now rushes toward my threshold, madly; in his hand he carries

401. household gods: The Penates, gods of the inner house, whose images were kept in a household shrine. Vesta was the goddess of the hearth and fire which, in the temple, was never allowed to go out.

423. Deiphobus: A son of Priam.

424. Vulcan: (Hephaistos), god of fire and craftsmanship; here, simply, fire.

426. Sigeum: A promontory overlooking the straits which connect the Aegean with the Black Sea.

the holy vessels and defeated gods.
He drags his tiny grandson. 'Panthus, where's the crucial struggle? Where are we to stand?'
My words are hardly done when, with a groan, he answers: 'It has come—the final day and Troy's inevitable time. We Trojans were; Troy has been; gone is the giant glory of Teucrians: ferocious Jupiter has taken all to Argos. And the city now burns beneath its Danaan overlords.
The horse stands high within the heart of Troy and it pours out armed men. The mocking Sinon, now he has won, is scattering firebrands.
Some crowd the open gates—as many thousands as ever came from great Mycenae; others have blocked the narrow streets with ready blades;
the sword edge stands, unsheathed, its gleaming point is set for slaughter; at the forward line
the guards can scarcely stand; they battle blind.'

"The words of Panthus and the will of gods, these carry me into the flames and weapons, where bitter Fury, where the roar and cries that climb the skies call out. And in the moonlight
I now am met by comrades: Epytus, great warrior, and Ripheus come to join us;
to march beside us, Hypanis and Dymas and then the young Coroebus, son of Mygdon.
For in those days he chanced to come to Troy, insane with love for his Cassandra, bringing his help, as son-in-law, to Priam and the Phrygians—sad Coroebus, would he had heeded the warnings of his frantic bride!

"And when I saw them hot again for battle, in tight ranks, I began: 'Young men, your hearts are sturdy—but for nothing; if you want to follow me into my last attempt, you see what fortune watches us. For all the gods on whom this kingdom stood have quit our shrines and altars, gone away. The city that you would help is now in flames. Then let us rush to arms and die. The lost have only this one deliverance: to hope for none.'

"So were these young men's spirits spurred to fury.
Then—just as plundering wolves in a black fog,
when driven blindly by their belly's endless frenzy, for they have left behind their cubs to wait with thirsty jaws—through enemies, through swords we pass to certain death; we make our way into the heart of Troy; around us the black night hovers with its hollow shade.

"Who has the words to tell that night's disaster?
And who to tell the deaths? What tears could equal our agony? An ancient city falls that ruled for many years; through streets and houses and on the sacred threshold of the gods so many silent bodies lie about.
Nor are the Teucrians the only ones to pay the penalty of blood: at times new courage comes to beaten hearts, and then the Danaan victors die; and everywhere are fear, harsh grief, and many shapes of slaughter.

"The first to face us is Androgeos, surrounded by a mighty mob of Greeks.
In ignorance, he thinks us fellow troops and welcomes us at once with friendly words:
'But hurry, men! What laziness has kept you back? The others are at sack and plunder in burning Pergamus. Have you just come from your tall ships?' He spoke and knew at once—for he received no sure reply from us—that he was in the hands of enemies.
He drew back, dazed. He checked his step and voice.
Even as one who works his way along the ground through tangled briers when, unawares, he treads upon a serpent and recoils in terror, suddenly, as it ignites in anger, puffing up its azure neck:
just so, on seeing us, Androgeos trembled, trying to make his quick escape. We rush to ring the Greeks, our weapons thick; we kill on every side. They do not know the ground and panic overcomes them. Fortune smiles on our first trial. And here Coroebus, glad at our success and spirits, cries: 'My comrades, where Fortune first points out the path of safety,

where first she shows herself auspicious, there must be the way to follow: let us change our shields, take Danaan armor for ourselves.
If that be guile or valor—who would ask in war? Our enemies will give us weapons.'

"Theses were Coroebus' words. Then he puts on Androgeos' crested helmet and his shield with handsome emblem, fastening to his thigh the Argive sword. So Dymas does and Ripheus and the excited youths: each arms himself with these new spoils. We move ahead, to mingle with Argives under auspices not ours.
Through that long night we clash in many combats,
and we send many Danaans down to Orcus.
Some scatter to the ships, to seek the shore of safety; some in their low fear climb back to the familiar belly of the horse.

"But oh, it is not right for anyone to trust reluctant gods! For there the virgin Cassandra, Priam's daughter, hair disheveled, was dragged out from the temple, from Minerva's shrine, and her eyes were raised in vain to heaven—her eyes, for chains held fast her gentle hands.
Coroebus, maddened, could not stand the sight.
He threw himself, about to die, against the very center of the Grecian line.
We follow close behind him, charging thick.
Here, from the shrine's high roof, we are struck down for the first time by our own Trojan weapons:
the image of our arms, the error of our Danaan helmets, starts a wretched slaughter.
But then the Grecians groan with indignation because the virgin is rescued. From all sides they muster to attack us: Ajax most ferociously, and both of Atreus' sons, and all the army of Dolopians:
as, when a hurricane has burst, the crosswinds will clash together—West and South and East, exulting in his oriental steeds—
the woods are shrill, and foam-washed Nereus rages,

536. Orcus: The abode of the dead.
546. Coroebus: He had been in love with Cassandra.
556. Ajax: Not the great Ajax, son of Telamon, but the lesser Ajax, son of Oileus.
562. Nereus: The old man of the sea.

his trident stirs the seas up from their deeps.
And any whom our stratagems had driven beneath the shades of dark night, whom we had chased across the city, now appear; and first they recognize our shields, our miming weapons, then note our speech that does not sound like theirs.
Such numbers overcome us instantly.
Coroebus is the first to fall; he dies beneath Peneleus' right hand, beside the altar of the warrior goddess, Pallas.
Then Ripheus, too, has fallen—he was first among the Teucrians for justice and observing right; the gods thought otherwise.
Both Hypanis and Dymas perish, pierced by their own comrades; neither your great goodness, o Panthus, nor Apollo's garland could protect you when you fell. O final flames that take my people, ashes of my Ilium, be you my witness that, in your disaster,
I did not shun the Danaan blades or battle:
if fate had willed my end, my hand had earned it.
Then we are forced apart. Along with me go Iphitus and Pelias: one was already slow with his long years, the other, slow-footed through a wound got from Ulysses.
The clamor calls us on to Priam's palace.

"And here the fight is deadly, just as if there were no battles elsewhere, just as if no one were dying now throughout the city;
for here the god of war cannot be tamed.
The Danaans rush the roofs; they storm the threshold with linked and lifted shields; their ladders hug
the walls—the rungs reach up the very doorposts.
Against the darts their left hands thrust their bucklers,
and with their right, they clutch the battlements.
In turn the Trojans tear down roofs and towers to fling as missiles; they can see the end is near, but even at death's point they still prepare defense. They roll down gilded rafters, our ancient fathers' splendors; while below,
the others block the gates with naked blades.
They guard in tight array. Made new again, our spirits rush relief to Priam's palace, help to our men, and fresh force to the beaten.

596. bucklers: Shields.

"There was an entry gate with secret doors:
a passageway that ran to Priam's rooms,
a postern at the palace rear; and there,
while Troy still stood, the sad Andromache would often, unattended, come to see her husband's parents; there she brought her boy
Astyanax to visit his grandfather.
That is the way I take to reach the ramparts along the roof; from there the wretched Trojans fling useless weapons with their hands. And from the sheer edge of that roof a tower rose, built starward; it had served as lookout over all Troy, the Danaan ships, the Grecian camp.
And where the upper stories show loose joints,
there we attack with iron to tug it free,
to wrench it from the top, to thrust it down.
It suddenly collapses; with a crash
it tumbles wide across the Danaan ranks; its fall is ruinous. But fresh Greeks come;
the stones, the other missiles never stop.

"And then, before the very porch, along the outer portal Pyrrhus leaps with pride, his armor glitters with a brazen brilliance
he is like a snake that, fed on poisonous plants and swollen underground all winter, now his slough cast off, made new and bright with youth, uncoils his slippery body to the light;
his breast erect, he towers toward the sun;
he flickers from his mouth a three-forked tongue.
With Pyrrhus are the giant Periphas together with Automedon, Achilles' charioteer and armor-bearer; all the youths of Scyros now assault the palace;
they fling their firebrands up toward the roof.
Pyrrhus himself, among the first, takes up a two-edged ax and cracks the stubborn gates.
He rips the bronze-bound portals off their hinges, cuts through a beam, digs out tough oak: the breach is vast, a gaping mouth. The inner house is naked now, the long halls, open; naked, the private rooms of Priam and the ancient kings; and the Greeks can see the threshold guards.

609. postern: Secret door.
613. Astyanax: Son of Hector, grandson of Priam.
628. Pyrrhus: Also known as Neoptolemus (the name means New War), the son of Achilles.
639. Scyros: The island where Pyrrhus was born, home of the Dolopians.

"But deep within, confusion takes the palace, anguish and sad commotion; and the vaulted walls echo with the wail and woe of women, lament that beats against the golden stars.
Across the huge apartments in their terror
the matrons wander, clutching at the doors, embracing them, imprinting kisses. Pyrrhus, his father's force within him, presses forward—
no barrier, and not the guards themselves, can hold him off. The gate gives way before the ram's repeated hammerings; the doors are severed from their hinges, topple out.
Force cracks a breach; the Danaans storm and pour across the passage, butchering the first they meet; their soldiers stream across the palace—less furious than these, the foaming river when it has burst across resisting banks and boundaries and overflows, its angry flood piling in a mass along the plains as it drags flocks and folds across the fields.
And I myself saw Neoptolemus, insane with blood, and both of Atreus' sons upon the threshold. I saw Hecuba together with her hundred daughters, and among the altars I could see King Priam, polluting with his blood the fires he himself had hallowed. And the fifty bridal chambers that had such hopes of sons of sons, the doors that once had stood so proud with booty and with barbaric gold lie on the ground.
What fire cannot do, the Danaans can.

"Perhaps you now will ask the end of Priam.
When he has seen his beaten city ruined—
the wrenching of the gates, the enemy among his sanctuaries—then in vain
the old man throws his armor, long unused, across his shoulders, tottering with age;
and he girds on his useless sword; about to die, he hurries toward the crowd of Greeks.

"Beneath the naked round of heaven, at the center of the palace, stood a giant shrine; at its side an ancient laurel leaned across the altar stone, and it embraced the household gods within its shadow. Here, around that useless altar, Hecuba together with her daughters—just like doves when driven headlong by a dark storm—huddled;

and they held fast the statues of the gods.
But when she saw her Priam putting on the armor he had worn when he was young, she cried: 'Poor husband, what wild thought drives you to wear these weapons now? Where would you rush?
This is no time for such defense and help,
not even were my Hector here himself.
Come near and pray: this altar shall yet save us all, or you shall die together with us.'
When this was said she took the old man to her and drew him down upon the sacred seat.

"But then Polites, one of Priam's sons who had escaped from Pyrrhus' slaughter, down long porticoes, past enemies and arrows, races, wounded, across the empty courts.
But after him, and hot to thrust, is Pyrrhus;
now, even now he clutches, closing in;
he presses with his shaft until at last Polites falls before his parents' eyes, within their presence; he pours out his life in streams of blood. Though in the fist of death, at this, Priam does not spare voice or wrath:
'If there is any goodness in the heavens to oversee such acts, for this offense and outrage may you find your fitting thanks and proper payment from the gods, for you have made me see the murder of my son, defiled a father's face with death. Achilles—you lie to call him father—never dealt with Priam so—and I, his enemy;
for he had shame before the claims and trust that are a suppliant's. He handed back for burial the bloodless corpse of Hector and sent me off in safety to my kingdom.'
The old man spoke; his feeble spear flew off—harmless; the hoarse bronze beat it back at once;
it dangled, useless now, from the shield's boss.
And Pyrrhus: 'Carry off these tidings; go and bring this message to my father, son of Peleus; and remember, let him know my sorry doings, how degenerate is Neoptolemus, Now die.' This said, he dragged him to the very altar stone, with Priam shuddering and slipping in the blood that streamed from his own son. And Pyrrhus with his left hand clutched tight the hair of Priam;

his right hand drew his glistening blade, and then he buried it hilt-high in the king's side.
This was the end of Priam's destinies, the close that fell to him by fate: to see his Troy in flames and Pergamus laid low—who once was proud king over many nations and lands of Asia. Now he lies along the shore, a giant trunk, his head torn from his shoulders, as a corpse without a name.

"This was the first time savage horror took me.
I was astounded; as I saw the king gasping his life away beneath a ruthless wound, there before me rose the effigy of my dear father, just as old as Priam;
before me rose Creüsa, left alone,
my plundered home, the fate of small Iülus.
I look behind and scan the troops around me;
all of my men, worn out, have quit the battle, have cast their bodies down along the ground or fallen helplessly into the flames.

"And now that I am left alone, I see the daughter of Tyndareos clinging to Vesta's thresholds, crouching silently within a secret corner of the shrine; bright conflagrations give me light as I wander and let my eyes read everything.
For she, in terror of the Trojans—set against her for the fall of Pergamus—and of the Danaans' vengeance and the anger of her abandoned husband; she, the common Fury of Troy and of her homeland, she had hid herself; she crouched, a hated thing, beside the altars. In my mind a fire is burning; anger spurs me to avenge my falling land, to exact the debt of crime.

756. Creüsa: Aeneas' wife.
763. daughter of Tyndareos: Helen. Tyndareos was her mortal father; she was actually the daughter of Jupiter (Zeus).

'Is she to have it so: to leave unharmed, see Sparta and her home Mycenae, go—a victor queen in triumph—to look on her house and husband, parents, children, trailing a train of Trojan girls and Phrygian slaves?
Shall Troy have been destroyed by fire, Priam been beaten by the blade, the Dardan shore so often soaked with blood, to this end? No.
For though there is no memorable name in punishing a woman and no gain of honor in such victory, yet I shall have my praise for blotting out a thing of evil, for my punishing of one who merits penalties; and it will be a joy to fill my soul with vengeful fire, to satisfy the ashes of my people.'

"And carried off by my mad mind, I was still blurting out these words when, with such brightness as I had never seen, my gracious mother stood there before me; and across the night she gleamed with pure light, unmistaken goddess, as lovely and as tall as she appears whenever she is seen by heaven's beings.
And while she caught and held my right hand fast,
she spoke these words to me with her rose lips:
'My son, what bitterness has kindled this fanatic anger? Why this madness? What of all your care for me—where has it gone?
Should you not first seek out your father, worn with years, Anchises, where you left him; see if your own wife, Creüsa, and the boy Ascanius are still alive? The Argive lines ring them all about; and if my care had not prevented such an end, by now flames would have swept them off, the hostile sword have drunk their blood. And those to blame are not the hated face of the Laconian woman,
the daughter of Tyndareos, or Paris:
It is the gods' relentlessness, the gods', that overturns these riches, tumbles Troy from its high pinnacle. Look now—for I shall tear away each cloud that cloaks your eyes

778. Sparta: The place of Helen's birth. Mycenae: The city where she had lived with her husband Menelaus.
813. Laconian: Spartan.

and clogs your human seeing, darkening all things with its damp fog: you must not fear the orders of your mother; do not doubt, but carry out what she commands. For here, where you see huge blocks ripped apart and stones torn free from stones and smoke that joins with dust in surges, Neptune shakes the walls, his giant trident is tearing Troy from its foundations; and here the first to hold the Scaean gates is fiercest Juno; girt with iron, she calls furiously to the fleet for more Greek troops. Now turn and look: Tritonian Pallas is planted there; upon the tallest towers
she glares with her storm cloud and her grim Gorgon.
And he who furnishes the Greeks with force that favors and with spirit is the Father himself, for he himself goads on the gods against the Dardan weapons. Son, be quick to flee, have done with fighting. I shall never desert your side until I set you safe upon your father's threshold.' So she spoke, then hid herself within the night's thick shadows.
Ferocious forms appear—the fearful powers of gods that are the enemies of Troy.

"At this, indeed, I saw all Ilium sink down into the fires; Neptune's Troy is overturned; even as when the woodsmen along a mountaintop are rivals in their striving to bring down an ancient ash, hacked at with many blows of iron and ax;
it always threatens falling, nodding with its trembling leaves and tossing crest until, slowly, slowly, the wounds have won; it gives one last great groan, then wrenches from the ridges and crashes into ruin. I go down and, guided by a god, move on among the foes and fires; weapons turn aside, the flames retire where I make my way.

827. Scaean gates: (Skaian gates), one of the principal entrances to Troy.

830. Tritonian Pallas: Minerva (Athena). The significance of the title Tritonian is unknown.

832. Gorgon: Monster whose appearance turned men to stone. Athena had a gorgon-face on her shield.

844. Neptune's Troy: Although Neptune (Poseidon) is now one of the powers hostile to Troy, he helped to build it.

"But now, when I had reached my father's threshold, Anchises' ancient house, our home—and I longed so to carry him to the high mountains and sought him first—he will not let his life be drawn out after Troy has fallen, he will not endure exile; 'You whose lifeblood is fresh, whose force is still intact and tough, you hurry your escape; if heaven's lords had wanted longer life for me, they would have saved my home. It is enough—and more—that I have lived beyond one fall and sack of Troy. Call out your farewell to my body as it is now, thus laid out, thus; and then be gone. I shall find death by my own hand;
the enemy will pity me and seek my spoils. The loss of burial is easy.
For hated by the gods and useless, I have lingered out my years too long already, since that time when the father of the High Ones and king of men let fly his thunderbolt against me with the winds, touched me with lightning.'

"These were the words he used. He did not move.
We stood in tears—my wife, Creüsa, and Ascanius and all the household—begging my father not to bring down everything along with him and make our fate more heavy.
He will not have it. What he wants is set;
he will not leave his place. Again I take to arms and, miserable, long for death.
What other stratagem or chance is left?
And then I ask: 'My father, had you thought I could go off and leave you here? Could such unholiness fall from a father's lips?
For if it please the High Ones that no thing be left of this great city, if your purpose must still persist, if you want so to add yourself and yours to Ilium's destruction—why then, the door to death is open: Pyrrhus—who massacres the son before his father's eyes, and then kills the father at the altars—still hot from Priam's blood, will soon be here.
And was it, then, for this, my gracious mother,

867. one fall and sack: Troy had been sacked once before, by Hercules (Herakles).

876. thunderbolt: Anchises was punished by Jupiter for being the lover of the goddess Venus. The thunderbolt lamed him.

that you have saved me from the blade, the fire—that I might see the enemy within the heart of home, my son Ascanius, my father and Creüsa at their side,
all butchered in each other's blood? My men, bring arms; the last light calls upon the beaten.
Let be, and let me at the Greeks again, to make my way back to new battles. Never shall we all die this day without revenge.'

"At that I girded on my sword again and fixed it firm, passing my left hand through my shield strap as I hurried from the house, But suddenly Creüsa held me fast beside the threshold; clinging to my feet, she lifted young Iülus to his father:
"If you go off to die, then take us, too,
to face all things with you, but if your past still lets you put your hope in arms, which now you have put on, then first protect this house.
To whom is young Iülus left, to whom your father and myself, once called your wife?'

"So did Creüsa cry; her wailing filled my father's house. But even then there comes a sudden omen—wonderful to tell:
between the hands, before the faces of his grieving parents, over Iülus' head there leaps a lithe flametip that seems to shed a radiance; the tongue of fire flickers, harmless, and plays about his soft hair, grazes his temples. Shuddering in our alarm, we rush to shake the flames out of his hair and quench the holy fire with water. But Anchises raised his glad eyes to the stars and lifted heavenward his voice and hands:
'O Jupiter, all-able one, if you are moved by any prayers, look on us.
I only ask you this: if by our goodness we merit it, then, Father, grant to us your help and let your sign confirm these omens.'

"No sooner had the old man spoken so than sudden thunder crashed upon the left,
and through the shadows ran a shooting star, its trail a torch of flooding light. It glides above the highest housetops as we watch, until the brightness that has marked its course is buried in the woods of Ida: far and wide the long wake of that furrow shines, and sulfur smokes upon the land. At last,

won over by this sign, my father rises,
to greet the gods, to adore the sacred star:
'Now my delay is done; I follow; where you lead, I am. Gods of my homeland, save my household, save my grandson. Yours, this omen; and Troy is in your keeping. Yes, I yield.
My son, I go with you as your companion.'

"These were his words. But now the fire roars across the walls; the tide of flame flows nearer.
'Come then, dear father, mount upon my neck;
I'll bear you on my shoulders. That is not too much for me. Whatever waits for us, we both shall share one danger, one salvation.
Let young Iülus come with me, and let my wife Creüsa follow at a distance.
And servants, listen well to what I say:
along the way, just past the city walls,
in an abandoned spot there is a mound, an ancient shrine of Ceres; and nearby an ancient cypress stands, one that our fathers' devotion kept alive for many years.
From different directions, we shall meet at this one point. My father, you will carry the holy vessels and our homeland's gods.
Filthy with war, just come from slaughter, I must never touch these sacred things until I bathe myself within a running stream.'

"This said, I spread a tawny lion skin across my bent neck, over my broad shoulders, and then take up Anchises; small Iülus now clutches my right hand; his steps uneven, he is following his father; and my wife moves on behind. We journey through dark places; and I, who just before could not be stirred by any weapons cast at me or by the crowds of Greeks in charging columns, now

944. Ida: The great mountain range near Troy.

965. Ceres: (Demeter) goddess of grain crops.

am terrified by all the breezes, startled by every sound, in fear for son and father.

"And now, as I approached the gates and thought I had found the way of my escape, the sudden and frequent tramp of feet was at my ears;
and peering through the shades, Anchises cries:
'My son, take flight; my son, they are upon us.
I see their gleaming shields, the flashing bronze.'
At this alarm I panicked: some unfriendly god's power ripped away my tangled mind.
For while I take a trackless path, deserting the customary roads, fate tears from me my wife Creüsa in my misery.
I cannot say if she had halted or had wandered off the road or slumped down, weary.
My eyes have never had her back again.
I did not look behind for her, astray, or think of her before we reached the mound and ancient, sacred shrine of Ceres; here at last, when all were gathered, she alone was missing—gone from husband, son, companions.

"What men, what gods did I in madness not accuse? Did I see anything more cruel within the fallen city? I commit Ascanius, Anchises, and the gods of Troy to my companions, hiding them inside a winding valley. I myself again seek out the city, girding on my gleaming arms. I want to meet all risks again, return through all of Troy, again give back my life to danger. First I seek the city walls, the gateway's shadowed thresholds through which I had come before. And I retrace my footsteps; through the night I make them out.
My spirit is held by horror everywhere;
even the very silence terrifies.
Then I move homeward—if by chance, by chance,
she may have made her way there. But the Danaans had flooded in and held the house. At once the hungry conflagration rolls before the wind, high as the highest rooftop; flames are towering overhead, the boiling tide is raging to the heavens. I go on; again I see the house of Priam and the fortress. Down the empty porticoes, in Juno's sanctuary, I can see both Phoenix and the fierce Ulysses, chosen as guardians, at watch over the booty.

And here, from every quarter, heaped together, are Trojan treasures torn from burning altars—
the tables of the gods, and plundered garments, and bowls of solid gold; and Trojan boys and trembling women stand in a long line.

"And more, I even dared to cast my cries across the shadows; in my sorrow, I—again, again, in vain—called for Creüsa; my shouting filled the streets. But as I rushed and raged among the houses endlessly, before my eyes there stood the effigy and grieving shade of my Creüsa, image far larger than the real. I was dismayed; my hair stood stiff, my voice held fast within my jaws. She spoke; her words undid my cares:

" 'O my sweet husband, is there any use in giving way to such fanatic sorrow?
For this could never come to pass without the gods' decree; and you are not to carry Creüsa as your comrade, since the king of high Olympus does not grant you that.
Along your way lie long exile, vast plains of sea that you must plow; but you will reach Hesperia, where Lydian Tiber flows, a tranquil stream, through farmer's fruitful fields.
There days of gladness lie in wait for you:
a kingdom and a royal bride. Enough of tears for loved Creüsa. I am not to see the haughty homes of Myrmidons or of Dolopians, or be a slave to Grecian matrons—I, a Dardan woman and wife of Venus' son. It is the gods'

1029. Phoenix: (Phoinix), formerly tutor of Achilles.

1054. Lydian: The Tiber was the center of many Etruscan settlements and the Etruscans were supposed to be immigrants from Lydia, in Asia Minor.

1062–1063. the gods' great Mother: Cybele, an Asiatic mother-goddess worshipped (according to Virgil) at Troy.

great Mother who keeps me upon these shores.
And now farewell, and love the son we share.'

"When she was done with words—I weeping and wanting to say so many things—she left and vanished in transparent air. Three times
I tried to throw my arms around her neck;
three times the Shade I grasped in vain escaped my hands—like fleet winds, most like a winged dream.

"And so at last, when night has passed, I go again to my companions. Here I find, to my surprise, new comrades come together, vast numbers, men and women, joined for exile,
a crowd of sorrow. Come from every side, with courage and with riches, they are ready for any lands across the seas where I may lead them. Now the star of morning rose above high Ida's ridges, guiding the day.
The Danaans held the gates' blockaded thresholds.
There was no hope of help. Then I gave way and, lifting up my father, made for the mountains."

[Aeneas goes on to tell the story of his wanderings in search of a new home. By the end of the evening, Dido, already falling in love with him before the banquet (through the intervention of Venus and Juno, who both promote the affair, each for different reasons), now feels the full force of her passion for Aeneas.]

Book IV

[Aeneas Abandons Dido]

Too late. The queen is caught between love's pain and press. She feels the wound within her veins;
she is eaten by a secret flame. Aeneas' high name, all he has done, again, again come like a flood. His face, his words hold fast her breast. Care strips her limbs of calm and rest.

A new dawn lights the earth with Phoebus' lamp and banishes damp shadows from the sky when restless Dido turns to her heart's sharer:
"Anna, my sister, what dreams make me shudder?
Who is this stranger guest come to our house?
How confident he looks, how strong his chest and arms! I think—and I have cause—that he is born of gods. For in the face of fear the mean must fall. What fates have driven him!

What trying wars he lived to tell! Were it not my sure, immovable decision not to marry anyone since my first love turned traitor, when he cheated me by death, were I not weary of the couch and torch,
I might perhaps give way to this one fault.
For I must tell you, Anna, since the time Sychaeus, my poor husband, died and my own brother splashed our household gods with blood, Aeneas is the only man to move my feelings, to overturn my shifting heart.
I know too well the signs of the old flame.
But I should call upon the earth to gape and close above me, or on the almighty Father to take his thunderbolt, to hurl me down into the shades, the pallid shadows and deepest night of Erebus, before I'd violate you, Shame, or break your laws!
For he who first had joined me to himself has carried off my love, and may he keep it and be its guardian within the grave."
She spoke. Her breast became a well of tears.

And Anna answers: "Sister, you more dear to me than light itself, are you to lose all of your youth in dreary loneliness, and never know sweet children or the soft rewards of Venus? Do you think that ashes or buried Shades will care about such matters?
Until Aeneas came, there was no suitor who moved your sad heart—not in Libya nor, before, in Tyre: you always scorned Iarbas and all the other chiefs that Africa,
a region rich in triumphs, had to offer.
How can you struggle now against a love that is so acceptable? Have you forgotten the land you settled, those who hem you in?
On one side lie the towns of the Gaetulians,

18. first love: Her first husband, Sychaeus, was murdered by Pygmalion, king of Tyre, Dido's brother. Her husband's ghost warned her in a dream to leave Tyre and seek a new home.

20. couch and torch: Marriage. In the Roman ceremony the bride was taken to her home in a torch-lit procession.

33. Erebus: The darkest region of the underworld.

46. Iarbas: The most prominent of Dido's African suitors.

52. Gaetulians: A savage African people living southwest of Carthage.

a race invincible, and the unbridled
Numidians and then the barbarous Syrtis.
And on the other lies a barren country, stripped by the drought and by Barcaean raiders, raging both far and near. And I need not remind you of the wars that boil in Tyre and of your brother's menaces and plots.
For I am sure it was the work of gods and Juno that has held the Trojan galleys fast to their course and brought them here to Carthage.
If you marry Aeneas, what a city and what a kingdom, sister, you will see!
With Trojan arms beside us, so much greatness must lie in wait for Punic glory! Only pray to the gods for their good will, and having presented them with proper sacrifices, be lavish with your Trojan guests and weave excuses for delay while frenzied winter storms out across the sea and shatters ships, while wet Orion blows his tempest squalls
beneath a sky that is intractable."

These words of Anna fed the fire in Dido.
Hope burned away her doubt, destroyed her shame.
First they move on from shrine to shrine, imploring
the favor of the gods at every altar.
They slaughter chosen sheep, as is the custom,
and offer them to Ceres the lawgiver, to Phoebus, Father Bacchus, and—above all—to Juno, guardian of marriage. Lovely Dido holds the cup in her right hand;
she pours the offering herself, midway between a milk-white heifer's horns. She studies slit breasts of beasts and reads their throbbing guts.
But oh the ignorance of augurs! How can vows and altars help one wild with love?

54. Numidians: The most powerful of the local tribes. Syrtis: On the coast to the west.

56. Barcaean raiders: To the east.

67. Punic: Carthaginian.

79. Ceres: Called 'lawgiver' because her gift of agriculture enabled men to live in settled communities. The goddess of the crops. Ceres, the Wine-god, and Phoebus Apollo are selected as deities especially connected with the founding of cities; one of Apollo's titles is "Founder," and Ceres and Dionysus (Bacchus) control the essential crops which will enable the colonists to live. Dido prays to these gods at the moment when she is about to abandon her responsibilities as founder of a city; a similar irony is present in her prayer to Juno, whose "business" is the marriage-bond, at the moment when she is about to break her long fidelity to the memory of Sychaeus.

84–86. Dido uses the Roman (Etruscan) method of augury—looking for signs of the future in the color and disposition of the entrails of a sacrifical animal.

Meanwhile the supple flame devours her marrow;
within her breast the silent wound lives on.
Unhappy Dido burns. Across the city she wanders in her frenzy—even as a heedless hind hit by an arrow when a shepherd drives for game with darts among the Cretan woods and, unawares, from far leaves winging steel inside her flesh; she roams
the forests and the wooded slopes of Dicte, the shaft of death still clinging to her side.
So Dido leads Aeneas around the ramparts, displays the wealth of Sidon and the city ready to hand; she starts to speak, then falters and stops in midspeech. Now day glides away.
Again, insane, she seeks out that same banquet, again she prays to hear the trials of Troy,
again she hangs upon the teller's lips.

But now the guests are gone. The darkened moon, in turn, conceals its light, the seeing stars invite to sleep; inside the vacant hall she grieves alone and falls upon the couch that he has left. Absent, she sees, she hears the absent one or draws Ascanius, his son and counterfeit, into her arms,
as if his shape might cheat her untellable love.

Her towers rise no more; ,the young of Carthage no longer exercise at arms or build their harbors or sure battlements for war;
the works are idle, broken off; the massive,
menacing rampart walls, even the crane,
defier of the sky, now lie neglected.

* * *

[Juno proposes to Venus that Dido and Aeneas be married, which would guarantee the unity of Carthage and Troy and peace between Juno and Venus. Her aim is of course to ensure that the imperial destiny reserved for Rome be transferred to Carthage. Venus, confident of the future, which has been explained to her by Jupiter, consents to the scheme. Dido organizes a hunt, which is broken up by a storm, and Dido and Aeneas take shelter in a cave, where their love is consummated. There is no formal marriage, but

96. Dicte: A mountain range in Crete.

Dido henceforth feels justified in assuming the dignity and rights of a wife. Their love is rumored abroad, and when the African prince Iarbas hears of it, he appeals to Jupiter for satisfaction.]

And as he prayed and clutched the altar stone, all-able Jupiter heard him and turned his eyes upon the royal walls, upon the lovers who had forgotten their good name.
He speaks to Mercury, commanding him:
"Be on your way, my son, call up the Zephyrs, glide on your wings, speak to the Dardan chieftain who lingers now at Tyrian Carthage, paying not one jot of attention to the cities the Fates have given him. Mercury, carry across the speeding winds the words I urge:
his lovely mother did not promise such a son to us; she did not save him twice from Grecian arms for this—but to be master of Italy, a land that teems with empire and seethes with war; to father a race from Teucer's high blood, to place all earth beneath his laws.
But if the brightness of such deeds is not enough to kindle him, if he cannot attempt the task for his own fame, does he—a father—grudge Ascanius the walls of Rome? What is he pondering, what hope can hold him here among his enemies, not caring for his own Ausonian sons or for Lavinian fields. He must set sail.
And this is all; my message lies in this."

His words were ended. Mercury made ready to follow his great father's orders. First he laces on his golden sandals: winged to bear him, swift as whirlwinds, high across the land and water. Then he takes his wand; with this he calls pale spirits up from Orcus and down to dreary Tartarus sends others;
he uses this to give sleep and recall it,
and to unseal the eyes of those who have died.
His trust in this, he spurs the winds and skims
the troubled clouds. And now in flight, he sights

297. Mercury: The Latin equivalent of the Greek Hermes, the divine messenger.
308. Teucer: The ancestral Trojan king.
316. Ausonian: Italian. The Ausonians were aboriginal inhabitants of southern Italy.
325. Tartarus: The place of punishment of the wicked in the lower world.

the summit and high sides of hardy Atlas who props up heaven with his crest—Atlas, whose head is crowned with pines and battered by the wind and rain and always girdled by black clouds; his shoulders' cloak is falling snow;
above the old man's chin the rivers rush;
his bristling beard is stiff with ice. Here first Cyllene's god poised on his even wings and halted; then he hurled himself headlong and seaward with his body, like a bird that, over shores and reefs where fishes throng, swoops low along the surface of the waters.
Not unlike this, Cyllene's god between the earth and heaven as he flies, cleaving the sandy shore of Libya from the winds that sweep from Atlas, father of his mother.

As soon as his winged feet have touched the outskirts,
he sees Aeneas founding fortresses and fashioning new houses. And his sword was starred with tawny jasper, and the cloak that draped his shoulders blazed with Tyrian purple—
a gift that wealthy Dido wove for him;
she had run golden thread along the web.
And Mercury attacks at once. "Are you now laying the foundation of high Carthage, as servant to a woman, building her a splendid city here? Are you forgetful of what is your own kingdom, your own fate?
The very god of gods, whose power sways both earth and heaven, sends me down to you from bright Olympus. He himself has asked me to carry these commands through the swift air:
what are you pondering or hoping for while squandering your ease in Libyan lands?
For if the brightness of such deeds is not enough to kindle you—if you cannot attempt the task for your own fame—remember Ascanius growing up, the hopes you hold for Iülus, your own heir, to whom are owed the realm of Italy and land of Rome."

330. Atlas: Mountain range in western North Africa. Atlas is described in human terms because of the legend that he was one of the Titans who rebelled against Jupiter and was condemned to hold up the sky on his shoulders.

337. Cyllene: A mountain in Arcadia, The birthplace of Hermes (Mercury).

345. his mother: The nymph Maia.

360. Olympus: The mountain in Greece believed to be the abode of the gods.

So did Cyllene's god speak out. He left the sight of mortals even as he spoke and vanished into the transparent air.

This vision stunned Aeneas, struck him dumb;
his terror held his hair erect; his voice held fast within his jaws. He burns to flee from Carthage; he would quit these pleasant lands, astonished by such warnings, the command of gods. What can he do? With what words dare he face the frenzied queen? What openings can he employ? His wits are split, they shift here, there; they race to different places, turning to everything. But as he hesitated, this seemed the better plan: he calls Sergestus and Mnestheus and the strong Serestus, and he asks them to equip the fleet in silence, to muster their companions on the shore, to ready all their arms, but to conceal the reasons for this change; while he himself—with gracious Dido still aware of nothing and never dreaming such a love could ever be broken—would try out approaches, seek the tenderest, most tactful time for speech, whatever dexterous way might suit his case.
And all are glad. They race to carry out the orders of Aeneas, his commands.

But Dido—for who can deceive a lover?— had caught his craftiness; she quickly sensed what was to come; however safe they seemed, she feared all things. That same unholy Rumor brought her these hectic tidings: that the boats were being armed, made fit for voyaging.
Her mind is helpless; raging frantically, inflamed, she raves throughout the city—just as a Bacchante when, each second year, she is startled by the shaking of the sacred emblems, the orgies urge her on, the cry
"o Bacchus" calls to her by night; Cithaeron incites her with its clamor. And at last Dido attacks Aeneas with these words:

399. same . . . Rumor: Earlier, Rumor (personified as a semi-divine being) had spread the report of Dido's 'marriage' which had incited Iarbas to make his indignant prayer to Jupiter.

404. Bacchante: A female devotee of the god Dionysus (Bacchus), in an ecstatic trance at the Dionysian festival.

407. Cithaeron: Mountain near Thebes, sacred to Dionysus.

"Deceiver, did you even hope to hide so harsh a crime, to leave this land of mine without a word? Can nothing hold you back—neither your love, the hand you pledged, nor even the cruel death that lies in wait for Dido?
Beneath the winter sky are you preparing a fleet to rush away across the deep among the north winds, you who have no feeling?
What! Even if you were not seeking out strange fields and unknown dwellings, even if your ancient Troy were still erect, would you return to Troy across such stormy seas?
Do you flee me? By tears, by your right hand—this sorry self is left with nothing else—by wedding, by the marriage we began, if I did anything deserving of you or anything of mine was sweet to you, take pity on a fallen house, put off your plan, I pray—if there is still place for prayers.
Because of you the tribes of Libya, all the Nomad princes hate me, even my own Tyrians are hostile; and for you my honor is gone and that good name that once was mine, my only claim to reach the stars.
My guest, to whom do you consign this dying woman? I must say 'guest': this name is all I have of one whom once I called my husband.
Then why do I live on? Until Pygmalion, my brother, batters down my walls, until Iarbas the Gaetulian takes me prisoner?
Had I at least before you left conceived a son in me; if there were but a tiny Aeneas playing by me in the hall, whose face, in spite of everything, might yet remind me of you, then indeed I should not seem so totally abandoned, beaten."

Her words were ended. But Aeneas, warned by Jove, held still his eyes; he struggled, pressed care back within his breast. With halting words he answers her at last: "I never shall deny what you deserve, the kindnesses that you could tell; I never shall regret

413. hand you pledged: The handclasp with which he pledged his love and which Dido takes as an earnest of marriage.

433. reach the stars: I.e., become immortal, in her reputation as a faithful wife.

remembering Elissa for as long as I remember my own self, as long as breath is king over these limbs. I'll speak brief words that fit the case. I never hoped to hide—do not imagine that—my flight;
I am not furtive. I have never held the wedding torches as a husband; I have never entered into such agreements.
If fate had granted me to guide my life by my own auspices and to unravel my troubles with unhampered will, then I should cherish first the town of Troy, the sweet remains of my own people and the tall rooftops of Priam would remain, my hand would plant again a second Pergamus for my defeated men. But now Grynean Apollo's oracles would have me seize great Italy, the Lycian prophecies tell me of Italy: there is my love, there is my homeland. If the fortresses of Carthage and the vision of a city in Libya can hold you, who are Phoenician, why, then, begrudge the Trojans' settling on Ausonian soil? There is no harm: it is right that we, too, seek out a foreign kingdom.
For often as the night conceals the earth with dew and shadows, often as the stars ascend, afire, my father's anxious image approaches me in dreams. Anchises warns and terrifies; I see the wrong I have done to one so dear, my boy Ascanius, whom I am cheating of Hesperia, the fields assigned by fate. And now the gods' own messenger, sent down by Jove himself—
I call as witness both our lives—has brought his orders through the swift air. My own eyes have seen the god as he was entering our walls—in broad daylight. My ears have drunk his words. No longer set yourself and me afire. Stop your quarrel. It is not my own free will that leads to Italy."

452. Elissa: Another name for Dido.
467. Grynean: Apollo had a temple at Gryneum in Asia Minor.
469. Lycian: Apollo had another famous oracular shrine at Patara in Lycia (also in Asia Minor).
480. Anchises: The old man had died in Sicily, just before Aeneas went to Carthage.

But all the while Aeneas spoke, she stared askance at him, her glance ran this way, that.
She scans his body with her silent eyes.
The Dido thus, inflamed, denounces him:

"No goddess was your mother, false Aeneas, and Dardanus no author of your race;
the bristling Caucasus was father to you on his harsh crags; Hyrcanian tigresses gave you their teats. And why must I dissemble?
Why hold myself in check? For greater wrongs?
For did Aeneas groan when I was weeping?
Did he once turn his eyes or, overcome, shed tears or pity me, who was his loved one?
What shall I cry out first? And what shall follow?
No longer now does mighty Juno or our Father, son of Saturn, watch this earth with righteous eyes. Nowhere is certain trust.
He was an outcast on the shore, in want.
I took him in and madly let him share my kingdom; his lost fleet and his companions
I saved from death. Oh I am whirled along in fire by the Furies! First the augur Apollo, then the Lycian oracles, and now, sent down by Jove himself, the gods'
own herald, carrying his horrid orders.
This seems indeed to be a work for High Ones, a care that can disturb their calm. I do not refute your words. I do not keep you back.
Go then, before the winds, to Italy.
Seek out your kingdom overseas; indeed,
if there be pious powers still, I hope that you will drink your torments to the lees among sea rocks and, drowning, often cry the name of Dido. Then, though absent, I shall hunt you down with blackened firebrands;
and when chill death divides my soul and body,
a Shade, I shall be present everywhere.
Depraved, you then will pay your penalties.
And I shall hear of it, and that report will come to me below, among the Shadows."

498. Dardanus: An ancestor of the Trojans.

499. Caucasus: A mountain range near the Caspian Sea. It has connotations of outlandishness and of cruelty.

500. Hyrcanian: From the same general area as the Caucasus.

519. calm: Dido is referring to the Epicurean idea that the gods are unaffected by human events.

Her speech is broken off; heartsick, she shuns
the light of day, deserts his eyes; she turns away, leaves him in fear and hesitation, Aeneas longing still to say so much.
As Dido faints, her servants lift her up;
they carry her into her marble chamber;
they lay her body down upon the couch.

But though he longs to soften, soothe her sorrow and turn aside her troubles with sweet words, though groaning long and shaken in his mind because of his great love, nevertheless pious Aeneas carries out the gods' instructions. Now he turns back to his fleet.

At this the Teucrians indeed fall to.
They launch their tall ships all along the beach;
they set their keels, well-smeared with pitch, afloat.
The crewmen, keen for flight, haul from the forest boughs not yet stripped of leaves to serve as oars and timbers still untrimmed. And one could see them as, streaming, they rushed down from all the city:
even as ants, remembering the winter,
when they attack a giant stack of spelt to store it in their homes; the black file swarms across the fields; they haul their plunder through the grass on narrow tracks; some strain against the great grains with their shoulders, heaving hard;
some keep the columns orderly and chide
the loiterers; the whole trail boils with work.

What were your feelings, Dido, then? What were the sighs you uttered at that sight, when far and wide, from your high citadel, you saw the beaches boil and turmoil take the waters, with such a vast uproar before your eyes?
Voracious Love, to what do you not drive the hearts of men? Again, she must outcry, again, a suppliant, must plead with him, must bend her pride to love—and so not die in vain, and with some way still left untried.

"Anna, you see them swarm across the beaches;
from every reach around they rush to sea:

554. spelt: A kind of wheat.

the canvas calls the breezes, and already the boisterious crewmen crown the sterns with garlands.
But I was able to foresee this sorrow;
therefore I can endure it, sister; yet in wretchedness I must ask you for this one service, Anna. Treacherous Aeneas has honored you alone, confiding even his secret feelings unto you; and you alone know all his soft approaches, moods.
My sister, go—to plead with him, to carry this message to my arrogant enemy.
I never trafficked with the Greeks at Aulis to root the Trojans out, I never sent a fleet to Pergamus, never disturbed his father's ashes or Anchises' Shade, that now Aeneas should ward off my words from his hard ears. Where is he hurrying?
If he would only grant his wretched lover this final gift: to wait for easy sailing and favoring winds. I now no longer ask for those old ties of marriage he betrayed, nor that he lose his kingdom, be deprived of lovely Latium; I only ask for empty time, a rest and truce for all this frenzy, until fortune teaches me, defeated, how to sorrow. I ask this—pity your sister—as a final kindness.
When he has granted it, I shall repay my debt, and with full interest, by my death."

So Dido pleads, and her poor sister carries these lamentations, and she brings them back.
For lamentation cannot move Aeneas;
his graciousness toward any plea is gone.
Fate is opposed, the god makes deaf the hero's kind ears. As when, among the Alps, north winds will strain against each other to root out with blasts—now on this side, now that—a stout oak tree whose wood is full of years; the roar is shattering, the trunk is shaken, and high branches scatter on the ground; but it still grips the rocks; as steeply as it thrusts its crown into the upper air, so deep the roots it reaches down to Tartarus:

584. Aulis: Greek port from which the fleet departed for Troy.

no less than this, the hero; he is battered on this side and on that by assiduous words;
he feels care in his mighty chest, and yet his mind cannot be moved; the tears fall, useless.

Then maddened by the fates, unhappy Dido calls out at last for death; it tires her to see the curve of heaven. That she may not weaken in her plan to leave the light, she sees, while placing offerings on the altars with burning incense—terrible to tell—the consecrated liquid turning black,
the outpoured wine becoming obscene blood.
But no one learns of this, not even Anna.
And more: inside her palace she had built a marble temple to her former husband that she held dear and honored wonderfully.
She wreathed that shrine with snow-white fleeces and holy-day leaves. And when the world was seized by night, she seemed to hear the voice and words of her dead husband, calling out to Dido.
Alone above the housetops, death its song, an owl often complains and draws its long slow call into a wailing lamentation.
More, many prophecies of ancient seers
now terrify her with their awful warnings.
And in her dreams it is the fierce Aeneas himself who drives her to insanity;
she always finds herself alone, abandoned, and wandering without companions on an endless journey, seeking out her people, her Tyrians, in a deserted land:
even as Pentheus, when he is seized by frenzy, sees files of Furies, and a double sun and double Thebes appear to him; or when Orestes, son of Agamemnon, driven across the stage, flees from his mother armed

633. holy-day leaves: Wreaths fit for a festival.

647. Pentheus: King of Thebes. He persecuted the worshipers of the new god Dionysus, and imprisoned the god himself. He was later mocked by the god, who inspired him with the Dionysiac spirit (and perhaps with wine) so that he saw double. In this state he was led off to his death on Cithaeron. These events are dramatized in Euripides' play The Bacchae. The reference to the Furies in this passage is obscure.

650. Orestes: Another reference to Greek tragedy. In the Choephoroe, the Aeschylean play which follows immediately on the Agamemnon, Orestes kills his mother Clytemnestra, and is pursued by the Furies. In other tragic contexts he is represented as pursued by the ghost of his mother.

with torches and black serpents; on the threshold
the awful goddesses of vengeance squat.

When she had gripped this madness in her mind and, beaten by her grief, resolved to die, she plotted with herself the means, the moment.
Her face conceals her meaning; on her brow
she sets serenity, then speaks to Anna:
"My sister, wish me well, for I have found a way that will restore Aeneas to me or free me of my love for him. Near by the bounds of Ocean and the setting sun lies Ethiopia, the farthest land;
there Atlas, the incomparable, turns the heavens, studded with their glowing stars, upon his shoulders. And I have been shown a priestess from that land—one of the tribe of the Massylians—who guards the shrine of the Hesperides; for it was she who fed the dragon and preserved the holy branches upon the tree, sprinkling moist honey and poppy, bringing sleep. She promises to free, with chant and spell, the minds of those she favors but sends anguish into others.
And she can stay the waters in the rivers and turn the stars upon their ways; she moves the nightly Shades; makes earth quake underfoot and—you will see—sends ash trees down the mountains.
Dear sister, I can call the gods to witness, and you and your dear life, that I resort to magic arts against my will. In secret build up a pyre within the inner courtyard beneath the open air, and lay upon it the weapons of the hero. He, the traitor, has left them hanging in my wedding chamber.
Take all of his apparel and the bridal bed where I was undone. You must destroy all relics of the cursed man, for so would I, and so the priestess has commanded."
This said, she is silent and her face is pale.
But Anna cannot dream her sister hides
a funeral behind these novel rites;

668. Massylian: From an African tribe.

669. Hesperides: The daughters of Hesperus, in the west, who lived in a garden which contained golden apples, guarded by a serpent.

her mind is far from thinking of such frenzy;
and she fears nothing worse than happened when Sychaeus died. And so, she does as told.

But when beneath the open sky, inside the central court, the pyre rises high and huge, with logs of pine and planks of ilex, the queen, not ignorant of what is coming,
then wreathes the place with garlands, crowning it with greenery of death; and on the couch above she sets the clothes Aeneas wore,
the sword he left, and then his effigy.
Before the circling altars the enchantress, her hair disheveled, stands as she invokes aloud three hundred gods, especially Chaos and Erebus and Hecate, the triple-shaped Diana, three-faced virgin.
And she had also sprinkled waters that would counterfeit the fountain of Avernus;
she gathered herbs cut down by brazen sickles beneath the moonlight, juicy with the venom of black milk; she had also found a love charm torn from the forehead of a newborn foal before his mother snatched it. Dido herself—with salt cake in her holy hands, her girdle unfastened, and one foot free of its sandal, close by the altars and about to die—
now calls upon the gods and stars, who know the fates, as witness; then she prays to any power there may be, who is both just and watchful, who cares for those who love without requital.

Night. And across the earth the tired bodies were tasting tranquil sleep; the woods and savage waters were resting and the stars had reached the midpoint of their gliding fall—when all the fields are still, and animals and colored birds, near and far, that find their home beside the limpid lakes or haunt the countryside

698. ilex: An evergreen oak tree of Europe.

707. Erebus: The lowest depth of the underworld. Chaos: Greek personification of the disorder which preceded the creation of the universe. Hecate: Title of Diana as goddess of sorcery; she is Hecate, the moon, and Diana the virgin huntress.

710. Avernus: A lake in southern Italy which was supposed to be the entrance to the lower world.

in bristling thickets, sleep in silent night.
But not the sorrowing Phoenician; she can not submit to sleep, can not admit dark night into her eyes or breast; her cares increase; again love rises, surges in her;
she wavers on the giant tide of anger.
She will not let things rest but carries on;
she still revolves these thoughts within her heart:
"What can I do? Shall I, whom he has mocked, go back again to my old suitors, begging, seeking a wedding with Numidians whom
I have already often scorned as bridegrooms?
Or should I sail away on Trojan ships,
to suffer there even their harshest orders?
Shall I do so because the Trojans once received my help, and gratefulness for such old service is remembered by the mindful?
But even if I wish it, would they welcome someone so hated to their haughty ships?
For, lost one, do you not yet know, not feel the treason of the breed of Laomedon?
What then? Shall I accompany, alone, the exultant sailors in their flight? Or call on all my Tyrians, on all my troops to rush upon them? How can I urge on those I once dragged from Sidon, how can I now force them back again upon the sea and have them spread their canvas to the winds?
No; die as you deserve, and set aside your sorrow by the sword. My sister, you, won over by my tears—you were the first to weigh me down with evils in my frenzy, to drive me toward my enemy. And why was it not given me to lead a guiltless life, never knowing marriage, like a wild beast, never to have touched such toils? I have not held fast the faith I swore before the ashes of my Sychaeus." This was her lament.

Aeneas on the high stern now was set to leave; he tasted sleep; all things were ready.
And in his sleep a vision of the god returned to him with that same countenance—

750. Laomedon: A king of Troy who twice broke his promise, once to Heracles and once to Apollo and Poseidon.

resembling Mercury in everything:
his voice and coloring and yellow hair and all his handsome body, a young man's—and seemed to bring a warning once again:
"You, goddess-born, how can you lie asleep at such a crisis? Madman, can't you see the threats around you, can't you hear the breath of kind west winds? She conjures injuries and awful crimes, she means to die, she stirs the shifting surge of restless anger. Why not flee this land headlong, while there is time?
You soon will see the waters churned by wreckage, ferocious torches blaze, and beaches flame,
if morning finds you lingering on this coast.
Be on your way. Enough delays. An ever uncertain and inconsistent thing is woman."
This said, he was at one with the black night.

The sudden apparition terrifies Aeneas. And he tears his body free from sleep. He stirs his crewmen: "Quick! Awake!
Now man the benches, comrades, now unfurl our sails with speed! Down from the upper air a god was sent to urge us on again, to rush our flight, to slice our twisted cables.
O holy one among the gods, we follow your way, whoever you may be; again rejoicing, we shall do as you command.
Be present, help us with your kindness, bring your gracious constellations to the heavens."
He spoke; and from his scabbard snatches up his glowing sword; with drawn blade, strikes the hawsers.
And all are just as eager, hurrying to leave the shore; the ships conceal the sea.
They strain to churn the foam and sweep blue waters.

Now early Dawn had left Tithonus' saffron bed, scattering new light upon the earth.
As soon as from her lookout on the tower
the queen could see the morning whitening, the fleet move on with level sails, the shores and harbors now abandoned, without oarsmen,

800. gracious constellations . . . ; I.e., give us good sailing weather.
802. hawsers: Mooring lines.
806. Dawn: Aurora, the dawn goddess, was married to a mortal, Tithonus.

she beat against her lovely breast three times,
then four, and tore her golden hair, and cried:
"O Jupiter, you let him go, a stranger who mocked our kingdom! Will my men not ready their weapons, hunt him down, pour from my city and rip the galleys from their moorings? Quick!
Bring torches, spread your sails, and ply your oars!
What am I saying? Where am I? What madness has turned awry what I had meant to do?
Poor Dido, does his foulness touch you now?
It should have then, when you gave him your scepter.
This is the right hand, this the pledge of one who carries with him, so they say, the household gods of his land who bore upon his shoulders his father weak with years. And could I not have dragged his body off, and scattered him piecemeal upon the waters, limb by limb?
Or butchered all his comrades, even served Ascanius himself as banquet dish upon his father's table? True enough—the battle might have ended differently.
That does not matter. For, about to die, need I fear anyone? I should have carried my torches to his camp and filled his decks with fire, destroyed the son, the father, that whole race, and then have thrown myself upon them.
You, Sun, who with your flames see all that is done on earth; and Juno, you, interpreter and witness of my sorrows; Hecate, invoked with shrieks, by night, at every city's crossways; and you, the Furies; and the gods that guard dying Elissa—hear these words and turn your power toward my pain; as I deserve, take up my prayers. If it must be that he, a traitor, is to touch his harbor, float to his coasts, and so the fates of Jove demand and if this end is fixed; yet let him suffer war and struggles with audacious nations, and then—when banished from his borders

848–849. . . . let him suffer: This prophecy of Dido's, expressed in the form of a wish, is destined to come true. Aeneas meets resistance in Italy; at one point in the war he has to leave Ascanius behind and go to beg aid from an Italian king, Evander. The final peace is made on condition that the name of his people be changed from "Trojans" to "Latins", and Aeneas dies soon afterwards in mysterious circumstances—his body is never found. His reward for all his struggles is to come not during his life, but in the glory of the generations which succeed him.

and torn from the embrace of Iülus—let him beg aid and watch his people's shameful slaughter.
Not even when he has bent low before an unjust peace may he enjoy his kingdom, the light that he has wished for. Let him fall before his time, unburied in the sand.
These things I plead; these final words I pour out of my blood. Then, Tyrians, hunt down with hatred all his sons and race to come;
send this as offering unto my ashes.
Do not let love or treaty tie our peoples.
May an avenger rise up from my bones,
one who will track with firebrand and sword
the Dardan settlers, now and in the future, at any time that ways present themselves.
I call your shores to war against their shores,
your waves against their waves, arms with their arms.
Let them and their sons' sons learn what is war."

This said, she ran her mind to every side, for she was seeking ways with which to slice—as quickly as she can—the hated light;
and then, with these brief words, she turned to Barce, Sychaeus' nurse—for Dido's own was now black ashes in Phoenicia, her old homeland:
"Dear nurse, call here to me my sister Anna;
and tell her to be quick to bathe her body with river water; see that she brings cattle and all that is appointed for atonement.
So must my sister come; while you yourself bind up your temples with a pious fillet.
I mean to offer unto Stygian Jove
the sacrifices that, as is ordained,
I have made ready and begun, to put an end to my disquiet and commit to flames the pyre of the Trojan chieftain."
So Dido spoke. And Barce hurried off;
she moved with an old woman's eagerness.

861. love or treaty: In fact, the Romans and Carthaginians fought three separate wars (called Punic Wars from the Roman word for the Carthaginians). Rome won them all (though she almost lost the second one): after the third, the city of Carthage was razed to the ground.

862. avenger: Dido foresees the harrying of Italy by the Carthaginian general Hannibal, who in the third century B.C. invaded Italy, defeating the Romans in battle after battle, but failed to capture Rome.

880. fillet: Garland.

881. Stygian: Of the underworld. Styx was one of the infernal rivers.

But Dido, desperate, beside herself with awful undertakings, eyes bloodshot and rolling, and her quivering cheeks flecked with stains and pale with coming death, now bursts across the inner courtyards of her palace.
She mounts in madness that high pyre, unsheathes the Dardan sword, a gift not sought for such an end. And when she saw the Trojan's clothes and her familiar bed, she checked her thought and tears a little, lay upon the couch and spoke her final words: "O relics, dear while fate and god allowed, receive my spirit and free me from these cares; for I have lived and journeyed through the course assigned by fortune.
And now my Shade will pass, illustrious,
beneath the earth; I have built a handsome city,
have seen my walls rise up, avenged a husband,
won satisfaction from a hostile brother:
o fortunate, too fortunate—if only the ships of Troy had never touched our coasts."
She spoke and pressed her face into the couch.
"I shall die unavenged, but I shall die," she says. "Thus, thus, I gladly go below to shadows. May the savage Dardan drink with his own eyes this fire from the deep and take with him the omen of my death."

Then Dido's words were done, and her companions can see her fallen on the sword; the blade is foaming with her blood, her hands are bloodstained.
Now clamor rises to the high rooftop.
Now rumor riots through the startled city.
The lamentations, keening, shrieks of women sound through the houses; heavens echo mighty wailings, even as if an enemy were entering the gates, with all of Carthage or ancient Tyre in ruins, and angry fires rolling across the homes of men and gods.

And Anna heard. Appalled and breathless, she runs, anxious, through the crowd, her nails wounding her face; her fists, her breasts; she calls the dying

910. Thus, Thus: The repetition represents the two strokes of the sword.

922–924. Carthage . . . gods: In these lines is prefigured the capture and total destruction of Carthage by the army of Scipio Africanus the Younger in 146 B.C.

Dido by name: "And was it, then, for this,
my sister? Did you plan this fraud for me?
Was this the meaning waiting for me when the pyre, the flames, the altar were prepared?
What shall I now, deserted, first lament?
You scorned your sister's company in death;
you should have called me to the fate you met;
the same sword pain, the same hour should have taken the two of us away. Did my own hands help build the pyre, and did my own voice call upon our fathers' gods, only to find me, heartless, far away when you lay dying?
You have destroyed yourself and me, my sister,
the people and the elders of your Sidon, and all your city. Let me bathe your wounds in water, and if any final breath still lingers here, may my lips catch it up."
This said, she climbed the high steps, then she clasped her half-dead sister to her breast, and moaning, embraced her, dried the black blood with her dress.
Trying to lift her heavy eyes, the queen falls back again. She breathes; the deep wound in her chest is loud and hoarse. Three times she tried to raise herself and strained, propped on her elbow;
and three times she fell back upon the couch.
Three times with wandering eyes she tried to find high heaven's light and, when she found it, sighed.

But then all-able Juno pitied her long sorrow and hard death and from Olympus sent Iris down to free the struggling spirit from her entwining limbs. For as she died a death that was not merited or fated, but miserable and before her time and spurred by sudden frenzy, Proserpina had not yet cut a gold lock from her crown, not yet assigned her life to Stygian Orcus.
On saffron wings dew-glittering Iris glides along the sky, drawing a thousand shifting colors across the facing sun. She halted

957. Iris: A messenger of the gods, particularly of Juno; also identified with the rainbow.

961. Proserpina: (Persephone) The queen of the underworld. Before an animal was sacrificed, some hair was cut from the forehead: before a human being died, Proserpina was thought to cut a lock of hair as an offering to Dis, the god of the underworld. Since Dido, by her suicide, has anticipated her fated day, Proserpina cannot cut the lock; Juno sends Iris to do it.

above the head of Dido: "So commanded,
I take this lock as offering to Dis;
I free you from your body." So she speaks and cuts the lock with her right hand; at once the warmth was gone, the life passed to the winds.

[After his hurried departure from Carthage, Aeneas goes to Sicily, to the kingdom of his friend Acestes. There he organizes funeral games in honor of his father, Anchises (who had died in Sicily on their first visit there), and leaves behind those of his following who are unwilling to go on to the uncertainty of a settlement in Italy. As the small fleet sails for the Italian shore, Aeneas' mother, Venus, begs Neptune, the divine ruler of the seas, to grant Aeneas a safe voyage. He consents, but warns that one Trojan life must be sacrificed. The victim is to be the head helmsman, Palinurus.]

Book V

[The Death of Palinurus]

And now damp Night had almost reached her midpoint along the skies; beneath their oars the sailors were stretching out on their hard rowing benches, their bodies sinking into easy rest,
when, gliding lightly from the stars of heaven,
Sleep split the darkened air, cast back the shadows, searching for you, o Palinurus, bringing his dismal dreams to you, an innocent.
The god sat down upon the high stern, taking the shape of Phorbas, pouring out these words:
"Palinurus, son of Iasus,
the seas themselves bear on the fleet; the breezes blow steadily; this is a time for rest.
Lay down your head and steal your tired eyes from trials; and for a brief while I myself will take your place, your duties." Palinurus, who scarcely lifts his eyes, makes this reply:
"And are you asking me to act as if I did not know the face of this calm sea and its still waves? Do you ask me to trust this monster? Why should I confide Aeneas to the deceiving winds—I who have been cheated so often by the treachery

1112. Phorbas: An older Trojan.

of tranquil skies?" He held the tiller fast;
not once did he let loose his grasp; his eyes were fixed upon the stars. But—look—the god now shakes a bough that drips with Lethe's dew, drenched with the stupefying power of Styx,
on Palinurus' temples; as he struggles, his swimming eyes relax. That sudden rest had just begun to let his limbs fall slack when, bending down, the god cast him headlong into the limpid waters; as he fell,
he tore away part of the stern and helm,
and often cried, in vain, to his companions.
The god himself soared off upon his wings into thin air. Nevertheless the fleet runs safely on its way across the sea—even as father Neptune promised—carried without alarm. Now, swept along, it neared the Sirens' reefs, long since so dangerous, white with the bones of many. When, far off, the rocks were roaring, hoarse with ceaseless surf, father Aeneas felt his ship drift, aimless, its pilot lost; he took the helm himself and steered his galley through the midnight waters, while sighing often, stunned by the disaster fallen upon his friend: "O Palinurus, too trustful of the tranquil sky and sea,
you will lie naked on an unknown shore."

[Once on Italian soil, Aeneas, obeying instructions from his dead father who had appeared to him in a dream, consults the Sybil, who guides him down to the world of the dead. There he is to see his father and the vision of his race, which is to be his only reward for he will die before his people are settled in their new home.]

Book VI

[Aeneas in the Underworld]

You gods who hold dominion over spirits;
you voiceless Shades; you, Phlegethon and Chaos, immense and soundless regions of the night:
allow me to retell what I was told;

1129. Lethe: A river of the underworld; its waters abolish memory of the past.

1143. Siren's reef: One of the dangers which threatened Odysseus on his voyage home. The song of the Sirens lured mariners close to land, where they were wrecked on the rocks.

351. Phlegethon: An underworld river of fire.

allow me by your power to disclose things buried in the dark and deep of earth!

They moved along in darkness, through the shadows, beneath the lonely night, and through the hollow dwelling place of Dis, his phantom kingdom:
even as those who journey in a forest beneath the scanty light of a changing moon, when Jupiter has wrapped the sky in shadows and black night steals the color from all things.
Before the entrance, at the jaws of Orcus, both Grief and goading Cares have set their couches;
there pale Diseases dwell, and sad Old Age,
and Fear and Hunger, that worst counsellor, and ugly Poverty—shapes terrible to see—and Death and Trials; Death's brother, Sleep, and all the evil Pleasures of the mind;
and War, whose fruits are death; and facing these,
and Furies' iron chambers; and mad Strife,
her serpent hair bound up with bloody garlands.

Among them stands a giant shaded elm,
a tree with spreading boughs and aged arms;
they say that is the home of empty Dreams that cling, below, to every leaf. And more, so many monstrous shapes of savage beasts are stabled there: Centaurs and double-bodied Scyllas; the hundred-handed Briareus;
the brute of Lerna, hissing horribly;
Chimaera armed with flames; Gorgons and Harpies;
and Geryon, the shade that wears three bodies.
And here Aeneas, shaken suddenly by terror, grips his sword; he offers naked steel and opposes those who come. Had not his wise companion warned him they were only thin lives that glide without a body in

378. Centaurs: Mythical creatures, half man, half horse—a byword for violence.

379. Scylla: A monster, described by Lucretius as 'half fish and a girdle of ravenous dogs'. Briareus: See Homer, Iliad, I, lines 463–468, p. 115.

380. brute of Lerna: The Hydra, a many-headed serpent killed by Heracles. Each time one head was cut off, two new ones grew in its place.

381. Chimaera: One-third lion, one-third goat, one-third snake. Gorgons: Monsters whose look could turn people to stone. Harpies: Winged creatures who seize their victims and carry them off to the lower world.

382. Geryon: A giant with three bodies: an opponent of Heracles.

the hollow semblance of a form, he would in vain have torn the shadows with his blade.

Here starts the pathway to the waters of Tartarean Acheron. A whirlpool thick with sludge, its giant eddy seething, vomits
all of its swirling sand into Cocytus.
Grim Charon is the squalid ferryman, the guardian of these streams, these rivers; his white hairs lie thick, disheveled on his chin;
his eyes are fires that stare, a filthy mantle hangs down his shoulder by a knot. Alone, he poles the boat and tends the sails and carries the dead in his dark ship, old as he is;
but old age in a god is tough and green.

And here a multitude was rushing, swarming shoreward, with men and mothers, bodies of high-hearted heroes stripped of life, and boys and unwed girls, and young men set upon the pyre of death before their fathers' eyes:
thick as the leaves that with the early frost of autumn drop and fall within the forest, or as the birds that flock along the beaches, in flight from frenzied seas when the chill season drives them across the waves to lands of sun.
They stand; each pleads to be the first to cross the stream; their hands reach out in longing for the farther shore. But Charon, sullen boatman, now takes these souls, now those; the rest he leaves;
thrusting them back, he keeps them from the beach.

That disarray dismays and moves Aeneas:
"O virgin, what does all this swarming mean?
What do these spirits plead? And by what rule must some keep off the bank while others sweep the blue-black waters with their oars?" The words the aged priestess speaks are brief: "Anchises' son, certain offspring of the gods, you see the deep pools of Cocytus and the marsh of Styx, by whose divinity even the High Ones are afraid to swear falsely.

391. Acheron: A river of the underworld.

393. Cocytus: The river of lamentation.

418. Virgin: The Sybil, his guide.

All these you see are helpless and unburied.
That ferryman is Charon. And the waves will only carry souls that have a tomb.
Before his bones have found their rest, no one may cross the horrid shores and the hoarse waters.
They wander for a hundred years and hover about these banks until they gain their entry, to visit once again the pools they long for."

Anchises' son has stopped; he stays his steps and ponders, pitying these unkind fates.
There he can see the sorrowing Leucaspis, Orontes, captain of the Lycian fleet:
both dead without death's honors, for the south wind had overwhelmed them, sinking ships and sailors, when they were crossing stormy seas from Troy.

And there the pilot, Palinurus, passed:
lately, upon the Libyan voyage, as he scanned the stars, he had fallen from the stern, cast down into the center of the sea.
And when at last in that deep shade Aeneas had recognized his grieving form, he was the first to speak: "O Palinurus, what god tore you from us, plunged you in midsea?
O tell me. For Apollo, who had never been false before, in this one oracle deceived me; he had surely prophesied that you would be unharmed upon the waters and reach the coastline of Ausonia.
Is this the way he keeps his word?" He answered:
"Anchises' son, my captain, you must know:
Apollo's tripod did not cheat, no god hurled me into the waves. For as it happened, the rudder that, as my appointed charge,
I clutched, to steer our course, was twisted off
by force; I dragged it down headlong with me.
I swear by those harsh seas that I was taken by no fear for myself; I was afraid your ship, without its gear, without a helmsman, might swamp in such a surge. Three nights of winter, along vast fields of sea, across the waters,

437. Leucaspis . . . Orontes: Trojans lost at sea in the storm which took Aeneas to Carthage.

the south wind lashed me violently; only on my fourth dawn, high on a wave crest, I saw Italy, dimly. I swam toward land slowly and was just at the point of safety—my sea-drenched clothing heavy, my hooked hands were clinging to a jagged cliffside—when barbarians attacked me with the sword, ignorantly thinking me a prize.
And now I am the breakers', beach winds toss me. . . .
I beg you, therefore, by the gentle light and winds of heaven, undefeated one,
and by your father, by your growing son, Iülus, save me from these evils: either cast earth upon my body—for you can—and seek again the port of Velia; or if there be any way, if you are given such power by your goddess mother (for I cannot think that you are now prepared to cross such mighty rivers and the marsh of Styx without the gods' protection), give your own right hand to wretched Palinurus and take me with you past the waters, that at least in death I find a place of rest."

But then the priestess turned on the dead pilot.
"Where was it, Palinurus, that you learned such dread desire? For how can you, unburied, look at the waves of Styx, upon the Furies' stern river, and approach its shore, unasked?
Leave any hope that prayer can turn aside the gods' decrees. But keep in memory these words as comfort in your cruel trial:
for all around, the neighboring cities will be goaded by the plague, a sign from heaven to make peace with your bones; and they will build a tomb and send their solemn sacrifices;
the place will always be named Palinurus."
These words have set his cares to rest, his sorrow is exiled for a while from his sad heart.
The land that bears his name has made him glad.

The journey they began can now continue.
They near the riverbank. Even the boatman,

481 Velia: South of the bay of Naples, near Cape Palinuro (which is still named after Aeneas' pilot).
490. priestess: The Sybil.

while floating on the Styx, had seen them coming across the silent grove and toward the shore.
He does not wait for greeting but attacks, insulting with these words: "Enough! Stop there!
Whoever you may be who make your way,
so armed, down to our waters, tell me now why you have come. This is the land of shadows, of Sleep and drowsy Night; no living bodies can take their passage in the ship of Styx.
Indeed, I was not glad to have Alcides or Theseus or Pirithoüs cross the lake, although the three of them were sons of gods and undefeated in their wars. Alcides tried to drag off in chains the guardian of Tartarus; he tore him, trembling, from the king's own throne. The others tried to carry the queen away from Pluto's wedding chamber."

Apollo's priestess answered briefly: "We bring no such trickery; no need to be disturbed; our weapons bear no violence; for us, the mighty watchman can bark on forever in his cavern, frightening the bloodless shades; Proserpina can keep the threshold of her uncle faithfully.
Trojan Aeneas, famed for piety and arms, descends to meet his father, down into the deepest shades of Erebus.
And if the image of such piety is not enough to move you, then"—and here she shows the branch concealed beneath her robe—
"you may yet recognize this bough." At this the swollen heart of Charon stills its anger.
He says no more. He wonders at the sacred gift of the destined wand, so long unseen, and turns his blue-black keel toward shore. He clears the other spirits from the gangways and long benches and, meanwhile, admits the massive Aeneas to the boat, the vessel's seams groaning beneath the weight as they let in marsh water through the chinks. At last he sets

517. Alcides: Heracles. One of his labors was to bring Cerberus, the watchdog of Hades, up from the lower world.

518. Theseus . . . Pirithoüs: They came to kidnap Proserpina (Persephone): they failed and were imprisoned but Hercules rescued Theseus.

538. bough: The golden bough which Aeneas had been ordered to take as tribute to Proserpina.

the priestess and the soldier safe across the stream in ugly slime and blue-gray sedge.

These regions echo with the triple-throated bark of the giant Cerberus, who crouches, enormous, in a cavern facing them.
The Sibyl, seeing that his neck is bristling with snakes, throws him a honeyed cake of wheat with drugs that bring on sleep. His triple mouths yawn wide with rapid hunger as he clutches the cake she cast. His giant back falls slack along the ground; his bulk takes all the cave.
And when the beast is buried under sleep,
Aeneas gains the entrance swiftly, leaves the riverbank from which no one returns.

Here voices and loud lamentations echo:
the souls of infants weeping at the very first threshold—torn away by the black day, deprived of their sweet life, ripped from the breast, plunged into bitter death. And next to them are those condemned to die upon false charges.
These places have not been assigned, indeed, without a lot, without a judge; for here Minos is magistrate. He shakes the urn and calls on the assembly of the silent, to learn the lives of men and their misdeeds.
The land that lies beyond belongs to those who, although innocent, took death by their own hands; hating the light, they threw away their lives. But now they long for the upper air, and even to bear want and trials there.
But fate refuses them: the melancholy marshland, its ugly waters, hem them in, the prisoners of Styx and its nine circles.

Nearby, spread out on every side, there lie
the Fields of Mourning: this, their given name.
And here, concealed by secret paths, are those whom bitter love consumed with brutal waste;
a myrtle grove encloses them; their pains

570. Minos: King of Crete, now judge of the dead. the urn: The magistrate of a Roman court decided the order in which cases were to be heard by drawing lots from an urn.

571. assembly of the silent: The jury of the dead.

remain with them in death. Aeneas sees Phaedra and Procris and sad Eriphyle, who pointed to the wounds inflicted by her savage son; he sees Pasiphaë and then Evadne; and Laodamia and Caeneus, once a youth and now a woman, changed back again by fate to her first shape.

Among them, wandering in that great forest,
and with her wound still fresh: Phoenician Dido.
And when the Trojan hero recognized her dim shape among the shadows (just as one who either sees or thinks he sees among the cloud banks, when the month is young, the moon rising), he wept and said with tender love:
"Unhappy Dido, then the word I had was true? That you were dead? That you pursued your final moment with the sword? Did I bring only death to you? Queen, I swear by the stars, the gods above, and any trust that may be in this underearth, I was unwilling when I had to leave your shores.
But those same orders of the gods that now urge on my journey through the shadows, through abandoned, thorny lands and deepest night, drove me by their decrees. And I could not believe that with my going I should bring so great a grief as this. But stay your steps.
Do not retreat from me. Whom do you flee?
This is the last time fate will let us speak."

These were the words Aeneas, weeping, used, trying to soothe the burning, fierce-eyed Shade.
She turned away, eyes to the ground, her face

587. Phaedra: Wife of Theseus, king of Athens, who fell in love with Hippolytus, her husband's son by another woman; the result was her death by suicide and Hippolytus' death through his father's curse. Procris: Killed by her husband in an accident which was brought about by her own jealousy. Eriphyle: Betrayed her husband for gold and was killed by her own son.

589. Pasiphaë: Wife of Minos of Crete, she conceived a monstrous love for a bull, and gave birth to the Minataur.

590. Evadne: Threw herself on the pyre of her husband, who was killed by Zeus for impietv. Laodamia: Begged to be allowed to talk with her dead husband; the request was granted by the gods and when his time came to return, she went back with him to the land of the dead.

591. Caeneus: Virgil's words in the original are ambiguous (perhaps to reflect the ambiguity of the sex of Caeneus). The usual explanation of the passage is that Caenis (a woman) was changed by Poseidon into a man (Caeneus) but returned to her original sex after death. Since the name occurs here in a catalogue of women, this seems the most likely explanation.

no more moved by his speech than if she stood as stubborn flint or some Marpessan crag.
At last she tore herself away; she fled—and still his enemy—into the forest of shadows, where Sychaeus, once her husband, answers her sorrows, gives her love for love.
Nevertheless, Aeneas, stunned by her unkindly fate, still follows at a distance with tears and pity for her as she goes.

* * *

[Aeneas returns to the upper air and begins his settlement in Italy. He is offered the hand of the princess Lavinia by her father Latinus, but this provokes a war against the Trojans, led by King Turnus of Laurentum, in the course of which Aeneas is wounded and stops by a stream to rest. At this point his mother, Venus, comes to him with the armor made for him by Vulcan (Hephaestus), her husband; on the shield is carved a representation of the future glories of Rome.]

Book VIII

[The Shield of Aeneas]

. . . But Venus, the bright goddess, bearing gifts, drew near in airy clouds; and when far off
she saw her son in a secluded valley, withdrawn beside a cooling stream, then she showed herself freely to him, saying this:
"You see, my son, these perfect offerings,
my husband's promised art; then do not doubt,
but dare brave Turnus and the proud Laurentians to battle." These were Cytherea's words.
She sought her son's embraces, then set up his glittering arms beneath a facing oak.
Aeneas cannot have enough; delighted with these gifts of the goddess, this high honor, his eyes rush on to everything, admiring;
with arm and hand he turns the helmet over,
tremendous with its crests and flood of flames,
the sword that deals out fate, the stiff brass corselet, blood-red and huge as when a blue-gray cloud, which rays of sun have kindled, glows far off;
the polished greaves made of electrum and

619. Marpessan: Marpessa was a marble quarry on the island of Paros.

793. perfect offerings: The armor made by Vulcan (Hephaistus).

807. greaves: Armor for the lower legs. electrum: An alloy of gold and silver.

of gold, resmelted many times; the spear;
the shield, its texture indescribable.

For there the Lord of Fire had wrought the story of Italy, the Romans' victories, since he was not unskilled in prophecy or one who cannot tell the times to come.
There he had set the generations of Ascanius, and all their wars, in order.
There, too, he made a mother-wolf, reclining in Mars' green cavern; and at play beside her,
twin boys were hanging at her dugs; fearless, they sucked their mother. She, at this, bent back her tapered neck to lick them each in turn and shape their bodies with her tongue. Not far from this he set the Romans and the Sabine women they carried off—against all law—while in the crowded theater the great Circensian games were under way; and sudden war then broke out again between the Romans and aged Tatius, king of austere Cures.
Next, Romulus and Tatius, these same kings, their quarrels set to rest, stood at Jove's altar;
both, armed and cup in hand and having offered a sow as sacrifice, swore league and friendship.
Not far from this, two chariots that rushed in different directions tore apart Mettus (but then you should have kept your word, o man of Alba!); Tullus hauled the guts of that conniving man into the forest;
the briers dripped with spattered blood. There, too, Porsenna, asking Rome to readmit the banished Tarquin, hemmed the city in

810. Lord of Fire: Vulcan, god of the forge.

816. mother wolf: The twins who were to build Rome, Romulus and Remus, sons of Mars, the war god, were cast out into the woods and there suckled by a she-wolf.

821. Sabine women: The newly founded city of Rome consisted almost entirely of men; the Romans decided to steal the wives of their neighbors, the Sabines. They invited them to an athletic festival and at a given signal, every Roman carried off a Sabine bride. The war which followed ended in the amalgamation of the Roman and Sabine peoples.

825. Circensian games: Games in the Circus, the Roman stadium.

827. Tatius: The Sabine king: Cures is the name of his city.

834. Mettus: Of Alba. He broke an agreement made during the early wars of Rome and was punished by being torn apart by two chariots moving in opposite directions.

835. Tullus: The Roman king who punished Mettus.

838. Porsenna: The Etruscan king who attempted to restore the last of the Roman kings, Tarquin, to the throne from which he had been expelled.

with strangling siege; Aeneas' sons rushed on the sword for freedom's sake. You might have seen Porsenna as one wild and menacing, since Cocles dared tear down the Tiber's bridge, and Cloelia broke her chains and swam the river.

Carved in the upper part was Manlius,
the guardian of the Tarpeian rock, who stood before the temple gates, defender of the high Capitol; the new-carved palace was shaggy with the straw of Romulus.
And here a silver goose fluttered across the gilded colonnades, signaling that the Gauls were at the threshold. Through the brush the Gauls crept toward the tower, under cover of darkness and dense night. Their hair is golden;
and golden, too, their clothes, set off by gleaming, striped cloaks; their milk-white necks are bound in gold;
each brandishes two Alpine javelins and, with an oblong shield, defends his body.
Here in relief were carved the nude Luperci and dancing Salian priests, with woolen caps and shields that fell from heaven; through the city chaste matrons in their cushioned carriages led sacred rites. Away from these scenes Vulcan added the house of Tartarus, the high doorways of Dis, the penalties of crime;
and Catiline, you hanging from a cliff that threatens, trembling at the Furies' faces; and, set apart, the pious who receive their laws from Cato. Bordering these scenes, 840–841. rushed on the sword: I.e., rushed bravely against the enemies' swords.

843. Cocles: Horatius Cocles, who with two companions defended the bridge across the Tiber to give the Romans time to destroy it.

844. Cloelia: A Roman hostage held by Porsenna.

845. Manlius: Consul in 392 B.C.; he was in charge of the citadel ("Tarpeian fortress") at a time when the Gauls from the north held all the rest of the city. They made a night attack on the citadel, but Manlius, awakened by the cackling of the sacred geese, beat it off, and saved Rome.

849. the straw of Romulus: In Virgil's time there was still preserved at Rome a rustic building which was supposed to have been the dwelling place of Romulus.

859. Luperci: Priests of Lupercus, a Roman god corresponding to the Greek Pan.

860. Salian priests: The twelve priests of Mars, who danced in his honor carrying shields which had fallen from heaven.

866. Catiline: Leader of a conspiracy to overthrow the republic which was halted mainly through the efforts of Cicero, consul in 63 B.C. Catiline is the type of discord, representing the civil war which almost destroyed the Roman state, and to which Augustus later put an end.

869. Cato: The noblest of the republicans who had fought Julius Caesar; he stood for honesty and the seriousness which the Romans most admired. He committed suicide in 47 B.C. after Caesar's victory in Africa. Before taking his life he read through Plato's Phaedo, a dialogue concerned with the immortality of the soul, which ends with an account of the death of Socrates.

he carved a golden image of the sea, yet there were blue-gray waters and white foam where dolphins bright with silver cut across the tide and swept the waves with circling tails.

Across the center of the shield were shown the ships of brass, the strife of Actium:
you might have seen all of Leucata's bay teeming with war's array, waves glittering with gold. On his high stern Augustus Caesar is leading the Italians to battle, together with the senate and the people,
the household gods and Great Gods; his bright brows pour out a twin flame, and upon his head his father's Julian star is glittering.
Elsewhere Agrippa towers on the stern;
with kindly winds and gods he leads his squadron;
around his temples, glowing bright, he wears the naval crown, magnificent device, with its ships' beaks. And facing them, just come from conquering the peoples of the dawn, from the red shores of the Erythraean Sea—together with barbaric riches, varied arms—is Antonius. He brings with him Egypt and every power of the East and farthest Bactria; and—shamefully—behind him follows his Egyptian wife.
The squadrons close headlong; and all the waters foam, torn by drawn-back oars and by the prows with triple prongs. They seek the open seas;
you could believe the Cyclades, uprooted,
now swam upon the waters or steep mountains had clashed with mountains as the crewmen thrust in their great galleys at the towering sterns.
Torches of hemp and flying darts of steel are flung by hand, and Neptune's fields are red

875. Actium: On the west coast of Greece. The naval battle fought here in 31 B.C. was the decisive engagement of the civil war. Augustus, the master of the western half of the empire, defeated Anthony, who held the eastern half and was supported by Cleopatra, queen of Egypt.

876. Leucata: A promontory near Actium; there was a temple of Apollo on it (see l. 916).

883. Julian: Pertaining to Julius Caesar, who adopted Augustus as his son.

884. Agrippa: Augustus' admiral at Actium.

890. Erythraean Sea: The Indian Ocean.

894. Bactria: On the borders of India.

897–898. prows with triple prongs: The prow of a Roman warship was shaped with three prongs, one above the other.

899. Cyclades: The islands of the southern Aegean Sea.

with strange bloodshed. Among all this the queen calls to her squadrons with their native sistrum;
she has not yet looked back at the twin serpents that swim behind her. Every kind of monster god—and the barking god, Anubis, too—stands ready to cast shafts against Minerva and Venus and at Neptune. In the middle of all the struggle, Mars, engraved in steel, rages beside fierce Furies from the sky;
and Discord, joyous, strides in her rent robe;
Bellona follows with a bloodstained whip.
But Actian Apollo, overhead, had seen these things; he stretched his bow; and all of Egypt and of India, and all the Arabs and Sabaeans, turned their backs and fled before this terror. The queen herself was seen to woo the winds, to spread her sails, and now, yes now, let fall the slackened ropes.
The Lord of Fire had fashioned her within the slaughter, driven on by wave and west wind, pale with approaching death; but facing this,
he set the Nile, his giant body mourning, opening wide his folds and all his robes, inviting the defeated to his blue-gray breast and his sheltering streams. But entering the walls of Rome in triple triumph, Caesar was dedicating his immortal gift to the Italian gods: three hundred shrines throughout the city. And the streets reechoed with gladness, games, applause; in all the temples were bands of matrons, and in all were altars;
and there, before these altars, slaughtered steers were scattered on the ground. Caesar himself is seated at bright Phoebus' snow-white porch, and he reviews the spoils of nations and he fastens them upon the proud doorposts.
The conquered nations march in long procession,
as varied in their armor and their dress

906. sistrum: An oriental rattle, used in the worship of Isis.

907. serpents: Cleopatra committed suicide by applying poisonous snakes to her breast.

909. Anubis: The Egyptian death-god, represented as with the head of a jackal.

915. Bellona: A Roman goddess of war.

919. Sabaeans: Arabs from the Yemen.

930. in triple triumph: In 29 B.C. Augustus celebrated a triple triumph for victories in Dalmatia, at Actium, and at Alexandria.

as in their languages. Here Mulciber had modeled Nomad tribes and Africans, loose-robed; the Carians; the Leleges; Geloni armed with arrows. And he showed Euphrates, moving now with humbler waves;
the most remote of men, the Morini;
the Rhine with double horns; the untamed Dahae;
and, river that resents its bridge, the Araxes.

Aeneas marvels at his mother's gift, the scenes on Vulcan's shield; and he is glad for all these images, though he does not know what they mean. Upon his shoulder he lifts up the fame and fate of his sons' sons.

[In the course of the desperate battles which follow, the young Pallas, entrusted to Aeneas' care by his father, is killed by the Italian champion Turnus, who takes and wears the belt of Pallas as the spoil of victory. The fortunes of the war later change in favor of the Trojans, and Aeneas kills the Etruscan King Mezentius, Turnus' ally. Eventually, as the Italians prepare to accept the generous peace terms offered by Aeneas, Turnus forestalls them by accepting Aeneas' challenge to single combat to decide the issue. But this solution is frustrated by the intervention of Juno, who foresees Aeneas' victory. She prompts Turnus' sister, the river nymph Juturna, to intervene in an attempt to save Turnus' life. Juturna stirs up the Italians who are watching the champions prepare for the duel; the truce is broken, and in the subsequent fighting Aeneas is wounded by an arrow. Healed by Venus, he returns to the fight, and the Italians are driven back. Turnus finally faces his adversary. His sword breaks on the armor forged by Vulcan, and he runs from Aeneas; he is saved by Juturna, who, assuming the shape of his charioteer, hands him a fresh sword. At this point Jupiter intervenes to stop the vain attempts of Juno and Juturna to save Turnus.]

Book XII

[The Death of Turnus]

. . . Meanwhile Olympus' king calls out to Juno as from a golden cloud she scans the battle:
"Wife, how can this day end? What is there left

943. Mulciber: Vulcan
945. Carians . . . Leleges: Peoples of Asia Minor.
946. Geloni: From Scythia (in the Balkans).
947. Euphrates: The great river of Babylonia, now in Syria.
948. Morini: A Belgian tribe.
949. with double horns: Obscure; perhaps a reference to the two months of the Rhine. Dahae: Nomads, living east of the Caspian Sea.
950. Araxes: A turbulent river in Armenia; Augustus built a bridge over it.

for you to do? You know, and say you know, that, as a deity, Aeneas is owed to heaven, that the fates will carry him high as the stars. What is your plan? What is the hope that keeps you lingering in these chill clouds? And was it seemly for a god to be profaned by a human wound? Or for a sword that had been lost to be restored to Turnus (without you, Juturna could do nothing)? Was it right to give fresh force to those who are defeated? Stop at last; give way to what I now ask: do not let so great a sorrow gnaw at you in silence;
do not let your sweet lips so often press your bitter cares on me. This is the end.
You have harassed the Trojans over land and wave, have kindled brutal war, outraged Latinus' home, and mingled grief and marriage:
you cannot pass beyond this point." So, Jove;
the goddess, Saturn's daughter, yielding, answered:

"Great Jupiter, it was indeed for this—my knowing what you wish—that I have left both Turnus and the earth, unwillingly.
Were it not so, you would not see me now alone upon my airy throne, enduring everything; but girt with flames, I should be standing on the battlefield itself, to drag the Trojans toward the war they hate.
I do confess that I urged on Juturna to help her luckless brother; I approved her daring greater things to save his life;
yet not to aim an arrow, not to stretch her bow. I swear this by the pitiless high fountainhead of Styx, the only pledge that fills the upper gods with dread. And now
I yield; detesting wars, I give them up.
And only this—which fates do not forbid—
I beg of you, for Latium, for your own father's greatness, for the race of Saturn:
when with their happy wedding rites they reach a peace—so be it—when they both unite

1053. as a deity: Aeneas is destined for immortality: after his death, he will be worshipped as a local god.

1069. grief and marriage: A reference not only to the Italian losses but also to the suicide of Amata, wife of King Latinus, who hanged herself when the Trojans assaulted the city just before the duel between Aeneas and Turnus began.

in laws and treaties, do not let the native-born Latins lose their ancient name, become Trojans, or be called Teucrians; do not make such men change their language or their dress.
Let Latium still be, let Alban kings still rule for ages; let the sons of Rome be powerful in their Italian courage.
Troy now is fallen; let her name fall, too."

And Jupiter smiled at her then; the maker of men and things said: "Surely you are sister to Jove, a second child of Saturn, for deep in your breast there surge such tides of anger.
But come, give up this useless madness: I now grant your wish and willingly, vanquished, submit. For the Ausonians will keep their homeland's words and ways; their name will stay;
the body of the Teucrians will merge with Latins, and their name will fall away.
But I shall add their rituals and customs to the Ausonians', and make them all—and with one language—Latins. You will see a race arise from this that, mingled with the blood of the Ausonians, will be past men, even past gods, in piety;
no other nation will pay you such honor."
Juno agreed to this; with gladness she then changed her mind. She quit the skies, her cloud.

This done, the Father, left alone, ponders another plan: to have Juturna driven far from her brother. It is said there are two fiends who bear the name of Furies; they were born in one same birth with hell's Megaera out of untimely Night, who wrapped all three in equal serpents' folds and added wings that take the wind. These wait before the throne of Jove, the threshold of the cruel king, and spur the fears of feeble mortals when it happens that the king of gods flings down dread sorrow and diseases or when he sends war to terrify unrighteous cities.
And quickly Jupiter sends one of these 1124. Megaera: One of three infernal sisters the Romans called Dirae (Dreadful), creatures comparable to the Greek Erinyes (Furies).

from heaven's height, commanding her to meet Juturna as an evil emissary.
She flies off; cloaked in whirlwinds, she is carried to earth. Just as an arrow that is driven from bowstring through a cloud, an arrow tipped in gall and venom, an incurable shaft, shot by some Parthian—a Parthian or a Cydonian; as it hurtles, hissing, it passes through swift shadows, seen by no one:
so did the child of Night rush on; she sought the earth. As soon as she can see the Trojan ranks and the troops of Turnus, suddenly she shrinks into the shape of that small bird which sometimes sits by night on tombs and lonely rooftops, where it chants late, among the shadows, its song of evil omen; so transformed,
the foul one howls before the face of Turnus,
flies back and forth; her wings beat at his shield.
Strange stiffness, terror, took the limbs of Turnus;
his hair stood up; his jaws held fast his voice.

But when, far off, Juturna recognized the shrill wings of the Fury, luckless, she tears at her flowing hair, defiles her face with nails, her breast with fists. "Turnus, how can your sister help you now? And what is left for all my struggle? By what art can I draw out your daylight? Can I stand against such prodigies? Now I must leave the field.
You, filthy birds, do not excite my fears;
I know the beating of your wings, your fatal shrieking; I know these are the harsh commands of that great-hearted Jove. Is this how he requites me now for my virginity?
Did he give me eternal life for this?
For this have I been made exempt from death?
I surely would be done with such a sorrow and go as my sad brother's comrade through the Shadows. I immortal? But can any thing that is mine be sweet to me without you, brother? For what lands are deep enough

1140. Parthian: Parthia was the most dangerous neighbor of the Roman Empire in the east. Parthian mounted archers were famous.

1141. Cydonian: Cretan.

1146. that small bird: An owl.

1166. virginity: Jupiter had been the lover of Juturna and had rewarded her with immortality.

to gape before me, to send me, a goddess, into the lowest Shades?" And saying this, Juturna placed a gray veil on her head;
moaning, she plunged into the river's depths.

And now Aeneas charges straight at Turnus.
He brandishes a shaft huge as a tree, and from his savage breast he shouts: "Now what delay is there? Why, Turnus, do you still draw back from battle? It is not for us to race against each other, but to meet with cruel weapons, hand to hand. Go, change yourself into all shapes; by courage and by craft collect whatever help you can;
take wing, if you so would, toward the steep stars or hide yourself within the hollow earth."
But Turnus shakes his head: "Your burning words, ferocious Trojan, do not frighten me;
it is the gods alone who terrify me, and Jupiter, my enemy." He says no more,but as he looks about he sees a giant stone, an ancient giant stone that lay at hand, by chance, upon the plain, set there as boundary mark between the fields
to keep the farmers free from border quarrels.
And twice-six chosen men with bodies such as earth produces now could scarcely lift that stone upon their shoulders. But the hero, anxious and running headlong, snatched the boulder;
reaching full height, he hurled it at the Trojan.
But Turnus does not know if it is he himself who runs or goes or lifts or throws that massive rock; his knees are weak; his blood congeals with cold. The stone itself whirls through the empty void but does not cross all of the space between; it does not strike a blow.
Just as in dreams of night, when languid rest has closed our eyes, we seem in vain to wish to press on down a path, but as we strain, we falter, weak; our tongues can say nothing,
the body loses its familiar force, no voice, no word, can follow: so whatever courage he calls upon to find a way, the cursed goddess keeps success from Turnus.

1178. river's depth: She was a nymph of rivers and springs.

The shifting feelings overtake his heart;
he looks in longing at the Latin ranks and at the city, and he hesitates, afraid; he trembles at the coming spear.
He does not know how he can save himself,
what power he has to charge his enemy;
he cannot see his chariot anywhere;
he cannot see the charioteer, his sister.

In Turnus' wavering Aeneas sees his fortune; he holds high the fatal shaft;
he hurls it far with all his body's force.
No boulder ever catapulted from siege engine sounded so, no thunderbolt had ever burst with such a roar. The spear flies on like a black whirlwind, carrying its dread destruction, ripping through the border of Turnus' corselet and the outer rim of Turnus' seven-plated shield; hissing, it penetrates his thigh. The giant Turnus, struck, falls to earth; his knees bend under him.
All the Rutulians leap up with a groan,
and all the mountain slopes around reecho;
tall forests, far and near, return that voice.
Then humble, suppliant, he lifts his eyes and, stretching out his hand, entreating, cries:
"I have indeed deserved this; I do not appeal against it; use your chance. But if there is a thought of a dear parent's grief that now can touch you, then I beg you, pity old Daunus—in Anchises you had such a father—send me back or, if you wish, send back my lifeless body to my kin.
For you have won, and the Ausonians have seen me, beaten, stretch my hands; Lavinia is yours; then do not press your hatred further."

Aeneas stood, ferocious in his armor;
his eyes were restless and he stayed his hand;
and as he hesitated, Turnus' words began to move him more and more—until high on the Latin's shoulder he made out the luckless belt of Pallas, of the boy whom Turnus had defeated, wounded, stretched 1237. Rutulians: The Italian troops watching the combat between Turnus and Aeneas.

upon the battlefield, from whom he took this fatal sign to wear upon his back, this girdle glittering with familiar studs.
And when his eyes drank in this plunder, this memorial of brutal grief, Aeneas, aflame with rage—his wrath was terrible—cried: "How can you who wear the spoils of my dear comrade now escape me? It is Pallas who strikes, who sacrifices you, who takes this payment from your shameless blood." Relentless, he sinks his sword into the chest of Turnus.
His limbs fell slack with chill; and with a moan his life, resentful, fled to Shades below.

The New Testament*

[The Birth and Youth of Jesus]†

2. And it came to pass in those days, that there went out a decree from Cæsar Augustus, that all the world[1] should be taxed. (And this taxing was first made when Cyrenius was governor of Syria.) And all went to be taxed, every one into his own city. And Joseph also went up from Galilee, out of the city of Nazareth, into Judæa, unto the city of David, which is called Bethlehem; (because he was of the house and lineage of David:) to be taxed with Mary his espoused wife, being great with child. And so it was, that, while they were there, the days were accomplished that she should be delivered. And she brought forth her firstborn son, and wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger; because there was no room for them in the inn. And there were in the same country shepherds abiding in the field, keeping watch over their flock by night. And, lo, the angel of the Lord came upon them, and the glory of the Lord shone round about them: and they were sore afraid. And the angel said unto them, Fear not: for, behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy, which shall be to all people. For unto you is born this day in the city of David a Saviour, which is Christ[2] the Lord. And this shall be a sign unto you; ye shall find the babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, lying in a manger. And suddenly there was with the angel a multitude of the heavenly host praising God, and saying, Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men. And it came to pass, as the angels were gone away from them into heaven, the shepherds said one to another, Let us now go even unto Bethlehem, and see this thing which

* The text of these selections from the Holy Bible is that of the King James, or Authorized, Version.

† Luke 2:1–52.

1. the Roman Empire.

2. A Greek word meaning "anointed," used of kings, priests, and the Deliverer promised by the Prophets.

is come to pass, which the Lord hath made known unto us. And they came with haste, and found Mary, and Joseph, and the babe lying in a manger. And when they had seen it, they made known abroad the saying which was told them concerning this child. And all they that heard it wondered at those things which were told them by the shepherds. But Mary kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart. And the shepherds returned, glorifying and praising God for all the things that they had heard and seen, as it was told unto them. And when eight days were accomplished for the circumcising of the child, his name was called JESUS,[3] which was so named of the angel[4] before he was conceived in the womb. And when the days of her purification[5] according to the law of Moses were accomplished, they brought him to Jerusalem, to present him to the Lord; (as it is written in the law of the Lord, Every male that openeth the womb[6] shall be called holy to the Lord;) and to offer a sacrifice according to that which is said in the law of the Lord, A pair of turtledoves, or two young pigeons. And, behold, there was a man in Jerusalem, whose name was Simeon; and the same man was just and devout, waiting for the consolation of Israel: and the Holy Ghost was upon him. And it was revealed unto him by the Holy Ghost, that he should not see death, before he had seen the Lord's Christ. And he came by the Spirit into the temple: and when the parents brought in the child Jesus, to do for him after the custom of the law, then took he him up in his arms, and blessed God, and said, Lord, now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace, according to thy word: for mine eyes have seen thy salvation, which thou hast prepared before the face of all people; a light to lighten the Gentiles,[7] and the glory of thy people Israel. And Joseph and his mother marvelled at those things which were spoken of him. And Simeon blessed them, and said unto Mary his mother, Behold, this child is set for the fall and rising again[8] of many in Israel; and for a sign which shall be spoken against; (yea, a sword shall pierce through thy own soul also,) that the thoughts of many hearts may be revealed. And there was one Anna, a prophetess, the daughter of Phanuel, of the tribe of Aser: she was of a great age, and had lived with an husband seven years from her virginity; and she was a widow of about fourscore and four years, which departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day. And she coming in that instant gave thanks likewise unto the Lord, and spoke of him to all them that looked for redemption in Jerusalem. And when they had performed all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into

3. a form of the name Joshua, which means "he shall save."

4. in the Annunciation to Mary. (Luke 1:31.)

5. For the law here referred to, see Leviticus 12.

6. first-born son. The first-born son was regarded as belonging to God. See Exodus 13:2.

7. non-Jews.

8. The Greek word is the one always used of the resurrection of the dead.

Galilee, to their own city Nazareth. And the child grew, and waxed strong in spirit, filled with wisdom: and the grace of God was upon him. Now his parents went to Jerusalem every year at the feast of the passover. And when he was twelve years old, they went up to Jerusalem after the custom of the feast. And when they had fulfilled the days, as they returned, the child Jesus tarried behind in Jerusalem; and Joseph and his mother knew not of it. But they, supposing him to have been in the company, went a day's journey; and they sought him among their kinsfolk and acquaintance. And when they found him not, they turned back again to Jerusalem, seeking him. And it came to pass that after three days they found him in the temple, sitting in the midst of the doctors,[9] both hearing them, and asking them questions. And all that heard him were astonished at his understanding and answers. And when they saw him, they were amazed: and his mother said unto him, Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing. And he said unto them, How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business? And they understood not the saying which he spoke unto them. And he went down with them, and came to Nazareth, and was subject unto them: but his mother kept all these sayings in her heart. And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature, and in favour with God and man.

9. teachers, rabbis.

[The Teaching of Jesus]

[THE SERMON ON THE MOUNT]*

5. And seeing the multitudes, he went up into a mountain: and when he was set, his disciples came unto him: and he opened his mouth, and taught them, saying, Blessed are the poor in spirit: for their's is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are they that mourn: for they shall be comforted. Blessed are the meek: for they shall inherit the earth. Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness: for they shall be filled. Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy. Blessed are the pure in heart: for they shall see God. Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the children of God. Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for their's is the kingdom of heaven. Blessed are ye, when men shall revile you, and persecute you, and shall say all manner of evil against you falsely, for my sake. Rejoice, and be exceeding glad: for great is your reward in heaven: for so persecuted they the prophets which were before you.

Ye are the salt of the earth: but if the salt have lost his savour, wherewith shall it be salted?[1] it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out, and to be trodden under foot of men. Ye are

* Matthew 5:1—7:29.

1. how can it regain its savor?

the light of the world. A city that is set on a hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel,[2] but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven.

Think not that I am come to destroy the law, or the prophets: I am not come to destroy, but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled. Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall teach men so, he shall be called the least in the kingdom of heaven: but whosoever shall do and teach them, the same shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven. For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes[3] and Pharisees,[4] ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven.

Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not kill; and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment: but I say unto you, That whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment: and whosoever shall say to his brother, Raca,[5] shall be in danger of the council: but whosoever shall say, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire.[6] Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee; leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come and offer thy gift. Agree with thine adversary quickly, whiles thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing.

Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, Thou shalt not commit adultery: but I say unto you, That whosoever looketh on a woman to lust after her hath committed adultery with her already in his heart. And if thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into hell. And if thy right hand offend thee, cut it off, and cast it from thee: for it is profitable for thee that one of thy members should perish, and not that thy whole body should be cast into

2. a household vessel with the capacity of a bushel.

3. the official interpreters of the Sacred Scriptures.

4. a sect which insisted on strict observance of the Mosaic law.

5. The word means "empty."

6. The reference is to Jewish legal institutions. The penalties which might be inflicted for murder (see the opening sentence of this paragraph) were death by the sword (a sentence of a local court, "the judgment"), death by stoning (the sentence of a higher court, "the council"), and lastly the burning of the criminal's body in the place where refuse was thrown, Gehenna, which is hence used as a name for hell. Jesus compares the different degrees of punishment (administered by God) for the new sins which he here lists to the degrees of punishment recognized by Jewish law.

hell. It hath been said, Whosoever shall put away his wife, let him give her a writing of divorcement: but I say unto you, That whosoever shall put away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery: and whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery.

Again, ye have heard that it hath been said by them of old time, Thou shalt not forswear thyself, but shalt perform unto the Lord thine oaths: but I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by heaven; for it is God's throne: nor by the earth; for it is his footstool: neither by Jerusalem; for it is the city of the great King. Neither shalt thou swear by thy head, because thou canst not make one hair white or black. But let your communication be, Yea, yea; Nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth: but I say unto you, That ye resist not evil: but whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also. And if any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him have thy cloak also. And whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain. Give to him that asketh thee, and from him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away.

Ye have heard that it hath been said, Thou shalt love thy neighbour, and hate thine enemy. But I say unto you, Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you; that ye may be the children of your Father which is in heaven: for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust. For if ye love them which love you, what reward have ye? do not even the publicans[7] the same? And if ye salute your brethren only, what do ye more than others? do not even the publicans so? Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

6. Take heed that ye do not your alms[8] before men, to be seen of them: otherwise ye have no reward of your Father which is in heaven. Therefore when thou doest thine alms, do not sound a trumpet before thee, as the hypocrites do in the synagogues and in the streets, that they may have glory of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But when thou doest alms, let not thy left hand know what thy right hand doeth: that thine alms may be in secret: and thy Father which seeth in secret himself shall reward thee openly.

And when thou prayest, thou shalt not be as the hypocrites are: for they love to pray standing in the synagogues and in the corners

7. the men who collected the taxes for the Roman tax-farming corporations; they were, naturally, universally despised and hated.

8. charitable actions.

of the streets, that they may be seen of men. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father which is in secret; and thy Father which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly. But when ye pray, use not vain repetitions, as the heathen do; for they think that they shall be heard for their much speaking. Be not ye therefore like unto them: for your Father knoweth what things ye have need of, before ye ask him. After this manner therefore pray ye: Our Father which art in heaven, Hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. And forgive us our debts, as we forgive our debtors. And lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. Amen. For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you: but if ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your Father forgive your trespasses.

Moreover when ye fast, be not, as the hypocrites, of a sad countenance: for they disfigure their faces, that they may appear unto men to fast. Verily I say unto you, They have their reward. But thou, when thou fastest, anoint thine head, and wash thy face; that thou appear not unto men to fast, but unto thy Father which is in secret: and thy Father, which seeth in secret shall reward thee openly.

Lay not up for yourselves treasures upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break through and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break through nor steal: for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. The light of the body is the eye: if therefore thine eye be single,[9] thy whole body shall be full of light. But if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If therefore the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness!

No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one, and love the other; or else he will hold to the one, and despise the other. Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body, what ye shall put on. Is not the life more than meat, and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air: for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit unto his stature? And why take ye thought for raiment? Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not, neither do they spin: and yet I say unto you that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore, if God so clothe the grass of the field, which to-day is, and to-morrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or, What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? (For after all these things do the Gentiles[10] seek:) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness; and all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for the morrow: for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof.

9. clear.

7. Judge not, that ye be not judged. For with what judgment ye judged, ye shall be judged: and with what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again. And why beholdest thou the mote that is in thy brother's eye, but considerest not the beam that is in thine own eye? Or how wilt thou say to thy brother, Let me pull out the mote out of thine eye; and, behold, a beam is in thine own eye? Thou hypocrite, first cast out the beam out of thine own eye; and then shalt thou see clearly to cast out the mote out of thy brother's eye.

Give not that which is holy unto the dogs, neither cast ye your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet, and turn again and rend you.

Ask, and it shall be given you; seek, and ye shall find; knock, and it shall be opened unto you: for every one that asketh receiveth; and he that seeketh findeth; and to him that knocketh it shall be opened. Or what man is there of you, whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone? Or if he ask a fish, will he give him a serpent? If ye then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Father which is in heaven give good things to them that ask him? Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them: for this is the law and the prophets.

Enter ye in at the strait[11] gate: for wide is the gate, and broad is the way, that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat: because strait is the gate, and narrow is the way, which leadeth unto life, and few there be that find it.

Beware of false prophets, which come to you in sheep's clothing, but inwardly they are ravening wolves. Ye shall know them by their fruits. Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles? Even so every good tree bringeth forth good fruit; but a corrupt tree bringeth forth evil fruit. A good tree cannot bring forth evil fruit, neither can a corrupt tree bring forth good fruit. Every tree that bringeth

10. non-Jews. 11. narrow.

not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. Wherefore by their fruits ye shall know them.

Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me in that day, Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in thy name? and in thy name have cast out devils? and in thy name done many wonderful works? And then will I profess unto them, I never knew you: depart from me, ye that work iniquity.

Therefore whosoever heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock: and the rain descended, and the floods came and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell not: for it was founded upon a rock. And every one that heareth these sayings of mine, and doeth them not, shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand: and the rain descended, and the floods came, and the winds blew, and beat upon that house; and it fell: and great was the fall of it. And it came to pass, when Jesus had ended these sayings, the people were astonished at his doctrine: for he taught them as one having authority, and not as the scribes.

[PARABLES OF JESUS]*

15. Then drew near unto him all the publicans and sinners for to hear him. And the Pharisees and scribes murmured, saying, This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them.

And he spoke this parable unto them, saying, What man of you, having a hundred sheep, if he lose one of them, doth not leave the ninety and nine in the wilderness, and go after that which is lost, until he find it? And when he hath found it, he layeth it on his shoulders, rejoicing. And when he cometh home, he calleth together his friends and neighbours, saying unto them, Rejoice with me; for I have found my sheep which was lost. I say unto you that likewise joy shall be in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, more than over ninety and nine just persons, which need no repentance.

Either what woman having ten pieces of silver, if she lose one piece, doth not light a candle, and sweep the house, and seek diligently till she find it? And when she hath found it, she calleth her friends and her neighbours together, saying, Rejoice with me; for I have found the piece which I had lost. Likewise, I say unto you, there is joy in the presence of the angels of God over one sinner that repenteth.

And he said, A certain man had two sons: and the younger of them said to his father, Father, give me the portion of goods that falleth to me. And he divided unto them his living. And not many days after the younger son gathered all together, and took his journey into a far country, and there wasted his substance with riotous living. And when he had spent all, there arose a mighty famine in that land; and he began to be in want. And he went and joined himself to a citizen of that country; and he sent him into his fields to feed swine. And he would fain have filled his belly with the husks that the swine did eat: and no man gave unto him. And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father, and will say unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and before thee, and am no more worthy to be called thy son: make me as one of thy hired servants. And he arose, and came to his father. But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him. And the son said unto him, Father, I have sinned against heaven, and in thy sight, and am no more worthy to be called thy son. But the father said to his servants, Bring forth the best robe, and put it on him; and put a ring on his hand, and shoes on his feet: and bring hither the fatted calf, and kill it; and let us eat, and be merry: for this my son was dead, and is alive again; he was lost, and is found. And they began to be merry. Now his elder son was in the field: and as he came and drew nigh to the house, he heard musick and dancing. And he called one of the servants, and asked what these things meant. And he said unto him, Thy brother is come; and thy father hath killed the fatted calf, because he hath received him safe and sound. And he was angry, and would not go in: therefore came his father out, and intreated him. And he answering said to his father, Lo, these many years do I serve thee, neither transgressed I at any time thy commandment: and yet thou never gavest me a kid, that I might make merry with my friends: but as soon as this thy son was come, which hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf. And he said unto him, Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine. It was meet that we should make merry, and be glad: for this thy brother was dead, and is alive again; and was lost, and is found.

* Luke 15:1–32.

[The Betrayal of Jesus]*

26. . . . Then one of the twelve, called Judas Iscariot, went unto the chief priests, and said unto them, What will ye give me, and I will deliver him unto you? And they covenanted with him for thirty pieces of silver. And from that time he sought opportunity to betray him.

* Matthew 26:14–75.

Now the first day of the feast of unleavened bread[1] the disciples came to Jesus, saying unto him, Where wilt thou that we prepare for thee to eat the passover? And he said, Go into the city to such a man, and say unto him, The Master saith, My time is at hand; I will keep the passover at thy house with my disciples. And the disciples did as Jesus had appointed them; and they made ready the passover. Now when the even was come, he sat down with the twelve. And as they did eat, he said, Verily I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me. And they were exceeding sorrowful, and began every one of them to say unto him, Lord, is it I? And he answered and said, He that dippeth his hand with me in the dish, the same shall betray me. The Son of man goeth as it is written of him: but woe unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! it had been good for that man if he had not been born. Then Judas, which betrayed him, answered and said, Master, is it I? He said unto him, Thou hast said.

And as they were eating, Jesus took bread, and blessed it, and brake it, and gave it to the disciples, and said, Take, eat; this is my body. And he took the cup, and gave thanks, and gave it to them, saying, Drink ye all of it; for this is my blood of the new testament,[2] which is shed for many for the remission of sins. But I say unto you, I will not drink henceforth of this fruit of the vine, until that day when I drink it new with you in my Father's kingdom. And when they had sung an hymn, they went out into the mount of Olives. Then saith Jesus unto them, All ye shall be offended[3] because of me this night: for it is written,[4] I will smite the shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered abroad. But after I am risen again, I will go before you into Galilee. Peter answered and said unto him, Though all men shall be offended because of thee, yet will I never be offended. Jesus said unto him, Verily I say unto thee, That this night, before the cock crow, thou shalt deny me thrice. Peter said unto him, Though I should die with thee, yet will I not deny thee. Likewise also said all the disciples.

Then cometh Jesus with them unto a place called Gethsemane, and saith unto the disciples, Sit ye here, while I go and pray yonder. And he took with him Peter and the two sons of Zebedee,[5] and began to be sorrowful and very heavy. Then saith he unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: tarry ye here, and watch[6] with me. And he went a little farther, and fell on his face,

1. held in remembrance of the delivery of the Jews from captivity in Egypt. See Exodus 12.
2. i.e., of the new covenant, or agreement. Jesus compares himself to the lamb that was killed at the Passover as a sign of the covenant between God and the Jews.
3. The Greek means literally, "you will be made to stumble."
4. See Zechariah 13:7.
5. James and John.
6. stay awake.

and prayed, saying, O my Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass from me: nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt. And he cometh unto the disciples, and findeth them asleep, and saith unto Peter, What, could ye not watch with me one hour? Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation: the spirit indeed is willing, but the flesh is weak. He went away again the second time, and prayed, saying, O my Father, if this cup may not pass away from me, except I drink it, thy will be done. And he came and found them asleep again: for their eyes were heavy. And he left them, and went away again, and prayed the third time, saying the same words. Then cometh he to his disciples, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest: behold, the hour is at hand, and the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me.

And while he yet spake, lo, Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves,[7] from the chief priests and elders of the people. Now he that betrayed him gave them a sign, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he: hold him fast. And forthwith he came to Jesus and said, Hail, master; and kissed him. And Jesus said unto him, Friend, wherefore art thou come? Then came they and laid hands on Jesus, and took him. And behold, one of them[8] which were with Jesus stretched out his hand, and drew his sword, and struck a servant of the high priest's, and smote off his ear. Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions[9] of angels? But how then shall the scriptures be fulfilled, that thus it must be? In that same hour said Jesus to the multitudes, Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and staves for to take me? I sat daily with you teaching in the temple, and ye laid no hold on me. But all this was done that the scriptures of the prophets might be fulfilled. Then all the disciples forsook him, and fled.

And they that had laid hold on Jesus led him away to Caiaphas the high priest, where the scribes and the elders were assembled. But Peter followed him afar off unto the high priest's palace, and went in, and sat with the servants, to see the end. Now the chief priests, and elders, and all the council, sought false witness[10] against Jesus, to put him to death; but found none: yea, though many false witnesses came, yet found they none. At the last came two false witnesses, and said, This fellow said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days. And the high priest arose, and said unto him, Answerest thou nothing? What is it which these

7. clubs, sticks.
8. This was Peter.
9. The legion was a Roman military formation; its full complement was six thousand men.
10. evidence.

witness against thee? But Jesus held his peace. And the high priest answered and said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said:[11] nevertheless I say unto you, Hereafter shall ye see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven. Then the high priest rent[12] his clothes, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard his blasphemy. What think ye? They answered and said, He is guilty of death.[13] Then did they spit in his face, and buffeted [14] him; and others smote him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, Who is he that smote thee?

Now Peter sat without in the palace: and a damsel came unto him, saying, Thou also wast with Jesus of Galilee. But he denied before them all, saying, I know not what thou sayest. And when he was gone out into the porch, another maid saw him and said unto them that were there, This fellow was also with Jesus of Nazareth. And again he denied with an oath, I do not know the man. And after a while came unto him they that stood by, and said to Peter, Surely thou also art one of them; for thy speech bewrayeth[15] thee. Then began he to curse and to swear, saying, I know not the man. And immediately the cock crew. And Peter remembered the word of Jesus, which said unto him, Before the cock crow thou shalt deny me thrice. And he went out, and wept bitterly.

11. an affirmative phrase.
12. tore.
13. liable to the death penalty.
14. beat.
15. betrays. Peter's speech revealed his Galilean origin.

[The Trial and Crucifixion of Jesus]*

27. When the morning was come, all the chief priests and elders of the people took counsel against Jesus to put him to death: and when they had bound him, they led him away, and delivered him to Pontius Pilate the governor.[1]

Then Judas, which had betrayed him, when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders, saying, I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood. And they said, What is that to us? see thou to that. And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple, and departed, and went and hanged himself. And the chief priests took the silver pieces, and said, It is not lawful for to put them into the treasury, because it is the price of blood. And they took counsel, and bought with them the potter's field,[2] to bury strangers in. Wherefore that field was called, The field of blood, unto this day. Then was fulfilled that which was spoken by Jeremy[3] the prophet, saying, And they took the thirty pieces of silver, the price of him that was valued, whom they of the children of Israel did value; and gave them for the potter's field, as the Lord appointed me. And Jesus stood before the governor: and the governor asked him, saying, Art thou the King of the Jews? And Jesus said unto him, Thou sayest.

* Matthew 27:1–66.

1. His official title was procurator of the province of Judea. The Roman policy was to allow the Jews as much independence as possible (especially in religious matters), but only the Roman authorities could impose a death sentence.

And when he was accused of[4] the chief priests and elders, he answered nothing. Then said Pilate unto him, Hearest thou not how many things they witness against thee? And he answered him to never a word; insomuch that the governor marvelled greatly. Now at that feast the governor was wont to release unto the people a prisoner, whom they would. And they had then a notable prisoner, called Barabbas.[5] Therefore when they were gathered together, Pilate said unto them, Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas, or Jesus which is called Christ? For he knew that for envy they had delivered him.[6]

When he was set down on the judgment seat, his wife sent unto him, saying, Have thou nothing to do with that just man: for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of him. But the chief priests and elders persuaded the multitude that they should ask Barabbas, and destroy Jesus. The governor answered and said unto them, Whether of the twain will ye that I release unto you? They said, Barabbas. Pilate saith unto them, What shall I do then with Jesus which is called Christ? They all say unto him, Let him be crucified.[7] And the governor said, Why, what evil hath he done? But they cried out the more, saying, Let him be crucified.

When Pilate saw that he could prevail nothing, but that rather a tumult was made, he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it. Then answered all the people, and said, His blood be on us, and on our children.

Then released he Barabbas unto them: and when he had scourged[8] Jesus, he delivered him to be crucified. Then the soldiers of the governor took Jesus into the common hall, and gathered unto him the whole band of soldiers. And they stripped him, and put on him a scarlet robe.

And when they had platted a crown of thorns, they put it upon

2. a field which had been dug for potter's clay, and was consequently not worth very much as land.

3. Jeremiah. The prophecy here quoted is a version of Zechariah 11:13.

4. by

5. under sentence of death for sedition and murder.

6. i.e., to the Roman authorities.

7. the regular Roman punishment for sedition.

8. whipped, a routine part of the punishment.

his head, and a reed[9] in his right hand: and they bowed the knee before him, and mocked him, saying, Hail, King of the Jews! And they spit upon him, and took the reed, and smote him on the head. And after that they had mocked him, they took the robe off from him, and put his own raiment on him, and led him away to crucify him. And as they came out, they found a man of Cyrene,[10] Simon by name: him they compelled to bear his cross. And when they were come unto a place called Golgotha, that is to say, a place of a skull,

They gave him vinegar to drink mingled with gall:[11] and when he had tasted thereof, he would not drink. And they crucified him, and parted his garments, casting lots: that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophet, They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots.[12] And sitting down they watched him there; and set up over his head his accusation written, THIS IS JESUS THE KING OF THE JEWS. Then were there two thieves crucified with him, one on the right hand, and another on the left.

And they that passed by reviled him, wagging their heads, and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save thyself. If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross. Likewise also the chief priests mocking him, with the scribes and elders, said, He saved others; himself he cannot save. If he be the King of Israel, let him now come down from the cross, and we will believe him. He trusted in God; let him deliver him now, if he will have him: for he said, I am the Son of God. The thieves also, which were crucified with him, cast the same in his teeth. Now from the sixth hour there was darkness over all the land unto the ninth hour. And about the ninth hour Jesus cried with a loud voice, saying, Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani? that is to say, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?[13] Some of them that stood there, when they heard that, said, This man calleth for Elias. And straightway one of them ran, and took a sponge, and filled it with vinegar,[14] and put it on a reed, and gave him to drink. The rest said, Let be, let us see whether Elias[15] will come to save him.

Jesus, when he had cried again with a loud voice, yielded up the ghost. And, behold, the veil of the temple[16] was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; and the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after his resurrection, and

9. to represent the king's scepter.
10. on the coast of North Africa.
11. The Greek word translated "vinegar" describes a sour wine which was the regular drink of the Roman soldiery. The addition of bitter gall is further mockery.
12. that it might . . . cast lots: It is generally agreed that this is a late addition to the text.
13. the opening words of Psalm 22. The actual words of Jesus, "Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani?" are Aramaic, the spoken Hebrew of the period.
14. See footnote 11.
15. the prophet Elijah.
16. the curtain which screened off the holy of holies.

went into the holy city, and appeared unto many. Now when the centurion,[17] and they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things that were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God. And many women were there beholding afar off, which followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering unto him: among which was Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James and Joses, and the mother of Zebedee's children. When the even was come, there came a rich man of Arimathæa, named Joseph, who also himself was Jesus' disciple. He went to Pilate, and begged the body of Jesus. Then Pilate commanded the body to be delivered. And when Joseph had taken the body, he wrapped it in clean linen cloth, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in the rock: and he rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed. And there was Mary Magdalene, and the other Mary, sitting over against the sepulchre.

Now the next day, that followed the day of the preparation, the chief priests and Pharisees came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while he was yet alive, After three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure[18] until the third day, lest his disciples come by night, and steal him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead: so the last error shall be worse than the first. Pilate said unto them, Ye have a watch:[19] go your way, make it as sure as ye can. So they went, and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch.

17. the Roman officer in charge of the execution.
18. guarded.
19. police force.

[The Resurrection]*

28. In the end of the sabbath, as it began to dawn toward the first day of the week, came Mary Magdalene and the other Mary to see the sepulchre. And, behold, there was a great earthquake: for the angel of the Lord descended from heaven, and came and rolled back the stone from the door, and sat upon it. His countenance was like lightning, and his raiment white as snow: and for fear of him the keepers did shake, and became as dead men. And the angel answered and said unto the women, Fear not ye: for I know that ye seek Jesus, which was crucified. He is not here: for he is risen, as he said. Come, see the place where the Lord lay. And go quickly, and tell his disciples that he is risen from the dead; and, behold, he goeth before you into Galilee; there shall ye see him: lo, I have told you. And they departed quickly from the sepulchre with fear and great joy; and did run to bring his disciples word.

And as they went to tell his disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail! And they came and held him by the feet, and worshipped him. Then said Jesus unto them, Be not afraid: go tell my brethren that they go into Galilee, and there shall they see me.

* Matthew 28:1–20.

Now when they were going, behold, some of the watch came into the city, and shewed unto the chief priests all the things that were done. And when they were assembled with the elders, and had taken counsel, they gave large money unto the soldiers, saying, Say ye, His disciples came by night, and stole him away while we slept. And if this come to the governor's ears, we will persuade him, and secure you. So they took the money, and did as they were taught: and this saying is commonly reported among the Jews until this day.

Then the eleven disciples went away into Galilee, into a mountain where Jesus had appointed them. And when they saw him, they worshipped him: but some doubted. And Jesus came and spake unto them, saying, All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth.

Go ye therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost: teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and, lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world. Amen.

PETRONIUS
(died A.D. 65)

Dinner with Trimalchio*

[The narrator, Encolpius, is a penniless vagabond who is a student of rhetoric under a master named Agamemnon. His close associates are Ascyltus, a fellow student, and Giton, a handsome boy who has no particular occupation. After some disreputable and very tiring adventures they are invited, as pupils of Agamemnon, to a banquet. The scene of the story is an unidentified city in southern Italy, the time probably about A.D. 50.]

The next day but one finally arrived. But we were so knocked about that we wanted to run rather than rest. We were mournfully discussing how to avoid the approaching storm,[1] when one of Agamemnon's slaves broke in on our frantic debate.

"Here," said he, "don't you know who's your host today? It's Trimalchio[2]—he's terribly elegant. . . . He has a clock[3] in the dining-room and a trumpeter[4] all dressed up to tell him how much longer he's got to live."

This made us forget all our troubles. We dressed carefully and

*From the work known as the Satyricon, probably written during the principate of Nero (A.D. 54–68). Our selection is one of the best-known incidents in the work. The translation is by J. P. Sullivan (copyright © J. P. Sullivan 1965, 1969) and is reprinted by permission of Penguin Books Ltd.

1. a repetition of the unsavory incidents they have just experienced.

2. Trimalchio: the name suggests "triply blessed" or "triply powerful."

3. at this period a rare and expensive article.

4. to sound off every hour on the hour.

told Giton, who was very kindly acting as our servant, to attend us at the baths.[5]

We did not take our clothes off but began wandering around, or rather exchanging jokes while circulating among the little groups. Suddenly we saw a bald old man in a reddish shirt, playing ball with some long-haired boys. It was not so much the boys that made us watch, although they alone were worth the trouble, but the old gentleman himself. He was taking his exercise in slippers and throwing a green ball around. But he didn't pick it up if it touched the ground; instead there was a slave holding a bagful, and he supplied them to the players. We noticed other novelties. Two eunuchs stood around at different points: one of them carried a silver chamber pot, the other counted the balls, not those flying from hand to hand according to the rules, but those that fell to the ground. We were still admiring these elegant arrangements when Menelaus[6] hurried up to us.

"This is the man you'll be dining with," he said. "In fact, you are now watching the beginning of the dinner."

No sooner had Menelaus spoken than Trimalchio snapped his fingers. At the signal the eunuch brought up the chamber pot for him, while he went on playing. With the weight off his bladder, he demanded water for his hands, splashed a few drops on his fingers and wiped them on a boy's head.

It would take too long to pick out isolated incidents. Anyway, we entered the baths where we began sweating at once and we went immediately into the cold water. Trimalchio had been smothered in perfume and was already being rubbed down, not with linen towels, but with bath-robes of the finest wool. As this was going on, three masseurs sat drinking Falernian[7] in front of him. Through quarreling they spilled most of it and Trimalchio said they were drinking his health.[8] Wrapped in thick scarlet felt he was put into a litter. Four couriers with lots of medals went in front, as well as a go-cart in which his favourite boy was riding—a wizened, bleary-eyed youngster, uglier than his master. As he was carried off, a musician with a tiny set of pipes took his place by Trimalchio's head and whispered a tune in his ear the whole way.

We followed on, choking with amazement by now, and arrived at the door with Agamemnon at our side. On the doorpost a notice was fastened which read:

ANY SLAVE LEAVING THE HOUSE WITHOUT HIS MASTER'S PERMISSION WILL RECEIVE ONE HUNDRED LASHES

5. a public institution. They were magnificent buildings, containing not only baths of many types and temperatures, but places for conversation and games and even libraries.

6. appropriately enough, Agamemnon's assistant in instruction.

7. Falernian: a famous wine from Campania south of Rome.

8. drinking his health: He claims they are pouring a libation.

Just at the entrance stood the hall-porter, dressed in a green uniform with a belt of cherry red. He was shelling peas into a silver basin. Over the doorway hung—of all things—a golden cage from which a spotted magpie greeted visitors.

As I was gaping at all this, I almost fell over backwards and broke a leg. There on the left as one entered, not far from the porter's cubbyhole, was a huge dog with a chain round its neck. It was painted on the wall and over it, in big capitals, was written:

BEWARE OF THE DOG

My colleagues laughed at me, but when I got my breath back I went to examine the whole wall. There was a mural of a slave market, price tags and all. Then Thimalchio himself, holding a wand of Mercury[9] and being led into Rome by Minerva.[10] After this a picture of how he learned accounting and, finally how he became a steward. The painstaking artist had drawn it all in great detail with descriptions underneath. Just where the colonnade ended Mercury hauled him up by the chin and rushed him to a high platform. . . .

I began asking the porter what were the pictures they had in the middle.

"The Iliad, the Odyssey, and the gladiatorial show given by Laenas," he told me.

Time did not allow us to look at many things there . . . by now we had reached the dining-room. . . .

Finally we took our places. Boys from Alexandria poured iced water over our hands. Others followed them and attended to our feet, removing any hangnails with great skill. But they were not quiet even during this troublesome operation: they sang away at their work. I wanted to find out if the whole staff were singers, so I asked for a drink. In a flash a boy was there, singing in a shrill voice while he attended to me—and anyone else who was asked to bring something did the same. It was more like a musical comedy than a respectable dinner party.

Some extremely elegant hors d'oeuvre were served at this point—by now everyone had taken his place with the exception of Trimalchio, for whom, strangely enough, the place at the top was reserved. The dishes for the first course included an ass of Corinthian bronze with two panniers, white olives on one side and black on the other. Over the ass were two pieces of plate, with Trimalchio's name and the weight of the silver inscribed on the rims. There were some small iron frames shaped like bridges supporting dormice sprinkled with

9. Mercury (Hermes): as a trickster, the patron god of thieves and businessmen.

10. Minerva (Athena): patron goddess of arts and skills.

honey and poppy seed. There were steaming hot sausages too, on a silver gridiron with damsons and pomegranate seeds underneath.

We were in the middle of these elegant dishes when Trimalchio himself was carried in to the sound of music and set down on a pile of tightly stuffed cushions. The sight of him drew an astonished laugh from the guests. His cropped head stuck out from a scarlet coat; his neck was well muffled up and he had put round it a napkin with a broad purple stripe and tassels dangling here and there. On the little finger of his left hand he wore a heavy gilt ring and a smaller one on the last joint of the next finger. This I thought was solid gold, but actually it was studded with little iron stars. And to show off even more of his jewellery, he had his right arm bare and set off by a gold armlet and an ivory circlet fastened with a gleaming metal plate.

After picking his teeth with a silver toothpick, he began: "My friends, I wasn't keen to come into the dining room yet. But if I stayed away any more, I would have kept you back, so I've deprived myself of all my little pleasures for you. However, you'll allow me to finish my game."

A boy was at his heels with a board of terebinth wood[11] with glass squares, and I noticed the very last word in luxury—instead of white and black pieces he had gold and silver coins. While he was swearing away like a trooper over his game and we were still on the hors d'oeuvre, a tray was brought in with a basket on it. There sat a wooden hen, its wings spread round it the way hens are when they are broody. Two slaves hurried up and as the orchestra played a tune they began searching through the straw and dug out peahens' eggs, which they distributed to the guests.

Trimalchio turned to look at this little scene and said: "My friends, I gave orders for that bird to sit on some peahens' eggs. I hope to goodness they are not starting to hatch. However, let's try them and see if they are still soft."

We took up our spoons (weighing at least half a pound each) and cracked the eggs, which were made of rich pastry. To tell the truth, I nearly threw away my share, as the chicken seemed already formed. But I heard a guest who was an old hand say: "There should be something good here." So I searched the shell with my fingers and found the plumpest little figpecker, all covered with yolk and seasoned with pepper.

At this point Trimalchio became tired of his game and demanded that all the previous dishes be brought to him. He gave permission in a loud voice for any of us to have another glass of mead if we wanted it. Suddenly there was a crash from the orchestra and a troop of waiters—still singing—snatched away the hors d'oeuvre. However in the confusion one of the side-dishes happened to fall and a slave picked it up from the floor. Trimalchio noticed this, had the boy's ears boxed and told him to throw it down again. A cleaner came in with a broom and began to sweep up the silver plate along with the rest of the rubbish. Two long-haired Ethiopians followed him, carrying small skin bottles like those they use for scattering sand in the circus, and they poured wine over our hands—no one ever offered us water.

11. terebinth: a very hard wood which takes a high polish and is very expensive (like everything Trimalchio has).

Our host was complimented on these elegant arrangements. "You've got to fight fair," he replied. "That is why I gave orders for each guest to have his own table. At the same time these smelly slaves won't crowd so."

Carefully sealed wine bottles were immediately brought, their necks labelled:

FALERNIAN
CONSUL OPIMIUS
ONE HUNDRED YEARS OLD[12]

While we were examining the labels, Trimalchio clapped his hands and said with a sigh:

"Wine has a longer life than us poor folks. So let's wet our whistles. Wine is life. I'm giving you real Opimian. I didn't put out such good stuff yesterday, though the company was much better class."

Naturally we drank and missed no opportunity of admiring his elegant hospitality. In the middle of this a slave brought in a silver skeleton, put together in such a way that its joints and backbone could be pulled out and twisted in all directions. After he had flung it about on the table once or twice, its flexible joints falling into various postures, Trimalchio recited:

"Man's life alas! is but a span,
So let us live it while we can,
We'll be like this when dead."

After our applause the next course was brought in. Actually it was not as grand as we expected, but it was so novel that everyone stared. It was a deep circular tray with the twelve signs of the Zodiac arranged round the edge. . . .

After this course Trimalchio got up and went to the toilet. Free of his domineering presence, we began to strike up a general conversation. Dama[13] started off by calling for bigger glasses.

"The day's nothin'," he said, "It's night 'fore y'can turn around. So the best thing's get out of bed and go straight to dinner. Lovely

12. The wine was labeled with the name of the man who was consul in the year it was bottled. Opimius was consul in 121 B.C. Since it was in this year that the custom of dating the wine by the consul's name began, Trimalchio's wine was the oldest possible. If genuine, it would have been undrinkable.

13. Dama: one of Trimalchio's friends. Like those of Seleucus and Phileros who join the conversation later, his name is Greek.

cold weather we've had too. M'bath hardly thawed me out. Still, a hot drink's as good as an overcoat. I've been throwin' it back neat, and I'm pretty tight—the wine's gone to m'head."

This started Seleucus off.

"Me now," he said, "I don't have a bath every day. It's like gettin' rubbed with fuller's[14] earth, havin' a bath. The water bites into you, and as the days go by, your heart turns to water. But when I've knocked back a hot glass of wine and honey, kiss-my-arse I say to the cold weather. Mind you, I couldn't have a bath—I was at a funeral today. Poor old Chrysanthus has just given up the ghost —nice man he was! It was only the other day he stopped me in the street. I still seem to hear his voice. Dear, dear! We're just so many walking bags of wind. We're worse than flies—at least flies have got some strength in them, but we're no more than empty bubbles.

"And what would he have been like if he hadn't been on a diet? For five days he didn't take a drop of water or a crumb of bread into his mouth. But he's gone to join the majority. The doctors finished him—well, hard luck, more like. After all, a doctor is just to put your mind at rest. Still, he got a good sendoff—he had a bier and all beautifully draped. His mourners—several of his slaves were left their freedom—did him proud, even though his window was a bit mean with her tears. Suppose now he hadn't been so good to her! But women as a sex are real vultures. It's no good doing them a favour, you might as well throw it down a well. An old passion is just an ulcer."

He was being a bore and Phileros said loudly:

"Let's think of the living. He's got what he deserved. He lived an honest life and he died an honest death. What has he got to complain about? He started out in life with just a penny and he was ready to pick up less than that from a muck-heap, if he had to use his teeth. He went up in the world. He got bigger and bigger till he got where you see, like a honeycomb. I honestly think he left a solid hundred thousand and he had the lot in hard cash. But I'll be honest about it—seeing I'm a bit of a cynic—he had a foul mouth and too much lip. He wasn't a man, he was just murder.

"Now his brother was a fine man, a real friend to his friends, always ready with a helping hand or a decent meal.

"Chrysanthus had bad luck at first, but the first vintage set him on his feet. He fixed his own price when he sold the wine. And what properly kept his head above water was a legacy he came in for, when he pocketed more than was left to him. And the blockhead, when he had a quarrel with his brother, cut him out of his will in favour of some sod we've never heard of. You're leaving a lot behind when you leave your own flesh and blood. But he took advice from his slaves and they really fixed him. It's never right to believe all you're told, especially for a business man. But it's true he enjoyed himself while he lived. You got it, you keep it. He was certainly Fortune's favourite—lead turned to gold in his hand. Mind you, it's easy when everything runs smoothly.

14. fuller: a cleaner (of woollen cloaks). They used very strong solvents.

"And how old do you think he was? Seventy or more! But he was hard as nails and carried his age well. His hair was black as a raven's wing. I knew the man for ages and ages and he was still an old lecher. I honestly don't think he left the dog alone. What's more, he liked little boys—he could turn his hand to anything. Well, I don't blame him—after all, he couldn't take anything else with him."

This was Phileros, then Ganymedes said:

"You're all talking about things that don't concern heaven or earth. Meanwhile, no one gives a damn the way we're hit by the corn situation. Honest to God, I couldn't get hold of a mouthful of bread today. And look how there's still no rain. It's been absolute starvation for a whole year now. To hell with the food officers! They're in with the bakers—'You be nice to me and I'll be nice to you.' So the little man suffers, while those grinders of the poor never stop celebrating. Oh, if only we still had the sort of men I found here when I first arrived from Asia. Like lions they were. That was the life! Come one, come all! If white flour was inferior to the very finest, they'd thrash those bogeymen till they thought God Almighty was after them.

"I remember Safinius—he used to live by the old arch then; I was a boy at the time. He wasn't a man, he was all pepper. He used to scorch the ground wherever he went. But he was dead straight—don't let him down and he wouldn't let you down. You'd be ready to play morra[15] with him in the dark. But on the city council, how he used to wade into some of them—no beating about the bush, straight from the shoulder! And when he was in court, his voice got louder and louder like a trumpet. He never sweated or spat—I think there was a touch of the old acid about him. And very affable he was when you met him, calling everyone by name just like one of us. Naturally at the time corn was dirt cheap. You could buy a penny loaf that two of you couldn't get through. Today—I've seen bigger bull's-eyes.

"Ah me! It's getting worse every day. This place is going down like a calf's tail. But why do we have a third-rate food officer who wouldn't lose a penny to save our lives? He sits at home laughing and rakes in more money a day than anyone else's whole fortune. I happen to know he's just made a thousand in gold. But if we had any balls at all, he wouldn't be feeling so pleased with himself. People today are lions at home and foxes outside.

"Take me, I've already sold the rags off my back for food and if this shortage continues, I'll be selling my bit of a house. What's going to happen to this place if neither god nor man will help us? As I hope to go home tonight, I'm sure all this is heaven's doing.

15. morra: a game (still played in southern Italy) which requires the players to match the number of fingers held out by the opponent.

"Nobody believes in heaven, see, nobody fasts, nobody gives a damn for the Almighty. No, people only bow their heads to count their money. In the old days high-class ladies used to climb up the hill barefoot, their hair loose and their hearts pure, and ask God for rain. And he'd send it down in bucketfuls right away—it was then or never—and everyone went home like drowned rats. Since we've given up religion the gods nowadays keep their feet well wrapped up. The fields just lie . . ."

"Please, please," broke in Echion the rag merchant, "be a bit more cheerful. 'First it's one thing, then another,' as the yokel said when he lost his spotted pig. What we haven't got today, we'll have tomorrow. That's the way life goes. Believe me, you couldn't name a better country, if it had the people. As things are, I admit, it's having a hard time, but it isn't the only place. We mustn't be soft. The sky don't get no nearer wherever you are. If you were somewhere else, you'd be talking about the pigs walking round ready roasted back here.

"And another thing, we'll be having a holiday with a three-day show that's the best ever—and not just a hack troupe of gladiators but freedmen for the most part. My old friend Titus has a big heart and a hot head. Maybe this, maybe that, but something at all events. I'm a close friend of his and he does nothing by halves. He'll give us cold steel, no quarter and the slaughterhouse right in the middle where all the stands can see it. And he's got the wherewithal—he was left thirty million when his poor father died. Even if he spent four hundred thousand, his pocket won't feel it and he'll go down in history. He's got some big brutes already, and a woman who fights in a chariot and Glyco's steward,[16] who was caught having fun with his mistress. You'll see quite a quarrel in the crowd between jealous husbands and romantic lovers. But that half-pint Glyco threw his steward to the lions, which is just giving himself away. How is it the servant's fault when he's forced into it? It's that old pisspot who really deserves to be tossed by a bull. But if you can't beat the ass you beat the saddle. But how did Glyco imagine the poisonous daughter of Hermogenes[17] would ever turn out well? The old man could cut the claws off a flying kite, and a snake don't hatch old rope. Glyco—well, Glyco's got his. He's branded for as long as he lives and only the grave will get rid of it. But everyone pays for their mistakes.

"But I can almost smell the dinner[18] Mammaea is going to give us—two denarii apiece for me and the family. If he really does it,

16. steward: a household slave. His master was permitted by law to punish him by forcing him to fight wild beasts in the arena.

17. Hermogenes: presumably the father of Glyco's wife.

18. dinner: a public banquet, given by Mammaea as part of his electoral campaign. His rival Norbanus has been giving gladiatorial shows.

he'll make off with all Norbanus's votes, I tell you he'll win at a canter. After all, what good has Nobanus done us? He put on some half-pint gladiators, so done in already that they'd have dropped if you blew at them. I've seen animal-killers[19] fight better. As for the horsemen killed, he got them off a lamp[20]—they ran round like cocks in a backyard. One was just a carthorse, the other couldn't stand up, and the reserve was just one corpse instead of another—he was practically hamstrung. One boy did have a bit of spirit—he was in Thracian armour,[21] and even he didn't show any initiative. In fact, they were all flogged afterwards, there were so many shouts of 'Give 'em what for!' from the crowd. Pure yellow, that's all.

" 'Well, I've put on a show for you,' he says. 'And I'm clapping you,' says I. 'Reckon it up—I'm giving more than I got. So we're quits.'

"Hey, Agamemnon! I suppose you're saying 'What is that bore going on and on about?' It's because a good talker like you don't talk. You're a cut above us, and so you laugh at what us poor people say. We all know you're off your head with all that reading. But never mind! Some day I'll get you to come down to my place in the country and have a look at our little cottage. We'll find something to eat—a chicken, some eggs. It'll be nice, even though the unreliable weather this year has made off with everything. Anyway, we'll find enough to fill our bellies.

"And my kid is growing up to be a pupil of yours. He can divide by four already. If God spares him, you'll have him ready to do anything for you. In his spare time, he won't take his head out of his exercise book. He's clever and there's good stuff in him, even if he is crazy about birds. Only yesterday I killed his three goldfinches and told him a weasel ate them. But he's found some other silly hobbies, and he's having a fine time painting. Still, he's already well ahead with his Greek, and he's starting to take to his Latin, though his tutor is too pleased with himself and unreliable—he just comes and goes. He knows his stuff but doesn't want to work. There is another one as well, not so clever but he is conscientious—he teaches the boy more than he knows himself. In fact, he makes a habit of coming around on holidays, and whatever you give him, he's happy.

"Anyway, I've just bought the boy some law books, as I want him to pick up some legal training for home use. There's a living in that sort of thing. He's done enough dabbling in poetry and such like. If he objects, I've decided he'll learn a trade—barber, auctioneer, or at least a barrister—something he can't lose till he dies. Well, yesterday I gave it to him straight: 'Believe me, my lad, any studying you do will be for your own good. You see Phileros the solicitor—if he hadn't studied, he'd be starving today. It's not so long since he was humping round loads on his back. Now he can even look Norbanus in the face. An education is an investment, and a proper profession never goes dead on you.' "

19. animal-killers: professional fighters of wild animals, considered inferior to gladiators.

20. lamp: as small as the horsemen depicted on a lamp.

21. Thracian armour: light armor, such as that worn by soldiers from Thrace, a savage country northeast of Greece.

This was the sort of conversation flying round when Trimalchio came in, dabbed his forehead and washed his hands in perfume. There was a short pause, then he said:

"Excuse me, dear people, my inside has not been answering the call for several days now. The doctors are puzzled. But some pomegranate rind and resin in vinegar has done me good. But I hope now it will be back on its good behaviour. Otherwise my stomach rumbles like a bull. So if any of you wants to go out, there's no need for him to be embarrassed. None of us was born solid. I think there's nothing so tormenting as holding yourself in. This is the one thing even God Almighty can't object to. Yes, laugh, Fortunata,[22] but you generally keep me up all night with this sort of thing.

"Anyway, I don't object to people doing what suits them even in the middle of dinner—and the doctors forbid you to hold yourself in. Even if it's a longer business, everything is there just outside—water, bowls, and all the other little comforts. Believe me, if the wind goes to your brain it starts flooding your whole body too. I've known a lot of people die from this because they wouldn't be honest with themselves."

We thanked him for being so generous and considerate and promptly proceeded to bury our amusement in our glasses. Up to this point we'd not realized we were only in mid-stream, as you might say.

The orchestra played, the tables were cleared, and then three white pigs were brought into the dining-room, all decked out in muzzles and bells. The first, the master of ceremonies announced, was two years old, the second three, and the third six. I was under the impression that some acrobats were on their way in and the pigs were going to do some tricks, the way they do in street shows. But Trimalchio dispelled this impression by asking:

"Which of these would you like for the next course? Any clodhopper can do you a barnyard cock or a stew and trifles like that, but my cooks are used to boiling whole calves."

He immediately sent for the chef and without waiting for us to choose he told him to kill the oldest pig.

He then said to the man in a loud voice:

"Which division are you from?"

When he replied he was from number forty, Trimalchio asked:

"Were you bought or were you born here?"

"Neither," said the chef, "I was left to you in Pansa's will."

"Well, then," said Trimalchio, "see you serve it up carefully—otherwise I'll have you thrown into the messenger's division."

22. Fortunata: Trimalchio's wife.

So the chef, duly reminded of his master's magnificence, went back to his kitchen, the next course leading the way.

Trimalchio looked round at us with a gentle smile: "If you don't like the wine, I'll have it changed. It is up to you to do it justice. I don't buy it, thank heaven. In fact, whatever wine really tickles your palate this evening, it comes from an estate of mine which as yet I haven't seen. It's said to join my estates at Tarracina and Tarentum. What I'd like to do now is add Sicily to my little bit of land, so that when I want to go to Africa, I could sail there without leaving my own property.

"But tell me, Agamemnon, what was your debate about today? Even though I don't go in for the law, still I've picked up enough education for home consumption. And don't you think I turn my nose up at studying, because I have two libraries, one Greek, one Latin. So tell us, just as a favour, what was the topic of your debate?"

Agamemnon was just beginning, "A poor man and a rich man were enemies . . ." when Trimalchio said: "What's a poor man?" "Oh, witty!" said Agamemnon, and then told us about some fictitious case or other. Like lightning Trimalchio said: "If this happened, it's not a fictitious case—if it didn't happen, then it's nothing at all."

We greeted this witticism and several more like it with the greatest enthusiasm.

"Tell me, my dear Agamemnon," continued Trimalchio, "do you remember the twelve labours of Hercules and the story of Ulysses —how the Cyclops tore out his thumb with a pair of pincers.[23] I used to read about them in Homer, when I was a boy. In fact, I actually saw the Sibyl at Cumae with my own eyes dangling in a bottle, and when the children asked her in Greek: 'What do you want, Sybil?' she used to answer: 'I want to die.' "

[Presents for the guests are distributed with a slave announcing the nature of each gift and making in each case an atrocious pun on the name of the guest.]

We laughed for ages. There were hundreds of things like this but they've slipped my mind now.

Ascyltus, with his usual lack of restraint, found everything extremely funny, lifting up his hands and laughing till the tears came. Eventually one of Trimalchio's freedman[24] friends flared up at him—the one sitting above me, in fact.

"You with the sheep's eyes," he said, "what's so funny? Isn't our host elegant enough for you? You're better off, I suppose, and used

23. pincers: Trimalchio refers to Odysseus' adventures in the cave of the Cyclops (Odyssey, Book IX). In spite of what he goes on to say, he has obviously not read Homer.

24. freedman: a former slave who had bought his freedom.

to a bigger dinner. Holy guardian here preserve me! If I was sitting by him, I'd make him bleat! A fine pippin he is to be laughing at other people! Some fly-by-night from god knows where—not worth his own piss. In fact, if I pissed round him, he wouldn't know where to turn.

"By god, it takes a lot to make me boil, but if you're too soft, worms like this only come to the top. Look at him laughing! What's he got to laugh at? Did his father pay cash for him? You're a Roman knight,[25] are you? Well, my father was a king.

" 'Why are you only a freedman?' did you say? Because I went into service voluntarily. I wanted to be a Roman citizen, not a subject with taxes to pay. And today, I hope no one can laugh at the way I live. I'm a man among men, and I walk with my head up. I don't owe anybody a penny—there's never been a court-order out for me. No one's said 'Pay up!' to me in the street.

"I've bought a bit of land and some tiny pieces of plate. I've twenty bellies to feed, as well as a dog. I bought my old woman's freedom so nobody could wipe his dirty hands on her hair. Four thousand I paid for myself. I was elected to the Augustan College[26] and it cost me nothing. I hope when I die I won't have to blush in my coffin.

"But you now, you're such a busybody you don't look behind you. You see a louse on somebody else, but not the fleas on your own back. You're the only one who finds us funny. Look at the professor now—he's an older man than you and we get along with him. But you're still wet from your mother's milk and not up to your ABC yet. Just a crackpot—you're like a piece of wash-leather in soak, softer but no better! You're grander than us—well, have two dinners and two suppers! I'd rather have my good name than any amount of money. When all's said and done, who's ever asked me for money twice? For forty years I slaved but nobody ever knew if I was a slave or a free man. I came to this colony when I was a lad with long hair—the town-hall hadn't been built then. But I worked hard to please my master—there was a real gentleman, with more in his little finger-nail than there is in your whole body. And I had people in the house who tried to trip me up one way or another, but still—thanks be to his guardian spirit!—I kept my head above water. That's real success: being born free is as easy as all get-out. Now what are you gawping at, like a goat in a vetch field?"

At this remark, Giton, who was waiting on me, could not suppress his laughter and let out a filthy guffaw, which did not pass unnoticed by Ascyltus's opponent. He turned his abuse on the boy.

"So!" he said, "you're amused too, are you, you curly-headed

25. knight: a Roman class including all who had property above a certain amount.

26. The state religion was the worship of Augustus, the emperor. The office of priest might be sold or conferred.

onion? A merry Saturnalia[27] to you! Is it December, I'd like to know? When did you pay your liberation tax?[28] Look, he doesn't know what to do, the gallow's bird, the crow's meat.

"God's curse on you, and your master too, for not keeping you under control! As sure as I get my bellyful, it's only because of Trimalchio that I don't take it out of you here and now. He's a freedman like myself. We're doing all right, but those good-for-nothings, well—. It's easy to see, like master, like man. I can hardly hold myself back, and I'm not naturally hot-headed—but once I start, I don't give a penny for my own mother.

"All right! I'll see you when we get outside, you rat, you excrescence. I'll knock your master in the dirt before I'm an inch taller or shorter. And I won't let you off either, by heaven, even if you scream down God Almighty. Your cheap curls and your no-good master won't be much use to you then—I'll see to that. I'll get my teeth into you, all right. Either I'm much mistaken about myself or you won't be laughing at us behind your golden beard. Athena's curse on you and the man who first made you such a forward brat.

"I didn't learn no geometry or criticism and such silly rubbish, but I can read the letters on a notice board and I can do my percentages in metal, weights, and money. In fact, if you like, we'll have a bet. Come on, here's my cash. Now you'll see how your father wasted his money, even though you do know how to make a speech.

"Try this:

> Something we all have.
> Long I come, broad I come. What am I?

"I'll give you it: something we all have that runs and doesn't move from its place: something we all have that grows and gets smaller.[29]

"You're running round in circles, you've had enough, like the mouse in the pisspot. So either keep quiet or keep out of the way of your betters, they don't even know you're alive—unless you think I care about your box-wood rings that you swiped from your girl friend! Lord make me lucky! Let's go into town and borrow some money. You'll soon see they trust this iron one.

"Pah! a drownded fox makes a nice sight, I must say. As I hope to make my pile and die so famous that people swear by my dead body, I'll hound you to death. And he's a nice thing too—the one who taught you all these tricks—a muttonhead, not a master. We learned different. Our teacher used to say: 'Are your things in order? Go straight home. No looking around. And be polite to your elders.' Nowadays it's all an absolute muck-heap. They turn out nobody worth a penny. I'm like you see me and I thank God for the way I was learnt." . . .

27. Saturnalia: a December festival in honor of an ancient Italian deity at which the normal order of everyday life was reversed and the slaves and children made fun of their masters.

28. liberation tax: The freed slave had to pay 5 per cent of his value to the treasury.

29. There is no agreement about the correct answer to these riddles. Suggested answers are, to the first, the foot; the second, the eye; the third, the hair.

In the middle of all this, a lictor[30] knocked at the double doors and a drunken guest entered wearing white, followed by a large crowd of people. I was terrified by this lordly apparition and thought it was the chief magistrate arriving. So I tried to rise and get my bare feet on the floor. Agamemnon laughed at this panic and said:

"Get hold of yourself, you silly fool. This is Habinnas—Augustan College and monumental mason."

Relieved by this information I resumed my position and watched Habinnas' entry with huge admiration. Being already drunk, he had his hands on his wife's shoulders; loaded with several garlands, oil pouring down his forehead and into his eyes, he settled himself into the place of honour and immediately demanded some wine and hot water. Trimalchio, delighted by these high spirits, demanded a larger cup for himself and asked how he had enjoyed it all.

"The only thing we missed," replied Habinnas, "was yourself—the apple of my eye was here. Still, it was damn good. Scissa was giving a ninth-day dinner[31] in honour of a poor slave of hers she'd freed on his death-bed. And I think she'll have a pretty penny to pay in liberation tax because they reckon he was worth fifty thousand. Still, it was pleasant enough, even if we did have to pour half our drinks over his wretched bones."

"Well," said Trimalchio, "what did you have for dinner?"

"I'll tell you if I can—I've such a good memory that I often forget my own name. For the first course we had a pig crowned with sausages and served with blood-puddings and very nicely done giblets, and of course beetroot and pure wholemeal bread—which I prefer to white myself: it's very strengthening and I don't regret it when I do my business. The next course was cold tart and a concoction of first-class Spanish wine poured over hot honey. I didn't eat anything at all of the actual tart, but I dived right into the honey. Scattered round were chickpeas, lupines, a choice of nuts and an apple apiece —though I took two. And look, I've got them tied up in a napkin, because if I don't take something in the way of a present to my youngster, I'll have a row on my hands.

"Oh, yes, my good lady reminds me. We had a hunk of bearmeat set before us, which Scintilla was foolish enough to try, and she practically spewed up her guts; but I ate more than a pound of it, as it tasted like real wild-boar. And I say if bears can eat us poor people, it's all the more reason why us poor people should eat bears.

30. lictor: a magistrate's attendant.
31. ninth-day dinner: on the last day of the mourning period.

"To finish up with, we had some cheese basted with new wine, snails all round, chitterlings, plates of liver, eggs in pastry hoods, turnips, mustard, and some filthy concoction—good riddance to that. There were pickled cumin seeds too, passed round in a bowl and some people were that bad-mannered they took three handfuls. You see, we sent the ham away.

"But tell me something, Gaius, now I ask—why isn't Fortunata at the table?"

"You know her," replied Trimalchio, "unless she's put the silver away and shared out the left-overs among the slaves, she won't put a drop of water to her mouth."

"All the same," retorted Habinnas, "unless she sits down, I'm shagging off."

And he was starting to get up, when at a given signal all the servants shouted "Fortunata" four or five times. So in she came with her skirt tucked up under a yellow sash to show her cerise petticoat underneath, as well as her twisted anklets and gold-embroidered slippers. Wiping her hands on a handkerchief which she carried round her neck, she took her place on the couch where Habbinas' wife was reclining. She kissed her. "Is it really you?" she said, clapping her hands together.

It soon got to the point where Fortunata took the bracelets from her great fat arms and showed them to the admiring Scintilla. In the end she even undid her anklets and her gold hair net, which she said was pure gold. Trimalchio noticed this and had it all brought to him and commented:

"A woman's chains, you see. This is the way us poor fools get robbed. She must have six and a half pounds on her. Still, I've got a bracelet myself, made up from one-tenth per cent to Mercury[32]—and it weighs not an ounce less than ten pounds."

Finally, for fear he looked like a liar, he even had some scales brought in and had them passed round to test the weight.

Scintilla was no better. From round her neck she took a little gold locket, which she called her "lucky box." From it she extracted two earrings and in her turn gave them to Fortunata to look at.

"A present from my good husband," she said, "and no one has a finer set."

"Hey!" said Habinnas, "you cleaned me out to buy you a glass bean. Honestly, if I had a daughter, I'd cut her little ears off. If there weren't any women, everything would be dirt cheap. As it is, we've got to drink cold water and piss it out hot."

Meanwhile, the women giggled tipsily between themselves and kissed each other drunkenly, one crying up her merits as a housewife, the other crying about her husband's demerits and boy friends.

32. Mercury: Trimalchio sets aside a percentage of his profits to offer to his patron deity.

While they had their heads together like this, Habinnas rose stealthily and taking Fortunata's feet, flung them up over the couch.

"Oh, oh!" she shrieked, as her underskirt wandered up over her knees. So she settled herself in Scintilla's lap and hid her disgusting red face in her handkerchief.

Then came an interval, after which Trimalchio called for dessert. . . .

Fortunata was now wanting to dance, and Scintilla was doing more clapping than talking, when Trimalchio said:

"Philargyrus—even though you are such a terrible fan of the Greens[33]—you have my permission to join us. And tell your dear Menophila to sit down as well."

Need I say more? We were almost thrown out of our places, so completely did the household fill the dining-room. I even noticed that the chef was actually given a place above me, and he was reeking of pickles and sauce. And he wasn't satisfied with just having a place, but he had to start straight off on an imitation of the tragedian Ephesus, and then challenge his master to bet against the Greens winning at the next races.

Trimalchio became expansive after this argument.

"My dear people," he said, "slaves are human beings too. They drink the same milk as anybody else, even though luck's been agin 'em. Still, if nothing happens to me, they'll have their taste of freedom soon. In fact, I'm setting them all free in my will. I'm giving Philargyrus a farm, what's more, and the woman he lives with. As for Cario, I'm leaving him a block of flats, his five per cent manumission tax, and a bed with all the trimmings. I'm making Fortunata my heir, and I want all my friends to look after her.

"The reason I'm telling everyone all this is so my household will love me now as much as if I was dead."

Everyone began thanking his lordship for his kindness, when he became very serious and had a copy of his will brought in. Amid the sobs of his household he read out the whole thing from beginning to end.

Then looking at Habinnas, he said:

"What have you to say, my dear old friend? Are you building my monument the way I told you? I particularly want you to keep a place at the foot of my statue and put a picture of my pup there, as well as paintings of wreaths, scent-bottles, and all the contests of Petraites,[34] and thanks to you I'll be able to live on after I'm dead. And another thing! See that it's a hundred feet facing the road and two hundred back into the field. I want all the various sorts of fruit round my ashes and lots and lots of vines. After all, it's a big mistake to have nice houses just for when you're alive and not worry about the one we have to live in for much longer. And that's why I want this written up before anything else:

33. Greens: one of the teams in the chariot races.

34. Petraites: a popular gladiator.

THIS MONUMENT DOES NOT GO TO THE HEIR

"But I'll make sure in my will that I don't get done down once I'm dead. I'll put one of my freedmen in charge of my tomb to look after it and not let people run up and shit on my monument. I'd like you to put some ships there too, sailing under full canvas, and me sitting on a high platform in my robes of office, wearing five gold rings and pouring out a bagful of money for the people. You know I gave them all a dinner and two denarii apiece. Let's have in a banqueting hall as well, if you think it's a good idea, and show the whole town having a good time. Put up a statue of Fortunata on my right, holding a dove, and have her leading her little dog tied to her belt—and this dear little chap as well, and great big wine jars sealed up so the wine won't spill. And perhaps you could carve me a broken wine jar and boy crying over it. A clock in the middle, so that anybody who looks at the time, like it or not, has got to read my name. As for the inscription now, take a good look and see if this seems suitable enough:

HERE SLEEPS
GAIUS POMPEIUS TRIMALCHIO
MAECENATIANUS
ELECTED TO THE AUGUSTAN COLLEGE IN HIS ABSENCE
HE COULD HAVE BEEN ON EVERY BOARD IN ROME
BUT HE REFUSED
GOD-FEARING BRAVE AND TRUE
A SELF-MADE MAN
HE LEFT AN ESTATE OF 30,000,000
AND HE NEVER HEARD A PHILOSOPHER
FAREWELL
AND YOU FARE WELL, TRIMALCHIO."

[After a visit to the baths, where Encolpius and his friends make an unsuccessful attempt to escape, the dinner is resumed.]

After this dish Trimalchio looked at the servants and said:

"Why haven't you had dinner yet? Off you go and let some others come on duty."

Up came another squad and as the first set called out: "Good night, Gaius!" the new arrivals shouted: "Good evening, Gaius!"

This led to the first incident that damped the general high spirits. Not a bad-looking boy entered with the newcomers and Trimalchio jumped at him and began kissing him at some length. Fortunata, asserting her just and legal rights, began hurling insults at Trimalchio, calling him a low scum and a disgrace, who couldn't control his beastly desires. "You dirty dog!" she finally added.

Trimalchio took offence at this abuse and flung his glass into Fortunata's face. She screamed as though she'd lost an eye and put her trembling hands across her face. Scintilla was terrified too and hugged the quaking woman to her breast. An obliging slave pressed a little jug of cold water to her cheek, while Fortunata rested her head on it and began weeping. Trimalchio just said:

"Well, well, forgotten her chorus days, has she? She doesn't remember, but she was bought and sold, and I took her away from it all and made her as good as the next. Yet she puffs herself up like a frog and doesn't even spit for luck. Just a great hunk, not a woman. But those as are born over a shop don't dream of a house. May I never have a day's good luck again, if I don't teach that Cassandra in clogs some manners!

"There was I, not worth twopence, and I could have had ten million. And you know I'm not lying about it. Agatho, who ran a perfume shop for the lady next door, he took me on one side and said: 'You don't want to let your family die out, you know!' But me, trying to do the right thing and not wanting to look changeable, I cut my own throat.

"All right! I'll make you want to dig me up with your bare nails. Just so you'll know on the spot what you've done for yourself—Habinnas! I don't want you to put her statue on my tomb, so at least when I'm dead I won't have any more squabbles. And another thing! just to show I can get my own back—when I'm dead I don't want her to kiss me."

After this thunderbolt, Habinnas began asking him to calm down: "None of us are without faults," he said, "we're not gods, we're human!" Scintilla said the same, calling him Gaius, and she began asking him, in the name of his guardian spirit, to give in.

Trimalchio held back his tears no longer. "I ask you, Habinnas," he said, "as you hope to enjoy your bit of savings—if I did anything wrong, spit in my face. I kissed this very careful little fellow, not for his pretty face, but because he's careful with money—he says his ten times table, he reads a book at sight, he's got himself some Thracian kit out of his daily allowance, and he's bought himself an easy chair and two cups out of his own pocket. Doesn't he deserve to be the apple of my eye? But Fortunata won't have it.

"Is that the way you feel, high heels? I'll give you a piece of advice: don't let your good luck turn your head, you kite, and don't make me show my teeth, my little darling—otherwise you'll feel my temper. You know me: once I've decided on something, it's fixed with a twelve-inch nail.

"But to come back to earth—I want you to enjoy yourselves, my dear people. After all, I was once like you are, but being the right sort, I got where I am. It's the old headpiece that makes a man, the rest is all rubbish. 'Buy right—sell right!'—that's me! Different people will give you a different line. I'm just on top of the world, I'm that lucky.

"But you, you snoring thing, are you still moaning? I'll give you something to moan about in a minute.

"However, as I'd started to say, it was my shrewd way with money that got me to my present position. I came from Asia as big as this candlestick. In fact, every day I used to measure myself against it, and to get some whiskers round my beak quicker, I used to oil my lips from the lamp. Still, for fourteen years I was the old boy's fancy. And there's nothing wrong if the boss wants it. But I did all right by the old girl too. You know what I mean—I don't say anything because I'm not the boasting sort.

"Well, as heaven will have it, I became boss in the house, and the old boy, you see, couldn't think of anything but me. That's about it—he made me co-heir with the Emperor[35] and I got a senator's fortune. But nobody gets enough, never. I wanted to go into business. Not to make a long story of it, I built five ships, I loaded them with wine—it was absolute gold at the time—and I sent them to Rome. You'd have thought I ordered it—every single ship was wrecked. That's fact, not fable! In one single day Neptune[36] swallowed up thirty million. Do you think I gave up? This loss honestly wasn't more than a flea-bite to me—it was as if nothing had happened. I built more boats, bigger and better and luckier, so nobody could say I wasn't a man of courage. You know, the greater the ship, the greater the confidence. I loaded them again—with wine, bacon, beans, perfumes and slaves. At this point Fortunata did the decent thing, because she sold off all her gold trinkets, all her clothes, and put ten thousand in gold pieces in my hand. This was the yeast my fortune needed to rise. What heaven wants, soon happens. In one voyage I carved out a round ten million. I immediately bought back all my old master's estates. I built a house, I invested in slaves, and I bought up the horse trade. Whatever I touched grew like a honeycomb. Once I had more than the whole country, then down tools! I retired from business and began advancing loans through freedmen.

"Actually I was tired of trading on my own account, but it was an astrologer who convinced me. He happened to come to our colony, a sort of Greek, Serapa by name, and he could have told heaven itself what to do. He even told me things I'd forgotten. He went through everything for me from A to Z. He knew me inside out—the only thing he didn't tell me was what I ate for dinner the day before. You'd have thought he'd never left my side.

"Wasn't there that thing, Habinnas?—I think you were there: 'You got your lady wife out of those certain circumstances. You are

35. co-heir with the Emperor: an honor which Trimalchio shared with many others, for it was customary (as a prudent measure, to avoid confiscation on some pretext or other) to include a bequest to the emperor in one's will.

36. Neptune (Poseidon): the sea god.

not lucky in your friends. Nobody thanks you enough for your trouble. You have large estates. You are nursing a viper in your bosom.'

"And he said—though I shouldn't tell you—I have thirty years, four months, two days to live. What's more, I shall soon receive a legacy. My horoscope tells me this. If I'm allowed to join my estates to Apulia,[37] I'll have lived enough.

"Meantime, under the protection of Mercury, I built this house. As you know, it was still a shack, now it's a shrine. It has four dining-rooms, twenty bedrooms, two marble colonnades, a row of box-rooms up above, a bedroom where I sleep myself, a nest for this viper, and a really good lodge for the porter. The guest apartment takes a hundred guests. In fact, when Scaurus[38] came here, he didn't want to stay anywhere else, even though he's got his father's guest house down by the sea. And there are a lot of other things I'll show you in a second.

"Believe me: have a penny, and you're worth a penny. You got something, you'll be thought something. Like your old friend—first a frog, now a king.

"Meantime, Stichus, bring out the shroud and the things I want to be buried in. Bring some cosmetic cream too, and a sample from that jar of wine I want my bones washed in."

Stichus did not delay over it, but brought his white shroud and his formal dress into the dining-room . . . Trimalchio told us to examine them and see if they were made of good wool. Then he said with a smile:

"Now you, Stichus, see no mice or moths get at those—otherwise I'll burn you alive. I want to be buried in style, so the whole town will pray for my rest."

He opened a bottle of nard[39] on the spot, rubbed some on all of us and said:

"I hope this'll be as nice when I'm dead as when I'm alive." The wine he had poured into a big decanter and he said:

"I want you to think you've been invited to my wake."

The thing was becoming absolutely sickening, when Trimalchio, showing the effects of his disgusting drunkenness, had a fresh entertainment brought into the dining-room, some cornet players. Propped up on a lot of cushions, he stretched out along the edge of the couch and said: "Pretend I'm dead and say something nice."

The cornet players struck up a dead march. One man in particular, the slave of his undertaker (who was the most respectable person present) blew so loudly that he roused the neighbourhood. As a result, the fire brigade, thinking Trimalchio's house was on fire, sud-

37. Apulia: the southeastern extremity of Italy.

38. Scaurus: unknown. The name is aristocratic but our translator suggests Trimalchio may be referring to a well-known manufacturer of fish sauce from Pompeii.

39. nard: a perfumed ointment.

denly broke down the front door and began kicking up their own sort of din with their water and axes.

Seizing this perfect chance, we gave Agamemnon the slip and escaped as rapidly as if there really were a fire.

ST. AUGUSTINE

(354–430 A.D.)

Confessions (Confessiones)*

[Childhood]

Book I

What have I to say to Thee, God, save that I know not where I came from, when I came into this life-in-death—or should I call it death-in-life? I do not know. I only know that the gifts Your mercy had provided sustained me from the first moment: not that I remember it but so I have heard from the parents of my flesh, the father from whom, and the mother in whom, You fashioned me in time.

Thus for my sustenance and my delight I had woman's milk: yet it was not my mother or my nurses who stored their breasts for me: it was Yourself, using them to give me the food of my infancy, according to Your ordinance and the riches set by You at every level of creation. It was by Your gift that I desired what You gave and no more, by Your gift that those who suckled me willed to give me what You had given them: for it was by the love implanted in them by You that they gave so willingly that milk which by Your gift flowed in the breasts. It was a good for them that I received good from them, though I received it not from them but only through them: since all good things are from You, O God, and from God is all my health.[1] But this I have learnt since: You have made it abundantly clear by all that I have seen You give, within me and about me. For at that time I knew how to suck, to lie quiet when I was content, to cry when I was in pain: and that was all I knew.

Later I added smiling to the things I could do, first in sleep, then awake. This again I have on the word of others, for naturally I do not remember; in any event, I believe it, for I have seen other

* Abridged. Written in A.D. 397. Our translation is by F. J. Sheed.

1. Throughout the Confessions, Augustine quotes liberally from the Bible; this citation, set off like the others in italics, has no special significance, but where a quotation alludes to a passage which bears more directly on Augustine's situation, it is glossed.

infants do the same. And gradually I began to notice where I was, and the will grew in me to make my wants known to those who might satisfy them; but I could not, for my wants were within me and those others were outside: nor had they any faculty enabling them to enter into my mind. So I would fling my arms and legs about and utter sounds, making the few gestures in my power—these being as apt to express my wishes as I could make them: but they were not very apt. And when I did not get what I wanted, either because my wishes were not clear or the things not good for me, I was in a rage—with my parents as though I had a right to their submission, with free human beings as though they had been bound to serve me; and I took my revenge in screams. That infants are like this, I have learnt from watching other infants; and that I was like it myself I have learnt more clearly from these other infants, who did not know me, than from my nurses who did.

* * *

From infancy I came to boyhood, or rather it came to me, taking the place of infancy. Yet infancy did not go: for where was it to go to? Simply it was no longer there. For now I was not an infant, without speech, but a boy, speaking. This I remember; and I have since discovered by observation how I learned to speak. I did not learn by elders teaching me words in any systematic way, as I was soon after taught to read and write. But of my own motion, using the mind which You, my God, gave me, I strove with cries and various sounds and much moving of my limbs to utter the feelings of my heart—all this in order to get my own way. Now I did not always manage to express the right meanings to the right people. So I began to reflect [I observed that] my elders would make some particular sound, and as they made it would point at or move towards some particular thing: and from this I came to realize that the thing was called by the sound they made when they wished to draw my attention to it. That they intended this was clear from the motions of their body, by a kind of natural language common to all races which consists in facial expressions, glances of the eye, gestures, and the tones by which the voice expresses the mind's state—for example whether things are to be sought, kept, thrown away, or avoided. So, as I heard the same words again and again properly used in different phrases, I came gradually to grasp what things they signified; and forcing my mouth to the same sounds, I began to use them to express my own wishes. Thus I learnt to convey what I meant to those about me; and so took another long step along the stormy way of human life in society, while I was still subject to the authority of my parents and at the beck and call of my elders.

O God, my God, what emptiness and mockeries did I now experience: for it was impressed upon me as right and proper in a boy to obey those who taught me, that I might get on in the world and excel in the handling of words[2] to gain honor among men and deceitful riches. I, poor wretch, could not see the use of the things I was sent to school to learn; but if I proved idle in learning, I was soundly beaten. For this procedure seemed wise to our ancestors: and many, passing the same way in days past, had built a sorrowful road by which we too must go, with multiplication of grief and toil upon the sons of Adam.[3]

Yet, Lord, I observed men praying to You: and I learnt to do likewise, thinking of You (to the best of my understanding) as some great being who, though unseen, could hear and help me. As a boy I fell into the way of calling upon You, my Help and my Refuge; and in those prayers I broke the strings of my tongue—praying to You, small as I was but with no small energy, that I might not be beaten at school. And when You did not hear me (not as giving me over to folly),[4] my elders and even my parents, who certainly wished me no harm, treated my stripes as a huge joke, which they were very far from being to me. Surely, Lord, there is no one so steeled in mind or cleaving to You so close—or even so insensitive, for that might have the same effect—as to make light of the racks and hooks and other torture instruments[5] (from which in all lands men pray so fervently to be saved) while truly loving those who are in such bitter fear of them. Yet my parents seemed to be amused at the torments inflicted upon me as a boy by my masters, though I was no less afraid of my punishments or zealous in my prayers to You for deliverance. But in spite of my terrors I still did wrong, by writing or reading or studying less than my set tasks. It was not, Lord, that I lacked mind or memory, for You had given me as much of these as my age required; but the one thing I revelled in was play; and for this I was punished by men who after all were doing exactly the same things themselves. But the idling of men is called business; the idling of boys, though exactly like, is punished by those same men: and no one pities either boys or men. Perhaps an unbiased observer would hold that I was rightly punished as a boy for playing with a ball: because this hindered my progress in studies—studies which would give me the opportunity as a man to play at things more degraded. And what difference was there between me and the master who flogged me? For if on some trifling point he had the worst of the argument with

2. The study of rhetoric, which was the passport to eminence in public life.

3. Refers to the consequences of Adam's disobedience. Cf. p. 50.

4. Augustine recognizes the necessity of this rigorous training; that he never forgot its harshness is clear from his remark in the City of God, Book XXI, Section 14: "If a choice were given him between suffering death and living his early years over again, who would not shudder and choose death?"

5. racks and hooks and other torments: The instruments of public execution.

some fellow-master, he was more torn with angry vanity than I when I was beaten in a game of ball.

* * *

But to continue with my boyhood, which was in less peril of sin than my adolescence. I disliked learning and hated to be forced to it. But I was forced to it, so that good was done to me though it was not my doing. Short of being driven to it, I certainly would not have learned. But no one does well against his will, even if the thing he does is a good thing to do. Nor did those who forced me do well: it was by You, O God, that well was done. Those others had no deeper vision of the use to which I might put all they forced me to learn, but to sate the insatiable desire of man for wealth that is but penury and glory that is but shame. But You, Lord, by Whom the very hairs of our head are numbered,[6] used for my good the error of those who urged me to study; but my own error, in that I had no will to learn, you used for my punishment—a punishment richly deserved by one so small a boy and so great a sinner. Thus, You brought good for me out of those who did ill, and justly punished me for the ill I did myself. So You have ordained and so it is: that every disorder of the soul is its own punishment.

To this day I do not quite see why I so hated the Greek tongue[7] that I was made to learn as a small boy. For I really liked Latin—not the rudiments that we got from our first teachers but the literature that we came to be taught later. For the rudiments—reading and writing and figuring—I found as hard and hateful as Greek. Yet this too could come only from sin and the vanity of life, because I was flesh, and a wind that goes away and returns not. For those first lessons were the surer. I acquired the power I still have to read what I find written and to write what I want to express; whereas in the studies that came later I was forced to memorize the wanderings of Aeneas[8]—whoever he was—while forgetting my own wanderings; and to weep for the death of Dido who killed herself for love,[9] while bearing dry-eyed my own pitiful state, in that among these studies I was becoming dead to You, O God, my life.

Nothing could be more pitiful than a pitiable creature who does not see to pity himself, and weeps for the death that Dido suffered through love of Aeneas and not for the death he suffers himself through not loving You, O God, Light of my heart, Bread of my soul, Power wedded to my mind and the depths of my thought. I

6. Who knows and attends to the smallest detail of each life. [Matthew 10:30.]

7. Important not only for gaining knowledge of Greek literature but also because it was the official language of the Eastern half of the Roman Empire. Augustine never really mastered Greek, though his remark elsewhere, that he had acquired so little Greek that it amounted to practically none, is overmodest.

8. Virgil's Aeneid, Book III.

9. Aeneid, Book IV.

did not love You and I went away from You in fornication:[10] and all around me in my fornication echoed applauding cries "Well done! Well done!" For the friendship of this world is fornication against Thee: and the world cries "Well done" so loudly that one is ashamed of unmanliness not to do it. And for this I did not grieve; but I grieved for Dido, slain as she sought by the sword an end to her woe, while I too followed after the lowest of Your creatures, forsaking You, earth going unto earth. And if I were kept from reading, I grieved at not reading the tales that caused me such grief. This sort of folly is held nobler and richer than the studies by which we learn to read and write!

But now let my God cry aloud in my soul, and let Your truth assure me that it is not so: the earlier study is the better. I would more willingly forget the wanderings of Aeneas and all such things than how to write and read. Over the entrance of these grammar schools hangs a curtain:[11] but this should be seen not as lending honor to the mysteries, but as a cloak to the errors taught within. Let not those masters—who have now lost their terrors for me—cry out against me, because I confess to You, my God, the desire of my soul, and find soul's rest in blaming my evil ways that I may love Your holy ways. Let not the buyers or sellers of book-learning cry out against me. If I ask them whether it is true, as the poet says, that Aeneas ever went to Carthage, the more ignorant will have to answer that they do not know, the more scholarly that he certainly did not. But if I ask with what letters the name Aeneas is spelt,[12] all whose schooling has gone so far will answer correctly, according to the convention men have agreed upon for the use of letters. Or again, were I to ask which loss would be more damaging to human life—the loss from men's memory of reading and writing or the loss of these poetic imaginings—there can be no question what anyone would answer who had not lost his own memory. Therefore as a boy I did wrong in liking the empty studies more than the useful—or rather in loving the empty and hating the useful. For one and one make two, two and two make four, I found a loathsome refrain; but such empty unrealities as the Wooden Horse with its armed men, and Troy on fire, and Creusa's Ghost, were sheer delight.[13]

Give me leave, O my God, to speak of my mind, Your gift, and of the follies in which I wasted it. It chanced that a task was set me, a task which I did not like but had to do. There was the promise of glory if I won, the fear of ignominy, and a flogging as well, if

10. Metaphorically in this instance.

11. School was often held in a building open on one side and curtained off from the street.

12. Augustine's point is that the historical truth of the poet's story may be doubted, but the spelling of Aeneas' name is certain.

13. Aeneid, Book II, l. 772.

I lost. It was to declaim the words uttered by Juno[14] in her rage and grief when she could not keep the Trojan prince from coming to Italy. I had learnt that Juno had never said these words, but we were compelled to err in the footsteps of the poet who had invented them: and it was our duty to paraphrase in prose what he had said in verse. In this exercise that boy won most applause in whom the passions of grief and rage were expressed most powerfully and in the language most adequate to the majesty of the personage represented.

What could all this mean to me, O My true Life, My God? Why was there more applause for the performance I gave than for so many classmates of my own age? Was not the whole business so much smoke and wind? Surely some other matter could have been found to exercise mind and tongue. Thy praises, Lord, might have upheld the fresh young shoot of my heart, so that it might not have been whirled away by empty trifles, defiled, a prey to the spirits of the air. For there is more than one way of sacrificing to the fallen angels.

* * *

[The Pear Tree]

Book II

I propose now to set down my past wickedness and the carnal corruptions of my soul, not for love of them but that I may love Thee, O my God. I do it for love of Thy love, passing again in the bitterness of remembrance over my most evil ways that Thou mayest thereby grow ever lovelier to me, O Loveliness that dost not deceive, Loveliness happy and abiding: and I collect my self out of that broken state in which my very being was torn asunder because I was turned away from Thee, the One, and wasted myself upon the many.

Arrived now at adolescence I burned for all the satisfactions of hell, and I sank to the animal in a succession of dark lusts: my beauty consumed away, and I stank in Thine eyes, yet was pleasing in my own and anxious to please the eyes of men.

My one delight was to love and to be loved. But in this I did not keep the measure of mind to mind, which is the luminous line of friendship; but from the muddy concupiscence of the flesh and the hot imagination of puberty mists steamed up to becloud and darken my heart so that I could not distinguish the white light of love from the fog of lust. Both love and lust boiled within me, and swept my youthful immaturity over the precipice of evil desires to leave me half drowned in a whirlpool of abominable sins. Your wrath had grown mighty against me and I knew it not. I had grown deaf from the clanking of the chain of my mortality, the punishment for the pride of my soul: and I departed further from You, and You left me to myself: and I was tossed about and wasted and poured out and boiling over in my fornications: and You were silent, O my late-won Joy. You were silent, and I, arrogant and depressed, weary and restless, wandered further and further from You into more and more sins which could bear no fruit save sorrows.

14. Augustine was assigned the task of delivering a prose paraphrase of Juno's angry speech in the Aeneid, Book I. (She complains that her enemies, the Trojans under Aeneas, are on their way to their destined goal in Italy in spite of her resolution to prevent them.) Rhetorical exercises such as this were common in the schools, since they served the double purpose of teaching literature and rhetorical composition at the same time.

* * *

Where then was I, and how far from the delights of Your house, in that sixteenth year of my life in this world, when the madness of lust—needing no licence from human shamelessness, receiving no licence from Your laws—took complete control of me, and I surrendered wholly to it? My family took no care to save me from this moral destruction by marriage: their only concern was that I should learn to make as fine and persuasive speeches as possible.

* * *

Your law, O Lord, punishes theft; and this law is so written in the hearts of men that not even the breaking of it blots it out: for no thief bears calmly being stolen from—not even if he is rich and the other steals through want. Yet I chose to steal, and not because want drove me to it—unless a want of justice and contempt for it and an excess for iniquity. For I stole things which I already had in plenty and of better quality. Nor had I any desire to enjoy the things I stole, but only the stealing of them and the sin. There was a pear tree near our vineyard, heavy with fruit, but fruit that was not particularly tempting either to look at or to taste. A group of young blackguards, and I among them, went out to knock down the pears and carry them off late one night, for it was our bad habit to carry on our games in the streets till very late. We carried off an immense load of pears, not to eat—for we barely tasted them before throwing them to the hogs. Our only pleasure in doing it was that it was forbidden. Such was my heart, O God, such was my heart: yet in the depth of the abyss You had pity on it. Let that heart now tell You what it sought when I was thus evil for no object, having no cause for wrongdoing save my wrongness. The malice of the act was base and I loved it—that is to say I loved my own undoing, I loved the evil in me—not the thing for which I did the evil, simply the evil: my soul was depraved, and hurled itself down from security in You into utter destruction, seeking no profit from wickedness but only to be wicked.

* * *

[Student at Carthage]

Book III

I came to Carthage[15] where a cauldron of illicit loves leapt and boiled about me. I was not yet in love, but I was in love with love, and from the very depth of my need hated myself for not more keenly feeling the need. I sought some object to love, since I was thus in love with loving; and I hated security and a life with no snares for my feet. For within I was hungry, all for the want of that spiritual food which is Thyself, my God; yet [though I was hungry for want of it] I did not hunger for it: I had no desire whatever for incorruptible food, not because I had it in abundance but the emptier I was, the more I hated the thought of it. Because of all this my soul was sick, and broke out in sores, whose itch I agonized to scratch with the rub of carnal things—carnal, yet if there were no soul in them, they would not be objects of love. My longing then was to love and to be loved, but most when I obtained the enjoyment of the body of the person who loved me.

Thus I polluted the stream of friendship with the filth of unclean desire and sullied its limpidity with the hell of lust. And vile and unclean as I was, so great was my vanity that I was bent upon passing for clean and courtly. And I did fall in love, simply from wanting to. O my God, my Mercy, with how much bitterness didst Thou in Thy goodness sprinkle the delights of that time! I was loved, and our love came to the bond of consummation: I wore my chains with bliss but with torment too, for I was scourged with the red hot rods of jealousy, with suspicions and fears and tempers and quarrels.

I developed a passion for stage plays, with the mirror they held up to my own miseries and the fuel they poured on my flame. How is it that a man wants to be made sad by the sight of tragic sufferings that he could not bear in his own person? Yet the spectator does want to feel sorrow, and it is actually his feeling of sorrow that he enjoys. Surely this is the most wretched lunacy? For the more a man feels such sufferings in himself, the more he is moved by the sight of them on the stage. Now when a man suffers himself, it is called misery; when he suffers in the suffering of another, it is called pity. But how can the unreal sufferings of the stage possibly move pity? The spectator is not moved to aid the sufferer but merely to be sorry for him; and the more the author of these fictions makes the audience grieve, the better they like him. If the tragic sorrows of the characters—whether historical or entirely fictitious—be so poorly represented that the spectator is not moved to tears, he leaves the theatre unsatisfied and full of complaints; if he is moved to tears, he stays to the end, fascinated and revelling in it.

15. The capital city of the province, where Augustine went to study rhetoric.

* * *

Those of my occupations at that time which were held as reputable[16] were directed towards the study of the law, in which I meant to excel—and the less honest I was, the more famous I should be. The very limit of human blindness is to glory in being blind. By this time I was a leader in the School of Rhetoric[17] and I enjoyed this high station and was arrogant and swollen with importance: though You know, O Lord, that I was far quieter in my behavior and had no share in the riotousness of the eversores—the Overturners[18]—for this blackguardly diabolical name they wore as the very badge of sophistication. Yet I was much in their company and much ashamed of the sense of shame that kept me from being like them. I was with them and I did for the most part enjoy their companionship, though I abominated the acts that were their specialty—as when they made a butt of some hapless newcomer, assailing him with really cruel mockery for no reason whatever, save the malicious pleasure they got from it. There was something very like the action of devils in their behavior. They were rightly called Overturners, since they had themselves been first overturned and perverted, tricked by those same devils who were secretly mocking them in the very acts by which they amused themselves in mocking and making fools of others.

With these men as companions of my immaturity, I was studying the books of eloquence; for in eloquence it was my ambition to shine, all from a damnable vaingloriousness and for the satisfaction of human vanity. Following the normal order of study I had come to a book of one Cicero, whose tongue[19] practically everyone admires, though not his heart. That particular book is called Hortensius[20] and contains an exhortation to philosophy. Quite definitely it changed the direction of my mind, altered my prayers to You, O Lord, and gave me a new purpose and ambition. Suddenly all the vanity I had hoped in I saw as worthless, and with an incredible intensity of desire I longed after immortal wisdom. I had begun that journey upwards by which I was to return to You. My father was now dead two years; I was eighteen and was receiving money from my mother for the continuance of my study of eloquence. But I used that book not for the sharpening of my tongue;

16. I.e. his rhetorical studies.
17. The best student.
18. A group of students who prided themselves on their wild actions and indiscipline. eversores is the Latin word that means "Overturners."
19. Style.
20. Only fragments of this dialogue remain. In it Cicero replies to an opponent of philosophy with an impassioned defense of the intellectual life.

what won me in it was what it said, not the excellence of its phrasing.

* * *

So I resolved to make some study of the Sacred Scriptures and find what kind of books they were. But what I came upon was something not grasped by the proud, not revealed either to children, something utterly humble in the hearing but sublime in the doing, and shrouded deep in mystery. And I was not of the nature to enter into it or bend my neck to follow it. When I first read those Scriptures, I did not feel in the least what I have just said; they seemed to me unworthy to be compared with the majesty of Cicero. My conceit was repelled by their simplicity, and I had not the mind to penetrate into their depths. They were indeed of a nature to grow in Your little ones.[21] But I could not bear to be a little one; I was only swollen with pride, but to myself I seemed a very big man.

* * *

[Death of a Friend]

Book IV

Throughout that nine-year period, from my nineteenth year to my twenty-eighth, I was astray myself and led others astray, was deceived and deceived others in various forms of self-assertion, publicly by the teaching of what are called the liberal arts,[22] privately under the false name of religion; in the one proud, in the other superstitious, in both vain. On the one side of my life I pursued the emptiness of popular glory and the applause of spectators, with competition for prize poems[23] and strife for garlands of straw and the vanity of stage shows and untempered lusts; on the other side I was striving to be made clean of all this same filth, by bearing food to those who were called elect and holy, that in the factory of their own stomachs they should turn it into angels and deities[24] by whom I was to be set free. And I followed out this line of conduct; and so did my friends who were deceived by me and with me.

* * *

In those years I taught the art of Rhetoric. Overcome myself by the desire of money, I offered for sale skill in speech to overcome others by.[25] But You know, O Lord, I preferred to have honest

21. Refers not only to the rhetorical simplicity of Jesus' teachings but his interest in teaching children, "for to such belongs the kingdom of heaven." [Matthew 19:14.]

22. The rhetorical and literary studies which Augustine pursued.

23. The prize for the winner of the rhetorical contests held in the theater.

24. Certain vegetables were supposed by the Manichees to contain elements of Light, which were liberated when the vegetables were eaten by the Elect.

25. In the law-courts.

scholars as honesty is nowadays reckoned: and without guile I taught them guilefulness, that they might use it not against the life of an innocent man, but for the life of a guilty man. And You, O God, saw me far from You stumbling in that slippery way, showing amidst much smoke some small spark of honor: for in my schoolmastership I honestly did my best for men who loved vanity and sought after lying: and in truth I was one with them. In those years I took one woman, not joined to me in lawful marriage, but one whom wandering lust and no particular judgment had brought my way. Yet I had but that one woman, and I was faithful to her. And with her I learnt by my own experience what a gulf there is between the restraint of the marriage-covenant entered into for the sake of children and the mere bargain of a lustful love, where if children come they come unwanted—though when they are born, they compel our love.[26]

* * *

During the period in which I first began to teach in the town of my birth, I had found a very dear friend, who was pursuing similar studies. He was about my own age, and was now coming, as I was, to the very flowering-time of young manhood. He had indeed grown up with me as a child and we had gone to school together and played together. Neither in those earlier days nor indeed in the later time of which I now speak was he a friend in the truest meaning of friendship: for there is no true friendship unless You weld it between souls that cleave together through that charity which is shed in our hearts by the Holy Ghost who is given to us. Yet it had become a friendship very dear to us, made the warmer by the ardor of studies pursued together. I had turned him from the true faith —in which being little more than a boy he was not deeply grounded—toward those superstitious and soul-destroying errors that my mother bewailed in me.[27] With me he went astray in error, and my soul could not be without him. But You are ever close upon the heels of those who flee from You, for You are at once God of Vengeance and Fount of Mercy, and You turn us to Yourself by ways most wonderful. You took this man from the life of earth when he had completed scarcely a year in a friendship that had grown sweeter to me than all the sweetness of the life I knew.

What man could recount all Your praises for the things he has experienced in his own single person? What was it, O my God, that You accomplished then and how unsearchable is the abyss of Your judgments! For he was in a high fever and when he had for a long time lain unconscious in a deathly sweat so that his life was despaired of, he was baptized.[28] Naturally he knew nothing of it, and I paid little heed, since I took for granted that his mind would retain what he had learned from me and not what was done upon his body while he was unconscious. But it turned out very differently. The fever left him and he recovered. As soon as I could speak to him—which was as soon as he could speak to me, for I had not left him and indeed we depended too much upon each other—I began to mock, assuming that he would join me in mocking, the baptism which he had received when he had neither sense nor feeling. For by now he had been told of it. But he looked at me as if I had been his deadly enemy, and in a burst of independence that startled me warned me that if I wished to continue his friend I must cease that kind of talk. I was stupefied and deeply perturbed. I postponed telling him of my feelings until he should be well again, and thus in such condition of health and strength that I could discuss what was in my mind. But he was snatched from the reach of my folly, that he might be safe with You for my future consolation. Within a few days he relapsed into his fever and died. And I was not there.

26. The liaison referred to in this passage resulted in the birth of a son, Adeodatus, who later accompanied Augustine to Italy.

27. Augustine's mother, Monica, was a Christian, and lamented her son's Manichaean beliefs.

My heart was black with grief. Whatever I looked upon had the air of death. My native place was a prison-house and my home a strange unhappiness. The things we had done together became sheer torment without him. My eyes were restless looking for him, but he was not there. I hated all places because he was not in them. They could not say "He will come soon," as they would in his life when he was absent. I became a great enigma to myself and I was forever asking my soul why it was sad and why it disquieted me so sorely. And my soul knew not what to answer me. If I said "Trust in God" my soul did not obey—naturally, because the man whom she had loved and lost was nobler and more real than the imagined deity in whom I was bidding her trust. I had no delight but in tears, for tears had taken the place my friend had held in the love of my heart.

* * *

[Professor at Milan]

Book V

. . . It was by Your action upon me that I was moved to go to Rome and teach there what I had taught in Carthage. How I was persuaded to this, I shall not omit to confess to You, because therein Your most profound depths and Your mercy ever present towards us are to be meditated upon and uttered forth. My reason for going to Rome was not the greater earnings and higher dignity

28. As a Christian; the Manichees did not use this rite.

promised by the friends who urged me to go—though at that time, these considerations certainly influenced my mind: the principal and practically conclusive reason, was that I had heard that youths there pursued their studies more quietly and were kept within a stricter limit of discipline. For instance, they were not allowed to come rushing insolently and at will into the school of one who was not their own master, nor indeed to enter it at all unless he permitted.

At Carthage the licence of the students is gross and beyond all measure. They break in impudently and like a pack of madmen play havoc with the order which the master has established for the good of his pupils. They commit many outrages, extraordinarily stupid acts, deserving the punishment of the law if custom did not protect them. Their state is the more hopeless because what they do is supposed to be sanctioned, though by Your eternal law it could never be sanctioned; and they think they do these things unpunished, when the very blindness in which they do them is their punishment, so that they suffer things incomparably worse than they do. When I was a student I would not have such habits in myself, but when I became a teacher I had to endure them in others; and so I decided to go to a place where, as I had been told by all who knew, such things were not done. But You, O my Hope and my Portion[29] in the land of the living, forced me to change countries for my soul's salvation: You pricked me with such goads at Carthage as drove me out of it, and You set before me certain attractions by which I might be drawn to Rome—in either case using men who loved this life of death, one set doing lunatic things, the other promising vain things: and to reform my ways You secretly used their perversity and my own. For those who had disturbed my peace were blind in the frenzy of their viciousness, and those who urged me to go elsewhere savored of earth. While I, detesting my real misery in the one place, hoped for an unreal happiness in the other.

Why I left the one country and went to the other, You Knew, O God, but You did not tell either me or my mother. She indeed was in dreadful grief at my going and followed me right to the seacoast. There she clung to me passionately, determined that I should either go back home with her or take her to Rome with me, but I deceived her with the pretence that I had a friend whom I did not want to leave until he had sailed off with a fair wind. Thus I lied to my mother, and such a mother; and so got away from her. But this also You have mercifully forgiven me, bringing me from the waters of that sea, filled as I was with execrable uncleanness, unto the water of Your grace; so that when I was washed clean, the floods that poured from my mother's eyes, the tears with which 29. Inheritance.

daily she watered the ground towards which she bent her face in prayer for me, should cease to flow. She would not return home without me, but I managed with some difficulty to persuade her to spend the night in a place near the ship where there was an oratory in memory of St. Cyprian.[30] That night I stole away without her: she remained praying and weeping. And what was she praying for, O my God, with all those tears but that You should not allow me to sail! But You saw deeper and granted the essential of her prayer; You did not do what she was at that moment asking, that You might do the thing she was always asking. The wind blew and filled our sails and the shore dropped from our sight. And the next morning she was frantic with grief and filled Your ears with her moaning and complaints because You seemed to treat her tears so lightly, when in fact You were using my own desires to snatch me away for the healing of those desires, and were justly punishing her own too earthly affection for me with the scourge of grief. For she loved to have me with her, as is the way of mothers but far more than most mothers; and she did not realize what joys you would bring her from my going away. She did not realize it, and so she wept and lamented, and by the torments she suffered showed the heritage of Eve[31] in her, seeking with sorrow what in sorrow she had brought forth. But when she had poured out all her accusation at my cruel deception, she turned once more to prayer to You for me. She went home and I to Rome.

* * *

[In Rome Augustine fell sick and was nursed back to health in the house of a Manichee. He continued to associate with members of this sect.]

All the same because I despaired of finding any profit in that false doctine,[32] I began to hold slackly and carelessly even the ideas with which I had decided to rest content while I could find nothing better.

The notion began to grow in me that the philosophers whom they call Academics[33] were wiser than the rest, because they held that everything should be treated as matter of doubt and affirmed that no truth can be understood by men. For so it seemed clear to me that they thought—and so they are commonly held to teach—though I did not yet understand their real meaning.[34] And I did

30. Chapel in memory of the Bishop of Carthage, who had been beheaded during a persecution of the Christians in 258 A.D.

31. In consequence of her temptation of Adam to eat the forbidden fruit: "In sorrow [pain] thou shalt bring forth children." [Genesis 3:16, p. 51.]

32. The doctrine of the Manichees.

33. Members of a Greek philosophical school which questioned the validity of all belief. Augustine probably became acquainted with their position through Cicero's work on the subject.

34. Augustine then thought the Academic position more simple than it was; it is still a matter of controversy how far they carried their skeptical attitude.

not neglect to dissuade my host from the excessive confidence that I saw he had in the fables with which the books of Manes are packed.[35] All the same I was much more in their company than in the company of others who were not of their heresy. I did not defend it with my earlier keenness, yet the friendship of these men, of whom Rome shelters a great number, made me slower to seek any other: especially since I had no hope of being able to find the truth in Your church, O Lord of heaven and earth, Creator of all things visible and invisible.

* * *

I began diligently to set about that for which I had come to Rome, namely the teaching of Rhetoric. First I gathered some few at my home, and by them I began to become known. And then I learned that Rome had its drawbacks which I had not had to suffer in Africa. For it is true the riotous incursions of blackguardly youngsters did not happen here: but, so I was warned, "at a given moment a number of students plan together to cheat their master of his fees, and go off to some other master; for they are utterly faithless and hold justice cheap, compared with love of money."

* * *

When therefore a message from Milan[36] came to Rome, to the prefect,[37] asking for a professor of Rhetoric for that city and arranging for public funds to cover his journey, I applied for the post with support from men far gone in the follies of the Manichees—the purpose of my journey being to be quit of them, though neither they nor I realized it. The perfect Symmachus approved of a public oration I delivered for the occasion, and sent me. So I came to Milan, to the bishop and devout servant of God, Ambrose,[38] famed among the best men of the whole world, whose eloquence did then most powerfully minister to Thy people the fatness of Thy wine.[39] All unknowing I was brought by God to him, that knowing I should be brought by him to God. That man of God received me as a father, and as bishop welcomed my coming. I came to love him, not at first as a teacher of the truth, which I had utterly despaired of finding in Your church, but for his kindness toward me. I attended carefully when he preached to the people, not with the right intention, but only to judge whether his eloquence was equal to his fame or whether it flowed higher or lower than had

35. The man in whose house Augustine was living was a member of the Manichaean community in Rome.

36. A city in the north of Italy, which because it was nearer to the frontiers was growing in importance and was soon to replace Rome as the capital, in practice, of the Western Empire.

37. The chief magistrate of the city.

38. The leading personality among the Christians of the West. Not many years after this he defied the power of the emperor Theodosius, and forced him to beg for God's pardon in the church at Milan for having put the inhabitants of Thessalonica to the sword.

39. Images of spiritual nourishment.

been told me. His words I listened to with the greatest care; his matter I held quite unworthy of attention. I enjoyed the charm of his speaking, though for all his learning it was not so pleasing and captivating as that of Faustus.[40] I refer of course only to the actual speaking: for the rest there was no comparison at all. Faustus was simply straying about among the fallacies of the Manichees, Ambrose taught the doctrine of salvation most profitably. But salvation is far from sinners, of the sort that I then was. Yet little by little I was drawing closer, though I did not yet realize it.

Thus I did not take great heed to learn what he was saying but only to hear how he said it: that empty interest was all I now had since I despaired of man's finding the way to You. Yet along with the words, which I admired, there also came into my mind the subject matter, to which I attached no importance. I could not separate them. And while I was opening my heart to learn how eloquently he spoke, I came to feel, though only gradually, how truly he spoke. First I began to realize that there was a case for the things themselves, and I began to see that the Catholic faith, for which I had thought nothing could be said in the face of the Manichean objections, could be maintained on reasonable grounds: this especially after I had heard explained figuratively several passages of the Old Testament which had been a cause of death for me when taken literally.[41] Many passages of these books were expounded in a spiritual sense and I came to blame my own hopeless folly in believing that the law and the prophets could not stand against those who hated and mocked at them. I did not yet feel that the Catholic way was to be followed, merely because it might have some learned men to maintain it and answer objections adequately and not absurdly; nor did I think that what I had so far held was to be condemned because both views were equally defensible. In fact the Catholic side was clearly not vanquished, yet it was not clearly victorious. I then bent my mind to see if I could by any clear proofs convict the Manicheans of error. If only I had been able to conceive of a substance that was spiritual, all their strong points would have been broken down and cast forth from my mind. But I could not.[42]

Concerning the body of this world, and the whole of that nature which our bodily senses can attain to, I thought again and again and made many comparisons; and I still judged that the views of so many of the philosophers were more probable. So in what I thought to be the manner of the Academics—that is to say, doubting of all

40. A Manichaean teacher Augustine had known in Carthage; not the legendary Dr. Faust.

41. Ambrose was famous for his allegorical explanations of difficult passages in the Scriptures.

42. One of the Manichaean criticisms of Christian doctrine which Augustine so far found impossible to answer was their objection to the concept of an infinite god who took on a corporeal nature.

things and wavering between one and another—I decided that I must leave the Manichees; for in that time of doubt, I did not think I could remain in a sect to which I now preferred certain of the philosophers. Yet I absolutely refused to entrust the care of my sick soul to the philosophers, because they were without the saving name of Christ. I determined, then, to go on as a catechumen[43] in the Catholic Church—the church of my parents—and to remain in that state until some certain light should appear by which I might steer my course.

* * *

[Worldly Ambitions]

Book VI

By this time my mother had come to me, following me over sea and land with the courage of piety and relying upon You in all perils. For they were in danger from a storm, and she reassured even the sailors—by whom travelers newly ventured upon the deep are ordinarily reassured—promising them safe arrival because thus You had promised her in a vision. She found me in a perilous state through my deep despair of ever discovering the truth. But even when I told her that if I was not yet a Catholic Christian, I was no longer a Manichean, she was not greatly exultant as at some unlooked-for good news, because she had already received assurance upon that part of my misery; she bewailed me as one dead certainly, but certainly to be raised again by You, offering me in her mind as one stretched out dead, that You might say to the widow's son: "Young man, I say to thee arise":[44] and he should sit up and begin to speak and You should give him to his mother.

* * *

Nor did I then groan in prayer for Your help. My mind was intent upon inquiry and unquiet for argumentation. I regarded Ambrose as a lucky man by worldly standards to be held in honor by such important people: only his celibacy seemed to me a heavy burden. I had no means of guessing, and no experience of my own to learn from, what hope he bore within him, what struggles he might have against the temptations that went with his high place, what was his consolation in adversity, and on what joys of Your bread the hidden mouth of his heart fed. Nor did he know how I was inflamed nor the depth of my peril. I could not ask of him what I wished as I wished, for I was kept from any face to face conversation with him by the throng of men with their own troubles, whose infirmities he served. The very little time he was not with

43. One who is preparing himself for baptism.

44. Luke: 7:14, recounting one of Christ's miracles.

these he was refreshing either his body with necessary food or his mind with reading. When he read, his eyes traveled across the page and his heart sought into the sense, but voice and tongue were silent. No one was forbidden to approach him nor was it his custom to require that visitors should be announced: but when we came into him we often saw him reading and always to himself; and after we had sat long in silence, unwilling to interrupt a work on which he was so intent, we would depart again. We guessed that in the small time he could find for the refreshment of his mind, he would wish to be free from the distraction of other men's affairs and not called away from what he was doing. Perhaps he was on his guard lest [if he read aloud] someone listening should be troubled and want an explanation if the author he was reading expressed some idea over-obscurely, and it might be necessary to expound or discuss some of the more difficult questions. And if he had to spend time on this, he would get through less reading than he wished. Or it may be that his real reason for reading to himself was to preserve his voice, which did in fact readily grow tired. But whatever his reason for doing it, that man certainly had a good reason.

* * *

I was all hot for honors, money, marriage: and You made mock of my hotness. In my pursuit of these, I suffered most bitter disappointments, but in this You were good to me since I was thus prevented from taking delight in anything not Yourself. Look now into my heart, Lord, by whose will I remember all this and confess it to You. Let my soul cleave to You now that You have freed it from the tenacious hold of death. At that time my soul was in misery, and You pricked the soreness of its wound, that leaving all things it might turn to You, who are over all and without whom all would return to nothing, that it might turn to You and be healed. I was in utter misery and there was one day especially on which You acted to bring home to me the realization of my misery. I was preparing an oration in praise of the Emperor[45] in which I was to utter any number of lies to win the applause of people who knew they were lies. My heart was much wrought upon by the shame of this and inflamed with the fever of the thoughts that consumed it. I was passing along a certain street in Milan when I noticed a beggar. He was jesting and laughing and I imagine more than a little drunk. I fell into gloom and spoke to the friends who were with me about the endless sorrows that our own insanity brings us: for here was I striving away, dragging the load of my unhappiness under the spurring of my desires, and making it worse by dragging it: and with all our striving, our one aim was to arrive at some sort of happiness without care: the beggar had reached the same goal before us, and we might quite well never reach it at all. The very thing that he had attained by means of a few pennies begged from passers-by—namely the pleasure of a temporary happiness—I was plotting for with so many a weary twist and turn.

45. Probably the young Valentinian, whose court was at Milan.

Certainly his joy was no true joy; but the joy I sought in my ambition was emptier still. In any event he was cheerful and I worried, he had no cares and I nothing but cares. Now if anyone had asked me whether I would rather be cheerful or fearful, I would answer: "Cheerful"; but if he had gone on to ask whether I would rather be like that beggar or as I actually was, I would certainly have chosen my own state though so troubled and anxious. Now this was surely absurd. It could not be for any true reason. I ought not to have preferred my own state rather than his merely because I was the more learned, since I got no joy from my learning, but sought only to please men by it—not even to teach them, only to please them. Therefore did You break my bones with the rod of Your discipline.

* * *

Great effort was made to get me married. I proposed, the girl was promised me. My mother played a great part in the matter for she wanted to have me married and then cleansed with the saving waters of baptism,[46] rejoicing to see me grow every day more fitted for baptism and feeling that her prayers and Your promises were to be fulfilled in my faith. By my request and her own desire she begged You daily with the uttermost intensity of her heart to show her in a vision something of my future marriage, but You would never do it. She did indeed see certain vain fantasies, under the pressure of her mind's preoccupation with the matter; and she told them to me, not, however, with the confidence she always had when You had shown things to her, but as if she set small store by them; for she said that there was a certain unanalyzable savor, not to be expressed in words, by which she could distinguish between what You revealed and the dreams of her own spirit. Still she pushed on with the matter of my marriage, and the girl was asked for. She was still two years short of the age for marriage[47] but I liked her and agreed to wait.

There was a group of us friends who had much serious discussion together, concerning the cares and troubles of human life which we found so hard to endure. We had almost decided to seek a life of peace, away from the throng of men. This peace we hoped to attain by putting together whatever we could manage to get, and making one common household for all of us: so that in the clear trust of friendship, things should not belong to this or that individual, but one thing should be made of all our possessions, and belong wholly

46. He could not be baptized while living in sin with his mistress.

47. The legal age was twelve years. Augustus himself was in his early thirties.

to each one of us, and everybody own everything. It seemed that there might be perhaps ten men in this fellowship. Among us there were some very rich men, especially Romanianus, our fellow townsman, who had been a close friend of mine from childhood and had been brought to the court in Milan by the press of some very urgent business. He was strongest of all for the idea and he had considerable influence in persuasion because his wealth was much greater than anyone else's. We agreed that two officers should be chosen every year to handle the details of our life together, leaving the rest undisturbed. But then we began to wonder whether our wives would agree, for some of us already had wives and I meant to have one. So the whole plan, which we had built up so neatly, fell to pieces in our hands and was simply dropped. We returned to our old sighing and groaning and treading of this world's broad and beaten ways:[48] for many thoughts were in our hearts, but Thy counsel standeth forever. And out of Thy counsel didst Thou deride ours and didst prepare Thine own things for us, meaning to give us meat in due season and to open Thy hands and fill our souls with Thy blessing.

Meanwhile my sins were multiplied. She with whom I had lived so long was torn from my side as a hindrance to my forthcoming marriage. My heart which had held her very dear was broken and wounded and shed blood. She went back to Africa, swearing that she would never know another man, and left with me the natural son I had had of her. But I in my unhappiness could not, for all my manhood, imitate her resolve. I was unable to bear the delay of two years which must pass before I was to get the girl I had asked for in marriage. In fact it was not really marriage that I wanted. I was simply a slave to lust. So I took another woman, not of course as a wife; and thus my soul's disease was nourished and kept alive as vigorously as ever, indeed worse than ever, that it might reach the realm of matrimony in the company of its ancient habit. Nor was the wound healed that had been made by the cutting off of my former mistress. For there was first burning and bitter grief; and after that it festered, and as the pain grew duller it only grew more hopeless.

* * *

[Conversion]

Book VIII

* * *

Thus I was sick at heart and in torment, accusing myself with a new intensity of bitterness, twisting and turning in my chain in the hope that it might be utterly broken, for what held me was so small a thing! But it still held me. And You stood in the secret places of my soul, O Lord, in the harshness of Your mercy redoubling the scourges of fear and shame lest I should give way again and that small slight tie which remained should not be broken but should grow again to full strength and bind me closer even than before. For I kept saying within myself: "Let it be now, let it be now," and by the mere words I had begun to move toward the resolution. I almost made it, yet I did not quite make it. But I did not fall back into my original state, but as it were stood near to get my breath. And I tried again and I was almost there, and now I could all but touch it and hold it: yet I was not quite there, I did not touch it or hold it. I still shrank from dying unto death and living unto life. The lower condition which had grown habitual was more powerful than the better condition which I had not tried. The nearer the point of time came in which I was to become different, the more it struck me with horror; but it did not force me utterly back nor turn me utterly away, but held me there between the two.

48. cf. Matthew 7:13: "Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction," that is, to damnation.

Those trifles of all trifles, and vanities of vanities, my one-time mistresses, held me back, plucking at my garment of flesh and murmuring softly: "Are you sending us away?" And "From this moment shall we not be with you, now or forever?" And "From this moment shall this or that not be allowed you, now or forever?" What were they suggesting to me in the phrase I have written "this or that," what were they suggesting to me, O my God? Do you in your mercy keep from the soul of Your servant the vileness and uncleanness they were suggesting. And now I began to hear them not half so loud; they no longer stood against me face to face, but were softly muttering behind my back and, as I tried to depart, plucking stealthily at me to make me look behind. Yet even that was enough, so hesitating was I, to keep me from snatching myself free, from shaking them off and leaping upwards on the way I was called: for the strong force of habit said to me: "Do you think you can live without them?"

But by this time its voice was growing fainter. In the direction toward which I had turned my face and was quivering in fear of going, I could see the austere beauty of Continence, serene and indeed joyous but not evilly, honorably soliciting me to come to her and not linger, stretching forth loving hands to receive and embrace me, hands full of multitudes of good examples. With her I saw such hosts of young men and maidens, a multitude of youth and of every age, gray widows and women grown old in virginity, and in them all Continence herself, not barren but the fruitful mother of children, her joys, by You, Lord, her Spouse. And she smiled upon me and her smile gave courage as if she were saying: "Can you not do what these men have done, what these women have done? Or could men or women have done such in themselves, and not in the youths—not students of Your law or Your peace but of lying follies and the conflicts of the law—should no longer buy at my mouth the tools of their madness. Fortunately it happened that there were only a few days left before the Vintage Vacation,[55] and I decided to endure them so that I might leave with due deliberation, seeing that I had been redeemed by You and was not going to put myself up for sale again. Our purpose therefore was known to You, but not to men other than our own friends. We had agreed among ourselves not to spread the news abroad at all, although, in our ascent from the valley of tears and our singing of the song of degrees, You had given us sharp arrows and burning coals against cunning tongues that might argue against us with pretended care for our interest, might destroy us saying that they loved us: as men consume food saying that they love it.

* * *

Furthermore that very summer, under the too heavy labor of teaching, my lungs had begun to give way and I breathed with difficulty,[56] the pain in my breast showed that they were affected and they no longer let me talk with any strength for too long at a time. At first this had disturbed me, because it made it practically a matter of necessity that I should lay down the burden of teaching, or at least give it up for the time if I was to be cured and grow well again. But when the full purpose of giving myself leisure to meditate on how You are the Lord arose in me and became a settled resolve—as you know, O my God—I actually found myself glad to have this perfectly truthful excuse to offer parents who might be offended and for their children's sake would never willingly have let me give up teaching. So I was full of joy, and I put up with the space of time that still had to run—I fancy it was about twenty days. But to bear the time took considerable fortitude. Desire for money, which formerly had helped me to bear the heavy labor of teaching, was quite gone; so that I should have [had nothing to help me bear it and so] found it altogether crushing if patience had not taken the place of covetousness. Some of Your servants, my brethren, may think that I sinned in this, since having enrolled with all my heart in Your service, I allowed myself to sit for so much as an hour in the chair of untruthfulness. It may be so. But, most merciful Lord, have You not pardoned and remitted this sin, along with others most horrible and deadly, in the holy water of baptism?

* * *

And now the day was come on which I was to be set free from the teaching of Rhetoric in fact, as I was already free in mind. And so it came about. You delivered my tongue as You had already delivered my heart, and I rejoiced and praised You, and so went off with my friends to the country-house.[57] The amount of writing I did there—the writing was now in your service but during this breathing-space still smacked of the school of pride—my books[58] exist to witness, with the record they give of discussions either with my friends there present or with Yourself when I was alone with You; and there are my letters to show what correspondence I had with Nebridius[59] while he was away.

55. This grape-harvesting and wine-making holiday lasted from the end of August to the middle of October.

56. Since he not only lectured but also read aloud, as is suggested by his comments on Ambrose's silent reading (Book VI).

* * *

When the Vintage Vacation was over I gave the people of Milan notice that they must find someone else to sell the art of words to their students, because I had chosen to serve You, and because owing to my difficulty in breathing and the pain in my lungs I could not continue my teaching. And in a letter I told Your bishop, the holy Ambrose, of my past errors and my present purpose, that he might advise me which of Your Scriptures I should especially read to prepare me and make me more fit to receive so great a grace. He told me to read Isaias the prophet, I imagine because he more clearly foretells the gospel and the calling of the gentiles[60] than the other Old Testament writers; but I did not understand the first part of his book, and thinking that it would be all of the same kind, put it aside meaning to return to it when I should be more practised in the Lord's way of speech.

When the time had come to give in my name for baptism, we left the country and returned to Milan. Alypius had decided to be born again in You at the same time, for he was already endowed with the humility that Your sacraments require, and had brought his body so powerfully under control that he could tread the icy soil of Italy with bare feet, which required unusual fortitude. We also took with us the boy Adeodatus, carnally begotten by me in my sin. You had made him well. He was barely fifteen, yet he was more intelligent than many a grave and learned man. In this I am but acknowledging to You Your own gifts, O Lord my God, Creator of all and powerful to reshape our shapelessness: for I had no part in that boy but the sin. That he had been brought up by us in Your way was because You had inspired us, no other. I do but acknowledge to You Your own gifts. There is a book of mine called De

57. At Cassiciacum, in the country, placed at his disposal by a friend.

58. While at Cassiciacum, Augustine wrote a book attacking the Academic philosophers, a book on the happy life, and another entitled De ordine, a treatise on divine providence.

59. Nebridius came from Carthage to Milan with Augustine, shared his spiritual pilgrimage through the pagan philosophies and Manichean doctrines to become a Christian, and returned to Africa where he died. Augustine's letters to Nebridius are still extant.

60. The appeal of Christ's apostles to peoples outside the Hebrew nation: "I am sought of them that asked not for me: I am found of them that sought me not." [Isaiah 65.1 ff.]

youths—not students of Your law or Your peace but of lying follies and the conflicts of the law—should no longer buy at my mouth the tools of their madness. Fortunately it happened that there were only a few days left before the Vintage Vacation,[55] and I decided to endure them so that I might leave with due deliberation, seeing that I had been redeemed by You and was not going to put myself up for sale again. Our purpose therefore was known to You, but not to men other than our own friends. We had agreed among ourselves not to spread the news abroad at all, although, in our ascent from the valley of tears and our singing of the song of degrees, You had given us sharp arrows and burning coals against cunning tongues that might argue against us with pretended care for our interest, might destroy us saying that they loved us: as men consume food saying that they love it.

* * *

Furthermore that very summer, under the too heavy labor of teaching, my lungs had begun to give way and I breathed with difficulty,[56] the pain in my breast showed that they were affected and they no longer let me talk with any strength for too long at a time. At first this had disturbed me, because it made it practically a matter of necessity that I should lay down the burden of teaching, or at least give it up for the time if I was to be cured and grow well again. But when the full purpose of giving myself leisure to meditate on how You are the Lord arose in me and became a settled resolve—as you know, O my God—I actually found myself glad to have this perfectly truthful excuse to offer parents who might be offended and for their children's sake would never willingly have let me give up teaching. So I was full of joy, and I put up with the space of time that still had to run—I fancy it was about twenty days. But to bear the time took considerable fortitude. Desire for money, which formerly had helped me to bear the heavy labor of teaching, was quite gone; so that I should have [had nothing to help me bear it and so] found it altogether crushing if patience had not taken the place of covetousness. Some of Your servants, my brethren, may think that I sinned in this, since having enrolled with all my heart in Your service, I allowed myself to sit for so much as an hour in the chair of untruthfulness. It may be so. But, most merciful Lord, have You not pardoned and remitted this sin, along with others most horrible and deadly, in the holy water of baptism?

* * *

And now the day was come on which I was to be set free from the teaching of Rhetoric in fact, as I was already free in mind. And so it came about. You delivered my tongue as You had already delivered my heart, and I rejoiced and praised You, and so went off with my friends to the country-house.[57] The amount of writing I did there—the writing was now in your service but during this breathing-space still smacked of the school of pride—my books[58] exist to witness, with the record they give of discussions either with my friends there present or with Yourself when I was alone with You; and there are my letters to show what correspondence I had with Nebridius[59] while he was away.

55. This grape-harvesting and wine-making holiday lasted from the end of August to the middle of October.

56. Since he not only lectured but also read aloud, as is suggested by his comments on Ambrose's silent reading (Book VI).

* * *

When the Vintage Vacation was over I gave the people of Milan notice that they must find someone else to sell the art of words to their students, because I had chosen to serve You, and because owing to my difficulty in breathing and the pain in my lungs I could not continue my teaching. And in a letter I told Your bishop, the holy Ambrose, of my past errors and my present purpose, that he might advise me which of Your Scriptures I should especially read to prepare me and make me more fit to receive so great a grace. He told me to read Isaias the prophet, I imagine because he more clearly foretells the gospel and the calling of the gentiles[60] than the other Old Testament writers; but I did not understand the first part of his book, and thinking that it would be all of the same kind, put it aside meaning to return to it when I should be more practised in the Lord's way of speech.

When the time had come to give in my name for baptism, we left the country and returned to Milan. Alypius had decided to be born again in You at the same time, for he was already endowed with the humility that Your sacraments require, and had brought his body so powerfully under control that he could tread the icy soil of Italy with bare feet, which required unusual fortitude. We also took with us the boy Adeodatus, carnally begotten by me in my sin. You had made him well. He was barely fifteen, yet he was more intelligent than many a grave and learned man. In this I am but acknowledging to You Your own gifts, O Lord my God, Creator of all and powerful to reshape our shapelessness: for I had no part in that boy but the sin. That he had been brought up by us in Your way was because You had inspired us, no other. I do but acknowledge to You Your own gifts. There is a book of mine called De

57. At Cassiciacum, in the country, placed at his disposal by a friend.

58. While at Cassiciacum, Augustine wrote a book attacking the Academic philosophers, a book on the happy life, and another entitled De ordine, a treatise on divine providence.

59. Nebridius came from Carthage to Milan with Augustine, shared his spiritual pilgrimage through the pagan philosophies and Manichean doctrines to become a Christian, and returned to Africa where he died. Augustine's letters to Nebridius are still extant.

60. The appeal of Christ's apostles to peoples outside the Hebrew nation: "I am sought of them that asked not for me: I am found of them that sought me not." [Isaiah 65.1 ff.]

Magistro:[61] it is a dialogue between him and me. You know, O God, that all the ideas which are put into the mouth of the other party to the dialogue were truly his, though he was but sixteen. I had experience of many other remarkable qualities in him. His great intelligence filled me with a kind of awe: and who but You could be the maker of things so wonderful? But You took him early from this earth, and I think of him utterly without anxiety, for there is nothing in his boyhood or youth or anywhere in him to cause me to fear. We took him along with us, the same age as ourselves in Your grace, to be brought up in Your discipline: and we were baptized, and all anxiety as to our past life fled away. The days were not long enough as I meditated, and found wonderful delight in meditating, upon the depth of Your design for the salvation of the human race. I wept at the beauty of Your hymns and canticles, and was powerfully moved at the sweet sound of Your Church's singing. Those sounds flowed into my ears, and the truth streamed into my heart: so that my feeling of devotion overflowed, and the tears ran from my eyes, and I was happy in them.

It was only a little while before that the church of Milan had begun to practice this kind of consolation and exultation, to the great joy of the brethen singing together with heart and voice. For it was only about a year, or not much more, since Justina, the mother of the boy emperor Valentinian, was persecuting Your servant Ambrose in the interests of her own heresy: for she had been seduced by the Arians.[62] The devoted people had stayed day and night in the church, ready to die with their bishop, Your servant. And my mother, Your handmaid, bearing a great part of the trouble and vigil, had lived in prayer. I also, though still not warmed by the fire of Your Spirit, was stirred to excitement by the disturbed and wrought-up state of the city. It was at this time that the practice was instituted of singing hymns and psalms after the manner of the Eastern churches,[63] to keep the people from being altogether worn out with anxiety and want of sleep. The custom has been retained from that day to this, and has been imitated by many, indeed in almost all congregations throughout the world.

At this time You revealed to Your bishop Ambrose in a vision the place where the bodies of the martyrs Protasius and Gervasius

61. The Teacher, written at Tagaste in Africa two years after Augustine's baptism and shortly after his return from Italy. The subject is teaching and the thesis that only God is the cause for man's acquisition of learning and truth.

62. Members of a heretical sect who followed the doctrine of Arius (A.D. 250?–336) that the Son had not existed from all eternity and was therefore inferior to the Father. At the Council of Nicaea (A.D. 325) Arius and his followers were declared heretical, but the Arian heresy remained a serious problem for the Church for many years. Justina demanded that Ambrose allow the Arians to hold public services inside the walls of Milan.

63. The Greek-speaking churches of the Eastern half of the empire. They split off from the Catholic Church in the ninth century.

lay hid, which You had for so many years kept incorrupt in the treasury of Your secret knowledge that You might bring them forth at the proper moment to check a woman's fury—the woman being the ruler of the Empire![64] For when they were discovered and dug up and with due honor brought to Ambrose's basilica,[65] not only were people cured who had been tormented by evil spirits—and the devils themselves forced to confess it—but also there was a man, a citizen well known to the city, who had been blind for many years: he asked what was the cause of the tumultuous joy of the people, and when he heard, he sprang up and asked his guide to lead him into the place. When he arrived there he asked to be allowed to touch with his handkerchief the place on which lay the saints, whose death is precious in Your sight. He did so, put the handkerchief to his eyes, and immediately they were opened. The news spread abroad, Your praises glowed and shone, and if the mind of that angry woman[66] was not brought to the sanity of belief, it was at least brought back from the madness of persecution. Thanks be to my God! From what and towards what have You led my memory, that it should confess to You these great things which I had altogether forgotten? Yet even then, when the odor of Thy ointments was so sweet smelling, I did not run after Thee: and for this I wept all the more now when I heard Your hymns and canticles, as one who had then sighed for You and now breathed in You, breathed so far as the air allows in this our house of grass.[67]

You, Lord, who make men of one mind to dwell in one house brought to our company a young man of our own town, Evodius. He had held office in the civil service, had been converted and baptized before us, had resigned from the state's service, and given himself to Yours. We kept together, meaning to live together in our devout purpose. We thought deeply as to the place in which we might serve You must usefully. As a result we started back for Africa. And when we had come as far as Ostia[68] on the Tiber, my mother died. I pass over many things, for I must make haste. Do You, O my God, accept my confessions and my gratitude for countless things of which I say nothing. But I will not omit anything my mind brings forth concerning her, Your servant, who brought me forth—brought me forth in the flesh to this temporal light, and in her heart to light eternal. Not of her gifts do I speak but of Your gifts in her. For she did not bring herself into the world or educate herself in the world: it was You who created her, nor did her father

64. Justina.
65. Church.
66. Justina.
67. "All flesh is grass. . . . The grass withers, the flower fades, but the word of our God will stand forever." [Isaiah 40:6–8.]
68. A port on the southwest coast of Italy; it was the port of Rome and the point of departure for Africa.

or mother know what kind of being was to come forth from them. It was the scepter of Your Christ, the discipline of your Only-Begotten, that brought her up in holy fear, in a Catholic family which was a worthy member of Your church. Yet it was not the devotion of her mother in her upbringing that she talked most of, but of a certain aged servant, who had indeed carried my mother's father on her back when he was a baby, as little ones are accustomed to be carried on the backs of older girls. Because of this, because also of her age and her admirable character, she was very much respected by her master and mistress in their Christian household. As a result she was given charge of her master's daughters. This charge she fulfilled most conscientiously, checking them sharply when necessary with holy severity and teaching them soberly and prudently. Thus, except at the times when they ate—and that most temperately—at their parents' table, she would not let them even drink water, no matter how tormenting their thirst. By this she prevented the forming of a bad habit, and she used to remark very sensibly: "Now you drink water because you are not allowed to have wine: but when you are married, and thus mistresses of food-stores and wine-cellars, you will despise water, but the habit of drinking will still remain." By this kind of teaching and the authority of her commands she moderated the greediness that goes with childhood and brought the little girls' thirst to such a control that they no longer wanted what they ought not to have.

Yet, as Your servant told me, her son, there did steal upon my mother an inclination to wine. For when, in the usual way, she was sent by her parents, as a well-behaved child, to draw wine from the barrel, she would dip the cup in, but before pouring the wine from the cup into the flagon, she would sip a little with the very tip of her lips, only a little because she did not yet like the taste sufficiently to take more. Indeed she did it not out of any craving for wine, but rather from the excess of childhood's high spirits, which tend to boil over in absurdities, and are usually kept in check by the authority of elders. And so, adding to that daily drop a little more from day to day—for he that despises small things, falls little by little—she fell into the habit, so that she would drink off greedily cups almost full of wine. Where then was that wise old woman with her forceful prohibitions? Could anything avail against the evil in us, unless Your healing, O Lord, watched over us? When our father and mother and nurses are absent, You are present, who created us, who call us, who can use those placed over us for some good unto the salvation of our souls. What did You do then, O my God? How did You cure her, and bring her to health? From another soul you drew a harsh and cutting sarcasm, as though bringing forth a surgeon's knife from Your secret store, and with one blow amputated that sore place. A maidservant with whom she was accustomed to go to the cellar, one day fell into a quarrel with her small mistress when no one else chanced to be about, and hurled at her the most biting insult possible, calling her a drunkard. My mother was pierced to the quick, saw her fault in its true wickedness, and instantly condemned it and gave it up. Just as the flattery of a friend can pervert, so the insult of an enemy can sometimes correct. Nor do You, O God, reward men according to what You do by means of them, but according to what they themselves intended. For the girl being in a temper wanted to enrage her young mistress, not to amend her, for she did it when no one else was there, either because the time and place happened to be thus when the quarrel arose, or because she was afraid that elders[69] would be angry because she had not told it sooner. But You, O Lord, Ruler of heavenly things and earthly, who turn to Your own purposes the very depths of rivers as they run and order the turbulence of the flow of time, did by the folly of one mind bring sanity to another; thus reminding us not to attribute it to our own power if another is amended by our word, even if we meant to amend him.

My mother, then, was modestly and soberly brought up, being rather made obedient to her parents by You than to You by her parents. When she reached the age for marriage, and was bestowed upon a husband, she served him as her lord. She used all her effort to win him to You, preaching You to him by her character, by which You made her beautiful to her husband, respected and loved by him and admirable in his sight. For she bore his acts of unfaithfulness quietly, and never had any jealous scene with her husband about them. She awaited Your mercy upon him, that he might grow chaste through faith in You. And as a matter of fact, though generous beyond measure, he had a very hot temper. But she knew that a woman must not resist a husband in anger, by deed or even by word. Only, when she saw him calm again and quiet, she would take the opportunity to give him an explanation of her actions, if it happened that he had been roused to anger unreasonably. The result was that whereas many matrons with much milder husbands carried the marks of blows to disfigure their faces, and would all get together to complain of the way their husbands behaved, my mother—talking lightly but meaning it seriously—advised them against their tongues: saying that from the day they heard the matrimonial contract read to them they should regard it as an instrument by which they became servants; and from that time they should be mindful of their condition and not set themselves up against their masters. And they often expressed amazement—for they knew how violent a husband she had to live with—that it had never been heard, and there was no mark to show, that Patricius[70] had beaten his wife or that there had been any family quarrel between them for so much as a single day. And when her friends asked her the reason, she taught them her rule, which was as I have just said. Those who followed it, found it good and thanked her; those who did not, went on being bullied and beaten.

69. Leaders of the church.

Her mother-in-law began by being angry with her because of the whispers of malicious servants. But my mother won her completely by the respect she showed, and her unfailing patience and mildness. She ended by going to her son, telling him of the tales the servants had bandied about to the destruction of peace in the family between herself and her daughter-in-law, and asking him to punish them for it. So he, out of obedience to his mother and in the interests of order in the household and peace among his womenfolk, had the servants beaten whose names he had been given, as she had asked when giving them. To which she added the promise that anyone must expect a similar reward from her own hands who should think to please her by speaking ill of her daughter-in-law. And as no one had the courage to do so, they lived together with the most notable degree of kindness and harmony.

This great gift also, O my God, my Mercy, You gave to Your good servant, in whose womb You created me, that she showed herself, wherever possible, a peacemaker between people quarreling and minds at discord. For swelling and undigested discord often belches forth bitter words when in the venom of intimate conversation with a present friend hatred at its rawest is breathed out upon an absent enemy. But when my mother heard bitter things said by each of the other, she never said anything to either about the other save what would help to reconcile them. This might seem a small virtue, if I had not had the sorrow of seeing for myself so many people who—as if by some horrible widespreading infection of sin—not only tell angry people the things their enemies said in anger, but even add things that were never said at all. Whereas, on the contrary, ordinary humanity would seem to require not merely that we refrain from exciting or increasing wrath among men by evil speaking, but that we study to extinguish wrath by kind speaking. Such a one was she: and You were the master who taught her most secretly in the school of her heart.

The upshot was that toward the very end of his life she won her husband to You; and once he was a Christian she no longer had to complain of the things she had had to bear with before he was a Christian. Further, she was a servant of Your servants. Such of them as knew her praised and honored and loved You, O God, in her; for they felt Your presence in her heart, showing itself in the fruit of her holy conversation. She had been the wife of one husband, had requited her parents, had governed her house piously, was well reported of for good works. She had brought up her children,[71] being in labor of them as often as she saw them swerving away from You. Finally of all of us Your servants, O Lord—since by Your gift You suffer us to speak—who before her death were living together[72] after receiving the grace of baptism, she took as much care as if she had been the mother of us all, and served us as if she had been the daughter of us all.

70. Augustine's father.

When the day was approaching on which she was to depart this life—a day that You knew though we did not—it came about, as I believe by Your secret arrangement, that she and I stood alone leaning in a window, which looked inwards to the garden within the house where we were staying, at Ostia on the Tiber; for there we were away from everybody, resting for the sea voyage from the weariness of our long journey by land. There we talked together, she and I alone, in deep joy; and forgetting the things that were behind and looking forward to those that were before, we were discussing in the presence of Truth, which You are, what the eternal life of the saints could be like, which eye has not seen nor ear heard, nor has it entered into the heart of man. But with the mouth of our heart we panted for the high waters of Your fountain, the fountain of the life which is with You: that being sprinkled from that fountain according to our capacity, we might in some sense meditate upon so great a matter.

And our conversation had brought us to this point, that any pleasure whatsoever of the bodily senses, in any brightness whatsoever of corporeal light, seemed to us not worthy of comparison with the pleasure of that eternal Light, not worthy even of mention. Rising as our love flamed upward towards that Selfsame,[73] we passed in review the various levels of bodily things, up to the heavens themselves, whence sun and moon and stars shine upon this earth. And higher still we soared, thinking in our minds and speaking and marveling at Your works: and so we came to our own souls, and went beyond them to come at last to that region of richness unending, where You feed Israel forever with the food of truth: and there life is that Wisdom by which all things are made, both the things that have been and the things that are yet to be. But this Wisdom itself is not made: it is as it has ever been, and so it shall be forever: indeed "has ever been" and "shall be forever" have no place in it, but it simply is, for it is eternal: whereas "to have been" and "to be going to be" are not eternal. And while we were thus

71. Augustine is quoting Paul's description of the duties of a widow. [I Timothy 5.]

72. Augustine and his fellow converts.

73. Reality, the divine principle. This ecstasy of Augustine and Monica is throughout described in philosophical terms, in which God is Wisdom.

talking of His Wisdom and panting for it, with all the effort of our heart we did for one instant attain to touch it; then sighing, and leaving the first fruits of our spirit bound to it, we returned to the sound of our own tongue, in which a word has both beginning and ending. For what is like to your Word, Our Lord, who abides in Himself forever, yet grows not old and makes all things new!

So we said: If to any man the tumult of the flesh grew silent, silent the images of earth and sea and air: and if the heavens grew silent, and the very soul grew silent to herself and by not thinking of self mounted beyond self: if all dreams and imagined visions grew silent, and every tongue and every sign and whatsoever is transient—for indeed if any man could hear them, he should hear them saying with one voice: We did not make ourselves, but He made us who abides forever: but if, having uttered this and so set us to listening to Him who made them, they all grew silent, and in their silence He alone spoke to us, not by them but by Himself: so that we should hear His word, not by any tongue of flesh nor the voice of an angel nor the sound of thunder nor in the darkness of a parable,[74] but that we should hear Himself whom in all these things we love, should hear Himself and not them: just as we two had but now reached forth and in a flash of the mind attained to touch the eternal Wisdom which abides over all: and if this could continue, and all other visions so different be quite taken away, and this one should so ravish and absorb and wrap the beholder in inward joys that his life should eternally be such as that one moment of understanding for which we had been sighing—would not this be: Enter Thou into the joy of Thy Lord? But when shall it be? Shall it be when we shall all rise again and shall not all be changed?[75]

Such thoughts I uttered, though not in that order or in those actual words; but You know, O Lord, that on that day when we talked of these things the world with all its delights seemed cheap to us in comparison with what we talked of. And my mother said: "Son, for my own part I no longer find joy in anything in this world. What I am still to do here and why I am here I know not, now that I no longer hope for anything from this world. One thing there was, for which I desired to remain still a little longer in this life, that I should see you a Catholic Christian before I died. This God has granted me in superabundance, in that I now see you His servant to the contempt of all worldly happiness. What then am I doing here?"

74. Alludes to Luke 8:10: "To you [the disciples of Jesus] it has been given to know the secrets of the kingdom of God; but for others they are in parables, so that seeing they may not see, and hearing they may not understand."

75. Refers to the Last Judgment, when "the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed." [I Corinthians 15:52.]

What answer I made, I do not clearly remember; within five days or not much longer she fell into a fever. And in her sickness, she one day fainted away and for the moment lost consciousness. We ran to her but she quickly returned to consciousness, and seeing my brother and me standing by her she said as one wondering: "Where was I?" Then looking closely upon us we stood wordless in our grief, she said: "Here you will bury your mother." I stayed silent and checked my weeping. But my brother said something to the effect that he would be happier if she were to die in her own land and not in a strange country. But as she heard this she looked at him anxiously, restraining him with her eye because he savored of earthly things, and then she looked at me and said: "See the way he talks." And then she said to us both: "Lay this body wherever it may be. Let no care of it disturb you: this only I ask of you that you should remember me at the altar of the Lord wherever you may be." And when she had uttered this wish in such words as she could manage, she fell silent as her sickness took hold of her more strongly.

But as I considered Your gifts, O unseen God, which You send into the hearts of Your faithful to the springing up of such wonderful fruits, I was glad and gave thanks to You, remembering what I had previously know of the care as to her burial which had always troubled her: for she had arranged to be buried by the body of her husband. Because they had lived together in such harmony, she had wished—so little is the human mind capable of rising to the divine—that it should be granted her, as an addition to her happiness and as something to be spoken of among men, that after her pilgrimage beyond the sea the earthly part of man and wife should lie together under the same earth. Just when this vain desire had begun to vanish from her heart through the fullness of Your goodness, I did not know; but I was pleased and surprised that it had now so clearly vanished: though indeed in the conversation we had had together at the window, when she said: "What am I still doing here?" there had appeared no desire to die in her own land. Further I heard afterwards that in the time we were at Ostia, she had talked one day to some of my friends, as a mother talking to her children, of the contempt of this life and of the attraction of death. I was not there at the time. They marveled at such courage in a woman—but it was You who had given it to her—and asked if she was not afraid to leave her body so far from her own city. But she said: "Nothing is far from God, and I have no fear that He will not know at the end of the world from what place He is to raise me up." And so on the ninth day of her illness, in the fifty-sixth year of her life and the thirty-third of mine, that devout and holy soul was released from the body.

it rested upon them, for it was Your ears that heard my weeping, and not the ears of a man, who would have misunderstood my tears and despised them. But now, O Lord, I confess it to You in writing, let him read it who will and interpret it as he will: and if he sees it as sin that for so small a portion of an hour I wept for my mother, now dead and departed from my sight, who had wept so many years for me that I should live ever in Your sight—let him not scorn me but rather, if he is a man of great charity, let him weep for my sins to You, the Father of all the brethren of Your Christ.

Now that my heart is healed of that wound, in which there was perhaps too much of earthly affection, I pour forth to You, O our God, tears of a very different sort for Your handmaid—tears that flow from a spirit shaken by the thought of the perils there are for every soul that dies in Adam.[82] For though she had been made alive in Christ, and while still in the body had so lived that Your name was glorified in her faith and her character, yet I dare not say that from the moment of her regeneration in baptism no word issued from her mouth contrary to Your Command. Your Son, who is Truth, has said: Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire;[83] and it would go ill with the most praiseworthy life lived by men, if You were to examine it with Your mercy laid aside! But because You do not enquire too fiercely into our sins, we have hope and confidence of a place with You. Yet if a man reckons up before You the merits he truly has, what is he reckoning except Your own gifts? If only men would know themselves to be but men, so that he that glories would glory in the Lord!

Thus, my Glory and my Life, God of my heart, leaving aside for this time her good deeds, for which I give thanks to Thee in joy, I now pray to Thee for my mother's sins. Grant my prayer through the true Medicine of our wounds,[84] who hung upon the cross and who now sitting at Thy right hand makes intercession for us. I know that she dealt mercifully, and from her heart forgave those who trespassed against her: do Thou also forgive such tespasses as she may have been guilty of in all the years since her baptism, forgive them, Lord, forgive them, I beseech Thee: enter not into judgment with her. Let Thy mercy be exalted above Thy justice for Thy words are true and Thou hast promised that the merciful shall obtain mercy. That they should be merciful is Thy gift who hast mercy on whom Thou wilt, and wilt have compassion on whom Thou wilt.

82. That is, with the curse of Adam not nullified through baptism in Jesus Christ and conformity with his teachings.

83. From Jesus' Sermon on the Mount. He is preaching a more severe moral code than the traditional one that whoever kills shall be liable to judgment.

84. I.e., Jesus Christ.

And I believe that Thou hast already done what I am now asking; but be not offended, Lord, at the things my mouth would utter. For on that day when her death was so close, she was not concerned that her body should be sumptuously wrapped or embalmed with spices, nor with any thought of choosing a monument or even for burial in her own country. Of such things she gave us no command, but only desired to be remembered at Thy altar, which she had served without ever missing so much as a day, on which she knew that the holy Victim was offered; by whom the handwriting is blotted out of the decree that was contrary to us,[85] by which offering too the enemy[86] was overcome who, reckoning our sins and seeking what may be laid to our charge, found nothing in Him, in whom we are conquerors. Who shall restore to Him his innocent blood? Who shall give Him back the price by which He purchased us and so take us from Him? To this sacrament of our redemption Thy handmaid had bound her soul by the bond of faith. Let none wrest her from Thy protection; let neither the lion nor the dragon[87] bar her way by force or craft. For she will not answer that she owes nothing, lest she should be contradicted and confuted by that cunning accuser: but she will answer that her debts have been remitted by Him, to whom no one can hand back the price which He paid for us, though He owed it not.

So let her rest in peace, together with her husband, for she had no other before nor after him, but served him, in patience bringing forth fruit for Thee, and winning him likewise for Thee. And inspire, O my Lord my God, inspire Thy servants my brethren, Thy sons my masters, whom I serve with heart and voice and pen, that as many of them as read this may remember at Thy altar Thy servant Monica, with Patricius, her husband, by whose bodies Thou didst bring me into this life, though how I know not.[88] May they with loving mind remember these who were my parents in this transitory light, my brethren who serve Thee as our Father in our Catholic mother, and those who are to be fellow citizens with me in the eternal Jerusalem,[89] which Thy people sigh for in their pilgrimage from birth until they come there: so that what my mother at her end asked of me may be fulfilled more richly in the prayers of so many gained for her by my Confessions than by my prayers alone.

* * *

85. Alludes to Christ's redemption of humanity from the curse of Adam through the Crucifixion.

86. Satan.

87. Psalm 91.13 invokes God's protection of the godly: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet."

88. I.e., Augustine does not understand the seemingly miraculous process by which the fetus grows in the womb.

89. Heaven.

it rested upon them, for it was Your ears that heard my weeping, and not the ears of a man, who would have misunderstood my tears and despised them. But now, O Lord, I confess it to You in writing, let him read it who will and interpret it as he will: and if he sees it as sin that for so small a portion of an hour I wept for my mother, now dead and departed from my sight, who had wept so many years for me that I should live ever in Your sight—let him not scorn me but rather, if he is a man of great charity, let him weep for my sins to You, the Father of all the brethren of Your Christ.

Now that my heart is healed of that wound, in which there was perhaps too much of earthly affection, I pour forth to You, O our God, tears of a very different sort for Your handmaid—tears that flow from a spirit shaken by the thought of the perils there are for every soul that dies in Adam.[82] For though she had been made alive in Christ, and while still in the body had so lived that Your name was glorified in her faith and her character, yet I dare not say that from the moment of her regeneration in baptism no word issued from her mouth contrary to Your Command. Your Son, who is Truth, has said: Whosoever shall say to his brother, Thou fool, shall be in danger of hell fire;[83] and it would go ill with the most praiseworthy life lived by men, if You were to examine it with Your mercy laid aside! But because You do not enquire too fiercely into our sins, we have hope and confidence of a place with You. Yet if a man reckons up before You the merits he truly has, what is he reckoning except Your own gifts? If only men would know themselves to be but men, so that he that glories would glory in the Lord!

Thus, my Glory and my Life, God of my heart, leaving aside for this time her good deeds, for which I give thanks to Thee in joy, I now pray to Thee for my mother's sins. Grant my prayer through the true Medicine of our wounds,[84] who hung upon the cross and who now sitting at Thy right hand makes intercession for us. I know that she dealt mercifully, and from her heart forgave those who trespassed against her: do Thou also forgive such tespasses as she may have been guilty of in all the years since her baptism, forgive them, Lord, forgive them, I beseech Thee: enter not into judgment with her. Let Thy mercy be exalted above Thy justice for Thy words are true and Thou hast promised that the merciful shall obtain mercy. That they should be merciful is Thy gift who hast mercy on whom Thou wilt, and wilt have compassion on whom Thou wilt.

82. That is, with the curse of Adam not nullified through baptism in Jesus Christ and conformity with his teachings.

83. From Jesus' Sermon on the Mount. He is preaching a more severe moral code than the traditional one that whoever kills shall be liable to judgment.

84. I.e., Jesus Christ.

And I believe that Thou hast already done what I am now asking; but be not offended, Lord, at the things my mouth would utter. For on that day when her death was so close, she was not concerned that her body should be sumptuously wrapped or embalmed with spices, nor with any thought of choosing a monument or even for burial in her own country. Of such things she gave us no command, but only desired to be remembered at Thy altar, which she had served without ever missing so much as a day, on which she knew that the holy Victim was offered; by whom the handwriting is blotted out of the decree that was contrary to us,[85] by which offering too the enemy[86] was overcome who, reckoning our sins and seeking what may be laid to our charge, found nothing in Him, in whom we are conquerors. Who shall restore to Him his innocent blood? Who shall give Him back the price by which He purchased us and so take us from Him? To this sacrament of our redemption Thy handmaid had bound her soul by the bond of faith. Let none wrest her from Thy protection; let neither the lion nor the dragon[87] bar her way by force or craft. For she will not answer that she owes nothing, lest she should be contradicted and confuted by that cunning accuser: but she will answer that her debts have been remitted by Him, to whom no one can hand back the price which He paid for us, though He owed it not.

So let her rest in peace, together with her husband, for she had no other before nor after him, but served him, in patience bringing forth fruit for Thee, and winning him likewise for Thee. And inspire, O my Lord my God, inspire Thy servants my brethren, Thy sons my masters, whom I serve with heart and voice and pen, that as many of them as read this may remember at Thy altar Thy servant Monica, with Patricius, her husband, by whose bodies Thou didst bring me into this life, though how I know not.[88] May they with loving mind remember these who were my parents in this transitory light, my brethren who serve Thee as our Father in our Catholic mother, and those who are to be fellow citizens with me in the eternal Jerusalem,[89] which Thy people sigh for in their pilgrimage from birth until they come there: so that what my mother at her end asked of me may be fulfilled more richly in the prayers of so many gained for her by my Confessions than by my prayers alone.

* * *

85. Alludes to Christ's redemption of humanity from the curse of Adam through the Crucifixion.

86. Satan.

87. Psalm 91.13 invokes God's protection of the godly: "Thou shalt tread upon the lion and the adder; the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet."

88. I.e., Augustine does not understand the seemingly miraculous process by which the fetus grows in the womb.

89. Heaven.

Masterpieces of the Middle Ages

EDITED BY
JOHN C. McGALLIARD
Professor of English, The University of Iowa

The period of the Middle Ages —approximately 500–1500 A.D. —encompasses a thousand years of European history distinguished by the unique fusion of a Heroic-Age society with Greco-Roman culture and Christian religion. The era is fairly well marked off by the emergence and disappearance of certain massive forces. It begins with the collapse of the Roman Empire in Western Europe, a development coincident with and partly occasioned by the settlement of Germanic peoples within the territory of the empire. It ends with the discovery of the Western Hemisphere, the invention of the printing press, the consolidation of strong national states, the break in religious unity brought about by the Protestant Reformation, and the renewal—after a lapse of nearly a thousand years—of direct contact with Greek art, thought, and literature. The medieval centuries created, or at least refashioned, and bequeathed to us such institutional patterns as the Christian church; the monarchical state; the town and village; the traditional European social order—the "lords spiritual," the "lords temporal," with the hierarchy of nobility and gentry ranging from duke to knight, and the third, or bourgeois, estate; the university; the system and logical method of Scholastic philosophy; Romanesque and Gothic architecture; and a rich variety of literary forms.

The literature of the earlier Middle Ages reflects directly and clearly the life and civilization of a Heroic Age. The dominant figure is the fighting king or chieftain; the favorite pursuit is war; the characteristic goals are power, wealth, and glory; and the primary virtues, accordingly, are valor and loyalty. The literary pattern is based on actuality, of which it presents a kind of idealization. In early Germanic and Celtic society the king ruled a small, essentially tribal nation; he and his companions in battle constituted a formal or informal noble class controlling the life of the people. The poems of such a society naturally tell chiefly of the fights of great champions, though also of the druids or other counselors who advised them and of the minstrels who entertained them. The proportions and the emphasis are much the same in the literature of the Irish, the Scandinavians, the French of the twelfth century, the Germans of the thirteenth. The hero of the Song of Roland, a twelfth-century French work, combines the fighting chieftain, serving his king, with the devout Crusader; and Archbishop Turpin is both spiritual adviser and fighting champion.

In the literature of the fourteenth century, the warrior plays a smaller rôle and is assimilated to the more extensive pattern of later medieval civilization. Thus in Dante's Heaven only one of the nine celestial spheres—Mars—is occupied by great men-at-arms, all devout Christians, of course. Chaucer's Knight and Squire are only two among twenty-nine pilgrims on their way to Canterbury. The Knight is devoted to truth and honor, generosity, and courteous conduct, while his son, along with other virtues appropriate to a young soldier, possesses those of a courtly lover. The fighting champion of the Heroic Age has become the "officer and gentleman" of the modern world.

This gradual assimilation of the Celtic and Germanic hero to a civilization in which Christianity ordered the Greco-Roman culture to new ends was made possible by the religious unity and authority of Western Europe. The medieval millennium was indeed an age of faith, though it was far from being an age of religious passivity or inertia. The first half of the period was occupied in winning the new peoples of Europe to Christianity. When this had been accomplished, the Crusades began—a series of holy wars intended to rescue Palestine from pagan occupation and, in general, to defeat and either destroy or convert the pagans, chiefly Mohammedans. But the Greek and Arabic learning and philosophy which these non-Christian people introduced into Europe in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries demanded an intellectual alertness. The sharpness of the Crusader's sword had to be matched by the acumen of the Scholastic philosopher; one of the chief works of St. Thomas Aquinas is a summation of principles in defense of Christianity "against the pagans" (his Summa contra Gentiles). Medieval Christianity could never afford to take itself for granted. For the first four centuries after Christ the new religion was aggressively on the defensive; thereafter it had to be actively on the offensive in both the practical and the ideological spheres. Nevertheless, in Western Europe itself the combination of theological unity and ecclesiastical authority was a phenomenon unmatched either before or after the Middle Ages. The Roman Empire had provided political unity, law, and order, to assure the success of secular pursuits. Beyond that, it had left moral and spiritual problems to be handled by the individual, singly or in voluntary or ethnic groups. In medieval Europe political disunity was at something like a maximum; but under the leadership and direction of the Church there was achieved a remarkable unanimity of spiritual, moral, and intellectual attitudes and ideals.

The community of European culture in this period was such that the productions of individual countries look like regional manifestations of a central nuclear force. Generally speaking, students and scholars moved freely from land to land; monks, abbots, and bishops might be sent from the country of their birth to serve or preside in distant places; artists and poets wandered widely either in the train of or in search of patrons. Besides his native tongue, the educated man might be expected to speak and write the common "standard" language of Europe —Latin. In an age when the political state was relatively weak, a man's strongest loyalties were to an individual, a feudal lord, for example; to a code, such as the code of chivalry; to an order—of monks or friars or knights; or simply to the Church itself, if, like so many medieval men of intellectual interests, he was a cleric of some sort.

These ties—except for the feudal, and sometimes including that also—were international in nature. In such a cultural atmosphere the themes and subjects and techniques of art and literature circulated freely throughout Europe. The Gothic architecture of a building is a more central aspect of it than the fact that it was designed and built by an English, a French, a German, or an Italian school of builders. Christianity itself furnished a common subject matter for painters, sculptors, and countless others skilled in the graphic and plastic arts; the biblical stories and scenes had the same meaning in every country. The stories of Charlemagne, Roland, and Arthur, of Aeneas, of Troy and Thebes, were European literary property. They were handled and rehandled, copied, translated, adapted, expanded, condensed, and in general appropriated by innumerable authors, writing in various languages, with no thought of property rights or misgivings about plagiarism. There were no copyright regulations and no author's royalties to motivate insistence on individuality of authorship; there was comparatively little concern about the identity of the artist. Many medieval poems and tales are anonymous, including some of the greatest.

The submergence of the artist in his work is accounted for in part, at least, by the medieval system of human values. The dominant hierarchy of values—we have seen that it did not dominate universally, especially in the literature of northern Europe—was based on the Christian view of man. Man, in this conception, is a creature of God, toward whom he is inevitably oriented but from whom he is separated by the world in which he must live his earthly, mortal life. Human civilization under Christian direction may be regarded as ideally designed—even if not actually so functioning—to assist man on his way to union with God. This is the criterion for the ultimate appraisal of all the institutions of society and all the patterns of culture. Hence derive the scale, the order, the hierarchical categories of medieval life and thought. Since the spiritual side of man transcends the material, the saint becomes the ideal. The saint is one whose life is most fully subdued, assimilated, and ordered to the spiritual. On earth he may be a hermit, like Cuthbert; a reformer of monasteries, like Bernard; a philosopher and a theologian, like Aquinas; a king, like Louis IX of France; or a humble man in private life. Since communion with God—the essential aspect of bliss in heaven—is an experience of the soul, the contemplative life, which prepares for the mystical communion, is superior to any form of the active life. Hence the monk—by virtue of his vocation—has an advantage over the secular priest, just as the priest is, other things being equal, in a position spiritually more desirable than that of the layman. As a whole, medieval literature is a study in human life judged according to this scale of values. The scale is represented clearly in Dante's Divine Comedy. Secular-value patterns are assimilated to it, for instance in the Song of Roland; or it may be taken for granted without much emphasis, as in Chaucer's works. But it is always there, whether below or above the surface. For the modern reader it supplies a focus for the adequate reading and understanding of most of the literature of the Middle Ages.

THE DREAM OF THE ROOD

The Dream of the Rood is one of the finest of the many poems, from early medieval lyrics to modern Gospel hymns, about that central symbol of the Christian religion, the cross on which Christ was crucified. It was originally written in Old English, the language of Anglo-Saxon England (ca. 500–1100), and in its written form probably dates from the eighth century. However, like all Old English poetry, it shares in the long and ancient tradition of oral poetry, composed spontaneously by bards in public performance.

The poem uses the popular medieval form of a dream vision: the anonymous poet tells what he (or she) saw and heard in a dream. The organization of the poem is almost perfectly symmetrical. In the first twenty-nine lines, the author describes the cross as it appeared in the dream; then the cross itself speaks directly, in a kind of autobiographical sketch of ninety lines; and in the final twenty-eight lines the narrator resumes, telling of the effect which the dream had on him.

In this vision the cross has a double aspect. It is a glorious, cosmic object, visible to the angels in heaven as well as to humanity on earth, but it is also "wet and stained" with Christ's blood. In telling of the crucifixion it offers this remarkable heroic image:

Then the young Warrior, God the All-Wielder,
Put off his raiment, steadfast and strong;
With lordly mood in the sight of many
He mounted the Cross to redeem mankind.

Here the Son of God might almost be a Germanic king setting forth on horseback to destroy a monster and save his people. Christ "the Wielder" appears again in the glimpse of the Last Judgment (lines 103–119), when he will return to Earth to punish and reward, and finally in the "triumphant" harrowing of hell (lines 141–147).

In this, as in all Old English poems, the metrical pattern depends on alliteration, the similar sound of stressed syllables at the beginning of one or two words in the first half-line and one in the second. The translator has made generous use of alliteration but has not tried to reproduce the exact sound patterns of the original poem.

THE SONG OF ROLAND

With some literal inaccuracy, but with substantial truth, it has been said that French literature begins with the Song of Roland (Chanson de Roland). Certainly it is the first great narrative poem in that language. Of unknown authorship and date, it was apparently composed in the decade or decades after the year 1100. Imbued with the spirit of the First Crusade, it seems to reproduce some details of the campaigns and expeditions to capture and hold the Holy Land for Christendom. The story it tells was developed from a historical incident in the career of Charlemagne (Charles the Great). As the Emperor was returning from a successful war in northern Spain, the Gascons attacked his baggage train and rear guard in the mountain passes of the Pyrenees. The rear guard perished, including Roland, the prefect of the Breton March. These events occurred in the year 778. Our poet of the twelfth century has transformed them—somewhat as Geoffrey of Monmouth, Chrétien de Troyes, and Malory transformed incidents involving the probably also historical Arthur, his exploits, and the deeds of his warriors. The Charles of the Roland, a magnificent figure, is white-haired and venerable, and not without a touch of the miraculous: though still valiant in fight, he is reputed among the enemy to be two hundred years old, or more. He is served especially by a choice band of leaders, the twelve peers, of whom the chief is Roland, his nephew —a relationship that in Heroic narrative intensifies either loyalty or disloyalty. The enemy, too, has been changed. Not a few border Gascons or Basques, but enormous Saracen armies fight against Roland and the Emperor. Thus we have a holy war; all the motives of a Crusade are invoked in this struggle of Christians against Mohammedans. Keeping the Emperor as the central background figure, the poet has concentrated his efforts on Roland as the hero, the central foreground character. Close beside him stand Olivier, the wise and faithful friend, and Ganelon, whose hatred of Roland leads him to treason against Charles.

The world of the poem is an idealization of feudal society in the early twelfth century. This society was headed by proud barons—a hereditary nobility—whose independent spirit found liberal scope in valiant action, fierce devotion, and bitter personal antagonism. A man was esteemed for his prowess in battle, for his loyalty to his king or other feudal chief, and for his wisdom, as the portrait of Oliver reminds us. The action of the poem is infused with a warm glow of patriotic feeling—not the flag-waving variety, but a cherishing love of the homeland, "sweet France." It might be called regional rather than political patriotism, for in a feudal regime a man's binding obligations are to his lord rather than to the country as a whole. Yet the larger issue enters, in a special way: in the second half of the poem, Ganelon is finally condemned and punished because in compassing the destruction of Roland he has injured the king and the French nation: the poet denies Ganelon's claim that these are separable things.

The present volume includes only the first half of the poem. As it is unabridged, however, this portion has a satisfactory completeness. We see the anger of Ganelon at Roland, out of which grows his treachery and the attack of the Saracens; the valor of Roland, and the rest, in battle; and their heroic death. The second half of the poem relates the vengeance taken by Charles against the Saracens—in two separate battles—and the trial and execution of Ganelon. Although the Song of Roland was the work, and probably the written work, of a well-educated man, during the period immediately following its composition it was sung or chanted. It is divided into strophes averaging fourteen lines, each of ten (or eleven) syllables.

It is easy to see why modern French readers and critics assign the Roland a high place in their national literature. Inherent in its structure and texture are the qualities especially esteemed in the French literary tradition—clarity of focus, lucidity in exposition and narration, definite design, and mastery of technical detail. In the poem as a whole—even in our abridgment of a part—scale and proportion are evident. The succession of quarrels, treachery, and battles is only the raw material out of which the poet has built a highly wrought work of art. The emphasis on action—on what Roland, Ganelon, and Oliver do and say—has been recognized since Aristotle as the right method for a poet. But mere action is the formula of the adventure story. The great-literature standard requires that the action have significance. This significance the author of the Roland has provided in rich and ordered variety. The acts of the hero, of his friend, and of his foe are presented as part of the total character of each; they grow out of the whole man, including his temperament and personality. But they are also presented against an ethical and social background. Every act, every decision, bears a relation to the feudal code of conduct, of right and wrong, and hence is an indication of human good or evil. Courage rather than cowardice, loyalty rather than treachery, judgment rather than folly—a belief in these criteria is implicit or explicit in the presentation of each action. And they apply to the outermost frame within which the poet has placed the specific events of the narrative—the contest between Christianity and paganism. For to the author and his audience the Christian cause is just, the Saracen, unjust. Roland, fighting for the crusading Emperor, is right; Ganelon, aiding the heathen enemy against his brother-in-arms, is doubly wrong.

The man who brings about the death of Roland and twenty thousand Franks is no mean and petty villain. The husband of the Emperor's sister and the stepfather of Roland, he holds a very high place in Charles's council. Nor does he lack the ability or the personality to sustain this position. He has no hesitation in speaking against Roland in the first discussion of the Saracen proposals; his nomination as envoy to King Marsile is readily accepted by Charles; and his success in his treachery is a brilliant feat. For in order to accomplish it he must first provoke the now peacefully inclined Marsile to wrath and then turn this anger against Roland. To this end he takes a calculated risk for the sake of a calculated—but far from guaranteed—result. Insulting Marsile deliberately, in the name of the Emperor, he makes himself the first target of the Saracen king's fury and definitely endangers his own life. Luckily for him, the king's hand is stayed; and the Saracen nobles applaud Ganelon's magnificent courage. The rest is comparatively easy—though everything now depends on Ganelon's success in getting Roland placed in command of the rear guard. That he succeeds is the more credible because it was Roland who previously nominated Ganelon for the embassy: Roland and Charles may be expected to act, as in fact they do, on the principle that turn about is fair play.

To the twelfth-century poet and his audience of proud knights the question of motive in Ganelon's hatred of Roland doubtless presented little difficulty. Indeed, if Ganelon had not resorted to treason, a tenable defense of his attitude could be established. For it may well be that he is honestly opposed to the policy of relentless war against the Saracens. His speech at the first council, urging acceptance of Marsile's proposals, wins the support of the wise counselor Naimes, and carries the day. An advocate of peace would obviously regard the uncompromising spokesman of the war party—Roland—as his opponent. Later, talking with the Saracen envoy Blancandrin, Ganelon plausibly represents Roland as the chief obstacle to pacific relations between the two peoples. To be sure, Ganelon is now plotting against Roland; but that should not blind us to the possibility that he honestly differs with Roland about this question of the Emperor's foreign policy. When we have said this, and when we have recognized the faults in Roland's personality that might normally vex another powerful, but less powerful, courtier, we have said all that can be said in defense of Ganelon. His acts put him quite beyond the possibility of moral justification. But justifying him is one thing; understanding him is quite another, and this the author has enabled us to do.

In Roland the poet has created one of the great heroes of European literature. Like Achilles, Aeneas, and Hamlet, he is the embodiment of a definite ideal of humanity. The ideal that Roland incarnates is that of feudal chivalry. Roland exhibits in superlative degree the traits and attitudes which feudal society and institutions sought to produce in a whole class. He is a supremely valiant fighter, a completely faithful vassal, and a warmly affectionate friend; and, since his creator lived in the early twelfth century, his fervent Christianity bears the Crusader's stamp. His words to his friend Oliver before the battle epitomize his vocation as he sees it:

Men for their lords great hardship must abide,
Fierce heat and cold endure in every clime,
Lose for his sake, if need be, skin and hide.
Look to it now! Let each man stoutly smite!
No shameful songs be sung for our despite!
Paynims are wrong, Christians are in the right!
Ill tales of me shall no man tell, say I!

This is the code of a man of action, of one to whom action appears as duty. Neither here nor elsewhere in the poem is Roland touched by any sense of the lacrimae rerum, and of the "doubtful doom of human kind" that haunts Aeneas. Nor has he ever dreamt of most of the things in Hamlet's philosophy. In assurance and self-reliance he is much closer to Achilles, except that Achilles fought essentially for himself—certainly not for Agamemnon! In Roland the man is wholly assimilated to the vassal. The ceiling above him is lower, the pattern he follows is more limited, than those of Achilles, Aeneas, and Hamlet; yet within his pattern Roland achieves perfection, as they do in theirs.

Roland's feats in battle require no analysis; they are bright and glorious; they outshine the great deeds of his noble comrades. This superiority is no more than the poet has led us to expect. It is the hero's weakness—weakness counterpoised to his greatness—that gives the poem depth and produces the tension that commands our interest. Roland's defect has been called the excess of his special virtue—confidence, courage, bravery; if assurance outstrips prudence, then bravery becomes recklessness, which can bring disaster upon the hero and those for whom he is responsible. The author carefully shows us that Roland has no habit or instinct of caution to match his marvelous courage. Charles notes the vindictive manner in which Ganelon proposes Roland for the rear guard, and though at a loss to divine its meaning, is moved to assign half his entire army to Roland. But Roland either has not noticed the gleam of triumph in Ganelon's eye, or, if he has, loftily disregards it and firmly refuses to take more than twenty thousand men, a relatively small force.

So far Roland has done nothing definitely wrong, though he has revealed a certain lack of perception and of intuitive prudence. But he does do wrong when, surprised by an army of a hundred thousand Saracens, he refuses to blow the horn that would summon Charles to the rescue. The error is emphasized by the repetition in Oliver's effort to persuade him, and the relationship between Roland's refusal and his rashness of character is made apparent both through his answers and through the contrast with Oliver. Roland fears that asking for help would make him look foolish among the Franks—instead, he will slay the foe himself; he will not leave his kin at home open to reproach because of him; if, as Oliver says, the rear guard is hopelessly outnumbered, then death is better than disgrace. Actually, Roland is confident of victory despite the odds. His judgment is not equal to his daring. As the poet sums it up, "Roland is fierce and Oliver wise."

Hence catastrophe ensues. But it is catastrophe redeemed by glorious heroism, as well as self-sacrificing penitence. When, despite tremendous exploits by the Franks, especially by Roland, all but a handful of the rear guard have been slain, Roland wishes to sound the horn to let the Emperor know what has happened. But now Oliver dissents on the ground of honor: Roland had refused to summon Charles to a rescue, and it would be shameful to summon him now only to witness a disaster. The repetitions in this scene balance those of the earlier one. Though the question is decided by Archbishop Turpin, the argument has embittered Oliver against Roland. Hence it is that when, blinded by his own blood, Oliver later strikes Roland, his comrade has to ask whether the blow was intentional. Roland's humility here is a part of his penitence, a penitence never put into words but sublimely revealed in deeds. Exhausted by battle as he is, his superhuman and repeated blasts on the horn burst his temples. The angels and archangels who receive his soul in Paradise are functional symbols of his final triumph in defeat. The poet does not remit the penalty of Roland's error, which is paid by his death. But his victory combines an epic with a tragic conclusion; atonement and redemption, not merely death, is the end, as it is in another profoundly Christian poem of action, Milton's Samson Agonistes.

THE STORY OF AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE

Aucassin and Nicolette (Aucassin et Nicolete) is perhaps the most charming literary work of the entire Middle Ages. Its author is unknown, but it is written in the language in use in northern France in the twelfth century or thereabouts. The alternation of prose and verse in Aucassin is somewhat unusual; perhaps the prose passages were intended to be read aloud or recited and the poems sung by an entertainer, amateur or professional. It has been suggested that the work belonged to the repertory of a company or pair of traveling minstrels, who performed or acted it much as a play. If this was the case, it must have been presented in places like the castle of Count Garin de Beaucaire in the story, for there was apparently no secular theater—or opera—during the Middle Ages.

The remarkable achievement of Aucassin is the masterly use of familiar elements of diverse kinds to produce a unique result. A wide variety of incidents, motifs, and themes has been woven into a unified pattern designed and sustained with precision. It partly resembles several of the recognized types of narrative: the folk tale, the romance, the adventure story; and it recalls a number of familiar themes: the love of prince and pauper, the child of royalty in disguise, the conversion of the heathen. The repetition of statements in nearly identical phrasing, especially in the dialogue of the early prose sections, offers the assurance and the emphasis that repetition provides in the fairy tale. And the beauty of Nicolette is so surpassing that we may be tempted to suspect that she is a supernatural creature—until we find the ignorant shepherds making exactly that mistake. The escapes, the traveling to strange lands, the separation by capture and shipwreck, the hardships, all these are the materials of the romans d'aventure (tales of adventure). But here they are handled with a brevity and deftness that make them incidental to the central theme; vivid or comic, strange or poignant, none of them delays us long. Nor do the other motifs, mentioned above, ever dominate the narrative or determine the real structure of the work.

Aucassin and Nicolette is, of course, a love story. But the treatment differs considerably from that customary in the romans d'amour (tales of love). In these the lady is often hostile, at least ostensibly, or, at best, unaware of her lover's pangs; she has to be won; frequently she is capricious and gives her knight a hard time—he must conquer the lady's affection as well as the numerous and wearying external obstacles that keep them apart. But Nicolette is as much in love as Aucassin, and more ingenious and enterprising; both are utterly candid, direct, and steadily devoted to each other. The specific dangers and the devices employed to elude them, the castles, dungeons, escapes by a window into a garden and through a moat—these are traditional. But the atmosphere in which they are related is not: the warm night of early summer, saturated with moonlight and nightingales, the lyric joy of the two lovers. The work is built, by rigid selection, from elements of the real life of the time, a time when there actually were moats, dungeons, sentinels, parental authority, chattel slaves, fierce counts carrying on private wars—not to insist on Saracens or uncouth shepherds in the woodland. Hence, perhaps, the freshness and spontaneity, the naturally springing gaiety and joy. Hence, too, the stress, without impairment of tone, on the picturesque and the humorous in a world from which the processes of moral judgment have been largely expunged. Action is straightforward and decisive. At one point Aucassin is taken prisoner by his father's enemies before he realizes what has happened; when he becomes aware of his situation, he lays about him manfully, captures the enemy count, and so puts an end to a twenty years' war! The same absoluteness and directness are expressed in Aucassin's famous reply to the viscount of the town, who warns him that he may be sent to hell for loving Nicolette. He wants to go there, says Aucassin, along with the lively knights, the gay, sweet ladies, and the musicians and poets; that is, he belongs with those who take delight in the joys and beauties of human life. A heaven filled with the ugly, the weak, the miserable, and those who deny nature in the name of religion would not suit him at all. This is exuberance, of course, not atheism; the extravagance of Aucassin's words is a part of his character and a feature of his world.

The work is a kind of gospel of the religion of love, a religion that exacts a complete devotion and bestows a complete happiness. Yet there is some question about the tone which the author intended to give it for his day and generation. Precisely because motivation and action are so absolute, so neat, and so pat, some modern students of medieval French literature believe that it is a parody or satire. They may well be right. But the modern reader, unburdened by lengthy metrical romances of chivalric adventure and courtly love conducted by means of stereotyped characters and formula situations, need not worry too much about the question. Aucassin and Nicolette is a delight whether regarded simply as a story or as a vehicle for literary satire.

DANTE, THE DIVINE COMEDY

The greatest poem of the Middle Ages, called by its author a comedy and designated by later centuries The Divine Comedy (La divina commedia), was written in the early fourteenth century. The poet, Dante Alighieri, born in Florence in 1265, was exiled from his native city in 1302 for political reasons and died at Ravenna in 1321. The poem is in many ways both the supreme and the centrally representative expression of medieval man in imaginative literature. But to appreciate the poem adequately in this light a reader must know it in its entirety, since it is an organic whole designed with the utmost symmetry. The present volume contains the entire Inferno and several cantos from the other two divisions. It will be best to look rapidly at the general plan and then concentrate on the part included in this book.

The three great divisions of the poem, Hell (Inferno), Purgatory (Purgatorio), and Paradise (Paradiso), are of identical length; each of the last two has thirty-three cantos, and the first, the Hell, has thirty-four; but the opening canto is a prologue to the entire poem. The total, one hundred, is the square of ten, regarded in the thought of the time as a perfect number. The three divisions correspond in number to the Trinity. Nine, the square of three, figures centrally in the interior structure of each of the three divisions. In Hell, the lost souls are arranged in three main groups, and occupy nine circles. Most of the circles are themselves subdivided. Hell itself is a funnel-shaped opening in the earth extending from the surface to the center. Dante's journey thus takes him steadily downward through the nine concentric circles. The progression is from the least to the greatest types of evil; all the souls are irrevocably condemned, but all are not intrinsically equal in the degree or nature of their sinfulness. Thus, as we follow Dante in his descent, we find first an ante-Hell, the abode of those who refused to choose between right and wrong; then the boundary river, Acheron; then a circle for virtuous pagans who knew not Christ; and then a series of circles occupied by those guilty of sins of self-indulgence, or Incontinence, of all kinds. These include the illicit lovers, the gluttons, the hoarders and spendthrifts, and those of violent or sullen disposition. Comparable classes and subclasses are found within the other two main groups of sinners, those guilty respectively of Violence and of Fraud, the latter including treachery and treason. At the bottom is the fallen angel, Satan, or Lucifer.

Purgatory is situated on a lofty mountain rising on an island in the sea. It is divided into the ante-Purgatory, which is the lower half of the mountain; Purgatory proper, just above; and the Earthly Paradise, or Garden of Eden, at the summit. Purgatory proper is arranged in a series of seven ledges encircling the mountain, each devoted to the purification of souls from particular kinds of sinful disposition—Pride, Envy, Anger, Sloth, Avarice, Gluttony, and Illicit Love. These seven divisions, plus the ante-Purgatory and the Earthly Paradise, make a total of nine.

The Paradise takes us, in ascending order, through the circles of the seven planets of medieval astronomy, the moon, Mercury, Venus, the sun, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; then through the circles of the fixed stars and the primum mobile, or outermost circle, which moves the others; and finally to the Empyrean, or Heaven itself, the abode of God, the angels, and the redeemed souls. Again we have nine circles, besides the Empyrean, inclusion of which would give a total of ten. Such is the vast design and scope of The Divine Comedy as a whole. Our partial reading can give us some representative and illustrative experience of its execution in some of its parts.

INFERNO

The poem itself begins with action, not outline; explanations come along in suitable places; they are part of the traveler's experience. We shall do well to follow the hint. The incidents recounted in Canto I of the Inferno are concrete and definite; their literal meaning is perfectly plain. As critics have often said, Dante is a highly visual poet; he gives us clear pictures or images. Beginning with a man lost in a wood, hindered by three beasts from escape by his own effort, the canto might well be the start of a tale of unusual but quite earthly adventures. But when the stranger Dante meets identifies himself as the shade of the poet Virgil and offers to conduct him through realms which, though not named, can only be Hell and Purgatory, we realize that there is a meaning beyond the one which appears on the surface. We recognize that the wood, the mountain, the sun, and the three beasts, though casually introduced, are not casual features of the scene. They represent something other than themselves; they are symbols. In the light of the entire poem, it is usually possible to tell what these other things are, and in this volume the headnotes and footnotes identify them. Occasionally, however, there is doubt. What do the three beasts stand for? A lack of certainty is not a serious disadvantage to the reader; he should regard it as a challenge to reach a correct decision for himself. Indeed, if he goes on to read the entire poem, he may arrive at an identification that seems sounder and more consistent with the work as a whole than those proposed. Meanwhile, there is no ambiguity about the animals themselves; they are the satisfying and specific images of poetry.

The simple style of this first canto may surprise the reader who has been told that The Divine Comedy is one of the five or six great poems of European literature, especially if he assumes that it will sound like an epic. For Dante begins with neither the splendor of Homer nor the stateliness of Virgil nor the grandeur of Milton. Indeed, except for the use of verse, Canto I seems more like a narrative by Defoe or Swift, particularly at the outset. It is quiet, factual, economical; it convinces us by its air of serious simplicity. Dante called the poem a comedy, in accordance with the use of the term in his day, not only because it began in misery and ended in happiness, but also because in that literary form a sustained loftiness of style was not requisite. In other words, he is free to use the whole range of style, from the humblest, including the colloquial and the humorous, to the highest. There is, indeed, a great variety of tone in the poem. Yet the reader will doubtless eventually agree that Dante strikes the right note for him at the beginning. Variation will result chiefly from change in intensity, achieved by differing degrees of concentration and repetition—rather than from a shift to the "grand style." This unpretentious manner is, we see, most suitable to a prolonged work of serious fiction in which the author is the central character. For The Divine Comedy is not primarily a Cook's tour of the world of the dead; it is an account of the effect of such a journey on the man who takes it—Dante. It is a record of his moral and spiritual experience of illumination, regeneration, and beatitude. We are interested partly because of the unique and individual character of the traveler—Dante as the man he was, the man revealed in the poem—and partly because the experience of the author is imaginatively available and meaningful to all of us.

In Canto IV we come to the first of the nine concentric circles of Hell. Here are the noble heroes, wise philosophers, and inspired poets of the ancient—and medieval—pagan world.

They are excluded from Heaven because they knew nothing of Christ and his religion. This fate may seem harsh to us, but the orthodox view recognized only one gate to Heaven. These spirits suffer no punishment, Virgil (who is one of them) tells Dante, only "cut off from hope, we live on in desire." Here Dante's fervent pity and sympathy at once nourish and mirror the reader's; but there is no rebellion against God's decree. Further explanation, and thereby justification, in Dante's view, will come as the poem progresses toward its goal.

With Canto V we reach the second circle, the first of those containing souls guilty of active sin unrepented at the time of death, and hence suffering a penalty in Hell. Here, therefore, is found the contemptuous and monstrous judge Minos, another figure taken from classical myth and freely adapted to Dante's purposes. The souls assigned to the second circle are those guilty of unlawful love. The poet's method here, as throughout the journey, is first to point out a number of prominent figures who would be familiar to his fourteenth-century readers, and then to concentrate attention on a very few, one or two in each circle, telling more about them and eliciting his own story from each. In general, Dante lets the place and condition in which the sinners are found serve as a minimum essential of information. For the penalties in the various circles are of many different kinds. Their fundamental characteristic is appropriateness to the particular sin; this is one of the principal differences between the punishments in Dante's Hell and the miscellaneous and arbitrary horrors of many accounts of the place. In Dante the penalties symbolize the sin. Thus the illicit lovers of the second circle are continually blown about by storm winds; their suffering is one aspect of the sin itself. For the sin consisted in the surrender of reason to lawless passions.

Here we find Paolo and Francesca, the best-known figures of the entire Divine Comedy. Like all the human beings presented in the poem, they actually existed. They lived in Italy about the time of Dante's childhood and early youth, and were slain by Francesca's husband, a brother of Paolo. Dante's method, it is hence clear, is not to build up an allegorical cast of personified abstractions. Instead of, say, Passion and Rebellion, he portrays Paolo and Francesca. They represent, or symbolize, sinful love by example. They show how an intrinsically noble emotion, love, if contrary to God's law, can bring two essentially fine persons to damnation and spiritual ruin. The tenderness and the sympathy with which the story is told are famous. But its pathos, and Dante's personal response of overwhelming pity, should not blind us to the justice of the penalty. The poet who describes himself as fainting at the end of Francesca's recital is the same man who consigned her to Hell. His purpose is partly to portray the attractiveness of sin, an especially congenial theme when this is the sin involved—both for Dante and for most readers.

But although Dante allows the lovers the bitter sweetness of inseparability in Hell, the modern "romantic" idea that union anywhere is sufficient happiness for lovers does not even occur to him. Paolo and Francesca indeed have their love; but they have lost God and thus corrupted their personalities—their inmost selves—from order into anarchy; they are the reverse of happy. In a sense, they have what they wanted, they continue in the lawless condition which they chose on earth. But that condition, seen from the point of view of eternity, is not bliss; it is, in effect, Hell.

In Canto X we are among the heretics in their flaming tomb in the sixth circle. Situated within the walled city of Dis—the capital, as it were, of Hell—this circle is a kind of border between the upper Hell (devoted to punishments for Incontinence) and the lower (concerned with Violence and Fraud). Here Dante portrays the proud aristocrat Farinata and his associate, the elder Cavalcante, father of Dante's closest friend. Their crime is heresy, a flagrant aspect of intellectual pride. But there is a nobility in Farinata's pride; Dante, like the reader, admires the splendid self-sufficiency of a man who, in this situation, can look "proclaiming his disdain for all this Hell." And the essence of the aristocratic nature is distilled in his address to Dante as "half-contemptuously / he asked, 'And who would your ancestors be?' " and in his abrupt resumption of the conversation interrupted by Cavalcante. Alongside the haughtiness of Farinata, Dante sets the pathetic —and mistaken—grief of Cavalcante for his son; each portrait gains in effect by the extreme contrast.

Canto XIII shows us one group of those guilty of Violence; for the suicides have been violent against themselves. Here they are turned into monstrous trees, their misery finding expression when a bough is plucked. In the eyes of the Church, suicide was murder, in no way diminished by the fact that the slayer and the victim were the same. By representing in Pier delle Vigne a man who had every human motive to end his life, Dante achieves the deepest pathos and evokes our shuddering pity. As Francesca displays in her dramatic monologue the charm and the potential weakness of her character, as Farinata's manner of speech portrays his nature, so Pier delle Vigne by his exact and legal-sounding language lets us see the careful, methodical counselor whose sense of logic and sense of justice were so outraged that he saw no point in enduring life any longer. His judgment is still unimpaired; he does not reproach his king, only the jealous courtiers who misled him. The Wood of the Suicides is one of the greatest—among many admirable—examples of landscape in Hell assimilated to theme and situation.

Canto XV describes the meeting of Dante and his venerable teacher and adviser, the scholar Brunetto Latini. We are in another ring of the seventh circle, among more of those who have sinned through Violence. The impact of this scene results from the contrast between the dignity of the man and the indignity of his condition in Hell, and by the tact with which both he and Dante ignore it for the moment. Brunetto, with the others guilty of homosexual vice, must move continually along a sandy desert under a shower of fiery flakes. Dante accords him the utmost respect and expresses his gratitude in the warmest terms; and something like their earthly relationship of teacher and pupil is re-enacted, for Brunetto is keenly interested in Dante's prospects in life. In the final image of Brunetto running, not like the loser, but like the winner of a race, Dante extracts dignity and victory out of indignity itself.

The presence of people like those we have been reviewing will remind the reader that Hell is not reserved exclusively for arrant ruffians, hoodlums, and scoundrels. They are there, of course; but so are many "nice," many charming, and some noble and great, men and women. These are in Hell because they preferred something else—no matter what—to God; at the moment of death they were therefore in rebellion against Him. God and Heaven would not be congenial to them, as they are and as He is; and there is no acceptable repentance after death. Hence they go on unchanged—only now experiencing the harsher aspects of the sin in which they chose to live.

In Canto XVII the travelers are carried on the back of the flying monster Geryon down the deep descent from the seventh to the eighth circle. With the face of a just man and the body of a serpent, Geryon symbolizes Fraud. He is one of the most exciting figures in Hell. In an age before ferris wheels and airplanes, he gives our poets a ride that anticipates some of the terrifying thrill which a young child may feel in an airplane journey. The eighth circle is subdivided into ten chasms or trenches (Malebolge), each with its own kind of sinners: seducers and panders; flatterers; simoniacs (buyers and sellers of appointments in the Church); sorcerers; grafters; hypocrites; thieves; evil counselors; troublemakers; forgers, and impostors.

Most readers will agree that the punishments here fit the crimes; indeed, reflection will usually intensify this conviction. It is a long catalogue of iniquity; much, but not all, is sordid. Dante has avoided monotony not only by the vividness and intensity of the separate scenes but also by their ingenious variety and by the frequent changes of pace in the narrative. The satirical situation and fierce denunciation of the simoniacs is followed by the quiet horror of the sorcerers with twisted necks. The hilarious episode of the grafters precedes the encounter with the solemn, slow-walking hypocrites; and these are succeeded by the macabre serpent-transformations of the thieves. Nevertheless, our steadily deepening descent in hell gradually produces a sense of oppressiveness. This is appropriate and deliberate; it is a part of Dante's total design. But he recognizes the need of momentary relief, a breath of fresh air, a reminder of the world above. These he provides, for example, in the long simile describing the shipyard in Venice (the opening of Canto XXI) or the picture of the peasant and his two sallies outside on a winter morning (the opening of Canto XXIV).

The episode of the grafters (Cantos XXI and XXII) probably has biographical relevance for Dante. During his absence from Florence on business of state, the opposing political party seized power and sentenced Dante to death if he should return to Florence. The quite unfounded charge against him was misappropriation of public funds. In these cantos Dante cuts a ludicrous figure: fearful, cowering, in constant danger from the demons. He escapes their clutches, first by a distraction and then by belated vigilance. The whole sequence affords an oblique and amusing view of an actual episode. It is worth noting also that here, and here only, in the poem, we find ourselves in the kind of hell known in popular lore and anecdote, with winged devils playing rough jokes on their human prey. Scenes, style, and language alike here show one extreme of the range of the poem—the "low" comic. Dante very unobtrusively indicates his awareness of this by the contrasting allusions found in Canto XX, line 113 and Canto XXI, line 2.

Cantos XXVI and XXVII take us among the wicked counselors, who occupy the eighth chasm, or subdivision, of the eighth circle. Appearing at a distance like fireflies in a summer valley, these souls are wrapped in individual, or occasionally twin, flames. Fire is a fit punishment for those who used the flame of intellect to accomplish evil. When the two poets approach more closely, Virgil identifies one flame as that of Ulysses (Odysseus) and Diomed, who burn together. Among the deceptions devised by Ulysses was the wooden horse, which made possible the capture of Troy. It will strike the reader as strange that a man should suffer for his powers as a military tactician. But the Greeks were enemies of the Trojans, whom the Romans and later most of the nations of Western Europe regarded as their ancestors. Ulysses was on the wrong side, and was responsible for his deeds; but Dante mingles with his condemnation an admiration of the man's mental powers. Ulysses remains aloof; he does not converse with Dante, like most of the souls we have met. Instead, as Dorothy Sayers puts it in the notes to her translation of the poem, Virgil conjures the flame into monologue. Thus we are told how Ulysses determined not to return home after the Trojan War but to explore the western ocean instead. In this narrative, apparently invented by Dante, Ulysses becomes the type of the adventuring and searching spirit of man; the voyage is an act of the mind and soul as well as the body. When he has sailed within sight of a mountainous island, his ship is wrecked by a storm and he perishes. Since, as other parts of the poem indicate, this is the island of Purgatory, the episode clearly has symbolic significance. On this island is the Earthly Paradise, or Garden of Eden, lost to man by the sin of Adam. Man, unassisted by divine grace—pagan man, represented by Ulysses—cannot regain it by his own intelligence, although the effort toward that end is noble in itself.

The other evil counselor, Guido da Montefeltro, talks fluently in Canto XXVII; he shows a quite earthly eagerness for news, crafty, garrulous old intriguer that he is. It is a neat irony that, in spite of his deserved reputation for cleverness, Dante shows him twice deceived: first on earth, as he himself relates, and now in Hell—he does not want his story known and is convinced that Dante will never return to earth to tell it. He sketches in detail, with recollective acidity, the steps by which the pope led him, an aging and reformed man, to return for a moment to his old ways. He even includes the contest of St. Francis and the devil for his soul at his death, along with the devil's bitter witticism: you didn't think I was a logician, perhaps!

In Cantos XXXII and XXXIII we have reached the ninth and last circle, where the traitors are immersed in ice that symbolizes their unfeeling hearts. At the end of one canto we are shown the horror of Ugolino gnawing the skull of his enemy Ruggieri, both partly fastened in the ice. Dante does not concentrate on the acts which have put either man in Hell. Instead he lets Ugolino tell us, in the next canto, why his hatred of Ruggieri is so implacable. The fearful pathos, the power, and at the same time the restraint and compression of this narrative make it one of the finest episodes in the poem.

The last canto, Canto XXXIV, shows us the enormous shape of the fallen angel, Satan, fixed at the bottom of Hell, where the motion of his wings freezes the ice in which we have found the traitors immersed. In one of his three mouths he holds Judas Iscariot, who betrayed Christ; in the other two are Brutus and Cassius, who plotted the assassination of Julius Caesar. Dante did not regard them, as we generally do today, as perhaps misguided patriots; to him they were the destroyers of a providentially ordained ruler. Readers who remember Milton's Paradise Lost may be surprised at the absence of any interior presentation of Satan. One critic regrets that his suffering is not shown as different from that of the other inhabitants of Hell. But the fact is that his suffering is not presented at all; he is not a person, to Dante, but an object, a part of the machinery and geography of Hell. For The Divine Comedy is occupied exclusively with human sin, human redemption, and human beatitude.

PURGATORY

At the beginning of the Purgatory, Dante and Virgil have once more reached the surface of the earth and can look up and see the sky and the stars. Their long climb from the bottom of Hell, where they left Satan, has brought them out on the shore of the mountain-island of Purgatory. The scene and the situation are presented by Dante with a bold and happy use of imaginative symbols. Guided by Reason in the person of Virgil, Dante, a man still in the earthly life, has looked closely at sin and evil—in Hell—and turned away from them, and is now in search of the means of self-correction and purification. He arrives on the island shore, just before dawn, to find the reverend figure of Cato acting as guardian of the mountain. The austerely glorious figure of Cato, his face illumined by rays from stars representing the pagan virtues of Prudence, Temperance, Fortitude, and Justice, embodies the highest moral and ethical ideal available to man without divine revelation, pre- or post-Christian. Dante meets him, appropriately, before dawn—before the sun of God's illumination has risen. These elements in the situation, together with the reference to his sojourn with Marcia, his wife, in the circle of virtuous pagans in Hell, make Cato a remarkable transition or border symbol, standing both between Hell and Purgatory and between Greco-Roman philosophy and ethics and the dispensation of the Old and New Testaments.

These opening cantos admirably set quite a new tone in the second great division of the poem. They show us joy and brightness, cheer and hope, contrasting totally with the darkness and misery of Hell. They show us an angel arriving with a cargo of souls, all joyfully singing. They accustom us to a different set of attitudes, a different kind of people, and especially, they portray the naïveté, the almost childlike lack of intellectual and moral sophistication, the need of orientation, which characterize the penitent soul at this point in its progress to perfection. As yet uninstructed and spiritually immature, it looks back, seeking to carry on the harmless but no longer suitable delights of earthly life. Dante—and Virgil—share this simplicity to the full.

Cantos III-XVIII, not included in this book, take the reader along the slopes of the lower half of the mountain—the ante-Purgatory, where some of the souls must wait for varying periods of time (and for different reasons) before entering Purgatory itself—and through four of the seven terraces, those devoted to purgation from Pride, Envy, Anger, and Sloth. In Canto XIX we go on to the fifth of the ledges encircling the mountain, that in which the souls are purified of Avarice. There we meet Pope Adrian, one of Dante's most vivid illustrations of the anguish of purification. Concisely he sketches for Dante the poignant story of his late conversion (to the reality of the Christian life), his repentance, and his present hard penance. Only when, after a life of self-seeking, he had attained the pinnacle of the papacy did disillusionment come—and spiritual discovery: "I saw that there the heart no peace could claim." Now he recognizes the equity of the reforming penalty:

> Even as our eyes on high we would not send,
> Which only upon earthly things were cast,

So here to earth Justice hath forced them bend.

Dante, on learning from Adrian's words that he was a pope, has knelt down in respect. But Adrian, perceiving this without lifting his eyes from the ground, peremptorily corrects Dante: there are no popes here. All the hierarchies and social orders of earth are annihilated in Purgatory—and, we may add, the hierarchy of Heaven is not that of earth. Having answered Dante's questions, Adrian bids him go on—he hinders the task of penitence. Finally, remembering that Dante had offered to carry news of him to those possibly dear to him on earth, which might lead to helpful prayers, the old man adds that he has only a niece there who, if not corrupted by the bad example of his family, could possibly help him. But for this soul, absorbed in his penance, the earth has receded far away, and Heaven is not yet attained; he is essentially alone with his suffering.

The remaining parts of the Purgatory included in this book, Cantos XXVII, XXX, and XXXI, add a dimension to Dante's role in the poem. He is, as has been said, the protagonist throughout; the journey and all its disclosures are carried out for his benefit. In Hell, to be sure, he could do little except look and learn; yet his emotional education through the revelation of perfected evil was a large and positive achievement. As a candidate for salvation, he has learned to abhor sin more completely in proportion as he has been shown its real nature; while, as a man of flesh and blood, he has felt alternate pity and hate for the sinners. Along the penitential ledges of Purgatory he has partially assimilated himself to the penitents; he has felt humility while among those purging themselves of Pride, and generosity among those seeking to root out Envy from their natures. On the seventh terrace, he has recognized an even closer kinship with those engaged in refining their love by fire. But now this same fire, it develops, is the boundary between Purgatory and the Earthly Paradise at the top of the mountain. To reach that goal, Dante must go through the fire. Remembering "Men's bodies burning, once beheld," he is overcome by a terrible fear. The encouraging words of the angel guardian of the ledge, the assurances of Virgil, who reminds him of perils safely passed—neither avail to move him until he is told that Beatrice is beyond the wall of flame. Then his resistance melts and he perseveres through the frightful but harmless fire. It is now nearly sunset, when all ascent ceases, but next morning Dante takes the few last steps to the Earthly Paradise. Here Virgil, who has guided him through Hell and Purgatory, gives him a farewell benediction. Dante, says Virgil, has explored evil in its final effects (in Hell) and the means of correcting the human inclinations that produce it (in Purgatory). His regenerated will is now truly free, and he may fearlessly follow its direction. He no longer needs the guidance of a teacher of morality (Virgil) nor a political structure ("crown") nor an ecclesiastical institution ("mitre"). In short, he has regained the condition of man before the Fall.

These words apply to Dante in his role as a kind of Everyman, representing whoever has fully discerned the nature of evil and wholly freed himself from the impulses to sin. They apply to every soul when it completes the experience of Purgatory; if they did not, the soul would not be ready to go to Heaven, to enter the presence of God. But obviously they cannot apply, actually and practically, to any man still living on earth. That they were not meant as a literal description of Dante the Italian poet and political exile from Florence is clear enough from the events of Cantos XXX and XXXI. For if Dante has already perfected himself by penance, why should he now, in the scenes with Beatrice, repeat the painful experience of rebuke, confession, and satisfaction? It is this latter series of incidents that constitutes Dante's personal, individual experience of correction and purification.

In the midst of the celestial pageant that moves before Dante in the Earthly Paradise appears a lady whom he instantly recognizes as one who was the object of his idealizing love when she lived as a woman on earth. Turning excitedly to confide this to Virgil, he cannot find him anywhere, and is stricken with grief. Presently the lady names herself as Beatrice—whom the reader will remember for two reasons: she sent Virgil to guide her endangered servant, Dante, through Hell and Purgatory; and to see her Dante forced himself to go through the barrier of fire. There is no cause to doubt that, like the other human beings in the poem, Beatrice is an actual person transformed by the shaping imagination of the poet. What she was to Dante in her earthly life he tells us in the New Life (Vita nuova), written not long after her death in 1290. She was an incarnation of beauty and virtue; simply by existing, she engrossed the young Dante's ardent but remote devotion; her smile or greeting left him in trembling rapture. This was the full extent of the relationship between them. But the poems in the New Life are mostly inspired by the thought of her, whether on earth or in heaven. In short, she was a real woman who, even in this world, was an ideal for Dante, and after death became an even more glorious image of goodness and divine wisdom. The last section of the New Life records Dante's resolution to devote a great work to her, when he shall be qualified to achieve it; The Divine Comedy is that work. We have seen that he makes her the instigator of the imaginary journey through two realms of the life after death and the motive for his endurance of the fire. Now, as successor to Virgil, she comes to guide him herself through the heavenly paradise. In the same way that Virgil is Reason without ceasing to be Virgil, Beatrice fulfills the role of Divine Revelation without ceasing to be Beatrice.

It is in this dual character, part beloved woman and part the voice of divine wisdom, that Beatrice, in Canto XXXI, unsparingly rebukes Dante. He had loved her mortal beauty as an image of the immortal; when death destroyed it, his devotion ought thenceforth to have fixed itself on the immortal and indestructible virtue of which that beauty had been the image. Instead, he turned aside to the lure of material things. Dante accepts the reproach with the utmost contrition. It is quite probable that this episode is based on some actual lapse, in Dante's life, from his highest moral ideal. These passages, then, recount his own personal experience of purgation, the autobiographical analogue of the penitence and purification portrayed on the mountain as a whole.

PARADISE

Like the invocations of Paradise Lost, that with which Dante begins the third division of his poem expresses his sense of the loftiness of the theme. Like Milton, he is venturing things unattempted hitherto in prose or rhyme. The three invocations of The Divine Comedy are incremental; the first (in Canto II of the Hell) is brief and unobtrusive, the second (in Canto I of the Purgatory) more extended, and the third (in Canto I of the Paradise) by its earnestness and solemnity indicates the epic stature, though not epic form, which he expects the poem to attain. The Paradise offers us an imagined experience of the entire celestial universe as it was charted by medieval astronomy. In that cosmology, the sun, the moon, and the rest, though immensely distant, had not retreated from the earth according to the scale established by modern knowledge. Dante's world is geocentric; the planetary circles, including those of the sun and moon, revolve about the earth, as does the circle of the stars—as does, in fact, everything except the "real" Heaven, or Empyrean, the abode of God and the saints and angels. The Paradise is the chronicle of an ascent from planet to planet, until finally Dante is in the Empyrean itself. In each planet a group of redeemed and perfected souls, come from their proper dwelling in the Empyrean, are present to converse with Dante and his guide, Beatrice. Their successive discussions set forth the essentials of Christian doctrine, along with the fundamental scientific concepts of the time; and they themselves exemplify various kinds and degrees of beatitude. For Dante—and the reader—the experience is educational, morally edifying, and spiritually preparatory for the vision with which the poem ends. In Canto II Dante learns of the hierarchy of souls in Heaven; not all are equal, indeed, no two are identical in bliss; yet each is completely satisfied, fulfilled, and happy—"in His will is perfected our peace." Piccarda, the not wholly blameless nun who speaks these words, is among the souls encountered in the moon, the group of lowest rank in Heaven. From these we rise to higher and higher kinds of blessed souls, each rejoicing wholly in God in its predestined way and in accordance with its capacity.

When all the cycles of the cosmos have been traversed, we come, in Canto XXXI, to Heaven itself, the real home of the blessed. Here the souls are arranged in the form of a great white rose; God is at the center —an ineffable brightness—and the souls have the aspect of rows of petals. Here Beatrice, who has set forth the truths of Divine Revelation throughout the journey, goes back to her place in Heaven, and St. Bernard, the great mystic of the twelfth century, becomes Dante's guide, or rather sponsor. For what remains is that Dante should be vouchsafed a vision in which, for an instant, he may see God as He really is—in so far as his human capacity enables him to do so. The last canto, Canto XXXIII, opens with Bernard's prayer to the Virgin Mary for intercession in Dante's behalf. There is no religious lyric poetry of greater depth or simplicity or beauty than this prayer; its intimacy, tenderness, and humility are consummate.

To obtain, to endure, such a vision is just within the limit of Dante's powers. It transports him into an utterly different kind of being; it leaves him with the memory of an overpowering but indescribable experience. For of course no mystic can ever reveal the content of his vision; it does not belong to the order of reportable things. Dante can only tell us that he discerned with direct but momentary certitude the identity of God as inclusive of man and of universal love, and that he knew himself to be at that instant one with Him.

The Divine Comedy thus ends both quietly and climactically. For this union with God was the purpose of the entire long and arduous journey. This is the good which St. Thomas Aquinas, and Boethius before him, pointed out as the goal of man, as of the entire creation. But what the philosophers prove, Dante experiences, imaginatively. And we reach both center and summit of the medieval structure of human life in proportion as we can follow the record of that experience.

BOCCACCIO, DECAMERON

The tales of Boccaccio's Decameron (completed about 1353) constitute the greatest achievement of prose fiction in a vernacular language of southern Europe during the medieval centuries. In his round hundred stories the Italian author presents a great variety of people and situations, aptly and often acutely characterized, and abundant dialogue of varying liveliness and realism. Like Chaucer, who wrote his Canterbury Tales several decades later, he provides a dramatic framework for his narrations. But his storytellers are not miscellaneous pilgrims traveling to a famous shrine; they are seven young ladies and three young gentlemen who have withdrawn from Florence to the countryside, to escape the Black Death, or plague, of 1348. They engage in gay banter and good-natured raillery; but, as they are all refined and cultivated young people with no occupational bias or ingrained prejudices, their relationships are polite rather than boisterous and lack the force and depth and vitality of those portrayed in The Canterbury Tales. They agree on a plan of storytelling—and adhere to it (with slight changes). Here there is no drunken miller, such as interrupts Chaucer's pilgrims, to upset the seemly orderliness acceptable to gentlefolk, for there are no other folk present. Each member of the company is to tell a tale each day; on some days a general topic is assigned, on others each narrator follows his own taste and judgment.

The story about Brother Alberto and his impersonation of the angel Gabriel, a bawdy tale of amorous intrigue and deception, exemplifies what most modern readers regard as typical of the Decameron. Like Chaucer's Miller's Tale, it presents a (moderately) clever person successfully deceiving a very foolish one, but eventually punished for his trickery. In the present story, the man is the trickster and the woman is the foolish dupe, but these roles are often reversed in other stories of the Decameron; indeed, Boccaccio digresses during the introduction to the fourth day to assert his devotion to women—the muses, after all, were women—and, indeed, the women storytellers outnumber the men. He nonetheless knew that some women are foolish, just as he knew, though he was a devout Christian, that some priests and friars fall short of their vocation. Like other authors of his time, he saw nothing wrong in acknowledging these facts and turning them to artistic use.

If reduced to the bare essentials of its plot, this tale could be told far more briefly, as a mere anecdote, a joke. Indeed, it may well have been in circulation as an anecdote both before and after Boccaccio. But he gives it literary value by the way he handles it. He makes the reader see the successive scenes in vivid detail, he creates memorable and amusing characters, and he relates the incidents of the narrative closely to the personalities of those characters. Lisetta is not only credulous but also inordinately vain—her credulity derives from her vanity—and it is because of these qualities that she can be taken in by Brother Alberto's preposterous account of the angel's interest in her. The reader also notices the tacit perception of Lisetta's woman friend, who at once sees through the friar's scheme but, instead of disabusing her foolish friend, leads her on and then gleefully reveals the whole story to the outside world. And Alberto, though clever, is not as cautious as he should be. Otherwise, once warned, he would not have exposed himself to discovery and disgrace.

The story of Federigo and his falcon is told on a day devoted to accounts of love that turns out happily after difficulties on the way. It presents the courtly-love relationship—or one of the possible relationships—in a remarkable combination of realism and nobility. Federigo's conduct perfectly fulfills the code; he devotes himself completely to Monna Giovanna, and his failure to receive any return in no way disturbs the pattern of that devotion. He never repines or complains; his lady's married or widowed condition is all one to him; and, having spent his fortune in the futile effort to attract her, he lives with resignation on his tiny estate. But Federigo is genuinely high-minded and noble; he has absorbed the ideals and not merely the etiquette of courtly love. His declaration, when Giovanna comes to call, that he has gained and not lost by his service to her, might be politeness learned out of a book—a romance, for example. But his sacrifice of the falcon to provide her with a good meal is a splendid and magnificent folly that could come only from an almost unbelievably generous heart. His grief at the outcome is probably sharper than Giovanna's, despite the painful disappointment which it produces for her.

Giovanna's dignity and charm and sensitivity are as clear to us as they evidently are to Federigo. Unwilling, whether as wife or widow, to have a romance with Federigo, she does not encourage him. Yet she knows that he loves her and that he has squandered his wealth on her account. We see her distress at having to ask him for anything, let alone the falcon, his most cherished possession. But when love for her young son, mortally ill, forces her to it, she acts with grace and decorum. And with something more; for she has discerned the nobleness of temper in Federigo through his consistently courteous behavior. It is that to which she appeals, not to any obligation of a courtly lover to please his lady. Later, when her brothers convince her that she should remarry, she also shows both generosity and independence of character. She gives Federigo his reward by marrying him—and seeing that his new fortune is not wasted! The happy ending is agreeable; but the notable achievement of the story is the brief but complete and poignant depiction of the dilemmas faced by the two against a background of preliminary characterization which gives their decision full significance.

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

Sir Gawain and the Green Knight is the best English example of a literary form immensely popular in the Middle Ages: the romance, sometimes called the light reading of our ancestors. A metrical romance is a narrative poem presenting, usually, knightly adventures and "courtly" love. The adventures typically involve the hero in fighting or jousting with other knights, and often also in encounters with giants or monsters. No medieval reader or listener would be surprised by the frequent occurrence of magical or supernatural elements. Courtly love is the modern term for the relationship between men and women usually depicted in medieval romances. Here the woman—or, rather, the lady—is sovereign; the man (the knight—but never her husband) is the humble suppliant or petitioner for her favors. (In this picture, with woman on a pedestal but effectively immobilized, and with man looking up to her but with both feet firmly on the ground, may be found an early version of a sexual stereotype which many now find irksome; it is probably more noticeable in this summary than in the poem itself.) The relationship, though usually adulterous, is carried on with careful regard for the conventions and manners of aristocratic (whence "courtly") society.

The poem's first audience, men and women of the late fourteenth century, might well have recognized both of the main plots of the story, the "Beheading Game" and the "Temptation," which also appear in earlier romances. This would more have pleased than troubled them, as originality per se was not so important then as now—indeed, the anonymous poet himself claims only to be repeating the story "As I heard it in hall." But many members of that first audience, as they listened or read, would also have noticed some of the original features of the poem that intrigue us as well.

To begin with, the hero, Gawain, must prove his courage not by fighting or jousting in the usual way but by accepting an exchange of blows which seems almost certain to kill him. Then, at Bercilak's castle, by another inversion, it is the lady who takes the initiative and woos; and the knight, because of his unusual situation, must resist. Thus Gawain, traditionally the model of the knightly warrior and courtly lover, cannot show his prowess in the traditional way. Indeed, he is tested in the most extreme way, for his fears and desires must be dealt with not in action but by strength of spirit alone. He is prevented, moreover, by the overall design of the double plot from knowing what is really going on until the very end of the story.

The structure of the Gawain narrative is also far tighter and more symmetrical than that of most romances. The story begins at King Arthur's court during a Christmas holiday and ends, almost exactly a year later, in the same place. At Bercilak's castle, the three days of hunting are matched by the three visits of the lady to Gawain's bedroom; each day follows the same pattern, beginning with the start of a hunt, continuing with a wooing scene, returning to the hunt, and concluding with evening festivities. The hunting and wooing are also bound together by the agreement between Bercilak and Gawain to exchange winnings at the end of each day.

Mood and atmosphere depend in large part on the premise that it is all a Christmas game (a word that recurs often in the poem). The Green Knight declares that he comes in peace, that he asks not for battle but for sport. But, as all realize, it is a grim and dangerous sport, for the Green Knight is plainly a magical being, and behind his apparently absurd challenge lie two threats: death to anyone who accepts it, disgrace to anyone who does not. Gawain's devotion to King Arthur and to the honor of the court compel him to offer himself for the deadly game, and later his high sense of personal obligation leads him to journey through many perils to find the Green Knight and receive the return stroke of the axe. His faithfulness to his word, his honor, are also at stake in the exchange of gifts at Bercilak's castle. A story that began as a Christmas entertainment has become a series of tests of knightly and Christian virtues.

Keeping to the spirit of the game, we might better appreciate the skill of the author if we try to answer some questions about the poem. What is the significance of the many parallels in it? For example, is there any broad similarity between Bercilak's third hunt—of the fox—and the lady's third visit to Gawain? Turning to the conclusion of the poem, what is Gawain's fault? Of what does he accuse himself in the final talk with Bercilak? Why are his chagrin and self-disgust so intense? What is Bercilak's view of the matter? Does the poet agree with Gawain or with Bercilak, or can their attitudes be reconciled?

A word about the language of the poem and our Modern English version of it: It was originally written by a contemporary of Chaucer but in a very different dialect than his, that of the English Midlands near the site of modern Birmingham. Further, except at the end of each stanza, the form depends not on rhyme but on the older device of alliteration: two or more words of every line begin with the same sound. The translation reproduces this pattern with great skill and fidelity. One result of this is the occasional use of unusual words or of ordinary words in slightly unaccustomed senses; some of these have been glossed, while the meanings of others may be surmised from the context or, if necessary, found in a dictionary.

CHAUCER, THE CANTERBURY TALES

THE GENERAL PROLOGUE

Although the French produced the richest and most influential body of vernacular literature in the Middle Ages, the greatest writers of the period were an Italian, Dante, and an Englishman, Chaucer. The Florentine poet and the Londoner both wrote their most important works in the fourteenth century, the former in its early decades, the latter in its latest. In origin and background, both represent the point of view of the upper middle class or the lesser gentry, groups which were not sharply separated in the urban life of Italy and of London in the later medieval centuries. Both were active in public affairs; both on occasion were envoys of their respective governments. Dante was once responsible for widening a street in Florence, and Chaucer for a time held a post comparable to that of an Under Secretary of the Interior in the cabinet of the United States. If Dante had sharper political convictions and a greater theoretical interest in the philosophy of government, Chaucer held a wider variety of offices—and held them longer.

Both poets probably lived out their lives as laymen; their view of the world is free from any bias due to a clerical vocation. Yet both were completely orthodox in religion and theology. Dante was severe with heretics and schismatics, and Chaucer was neither a Wycliffite nor a sympathizer with the Peasants' Revolt. With the partial exception of Dante's insistence on the equal status of the Holy Roman Empire and the Papacy, alike providentially sponsored, it may be said that both poets found themselves in harmony with the traditional institutions and patterns of medieval civilization. Both were keenly aware of injustices resulting from abuses of the system; each exposed rascals with enthusiasm—Dante with bitterness, Chaucer with amusement. But their denunciation of wicked rulers and their satire directed against the worldliness of bishops and abbots and the corruptness of friars and pardoners do not show either writer to be a rebel against the established institutions of Church or State. The background against which abuses are portrayed is always, implicitly or explicitly, the ideal pattern for the king or priest or monk—not some utopian or revolutionary social order which would dispense with or radically alter the patterns themselves.

On the ultimate issues of human life, as in these questions of the structure of civilization, the two greatest literary geniuses of the Middle Ages were in agreement with each other and with their fellow men. For each, God was the center of the universe, as man and his earth were the center of the cosmic order. Man's goal was union with God; if he attained it—after this short earthly life—he would spend eternity in heaven; if he missed it, then hell awaited him. For man's direction and guidance toward the good in this life and the next, there were the divinely ordained religion and its Church, and the divinely approved hierarchy of society on earth. As men of independent intelligence, of education—and of essentially middle-class origin—both Dante and Chaucer insisted that true nobility depends on intrinsic character, not the accident of birth. But the modern conceptions of political, social, and economic equality, and complete religious freedom, would have appeared to them as anarchy. They had fundamental faith in the quite different patterns of institutional hierarchy and authority.

If Dante chose the life after death as the theme of the greatest medieval poem, Chaucer chose a religious pilgrimage as the framework of the richest portrayal of medieval men and women in the earthly scene. Chaucer's pilgrims are not dead, but very much alive; they are on their way to thank St. Thomas of Canterbury for his help in keeping them in that state! Yet the twenty-nine travelers, including those described in the course of the pilgrimage, are not incomparable in number or vividness to the characters presented with similar fullness in The Divine Comedy. Both poets —when they wish—make the individual stand out clearly and distinctly; both—when they choose—present fully the background, the milieu, the occupational or moral setting from which the individual emerges and in terms of which he is to be estimated. Both poets sketch the portraits with extraordinary insight, discrimination, and perception of the subtle mixture of good and bad in humanity. It would be interesting to attempt the assignment of Chaucer's pilgrims to their proper places in The Divine Comedy—assuming that each of them dies in the condition described in the Prologue.

With the Knight, the Parson, his brother the Plowman, the Clerk of Oxford, and the Nun's Priest (who is characterized in the course of the journey) we should have no trouble. Though thoroughly human, flesh-and-blood people, these are all wholly excellent and admirable men. Moral and ethical nobility is a part of their personal and vocational perfection. They embody—not personify as abstractions—the ideal characteristics of men in their several stations in life; they are models as well as individuals. But these individuals are living men on earth. We recognize in the portrait of the Clerk, for instance, an ingredient of tacit humor hardly duplicated in Dante's presentation of the blessed. The Clerk's unique traits of temperament and taste—the concise habit of speech, the aloofness, the ardent book-collecting—might be a little irrelevant in Heaven, while eminently suited to his portrait in this world.

The scoundrels, likewise, would be easy to deal with. The Friar, the Pardoner, the Summoner, and, I fear, also the Shipman, the Reeve, the Manciple, and the Miller, would easily find their respective niches in the circles of Hell—most of them in the ten subdivisions of the eighth circle, in which those guilty of various kinds of fraud are punished. Dante might have made each of them tell his story in much the same terms as Chaucer used. He would have done it with as much gusto; indeed, his work includes parallels to most of them. But denunciation and contempt would have replaced Chaucer's detached delight in the cleverness and success of their rascality. Again, the vantage point dictates an appropriate difference of treatment; time and our earth are a different background from eternity and Hell. Both Dante's and Chaucer's portraits achieve symmetry. But Dante's are more decisive, more limited, more exclusively concentrated on ethical definition; Chaucer's have room for more mundane, personal, and morally neutral detail.

We should have great difficulty in classifying some of the others. The exquisite Prioress is doubtless destined for Heaven. But should we expect to find her, fairly soon, among the blessed in one of the three lowest spheres—the moon, Mercury, or Venus? Is she, like Piccarda, a soul whose unquestionably genuine devotion is linked with an intrinsically limited spiritual capacity—limited in a way suggested by her unmonastic fondness for pet dogs, nice clothes, and fashionable manners? Or is her sensibility an outward sign of great spiritual endowment, so that, after some time on the terraces of Purgatory, she will be found among the higher spheres of the celestial hierarchy? Dante had to decide such questions concerning his characters, and his portraits naturally show how they fit the classifications. Chaucer did not have to decide; his pilgrims still belong to the earth, and some of their portraits are executed without conclusive moral definition. The worldly, hunting Monk, a fine figure of a man—will he take his place among the avaricious or the hypocrites in Hell? Or will he purge his worldliness, like Pope Adrian, on the fifth ledge of the mountain?

In general, Chaucer shows a large "middle" group of people, confirmed perhaps in neither wickedness nor holiness, but absorbed in the things of this world. Such an absorption exposes the professed cleric, secular or monastic, to ironical satire; for the religious vocation involves renunciation of the world. This is why many of the pilgrims connected with the Church are obvious targets. But laymen also run the risk of ridicule if their absorption in worldly matters leads to excessive egotism or affectation or limitation of perspective. Thus the Sergeant of the Law, whose days are, in fact, full, seems even busier than he is; the Merchant apparently talks entirely about profits; and the Physician's financial astuteness is not unmixed with complacency. The Franklin's pride in his hospitality and fine table is a more attractive form of egotism—although one might hesitate to become his cook! Traits like these, casually mentioned in the Prologue, would be valuable hints as to where on the terraces of Purgatory the several pilgrims might be expected to spend some time. Meanwhile, it is just such qualities, the weaknesses, foibles, excesses, and limitations, that endow them with distinctness and poignancy in this world—in short, with individuality and personality.

It is often said that the characters in the Prologue are delineated in terms of the superlative—each of the pilgrims is the best, or worst, representative of his particular kind of human being. This is true. Yet it is also true that Chaucer finds far less to say about some than about others. He is, in fact, interested in them in different ways. Thus the Knight is described at length; occupationally, ethically, and otherwise he emerges as an individual member of a class. His son, the young Squire, is presented primarily as a fine but standard specimen of his type, the fashionable young warrior and politely cultivated "lover." And in their servant, the Yeoman, we see a yet smaller segment of the whole character: he is simply an expert woodsman. Other pilgrims, like the five Guildsmen, receive only a collective portrait; they all share in the pride of their crafts and their organized "fraternity," in the garb of which they are handsomely turned out. A few of the company are not described at all in the Prologue.

Evidently Chaucer has allowed himself a margin of freedom in his account of this imaginary company as they present themselves to the imaginary observer and fellow traveler, the poet. With the future possibilities of the pilgrimage in mind, he readily leaves a few members of the group undeveloped; one of these, the Nun's Priest, does emerge in full characterization as the tales proceed. But in the Prologue itself Chaucer gives us the fullest, the most varied, and the liveliest, panorama of men and women in medieval literature. The portraits are usually fairly complete and satisfying in themselves, though, as we have noted, some are miniatures and some large canvases, some are full face, some profile, and a few quarter face. Yet the portraits are not merely lively in themselves; they are dynamic; they prepare us for the highly dramatic relationships which develop among the pilgrims in the course of the journey.

THE MILLER'S TALE

At the end of the General Prologue we are told that the Knight will tell the first tale. This narrative, not included in our book, is a fine example of medieval metrical romance—with important variations from the standard types. As we learn from the Words between the Host and the Miller, the latter, now drunk, refuses to follow the decorous order preferred by the Host; he insists on matching the Knight right now with his tale. When he goes on to say that it will be a story of an old carpenter, his wife, and her student lover, we anticipate, rightly, that it will be the opposite of the Knight's courtly romance. Like the medieval reader, we expect a tale of amorous intrigue and trickery involving people of considerably less than noble rank, in short, a fabliau. But the carpenter's wife, Alison, has not only a husband, John, and a lover, Nicholas; there is also a would-be lover, the parish clerk, Absalom. There is thus a double triangle plot, with Alison at the apex of both triangles; and the denouement comes when one triangle crashes down on the other!

This addition to the traditional kind of fabliau plot is one part of Chaucer's vast enrichment of what must have been a fairly stereotyped narrative. In mediocre tales of this sort the plot is the thing—almost the whole thing; they are comic anecdotes. But Chaucer has lavished as much effort on characterization and depiction of scenes as one expects in the best serious literature. We get to know the clever, opportunistic, cynical Nicholas very well indeed. His rival, Absalom, is a complete contrast. He is theatrical, sentimental, and silly; his "love" songs are an amusing parody of the poetic pleas of chivalric suitors. (Nicholas is much too practical and hardheaded to go in for amorous complaints; he keeps his eye on the main chance —and he is right; he knows how to manage Alison, as Absalom does not.)

The vivid, detailed description of Alison, rich in comparisons and fresh images, would remind the medieval reader of traditional portraits of ladies in romances—by difference rather than similarity. Instead of the noble lady, a standard blonde, looking out placidly from a castle window, we have Alison, neat, washed, bright as a new coin, skipping like a colt. The personality of John, the carpenter, is similarly enlarged and deepened. Here the prototype was an old husband married to a young wife; he was jealous and suspicious. Chaucer's John is a great deal more than this. He is genuinely devoted to his wife—he dotes on her; he is fond of Nicholas, his student lodger, though he also believes in the common-sense advantages of the ordinary man (himself) over the scholar; he is attractively gullible: He embraces the plan for dealing with the flood with great gusto.

The denouement of the Miller's Tale does not satisfy the requirements of poetic justice; it does not reward the good and punish the wicked—at least, not consistently. Instead, it penalizes stupidity and vindicates cleverness. Moreover, characterization and plot sustain each other: the various individuals do the kinds of things that we are willing to believe that these kinds of people would do. And there is room for variation within the basic pattern: The ingenuity of Nicholas is duly rewarded, but when overconfidence leads him to overreach himself a bit (both metaphorically and literally), he suffers in the end. Alison's cleverness is unflawed by such excess—and she escapes.

THE PARDONER'S TALE

The Pardoner is one of the liveliest rascals on the Canterbury pilgrimage. His rascality is so complete that it may be difficult for us to realize just what a pardoner was properly or ideally like in the fourteenth century. For one thing, a legitimate pardoner did not go about "pardoning" people for their sins. Many such men were not—and were not expected to be—priests, in the proper sense of the term, at all. Many doubtless were in what is called minor orders, extending up to subdeacon. Such men were not qualified or authorized to hear confession or grant absolution. The legitimate activity of a pardoner consisted in making available to devout persons a certificate of ecclesiastical "indulgence." The charge made for this constituted a gift or offering to God and the Church. The purchase was therefore considered a worthy act in the sight of God which might benefit the souls of the purchaser's relatives or friends if they were doing penance in purgatory (but not if they had been sent to hell).

No doubt there were many perfectly honest and worthy pardoners in medieval Europe. But the opportunities for personal profit are evident, and there must have been some who exploited these opportunities unscrupulously. The satiric literature of the time tells us much about bad pardoners, and Chaucer's is clearly one of them. Besides distributing indulgences of doubtful validity, he preaches in country churches, intimidating the congregation so that they will not fail to put money in the collection plate; and he makes a good profit out of fake relics. Far from being ashamed of these vices, Chaucer's Pardoner is proud of his skill in dishonesty. He tells us all about it in the Prologue to his tale.

The Pardoner's Tale itself, furthermore, is a sample of his preaching. The text of the sermon is his favorite: Covetousness is the root of evil. It is ironical, of course, that such a man should preach so regularly and strenuously against his own greatest sin. His sermon, as Chaucer gives it, is really a very old and simple story about three men who went in search of Death and found him unexpectedly. The Pardoner dramatizes the narrative with great energy and imagination. In addition, he embroiders it with brief anecdotes which are really digressions. Before he has got really started on the story, moreover, he takes time out for a ringing denunciation of gluttony (including drunkenness), gambling, and swearing—complete with examples of each.

THE NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE

The tale of Chanticleer and Dame Partlet is Chaucer at his best. Since the basic story, of a cock, a hen, and a fox, is rich in human implications and applications and in intrinsic humor it must have been especially congenial to the imaginative comic spirit of the mature Chaucer—and it apparently does belong to a late period in the composition of The Canterbury Tales. For its narrator the poet chose the genial Priest who rode with the two nuns on the pilgrimage; his good taste and inexhaustible sense of humor have been ripened by years of reading and observation of life.

The setting of the tale in the Canterbury pilgrimage contributes to its total effect. The Knight, seconded by the Host, has suddenly interrupted the Monk, who was retailing an apparently endless series of "tragedies," or tales of misfortune. This has become unendurably gloomy and dull, they protest; they want something more cheerful and entertaining! When the Monk has nothing else to offer, the Host turns to Sir John, the Priest, and bids him "Tell us a thing to make our spirits glad./Be cheerful, though the jade you ride is bad."

Thus launched, the Priest gives us a remarkable version of one of the favorite stories of the Middle Ages. For of course Chaucer did not invent the plot itself. The popular literature of Europe had long included tales of the cock's capture through his weakness for flattery, and his escape through the fox's overweening pride. The narrative can be condensed in a paragraph or spun out to indeterminate length, according to the inclination of the narrator. The Priest, without losing sight of its identity as a moral fable, makes it many other things as well.

First, with leisurely detail and humor, he gives the cock and hen a human background. The quiet, realistic description of the circumstances of the poor widow—her narrow cottage with a small yard surrounded by a wooden fence, her three cows, three hogs, and one sheep, named Moll—reads like the beginning of a skillfully told modern short story. The implicit contrast with a great house or castle is cumulatively comic; it evokes a smile rather than a guffaw.

Then we are brought to the description of Chanticleer and his seven wives—they are part of the widow's household, indoors and outdoors. The account of the cock is at first simply "superlative," like the characterization of the Canterbury pilgrims themselves; he is initially the best imaginable cock. His regular crowing, exactly on the hour, doubtless appeared less extraordinary to Chaucer's audience than it does to us, for apparently this accuracy was commonly attributed to roosters during the medieval period. But the detailed description of his features and coloring is done in the manner of the literary portraits of heroes in romances; and the cock's comb, scalloped "like a crenelated castle wall," is a first touch of the mock-heroic. Partlet too has the virtues of highborn ladies in romances; she is courtly, discreet, and debonair. And she has held Chanticleer's firm affection since she was seven nights old!

Having been thus acquainted with the general capacities of these unusual chickens, we are now moved on to the first incident in the story itself—Chanticleer's dream. The tone here is that of ordinary, commonplace domesticity: a husband is awakened from a nightmare, which he then relates to his wife. Their further conversation is in the same vein, Partlet combining in her character both the comic-strip wife who measures her husband, reproachfully, against a standard of heroic perfection, and the more ordinary Mrs. Smith who confidently diagnoses her man's indisposition and energetically tells him what to take for it. The line "Have you no man's heart, when you have a beard?" indicates how completely the cock and hen have become a human pair.

In the matrimonial argument about the nature and significance of dreams Chaucer employs the two principal medieval theories on the subject. Doubtless he is right in assigning the physiological explanation to Partlet; women are said to be more realistic and practical than men. And we might say that her sixty-two-line speech exemplifies the feminine love of talking—if Chanticleer did not take two hundred lines to answer her! Both speeches in fact poke fun at the method of proof by citing authorities. But Chanticleer's extended monologue has a further purpose: it is structural in the development of the plot; it produces the comic irony which is at the center of the tale. For the very act of vigorously refuting Partlet and proving that dreams do portend danger has the effect of reassuring him. Having won the argument—to his own satisfaction and by default of rebuttal from Partlet—Chanticleer is in reality no longer disturbed about the dream. His thoughts turn exuberantly to love, and the climax of the plot is reached when he declares: "I am then so full of pure felicity/That I defy whatever sort of dream!"

Having fully established this mood in Chanticleer—having in fact characterized him in terms of superheroism—Chaucer tells us that a cunning fox has got through the hedge during the night and is now hiding in a bed of herbs in the yard, lying in wait for Chanticleer. This leads to a citation of traitors and deceivers from epic literature and an elaborate raising of the question of predestination, foreknowledge, and free will.

Next it is pointed out that Chanticleer unfortunately took his wife's advice about the dream ("Women have many times, as wise men hold,/Offered advice that left men in the cold"), and Adam's loss of Paradise is immediately cited as a parallel. Thus we see finally that the whole situation has been presented as a kind of parody of the Fall of Man, with Chanticleer as Adam, Partlet as Eve, and the fox, now lurking but later to speak with persuasive and successful flattery, as the Serpent.

The rest of the tale is carried out in the same vein of elaborate mockery, with allusions, exclamations, and comparisons. The fox displays consummate diplomacy, Chanticleer is as naïve and susceptible as possible, and Partlet's grief is epic. The finest passage, among many excellent, is the picture of the utter confusion and uproar of men, women, beasts, and fowls when the alarm is given. At last—to provide the happy ending demanded by the Knight and the Host as well as to conform to the familiar plot of the story—comes the second reversal, when Chanticleer escapes. And in conclusion Sir John, who, for all his gift of wit and fun, is a deeply and wholesomely religious man, reminds us:

Such is it to be reckless and unheedful
And trust in flattery....
Think twice, and take the moral,
my good men!

EVERYMAN

Drama scarcely attained the status of a dominant literary form in the Middle Ages, although in the later centuries of the period it was popular, fairly abundant, and varied in character. It began with the impersonation or dramatization of passages from the liturgy of the Resurrection and the Nativity of Christ. "Produced" at first in the Latin language and inside a church, it was later moved outside and Latin was replaced with vernacular languages of several European peoples. By the fourteenth century, if not earlier, whole "cycles" of short plays were performed on certain feast days of the Church, especially Corpus Christi. A complete sequence began with the revolt of Satan and his followers against God and ended with the Last Judgment; inside these limits, some forty "one-act" pieces presented the important events in the divine plan for the history of mankind. The content of these plays was based very closely on the narrative of the Bible; hence the name miracle plays —that is, dealing with things wonderful to man.

About the time when the miracle plays had reached their fullest development, another kind of dramatic composition emerged, also religious in nature and purpose. As the miracle plays dramatize the liturgy and certain Biblical events, so the morality plays dramatize the content of a typical homily or sermon. By common consent, Everyman is regarded as the best of this kind of drama. We do not know the author's name, but the play belongs to the fifteenth century; it may owe something to a Dutch piece on the same theme. Whereas miracle plays were produced in a long sequence, with "amateur" casts drawn from more or less suitable craft guilds (for example, the carpenters might present the building of Noah's ark and the subsequent flood), morality plays may have been acted by professional or semiprofessional companies. Nothing is actually known about the original productions of Everyman; it is well suited, however, to outdoor performance. Its comparative length, along with the large part of the title character, favors the possibility of some degree of professionalism in the cast.

The modern reader may find it profitable to compare Everyman with such different kinds of drama as Greek tragedy, Marlowe's Doctor Faustus, or MacLeish's modern play, J.B. In its brevity, simplicity, and concentration on a single theme and situation, it recalls especially the shorter plays of the ancient Greeks. Its topic has much in common with that of Marlowe's play—man facing death, in the light of his past life—but the decisive choice and consequent ending are different. The role assigned to deity is both like and unlike that in MacLeish's adaptation of the story of Job in his play.

As in most morality plays, the characters are personifications of abstractions, or generalizations. Everyman himself of course represents all humanity. But we should not assume in advance that "abstract" characters make a dull play. In the first place, dramatizing the characters gives them actuality; the actors must be flesh and blood. Then, in Everyman, the situations, the talk, and the behavior of the various characters are thoroughly realistic as well as representative of their respective generalized significance. For example, Good Fellowship does and says just about what a single boon companion would be likely to say and do under the same circumstances. Good Deeds is not a static figure: we see her first bound to the earth (the floor of the stage) by Everyman's sins; when he scourges himself in penance, she rises joyfully to accompany him. The author's ingenuity is notable in the character Goods (Riches): Goods is offstage when Everyman calls him; the audience hears but does not see him at first as he explains that he lies there in corners, trussed and piled up, locked in chests, stuffed in bags! Surely he must have got a laugh when he did come on stage. And of course God, who instigates the action by sending Death to call Everyman to his account, is no abstraction. He was probably a voice off-stage rather than an actor—but a very effective character none the less.

Together with the rapidly moving plot, free from extraneous matter, it is the rightness of its words that makes Everyman a success. God speaks with an unfailing simplicity and directness:

> Charyte they do all clene forgete.
> I hoped well that every man
> In my glory shulde make his mansyon;
> And thereto I had them all electe....
> They be so combred with worldly ryches
> That nedes on them I must do iustyce....

He is as real and human as the God of Marc Connelly's The Green Pastures; He does not need the modern author's humor or triviality. Yet humor is not absent from the play. Cousin, asked by Everyman to go with him at the summons of Death, exclaims: "No, by Our Lady! I have the crampe in my to[e]"; and later, Beauty replies to the same effect: "I crosse out all this! Adewe, by Savnt Iohan! /I take my cap in my lappe, and am gone." There is irony in Good Fellowship's farewell verse: "For you I wyll remembre that partynge is mournynge." Best of all, perhaps, are the short speeches, scattered throughout the earlier parts of the play especially, which express Everyman's disappointment in his friends and consequent disillusion. One example must suffice. After a long colloquy with Goods, that character asks Everyman, "What! wenest thou that I am thyne?" Reversal, necessary prelude to re-orientation, is condensed in Everyman's brief reply: "I had went [believed] so."

LIVES, WRITINGS, AND CRITICISM

In almost all instances, biographical and critical works are listed only if they are available in English.

THE MIDDLE AGES: GENERAL

Robert S. Hoyt, Europe in the Middle Ages (1957) is a good historical survey. For a view of medieval thought and culture as a whole, the standard older work is H. O. Taylor, The Mediaeval Mind, 2 vols., 4th ed. (1925). A more recent book is F. B. Artz, The Mind of the Middle Ages, 2d ed. (1954).

THE DREAM OF THE ROOD

The edition by Bruce Dickins and Alan S. C. Ross (London, 1963) offers abundant background information. Special topics are treated in Howard R. Patch, "Liturgical Influence in 'The Dream of the Rood' ", PMLA 24 (1919), 233–257; John V. Fleming, " 'The Dream of the Rood' and Anglo-Saxon Monasticism," Traditio 22 (1966), 43–72; and Alvin A. Lee, "Toward a Critique of The Dream of the Rood," in Lewis E. Nicholson & Dolores Warwick Frese, editors, Anglo-Saxon Poetry: Essays in Appreciation (Notre Dame, Indiana, 1975), 163–191.

THE SONG OF ROLAND

The best summary in English of information about the origin and nature of the poem is contained in the introduction to the edition by T. A. Jenkins, La Chanson de Roland (1924), pp. ix-xcviii. For discussion against the background of the chanson de geste in general, see Urban Tigner Holmes, A History of Old French Literature (1938). For French estimates of the poem, see Gaston Paris, La Littérature française au moyen-âge (3d ed., 1903); and E. Faral, La Chanson de Roland (1933), in the series of volumes entitled Les Classiques expliquées.

P. le Gentil, The "Chanson de Roland" (1969), provides technical information in the first half and a more general reading in the second.

AUCASSIN AND NICOLETTE

For a statement of the little that is known about the background of Aucassin and Nicolette (Aucassin et Nicolete), see the English introduction to the edition by F. W. Bourdillon (1919); and Urban Tigner Holmes, A History of Old French Literature (1938). Henry Adams devotes a chapter to it in Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres (1913).

DANTE ALIGHIERI

LIFE. Born in late May, 1265, at Florence, Italy. He took part in the battle of Campaldino, 1289, on the Florentine side. In 1291 he married Gemma Donati, by whom he had two sons and one or two daughters. In 1295 he was a member of the "people's council" of Florence, and in 1300 served for two months, the usual term, as one of the six priors, or magistrates, of Florence. In 1302 the Blacks, opponents of the Whites (a political group with which Dante was affiliated), seized power in Florence, and he, with other White leaders, was exiled. Dante had gone to Rome on a mission to Pope Boniface in 1301, and as the decree of banishment was soon coupled with a condemnation to execution by fire (on false charges of corruption in office), he never returned to his native city. The last twenty years of his life, from 1301 to 1321, were spent in exile in various parts of Italy and possibly elsewhere. He died at Ravenna in September, 1321.

CHIEF WRITINGS. The New Life (La vita nuova), probably written about 1292: sonnets and odes with a prose account and running commentary by the poet; the poems were mostly inspired by Beatrice. The Banquet (Il convivio), of uncertain date, unfinished: a work of encyclopedic scope in the form of a prose commentary on a series of the poet's odes (canzoni). On the Vernacular Language (De vulgari eloquentia), in Latin prose, of uncertain date, unfinished: an essay on language and poetry, especially on the dialects of Italy and Provence; of great linguistic and literary interest. On Single Government (De monarchia), in Latin prose, of uncertain date: a closely reasoned defense of world government, together with an attempt to demonstrate the independent status of the Holy Roman Empire and the Papacy. The Divine Comedy (La divina commedia), date of beginning uncertain, apparently finished shortly before Dante's death in 1321.

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICISM. C. H. Grandgent, Dante (1916), and the introduction to his edition of The Divine Comedy (revised, 1933); T. S. Eliot, "Dante," most easily available in his Selected Essays (1932); George Santayana, "Dante," in Three Philosophical Poets (1910). Some recent studies are E. Gilson, Dante the Philosopher (1948); Charles Williams, The Figure of Beatrice (1943); and the introduction and notes by Dorothy Sayers to her translation of the Inferno (1949). See also her Introductory Papers on Dante (1954) and Further Papers on Dante (1957). The more ambitious student will derive profit from Charles S. Singleton, Dante Studies 1, Commedia: Elements of Structure (1956) and Dante Studies 2, Journey to Beatrice (1958); Francis Fergusson, Dante's Drama of the Mind: A Modern Reading of the Purgatorio (1953, 1968); and Erich Auerbach, Dante, Poet of the Secular World, translated by Ralph Manheim (1961). Also helpful is Michele Barbi, Life of Dante, translated by Paul G. Ruggiers, 1954.

For background in medieval European history and literature see K. Vossler, Medieval Culture: An Introduction to Dante and His Times, translated from the German, 2 vols. (1929), and E. R. Curtius, European Literature and the Latin Middle Ages, translated by Willard R. Trask (1953).

Recent studies include R. Hollander, Allegory in Dante's "Commedia" (1969), and I. Brandeis, The Ladder of Vision (1960). Two collections of essays representative of modern Dante studies are: Dante: A Collection of Critical Essays, edited by J. Freccero (1965), and American Critical Essays on Dante, edited by R. J. Clements (1969).

GIOVANNI BOCCACCIO

LIFE. Born in 1313 in Paris, son of a Florentine businessman and a Frenchwoman. He was apparently taken to Italy in infancy, and in 1328 was sent to Naples to learn commerce in the office of his father's partner; but after six years, bored with business, he turned to the study of canon law. In 1336 Boccaccio saw Maria d'Aquino in a church at Naples; she is represented as Fiammetta in several of his works, including the Decameron. A romantic affair ended in Maria's desertion of her lover, and finally in her death in the plague of 1348. In 1341 Boccaccio returned to Florence. After 1351 he was greatly influenced by Petrarch, and turned in his writing from Italian poetry and prose fiction to Latin works of a scholarly nature. He sheltered Leon Pilatus, inducing him to make the first translation of Homer from Greek. Unlike Petrarch, Boccaccio was devoted to the study of Dante, of whom he wrote a biography; in 1373 he was appointed to a Dante chair or lectureship in Florence. He died in 1375.

CHIEF WRITINGS. Italian narrative verse: Filostrato, a source of Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde; Teseide, a source of Chaucer's "Knight's Tale." The Filostrato of Giovanni Boccaccio, a translation with parallel text by Nathaniel Edward Griffin and Arthur Beckwith Myrick (1929) is convenient. Italian prose: Decameron, finished about 1353; Vita di Dante. Latin works: De casibus virorum illustrium and De claris mulieribus, compendiums of biographical sketches; De genealogiis deorum, a kind of dictionary of mythology and defense of poetry.

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICISM. T. C. Chubb, The Life of Giovanni Boccaccio (1930); Edward Hutton, Giovanni Boccaccio (1910). Interesting and sensitive criticism is to be found in Charles G. Osgood, Boccaccio on Poetry (1930).

John Addington Symonds, Giovanni Boccaccio (1895), has been reissued (1968). A. D. Scaglione, Nature and Love in the Middle Ages (1963), a useful discussion of the Decameron. Twenty-one of the tales from the Decameron will be found in Mark Musa and Peter E. Bondanella, Giovanni Boccaccio, The Decameron, A New Translation (New York, 1977). This book also contains 180 pages of criticism and interpretation ranging from the fourteenth to the twentieth centuries.

SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT

The standard edition of the original poem (in Middle English) is by J. R. R. Tolkien and E. V Gordon, revised by Norman Davis (Oxford, 1967). A few of the recent interpretations are M. Borroff, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, A Stylistic and Metrical Study (New Haven, 1962); Larry D. Benson, Art and Tradition in Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (New Brunswick, N. J., 1965); and J. A. Burrow, A Reading of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (London, 1965). Donald R. Howard and Christian K. Zacher, editors, Critical Studies of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight (Notre Dame, Indiana, 1968) is an excellent collection.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

LIFE. Born in 1340 or a few years later, son of a London wine merchant. In 1357 he apparently became a page in the household of the Countess of Ulster, wife of Lionel, a son of King Edward III. In 1359, in military service with the English in France, he was captured by the French and ransomed with royal funds. Between 1368 and 1378 Chaucer made several journeys to France and Italy as king's envoy or courier. In 1374 he received a pension from John of Gaunt, a son of Edward III, and became comptroller of customs in the port of London; about 1385 he moved to Kent, where he was elected knight of the shire in 1386, and sat in Parliament for one term. In 1389 he became Clerk of the King's Works (under Richard II), in 1391 deputy forester of the royal forest of North Petherton in Somerset, and in 1399 pensioner of King Henry IV. He died in 1400.

CHIEF WRITINGS. The Romance of the Rose, a translation (probably never finished) of the Roman de la Rose; the Book of the Duchess; the House of Fame; the Parliament of Fowls—all these are comparatively early works in English verse. He also translated A Treatise on the Astrolabe and Boethius' Consolation of Philosophy into English prose. His major works are Troilus and Criseyde, completed about 1385; and The Canterbury Tales, composed largely in the 1390's but with some use of earlier material.

BIOGRAPHY AND CRITICISM. The essential edition is F. N. Robinson, The Complete Works of Geoffrey Chaucer (1933); see also E. T. Donaldson (ed.), Chaucer's Poetry: An Anthology for the Modern Reader (1958). Social background is described admirably in G. G. Coulton, Chaucer and His England (rev. ed., 1950). The artistic growth of the poet is sketched in J. L. Lowes, Geoffrey Chaucer annd His Art (1941); see also H. S. Bennett, Chaucer and the Fifteenth Century (1947); Derek S. Brewer, Chaucer (1953); Neville Coghill, The Poet Chaucer (1955); Raymond Preston, Chaucer (1952); and J. H. Speirs, Chaucer, the Maker (2d ed., 1960).

For general criticism see G. L. Kittredge, Chaucer and His Poetry (1915), and R. K. Root, The Poetry of Chaucer (1922). For a French view, see E. Legouis, Chaucer (English translation, 1913). Other critical works include Edward Wagenknecht (ed.), Chaucer: Modern Essays in Criticism (1959); Harold F. Brooks, Chaucer's Pilgrims (1962); Wolfgang Clemen, Chaucer's Early Poetry (1964); T. W. Craik, The Comic Tales of Chaucer (1963); B. F. Huppé and D. W. Robertson, Fruyt and Chaf: Studies in Chaucer's Allegories (1963); and Charles Muscatine, Chaucer and the French Tradition (1957).

Recent anthologies are: Geoffrey Chaucer: A Critical Anthology, edited by John A. Burrows (1969); A Companion to Chaucer Studies, edited by B. Rowland (1968), and Chaucer Criticism: An Anthology, edited by R. J. Schoek and J. Taylor (1960). Chaucer, edited by Albert C. Baugh (1968), is a thorough yet selective annotated bibliography.

EVERYMAN

A good selection of miracle plays, morality plays, and other medieval drama is contained in Joseph Quincy Adams, Chief Pre-Shakespearean Dramas (1924). On the medieval theatre and staging see Richard Southern, The Medieval Theatre in the Round; A Study of the Staging of the Castle of Perserverance and Other Matters (1957). For a recent survey of the whole matter, see Hardin Craig, English Religious Drama (1955). For an interesting fresh approach, see the chapter on "The Mystery Cycle" in John Speirs, Medieval English Poetry: The Non-Chaucerian Tradition (1958).

*The Dream of the Rood

Lo! I will tell the dearest of dreams
That I dreamed in the midnight when mortal men Were sunk in slumber. Me-seemed I saw
A wondrous Tree towering in air,
Most shining of crosses compassed with light.
Brightly that beacon was gilded with gold;
Jewels adorned it fair at the foot,
Five on the shoulder-beam, blazing in splendor.
Through all creation the angels of God
Beheld it shining— no cross of shame!
Holy spirits gazed on its gleaming,
Men upon earth and all this great creation.
Wondrous that Tree, that Token of triumph,
And I a transgressor soiled with my sins!
I gazed on the Rood arrayed in glory,
Shining in beauty and gilded with gold,
The Cross of the Saviour beset with gems.
But through the gold-work outgleamed a token
Of the ancient evil of sinful men
Where the Rood on its right side once sweat blood.
Saddened and rueful, smitten with terror
At the wondrous Vision, I saw the Cross Swiftly varying vesture and hue,
Now wet and stained with the Blood outwelling,
Now fairly jeweled with gold and gems.
Then, as I lay there, long I gazed
In rue and sadness on my Saviour's Tree,
Till I heard in dream how the Cross addressed me,
Of all woods worthiest, speaking these words:
"Long years ago (well yet I remember)
They hewed me down on the edge of the holt,
Severed my trunk; strong foemen took me,
For a spectacle wrought me, a gallows for rogues.
High on their shoulders they bore me to hilltop,
Fastened me firmly, an army of foes!
"Then I saw the King of all mankind
In brave mood hasting to mount upon me.
Refuse I dared not, nor bow nor break,
Though I felt earth's confines shudder in fear;
All foes I might fell, yet still I stood fast.
"Then the young Warrior, God, the All-Wielder,
Put off His raiment, steadfast and strong;
With lordly mood in the sight of many
He mounted the Cross to redeem mankind.
When the Hero clasped me I trembled in terror,

* Translated by Charles W. Kennedy.
Title. Rood: Cross (from the Old English word rōd).
3. Me-seemed: It seemed to me.
31. holt: Forest.

But I dared not bow me nor bend to earth;
I must needs stand fast. Upraised as the Rood
I held the High King, the Lord of heaven.
I dared not bow! With black nails driven
Those sinners pierced me; the prints are clear,
The open wounds. I dared injure none.
They mocked us both. I was wet with blood
From the Hero's side when He sent forth His spirit.
"Many a bale I bore on that hillside
Seeing the Lord in agony outstretched.
Black darkness covered with clouds God's body,
That radiant splendor. Shadow went forth
Wan under heaven; all creation wept Bewailing the King's death. Christ was on the Cross.
"Then many came quickly, faring from far,
Hurrying to the Prince. I beheld it all.
Sorely smitten with sorrow in meekness I bowed
To the hands of men. From His heavy and bitter pain
They lifted Almighty God. Those warriors left me Standing bespattered with blood; I was wounded with spears.
Limb-weary they laid Him down; they stood at His head, Looked on the Lord of heaven as He lay there at rest
From His bitter ordeal all forspent. In sight of His slayers
They made Him a sepulcher carved from the shining stone;
Therein laid the Lord of triumph. At evening tide
Sadly they sang their dirges and wearily turned away
From their lordly Prince; there He lay all still and alone.
"There at our station a long time we stood Sorrowfully weeping after the wailing of men
Had died away. The corpse grew cold,
The fair life-dwelling. Down to earth
Men hacked and felled us, a grievous fate!
They dug a pit and buried us deep.
But there God's friends and followers found me
And graced me with treasure of silver and gold.
"Now may you learn, O man beloved,
The bitter sorrows that I have borne,
The work of caitiffs. But the time is come
That men upon earth and through all creation
Show me honor and bow to this sign.
On me a while God's Son once suffered;
Now I tower under heaven in glory attired
With healing for all that hold me in awe.
Of old I was once the most woeful of tortures,
Most hateful to all men, till I opened for them
The true Way of life. Lo! the Lord of glory,

54. bale: Evil, affliction.
68. forspent: Exhausted.
73. we: Christ's cross and those on which the two criminals were crucified with him.
79–80. A reference to the discovery of the cross in the fourth century by Saint Helena, mother of the Roman emperor Constantine.
83. caitiffs: Evil people.

The Warden of heaven, above all wood
Has glorified me as Almighty God
Has honored His Mother, even Mary herself,
Over all womankind in the eyes of men.
"Now I give you bidding, O man beloved,
Reveal this Vision to the sons of men,
And clearly tell of the Tree of glory
Whereon God suffered for man's many sins
And the evil that Adam once wrought of old.
"Death He suffered, but our Savior rose
By virtue of His great might as a help to men.
He ascended to heaven. But hither again
He shall come unto earth to seek mankind,
The Lord Himself on the Day of Doom,
Almighty God with His angel hosts.
And then will He judge, Who has power of judgment,
To each man according as here on earth
In this fleeting life he shall win reward.
"Nor there may any be free from fear Hearing the words which the Wielder shall utter.
He shall ask before many: Where is the man
Who would taste bitter death as He did on the Tree?
And all shall be fearful and few shall know
What to say unto Christ. But none at His Coming Shall need to fear if he bears in his breast
This best of symbols; and every soul
From the ways of earth through the Cross shall come
To heavenly glory, who would dwell with God."
Then with ardent spirit and earnest zeal, Companionless, lonely, I prayed to the Cross.
My soul was fain of death. I had endured Many an hour of longing. It is my life's hope That I may turn to this Token of triumph,
I above all men, and revere it well.
This is my heart's desire, and all my hope Waits on the Cross. In this world now
I have few powerful friends; they have fared hence
Away from these earthly gauds seeking the King of glory, Dwelling now with the High Father in heaven above, Abiding in rapture. Each day I dream
Of the hour when the Cross of my Lord, whereof here on earth
I once had vision, from this fleeting life may fetch me
And bring me where is great gladness and heavenly bliss,
Where the people of God are planted and stablished for ever
In joy everlasting. There may it lodge me
Where I may abide in glory knowing bliss with the saints.
May the Lord be gracious who on earth of old Once suffered on the Cross for the sins of men.

122. fain of: Longing for.

He redeemed us, endowed us with life and a heavenly home.
Therein was hope renewed with blessing and bliss
For those who endured the burning. In that great deed God's Son was triumphant, possessing power and strength!
Almighty, Sole-Ruling He came to the kingdom of God
Bringing a host of souls to angelic bliss,
To join the saints who abode in the splendor of glory,
When the Lord, Almighty God, came again to His throne.

141–147. According to tradition, Christ invaded hell between the crucifixion and the resurrection and rescued the souls of good men and women, who, having lived before the crucifixion, were awaiting that event and the redemption it would bring from the original sin of Adam's disobedience of God in the Garden of Eden.

The Song of Roland*

1

Carlon the King, our Emperor Charlemayn,
Full seven years long has been abroad in Spain,
He's won the highlands as far as to the main;
No castle more can stand before his face,
City nor wall is left for him to break,
Save Saragossa in its high mountain place;
Marsilion holds it, the king who hates God's name,
Mahound he serves, and to Apollyon prays:
He'll not escape the ruin that awaits.

AOI†

2

Marsilion sat in Saragossa town,
He sought an orchard where shade was to be found,
On a bright dais of marble he lies down;
By twenty thousand his vassals stand around.
He calls before him all his dukes and his counts:
"Listen, my lords, what affliction is ours!
The Emperor Charles that wears fair France's crown
Invades our country our fortunes to confound.
I have no host but before him gives ground,
I find no force his forces for to flout;
Wise men of wit, give counsel to me now,
Save me from death and loss of my renown."
There's ne'er a paynim utters a single sound,
Till Blancandrin, Valfonda's lord, speaks out.

* Apparently composed in the twelfth century. Abridged. The Song of Roland, translated by Dorothy L. Sayers. Copyright 1957 by the Executors of Dorothy L. Sayers. Reprinted by permission of David Higham Associates, Ltd.

† AOI: appears here and with more than half of the laisses in the poem. No pattern has been found for their occurrence, nor do scholars agree on the meaning of the word. Most theories consider it a refrain, perhaps shouted, which marks some kind of climax in the action or mood of the poem. For a fuller discussion, see the edition of T. A. Jenkins (1924), pp. xxxviii, 4–5.

6. Saragossa: city in Aragon, on the Ebro River.

8. Mahound: Mohammed, prophet of the god Allah and founder of the Mohammedan religion. Apollyon: the Greek god Apollo; but the poet is mistaken, for the Mohammedans were monotheists, recognizing only the god Allah.

3

Blancandrin's wise amid the paynim horde;
He was for valour a mighty knight withal,
And fit of wit for to counsel his lord.
He tells the king; "Be you afeared for naught,
But send to Charles in his pride and his wrath
Your faithful service and your friendship henceforth.
Promise him lions and bears and hounds galore,
Sev'n hundred camels and a thousand mewed hawks,
Four hundred pack-mules with gold and silver store,
And fifty wagons, a wagon-train to form,
Whence he may give his soldiers rich rewards.
Say, in this land he has made enough war;
To Aix in France let him go home once more;
At Michaelmas you'll follow to his court,
There you'll submit unto the Christian law,
And be his man by faith and fealty sworn.
Hostages too, if for sureties he call,
You'll let him have, ten maybe or a score;
'Twere good we send the sons our wives have borne:
I'll send mine own, though he should die therefor.
Better by far the heads of them should fall
Than we should lose honour, estate and all.
And be reduced to beggary and scorn."

4

Quoth Blancandrin: "I swear by my right hand
And beard that flutters about my girdle-span,
Straightway you'll see the Frenchman's host disband:
They'll hurry home to France, their native land,
When each within his favourite haunt is back,
Charles in his chapel at Aix will take his stand,
And there he'll hold high feast at Michaelmas.
The time will pass, the trysted hour elapse:
No news of us, no message will he have.
Fierce is the king, a cruel-hearted man;
Our sureties' heads he'll smite off with the axe.
Better their heads should fall into their laps
Than that fair Spain should fall from out our hands,
And we should suffer grave losses and mishap."
The Paynims say: "There is some truth in that."

5

The King Marsile had ended the debate;
He calls before him Clarin of Balagate,

31. mewed hawks: hawks which have got over their molt, and are consequently in good condition.

34. soldiers: these are the mercenaries, who received their pay (solde) directly from the king in cash, as distinct from the feudal vassalage, who were maintained by their respective lords. Many of them were knights-errant, without territorial attachment, who wandered about offering their services to whoever would employ them.

36. Aix: Aix-la-Chapelle was the imperial city of Charlemagne, who rebuilt its palace and chapel and granted it many special privileges. He was reputed to have been born there and certainly died and was buried there in 814.

Estramarin, and Eudropin his mate;
And Garlon Longbeard and Priamon he names,
And Machiner and his uncle Matthay,
Johun of Outremer, and Malabayn,
And Blancandrin; these ten make up the tale,
Ten matchless villains, to whom he's said his say:
"Barons, my lords, get you to Charlemayn,
Who sits at siege, Cordova town to take.
Bear each in hand an olive-branch displayed;
Peace and submission are signified that way.
If you contrive this treaty to arrange,
Of gold and silver I'll give you goodly weight,
And lands and fiefs as much as heart can crave."
The Paynims answer: "That will be ample pay."

6

Marsile the king his conference had ceased.
He tells his men: "My barons, go with speed;
Bear in your hands boughs of the olive tree.
On my behalf King Charlemayn beseech,
For his God's sake to show me clemency.
Say, this month's end in truth he shall not see
Ere I shall seek him with thousand vassals leal.
The law of Christ I'll then and there receive,
In faith and love I will his liegeman be.
I'll send him sureties if thus he shall decree."
Quoth Blancandrin: "Be sure he'll grant your plea."

7

Marsilion sent for ten mules white as snow
(A gift that erst Suatilia's king bestowed),
Their saddles silver, their bridles all of gold.
Now are they mounted, the men who are to go;
All in their hands the olive-branches hold.
They came to Carlon that hath France in control;
They'll trap him somehow, for it is fated so.

8

The Emperor Charles is glad and full of cheer.
Cordova's taken, the outer walls are pierced,
His catapults have cast the towers down sheer;
Rich booty's gone to all his chevaliers,
Silver and gold and goodly battle-gear.
In all the city no paynim now appears
Who is not slain or turned to Christian fear.
The Emperor sits in a great orchard near,
Having about him Roland and Olivere,
Samson the duke, and Anseis the fierce,
Geoffrey d'Anjou the King's gonfalonier,
And Gerin too, and with him too Gerier;
And where these were was many another fere—
Full fifteen thousand of France the fair and dear.
Upon white carpets they sit, those noble peers,

108. fere: companion.

For draughts and chess the chequer-boards are reared;
To entertain the elder lords revered;
Young bachelors disport with sword and spear.
Beneath a pine beside an eglantier
A faldstool stands all of the red gold clear;
Of fairest France there sits the king austere.
White are his locks, and silver is his beard,
His body noble, his countenance severe:
If any seek him, no need to say, "Lo, here!"
From off their steeds lit down the messengers,
Well did they greet him with shows of love sincere.

9

Before them all Blancandrin forward stood;
And hailed the King: "God give His grace to you,
The glorious God to whom worship is due.
Thus speaks the king, Marsilion, great in rule:
Much hath he studied the saving faith and true.
Now of his wealth he would send you in sooth
Lions and bears, leashed greyhounds not a few,
Sev'n hundred camels, a thousand falcons mewed,
And gold and silver borne on four hundred mules;
A wagon-train of fifty carts to boot,
And store enough of golden bezants good Wherewith to pay your soldiers as you should.
Too long you've stayed in this land to our rue:
To Aix in France return you at our suit.
Thither my liege will surely follow you,
[And will become your man in faith and truth,
And at your hand hold all his realm in feu!"]
With lifted hands to God the Emperor sues;
Then bows his head and so begins to brood.

10

The Emperor bode long time with downcast eyes;
He was a man not hasty in reply,
But wont to speak only when well advised.
When he looked up, his glance was stern and high.
He told the envoys: "Fair is your speech and fine;
Yet King Marsile is foe to me and mine.
In all these words and offers you recite
I find no warrant wherein I may confide."
"Sureties for this," the Saracen replies,
"Ten or fifteen or twenty we'll provide.
One of my sons I'll send, on pain to die;
Others, yet nobler, you'll have, as I divine.
When in your palace high feast you solemnize
To great St Michael of Peril-by-the-Tide,

114. eglantier: wild-rose bush.

154. St. Michael of Peril-by-the-Tide: ("St. M. in periculo maris"). The name was originally given to the monastery built on the great island rock called Mont St. Michel, off the coast of Normandy. Later it came to be applied to the archangel himself. "St. Michel del Peril."

He'll follow you, on that you may rely,
And in those baths God made you by His might
He would turn Christian and there would be baptized."
Quoth Charles: "He yet may save his soul alive."

11

Fair was the ev'ning and clearly the sun shone;
The ten white mules Charles sends to stall anon;
In the great orchard he bids men spread aloft
For the ten envoys a tent where they may lodge,
With sergeants twelve to wait on all their wants.
They pass the night there till the bright day draws on.
Early from bed the Emperor now is got;
At mass and matins he makes his orison.
Beneath a pine straightway the King is gone,
And calls his barons to council thereupon;
By French advice whate'er he does is done.

12

The Emperor goes beneath a tall pine-tree,
And to his council he calls his barony:
There Duke Ogier, Archbishop Turpin meet, Richard the Old and his nephew Henri,
Count Acelin the brave of Gascony,
Miles, and his cousin the Lord Tibbald of Rheims, Gerin likewise and Gerier are convened;
And County Roland, there with the rest came he,
And Oliver, noble and good at need;
All French of France, thousand and more, maybe;
And Ganelon that wrought the treachery.
So starts that council which came to such sore grief.

13

"Barons, my lords," began the Emperor Carlon,
"From King Marsile come envoys, seeking parley.
He makes me offers of treasure overpassing:
Of lions and bears and hounds to the leash mastered,
Sev'n hundred camels, and falcons mewed and hearty,
Four hundred mules with Arab gold all chargèd,
And fifty wagons well-laden in a cart-train.
But now to France he urges my departure,
And to my palace at Aix he'll follow after,

156. baths: the curative mineral springs for which Aix is still celebrated, and which were held to be of miraculous origin.

163. sergeants: the word "sergeant," meaning primarily "servant," was applied generally to almost any man, under the rank of knight, who exercised any kind of office in a lord's household or on his estate. In military use, it denoted a tenant doing military service, especially one who was in attendance on a knight in the field. The sergeant marched and fought on horseback, but was more lightly armed than the chevalier.

172. Ogier the Dane: this semihistorical hero boasts a Chanson de Geste devoted to his exploits, and figures in many others.

173. Richard the Old: his historical prototype is Richard I of Normandy, who lived (943–996) later than Charlemagne's time, but has been attracted into the Carolingian cycle by the natural tendency of epic to accumulate famous names regardless of chronology.

There change his faith for one of more advantage,
Become a Christian and of me hold his marches.
But his true purpose—for that I cannot answer."
The French all say: "We'd best be very guarded."

14

The Emperor Charles had finished all his speech.
The County Roland, who fiercely disagrees,
Swift to oppose springs up upon his feet:
He tells the King: "Nevermore trust Marsile!
Seven years long in land of Spain we've been.
I won for you both Noples and Commibles,
I took Valterna, the land of Pine I seized,
And Balagate, and Seville and Tudele.
Then wrought Marsile a very treacherous deed:
He sent his Paynims by number of fifteen,
All of them bearing boughs of the olive tree,
And with like words he sued to you for peace.
Then did you ask the French lords for their rede;
Foolish advice they gave to you indeed.
You sent the Paynim two counts of your meinie:
Basan was one, the other was Basile.
He smote their heads off in hills beneath Haltile.
This war you've started wage on, and make no cease;
To Saragossa lead your host in the field,
Spend all your life, if need be, in the siege,
Revenge the men this villain made to bleed!"

15

The Emperor Charles sat still with his head bended;
He stroked his beard and his moustaches gently;
Nor good nor ill he answers to his nephew.
The French are silent, Guènes alone excepted;
But he leaps up, strides into Carlon's presence,
And full of pride begins thus to address him.
He tells the King: "Trust not a brawling fellow,
Me nor another; seek only your own welfare.
If King Marsile informs you by this message
He'll set his hands in yours, and fealty pledge you,
And hold all Spain from you, at your good pleasure,
And to that faith we follow give acceptance,
The man who tells you this plea should be rejected
Cares nothing, Sire, to what death he condemns us.
Counsel of pride must not grow swollen-headed;
Let's hear wise men, turn deaf ears to the reckless."

16

Naimon at this stood forth before them all:
No better vassal was ever seen in hall.
He tells the King: "Well have you heard, my lord,

207. rede: counsel.

The arguments Count Ganelon sets forth.
There's weight in them, and you should give them thought.
The King Marsile is vanquished in the war,
You've taken from him his castles and his forts,
With catapults you've broken down his walls,
You've burned his cities and his armies outfought.
Now that he comes on your mercy to call Foul sin it were to vex him any more.
Since he'll find sureties his good faith to support,
We should make haste to cut this great war short."
The French all say: "The Duke speaks as he ought."

17

"Barons, my lords, whom shall we send anon
To Saragossa, to King Marsilion?"
"I, by your leave," saith Naimon, "will begone, Therefore on me bestow the glove and wand."
"You are my wisest," the King makes answer prompt:
"Now by the beard my cheek and chin upon,
You shall not go so far this twelvemonth long.
Hence! sit you down, for we summon you not!"

18

"Barons, my lords, whom shall we send of you To Saragossa, the Sarsen king unto?"
"Myself," quoth Roland, "may well this errand do."
"That shall you not," Count Oliver let loose;
"You're high of heart and stubborn of your mood,
You'd land yourself, I warrant, in some feud.
By the King's leave this errand I will do."
The King replies: "Be silent there, you two!
Nor you nor he shall on that road set foot.
By this my beard that's silver to the view,
He that names any of the Twelve Peers shall rue!"
The French say nothing: they stand abashed and mute.

19

Then from their ranks arose Turpin of Rheims;
He tells the King: "Leave your French lords at ease;
Full sev'n long years in this land have you been,
Much have they suffered of perils and fatigue;
Pray you then, Sire, give wand and glove to me;
The Saracen of Spain I'll seek and see,
And in his looks his purpose will I read."
The Emperor answers with anger in his mien:
"On that white carpet sit down and hold your peace;
Be still, I say, until I bid you speak."

20

The Emperor said: "My free and knightly band,
Come choose me out some baron of my land

255. Sarsen: Saracen.

To bring my message to King Marsilion's hand."
Quoth Roland: "Guènes my step-sire is the man."
The French all say: "Indeed, he is most apt;
If he's passed over you will not find his match."
Count Ganelon is furious out of hand;
His great furred gown of marten he flings back
And stands before them in his silk bliaut clad.
Bright are his eyes, haughty his countenance,
Handsome his body, and broad his bosom's span;
The peers all gaze, his bearing is so grand.
He says to Roland: "Fool! what has made thee mad?
I am thy step-sire, and all these know I am,
And me thou namest to seek Marsilion's camp!
If God but grant I ever thence come back
I'll wreak on thee such ruin and such wrack
That thy life long my vengeance shall not slack."
Roland replies: "This is all boast and brag!
Threats cannot fright me, and all the world knows that
To bear this message we must have a good man;
I'll take your place if the King says I can."

21

Quoth Ganelon: "My place thou shalt not take;
Thou'rt not my vassal, nor I thy suzerain.
Charles for his service commands me to obey.
I'll seek Marsile in Saragossa's gates;
But rather there some deadly trick I'll play
Than not find vent for my unbounded rage."
When Roland heard him, then he laughed in his face.

22

When Ganelon sees Roland laugh outright He's fit to burst for anger and despite,
And very nearly goes clean out of his mind.
He tells the Count: "I love you not, not I;
You've picked on me unfairly, out of spite.
Just Emperor, here I stand before your eyes,
Ready to do whatever you think right.

23

To Saragossa I see that I must shift me;
There's no return for him that journeys thither.
Bethink you well that my wife is your sister,
A son she bare me, fairest of goodly children,
"Baldwin" (quoth he) "and a champion he will be.
To him I leave all my lands and my living;
No more I'll see him; take care, Sir, of your kinsman."
Quoth Charles: "Your heart is too tender within you;
Go now you must, for even so I bid you."

24

Then said the King: "Stand forward, Ganelon,
Here at my hand receive the glove and wand;

You've heard the French—you are the man they want."
"Messire," said Guènes, "Roland hath done this wrong!
I'll never love him the whole of my life long,
Nor Oliver his friend and fellow fond,
Nor the Twelve Peers by whom he's doted on;
Sire, in your presence I defy the whole lot."
Then said the King: "Your passion is too hot;
I bid you go and so you must begone."
"Well may I go, but safeguard have I not, Basile had none, nor Basan none, God wot."

25

The King holds out to him his right-hand glove;
Fain would Count Guènes be an hundred miles off!
When he would take it, it fell into the dust.
"God! what is this?" cry all the French at once;
"For sure this message will bring us great ill-luck."
"My lords," quoth Guènes, "you'll know it soon enough."

26

"Sire, give me leave" quoth Guènes, "hence to hie; Since go I must, it boots not to abide."
"Go," said the King, "by Jesu's leave and mine."
With his right hand he's absolved him and signed,
And to his care letter and wand consigned.

27

Guènes the Count to his lodging makes speed,
Of his array he setteth him to seek
The best he has to serve him for this need.
His golden spurs he buckles on his heels,
Girds to his side Murgleys his brand of steel,
And mounts him up on Tachëbrun his steed;
His stirrup's held by Guinëmer his eme.
Then might you see full many a brave knight weep, Saying to him: "Woe worth your valour's meed!
In the King's court these many years you've been,
A noble vassal by all were you esteemed.
He that named you for this gear by his rede Charlemayn's self shall not save him nor shield:
No right had Roland to have contrived this scheme;
For you're a man sprung of a noble breed."
Then they said, "Sir, take us with you, we plead."
Guènes replied: "God forbid it should be!
Best die alone nor slay good knights with me.

342. absolved him and signed: i.e., pronounced the absolution over him, making the sign of the cross. Some commentators have seen here a relic of the very ancient popular conception of the priest-emperor, preserved in the legend of Prester John. But there is, I think, nothing in the line which necessarily ascribes sacerdotal status to Charlemagne, however sacred his person and function. What is probably intended is the prayer of absolution, frequently called simply the Absolution (as in the Book of Common Prayer) which can be pronounced by, for example, an abbess, or indeed any other lay person. It would be some such formula as "The Lord bless you and keep you, deliver you from all your sins, and bring you to everlasting life."

350. eme: uncle.

Sirs, you'll return to fair France presently:
On my behalf my wife I bid you greet,
And Pinabel that is my friend and peer.
Baldwin my son, whom you know well, I ween,
Him shall you help and accept for your liege."
Then he sets forth and on his way goes he.

28

Under tall olives the County Guènes rides;
The Paynim envoys he's caught up in good time,
And Blancandrin drops back with him behind.
Now each to other begins to speak with guile.
Blancandrin says: "Charles is a wondrous wight!
Pulia he's ta'en, Calabria likewise,
And unto England passed over the salt tide
To win St Peter the tribute of the isle.
What seeks he here, warring in our confines?"
"Such is his pleasure," Count Ganelon replies;
"In all the world you will not find his like."

29

Quoth Blancandrin: "The French are men of worth,
Yet to their lord they do a scurvy turn,
These dukes and counts, when they counsel such work;
Both him and others they harry to their hurt."
"There's none," quoth Guènes, "who merits such ill words,
Save only Roland, for whom 'twill be the worse.
But now, the Emperor in the cool shade conversed;
Up came his nephew all in his byrny girt,
Fresh with his booty from Carcassone returned.
Roland in hand a golden apple nursed
And showed his uncle, saying, 'Take it, fair sir;
The crowns I give you of all the kings on earth.'
One day his pride will undo him for sure,
Danger of death day by day he incurs.
If one should slay him some peace might be preserved."

30

Quoth Blancandrin: "Roland's a villain fell,
Presuming thus all folk on earth to quell,
And every land under his yoke compel!
Whom does he count on to lend his arms such strength?"
Ganelon answers: "He counts upon the French;
They'll never fail him, they love him far too well.
Silver and gold he gives them for largesse,
Horses and mules, silks and accoutrements.
And everything the Emperor wants, he gets—He'll win for him all lands 'twixt east and west."

375. the tribute of the isle: The annual tribute known as Peter's Pence, paid by England to the See of Rome, was of Anglo-Saxon origin and instituted in the eighth or ninth century, though not in consequence of political or military pressure by Charlemagne.

31

So long rides Guènes with Blancandrin that day
Till each to each has pledged his truth and faith
They will seek means Count Roland for to slay.
So long they ride, they come by road and way
To Saragossa, and by a yew draw rein.
A faldstool stood beneath a pine-tree's shade,
With silken cloth of Alexandria draped;
There sat the King that bore the rule in Spain.
Full twenty thousand Saracens stood arrayed.
Not one of them has any word to say,
So eagerly upon the news they wait.
And here come Guènes and Blancandrin apace!

32

Blancandrin came before Marsilion,
And by the hand held County Ganelon;
Saith to the King: "Save you, sir, by Mahond,
And by Apollyon, whose blest faith we extol!
To Charles we gave your message every jot;
Both of his hands he lifted up aloft
And praised his God; further, he answered not.
One of his nobles, you see, he's sent along—
A lord of France, of most illustrious stock;
From him you'll hear if peace is won or lost."
"We'll hear him," quoth Marsile; "let him say on."

33

Now Ganelon had giv'n this matter thought,
And with great cunning he now begins to talk,
Even as a man that's to the manner born.
He tells the King: "God have you in His ward,
The glorious God whom we ought to adore!
King Charlemayn, the Great, thus sends you word:
You must receive the faith of Christ Our Lord,
And as your fief half Spain he will award.
If you refuse to accept this accord,
You shall be taken and fettered by main force,
And haled away to Aix, into his court,
There to be doomed and done with once for all;
There shall you die in shamefulness and scorn."
On hearing this Marsile was quite distraught;
He held a dart with golden feathers wrought,
And would have struck him, but he was overborne.

34

The King Marsile has all his colour changed.
Grasping the shaft, his javelin he shakes.
When Guènes sees it he sets hand to his blade,
Two fingers' breadth forth of the scabbard hales,
And says to it: "Full bright you are and brave!

In the King's court I've borne you many a day!
Ne'er shall the Emperor of France have cause to say
I died alone in strange lands far away;
Before their bravest the price of you have paid!"
The Paynims cry: "We must prevent this fray."

35

The wiser Paynims remonstrate with him so
That King Marsile has sunk back on this throne.
Quoth the Caliph: "You put us to reproach,
Thinking to threaten this Frenchman with a blow!
It is your business to listen and take note."
Saith Ganelon: "All this, sir, must I thole.
For all the gold God made, I'll not forgo,
No, not for all the wealth your land can boast,
To speak the message—so I'm but given scope—
Which Charles the King, that mighty man of mould,
Has sent by me to this his mortal foe."
He had on him a sable-fur-lined cloak Covered with silk which Alexandria wove;
He flings it down for Blancandrin to hold,
But of his sword he nowise will let go;
In his right hand he grasps the hilts of gold,
The Paynims say: "Lo there a baron bold!"

36

Guènes approached the King and thus addressed him:
He saith to him: "You do vainly to vex you.
Carlon thus bids you, that hath France in possession:
The Christian faith must of you be accepted,
And one half Spain he will give you in tenure;
The other half is for Roland his nephew;
A right proud partner you'll have there for co-tenant!
If these conditions should by you be rejected,
In Saragossa he'll besiege and invest you,
And by main force you shall be se.zed and fettered.
Thence to his city of Aix you'll go directly.
You shall not ride on palfrey nor on destrier,
Nor for the road shall you have mule nor jennet;
On some poor screw of a pack-ass he'll set you;
And you will lose your head there by his sentence.
See now, the Emperor has written you this letter."
To the right hand of the Moor he presents it.

37

The King Marsile for very rage went white;
He breaks the seal and flings the wax aside,
Looks at the letter and reads what is inside.
"These words to me Carlon the French King writes:
I'm to remember his grief and his despite
For those two brothers, Basan and Basil hight,

458. thole: endure.

Whom I beheaded in Haltoye-on-the-Height;
And if I value the purchase of my life,
Must send my uncle the Caliph as his prize;
Else nevermore will he be friend of mine."
Marsilion's son at this broke in and cried:
"Ganelon's words are madness out of mind!
This is too much—he shall not rest alive;
Give him to me and justice he shall find!"
When Guènes heard, he shook his blade on high,
And set his back to the trunk of the pine.

38

Unto the orchard the King Marsile repairs;
Of his best men he takes with him a share,
And thither came Blancandrin white of hair,
And Jurfaret, who is his son and heir,
And the Caliph, his eme and officer.
Quoth Blancandrin: "Call in that Frenchman there:
He'll serve our ends, to this I've heard him swear."
"Fetch him yourself, 'twere best," the King declares.
In his right hand Count Ganelon he bare Into the orchard where king and council were.
So they begin to plot the treacherous snare.

39

"Guènes, fair sir," said Marsile, "I allow,
Something too lightly I treated you just now
When in my fury I would have struck you down;
But by these pelts of sable fur I vow,
Which of good gold are worth five hundred pounds, Richly I'll quite you ere the next day be out."
"This I refuse not," said Ganelon the Count;
"God, if He please, shall balance the account."

40

"Truly, Count Guènes," then said the King Marsile.
"I have in mind your right good friend to be.
Of Charlemayn fain would I hear you speak.
He's very old, a hard life his has been;
Two hundred years and more I know he's seen;
In lands so many his body he's fatigued,
Hard strokes so many he's taken on his shield,
Rich kings so many he's brought to beggary—
When will he weary of fighting in the field?"
"That's not his way," said Guènes, "in the least.
None knows the Emperor, or looks upon his mien,
But says of him: 'A right great man is he.'
Howe'er I sounded his praise and his esteem,
His worth and honour would still outrun my theme.
His mighty valour who could proclaim in speech?
God kindled in him a courage so supreme,
He'd rather die than fail his knights at need."

41

The Paynim said: "I marvel in my thought,
At Charlemayn, that is so old and hoar!
I know he's lived two hundred years and more.
In lands so many his body he's forworn,
Sharp strokes so many of lance and spear has borne,
Rich kings so many beggared and brought to naught—
When will he weary of going to the wars?"
"Never," said Guènes, "while Roland still bears sword;
There's none so valiant beneath the heavens broad,
Oliver too, his friend, is a brave lord;
And the Twelve Peers whom Charles so much adores
Protect the vanward with knights a thousand score;
Charles is secure, he fears no man at all."

42

The Paynim said: "I marvel in my mind
At Charlemayn whose head is old and white.
Two hundred years, I know, have passed him by.
In lands so many he's conquered far and wide,
Lance-thrusts so many he's taken in the strife,
Rich kings so many brought to a beggar's plight—
When will he weary of going forth to fight?"
"Never," said Guènes, "while Roland sees the light;
'Twixt east and west his valour has no like,
Oliver too, his friend, is a brave knight;
And the twelve Peers, in whom the King delights,
With twenty thousand Frenchmen to vanward ride:
Charles is secure, he fears no man alive."

43

"Guènes, fair sir," then said the King directly,
"I have an army, you will not find a better,
Four hundred thousand good knights as I may reckon:
Can I give battle to Carlon and his Frenchmen?" Guènes replies: "Not you, and so I tell you,
For of your Paynims the losses would be deadly.
Leave all this folly, come to your sober senses.
Send to the Emperor so huge a heap of treasure
That all the French will marvel at its splendour.
For twenty sureties, that you will likewise send him,
Back to fair France Charles will return contented,
Leaving behind a rear-guard to protect him.
With them, I warrant, will be Roland his nephew,
Oliver too, the valorous and gentle.
Dead are these Counts, if you will give me credit.
Carlon will see his great pride fall'n and ended;
He'll have no heart to fight with you from henceforth."

44

"Guènes, fair sir," [the King Marsilion cries,]
"What must I do to bring Roland to die?"

"I'll tell you that," Count Ganelon replies.
"At Sizer Gate the King will have arrived,
Leaving a rear-guard to keep the pass behind.
There'll be his nephew Count Roland, the great knight,
Oliver too, on whom he most relies.
With twenty thousand good Frenchmen at their side.
An hundred thousand send of your Paynim kind,
And these shall first engage the French in fight.
Of the French force the loss will not be light—
Yours will be slaughtered, and that I'll not disguise!
The like assault you'll launch a second time,
And, first or last, Roland will not get by.
You will have done a deed of arms full fine;
You'll ne'er again see war in all your life.

45

Whoso should smite the County Roland dead,
From Carlon's body then were the right hand reft;
The wondrous armies would dwindle off and melt,
Nor could Charles gather so great a host afresh;
Our fathers' land would thus find peace and rest."
When he heard this Marsile fell on his neck,
And straightway bad them unlock his treasure-chests.

46

Then said Marsile: "One thing alone remains:
There's no good bond where there is no good faith;
Give me your oath Count Roland to betray."
Guènes replies: "It shall be as you say."
Upon the relics of his good sword Murgleys
He sware the treason and sware his faith away.

47

There was a faldstool of ivory all wrought;
Marsile commands a volume to be brought
Of Termagant's and of Mahomet's law;
The Saracen of Spain thereon has sworn
That in the rear-guard Count Roland shall be sought;
If there he find him, he'll fight with his whole force,
And do his best to slay him once for all.
Guènes replies: "And may it so befall!"

48

Lo, now! there comes a Paynim, Valdebron;
He stands before the King Marsilion,
And gaily laughing he says to Ganelon:
"Here, take my sword, a better blade is none.

585. Sizer Gate: Port de Sizer, or Sizre (the spelling varies): This is the pass now called the Col de Cize, which cuts through the Pyrenees on the road running from St.-Jean-Pied-de-Port by way of Roncevaux to Pampeluna, and forms the Gate of Spain.

602. Our fathers' land: France.

612. a volume: the Koran (?).

A thousand mangons are in the hilt thereof;
'Tis yours, fair, sir, for pure affection,
For help against Roland the champion,
If in the rear-guard we find him as we want."
Quoth Ganelon to him: "It shall be done."
They kiss each other the cheek and chin upon.

49

Thereafter comes a Paynim, Climborin,
And laughing gaily to Ganelon begins:
"Come, take my helm, I ne'er saw none so rich:
[Above the nasal a carbuncle there is.
Out of pure friendship I offer you this gift]
If against Roland you'll aid us by your wit
That we may bring a shameful death on him."
"It shall be done," quoth Ganelon to this;
They kissed each other upon the mouth and chin.

50

Then to the Count Queen Bramimonda spoke:
"Dearly, fair sir, I love you, by my troth,
My king so·lauds you, and his vassals also.
This pair of owches on your wife I bestow,
Heavy with jacinth and amethyst and gold;
More worth are they than all the wealth of Rome,
The like of them your Emperor never owned."
He takes the jewels and thrusts them in his poke.

51

The King calls Malduit, the keeper of his treasure:
"King Carlon's gifts, have you yet got them ready?"
And he replies, "Yea, sire, in ample measure:
Sev'n hundred camels laden with precious metal,
And twenty sureties, the noblest under heaven."

52

Marsilion's hand on Guènes' shoulder lies;
He says to him: "You are both bold and wise.
Now by that faith which seems good in your eyes
Let not your heart turn back from our design.
Treasure I'll give you, a great and goodly pile,
Ten mule-loads gold, digged from Arabian mines;
No year shall pass but you shall have the like.
Take now the keys of this great burg of mine,
Offer King Charles all its riches outright.
Make sure that Roland but in the rear-guard rides,
And if in pass or passage I him find I'll give him battle right bitter to abide."
"I think," said Guènes, "that I am wasting time."
He mounts his horse and on his journey hies.

623. mangons: Saracen gold coins.
641. owches: brooches (?).
645. poke: pouch.

53

The Emperor now returns upon his way
And has arrived before the town of Gayne (Count Roland took it and all its wall down-razed,
An hundred years thereafter it lay waste;)
And there the King for news of Guènes waits,
And for the tribute of the great land of Spain.
In the white dawn, at breaking of the day,
Into the camp the County Guènes came.

54

Early that day the Emperor leaves his bed.
Matins and mass the King has now heard said;
On the green grass he stood before his tent.
Roland was with him, brave Oliver as well,
Naimon the Duke and many another yet.
Then perjured Guènes the traitor comes to them
And starts to speak with cunning false pretence.
He tells the King: "To you (whom God defend!)
Of Saragossa the keys I here present.
I bring you also wealth to your heart's content,
And twenty sureties: see they be closely kept.
The valiant king, Marsile, this message sends:
The Caliph's absence he prays you'll not resent.
Mine own eyes saw four hundred thousand men
In hauberk armed, some having laced their helms,
And girt with swords whose hilts were richly gemmed,
Attend him forth; to the sea-shore they went.
The faith of Christ they'd keep not, nor accept,
And for this cause they from Marsilion fled.
But ere they'd sailed four leagues, maybe, or less,
Black wind and storm and tempest on them fell;
They were all drowned; they'll ne'er be seen again.
Had he been living I would have had him fetched.
Now, as regards the Paynim King himself:
Believe me, sire, before a month is sped
He'll follow you to France, to your own realm.
There he'll receive the faith that you profess,
There with joined hands to you his fealty pledge,
And hold from you in fief the Spanish realm."
Then said the King: "The name of God be blest!
Well have you done: I shall reward you well."
Throughout the host a thousand trumpets swell,
The French strike camp, their goods on sumpters set;
Home to fair France behold them all addressed.

. . .

55

King Charlemayn has spoiled the Spanish borders,
He's taken castles, put cities to the slaughter;

683. twenty sureties: This is the last we hear of the hostages, whose ultimate fate is not mentioned.

Now the King says he has ended his warfare.
Home to fair France the Emperor turns his horses.
Pennon to lancehead Count Roland now has corded;
High on a hillock he displays it abroad there.
In fields all round the French set up their quarters.
Through the wide valleys the Paynim hosts go forward,
[All fully armed,] accoutred in their corslets,
Their helms laced on, and their swords in the sword-belt,
Shields on their necks, and their lances well ordered.
High on the mountains in a thicket they've halted:
Four hundred thousand they wait there for the morning;
God! it is grievous that the French have no warning!

56

The day goes down, dark follows on the day.
The Emperor sleeps, the mighty Charlemayn.
He dreamed he stood in Sizer's lofty gate,
Holding in hand his ashen lance full great.
Count Ganelon takes hold of it, and shakes,
And with such fury he wrenches it and breaks
That high as heaven the flinders fly away.
Carlon sleeps on, he sleeps and does not wake.

57

After this dream he had another dream:
That in his chapel at Aix in France was he;
In his right arm a fierce bear set its teeth.
Forth from Ardennes he saw a leopard speed,
That with rash rage his very body seized.
Then from the hall ran in a greyhound fleet,
And came to Carlon by gallops and by leaps.
From the first brute it bit the right ear clean,
And to the leopard gives battle with great heat.
The French all say the fight is good to see,
But none can guess which shall the victor be.
Carlon sleeps on; he wakes not from his sleep.

58

The night is past and the clear dawn is showing.
[A thousand trumpets] are sounded for the hosting.
The Emperor rides full lordly in his going.
"Barons, my lords," quoth Charlemayn, "behold now
These lofty passes, these narrows winding closely—Say, who shall have the rearguard now to hold them?"
Quoth Ganelon: "I name my nephew Roland;
You have no baron who can beat him for boldness."
When the King heard, a stern semblance he showed him:

710–711: The scribe has perhaps omitted a line or two here, mentioning where Charlemagne and his army have got to. We learn from laisse 58 that they have reached the entrance to the pass, at the foot of the Pyrenees.

731 ff. a fierce bear, etc.: The bear is presumably Ganelon, as in laisse 186; the leopard, Marsilion; the greyhound, Roland.

"A fiend incarnate you are indeed," he told him;
"Malice hath ta'en possession of you wholly!
Who then should keep the vanguard of my progress?"
Quoth Ganelon: "Ogier the Dane I vote for;
You have no baron can do it with more prowess."

59

When Roland hears what he's appointed to,
He makes reply as knighthood bids him do:
"My noble stepsire, I owe you gratitude
That I'm assigned the rearguard at your suit.
Charles, King of France, the loss shall never rue
Of steed or palfrey thereby, I warrant you,
No saddle-beast, nor hinny neither mule,
Pack-horse nor sumpter thereby he shall not lose,
Save first the sword have paid the reckoning due."
Quoth Ganelon: "I know it; you speak truth."

60

When Roland hears that to the rearward guard
His stepsire names him, he speaks in wrath of heart:
"Ah! coward wretch, foul felon, baseborn carle, Didst think the glove would fall from out my grasp
As did the wand from thine, before King Charles?"

61

"Just Emperor," then besought Count Roland bold,
"From your right hand deliver me your bow;
No man, I swear, shall utter the reproach
That I allowed it to slip from out my hold
As did the wand that Ganelon let go."
The Emperor sits with his head bended low,
On cheek and chin he plucks his beard for woe,
He cannot help but let the tears o'erflow.

62

Straightway thereon comes Naimon to the King—
No better vassal in court did ever sit.
He says to him: "You've listened to all this;
The County Roland is angered to the quick;
The rear-guard now has been adjudged to him
And you've no baron can ever make him quit.
Give him the bow now bended in your grip,
And find good men to aid him in this shift."
So the King gives it, and Roland seizes it.

752. who then should keep the vanguard?: i.e., in Roland's place, since he usually takes command there with the other peers (see ll. 549–550, 561–562).

769. the wand: the mention of the wand, here and in l. 774, seems to be a lapse of memory on the poet's part. Actually (333–335) it was the glove that Ganelon let fall.

771. your bow: the use of a bow as the token of an appointment does not seem to be very usual, nor is it clear why Charlemagne should have one in his hand, since the bow was not reckoned as a "noble" weapon, except for use in hunting. Later MSS substitute, or add, the more customary glove or standard.

63

To Roland then the King his uncle said:
"Nephew, fair sir, hear now and heed me well:
Half of my army I'll leave you for this stead;
Keep them with you and you'll be safe with them."
The Count said: "No; I never will consent;
May God confound me if I shame my descent!
A thousand score I'll keep of valiant French.
Safe through the passes go you with confidence;
Never fear man so long as I draw breath."

64

Roland the Count mounts on his destrier.
Comes then to him his comrade Oliver,
And Gerin comes and brave Count Gerier,
And Othon comes and so does Berenger,
Old Anseis, and Astor, great of worth,
And Gerard too, Roussillon's haughty earl;
And with them comes the rich Duke Gaïfer.
Quoth the Archbishop: "By Heav'n, I'm with you, sirs!"
"And so am I," Walter the Count affirms,
"I'm Roland's man, him am I bound to serve!"
Knights twenty thousand they choose for followers.

65

To Walter Hum Count Roland gives command:
"A thousand French take, of our own French land,
And hold the gorges and heights on either hand;
Nor let the Emperor lose from his side one man."
Quoth Walter: "Mine to do as you demand."
With thousand French of France their own dear land
On gorge and hill Count Walter holds the flanks;
Come what come may he'll never quit his stand
Till from the sheath have flashed sev'n hundred brands.
King Almeric, lord of Balferna's strand,
That day shall give hard battle to their band.

66

High are the hills, the valleys dark and deep,
Grisly the rocks, and wonderous grim the steeps.
The French pass through that day with pain and grief;
The bruit of them was heard full fifteen leagues.
But when at length their fathers' land they see,
Their own lord's land, the land of Gascony,
Then they remember their honours and their fiefs,

801. Gerard of Roussillon: not Roussillon in the Pyrenees, but a hill in Burgundy (now Mont Lassois), near the Abbey of Pothières, which was founded, together with the Abbey of Vèzelay by the historical Gerard. His exploits are celebrated in the Chanson de Geste which bears his name.

805. man: i.e., vassal.

816. The engagement between Almeric and Walter Hum is not described in the poem; its results are mentioned in laisse 152.

Sweethearts and wives whom they are fain to greet,
Not one there is for pity doth not weep.
Charles most of all a boding sorrow feels,
His nephew's left the Spanish gates to keep;
For very ruth he cannot choose but weep.

67

All the twelve peers in Spain are left behind,
Full twenty thousand stout Frenchmen at their side;
Valiant they are, and have no fear to die.
To land of France the Emperor homeward hies.
And still his face beneath his cloak he hides.
Close at his rein the good Duke Naimon rides;
He asks the King: "What troubles thus your mind?"
"This is ill done," quoth Charles, "to ask me why!
So much I grieve I cannot choose but sigh.
Through Ganelon fair France is ruined quite.
An angel showed me a vision in the night,
How in my hand he broke my lance outright,
He that my nephew to the rear-guard assigned.
In foreign marches abandoned, Roland bides—God! if I lose him I shall not find his like."

68

King Charlemayn from tears cannot refrain;
Full hundred thousand, the French grieve for his sake,
And for Count Roland are wondrously afraid.
Him has the false lord Ganelon betrayed;
Vast the reward the paynim king has paid:
Silver and gold, and cloth of silk and saye,
Horses and mules, camels and beasts of prey.
Marsile has called the barony of Spain;
His viscounts, counts, almanzors stand arrayed,
Dukes and emirs, and youths of high estate;
Four hundred thousand he's summoned in three days.
In Saragossa he bids his tabors play;
Mahound their idol high on the tower they raise,
And every Paynim adores and gives it praise.
Then by forced marches their army hastes away,
Through Terracerta they ride by hill and dale.
Now have they seen French gonfalons displayed.
The twelve companions who in the rear-guard wait
Mean to give battle, and none shall say them nay.

69

Marsilion's nephew trips out before the throng,
Riding a mule which he whips with a wand;
He tells his uncle with laughter on his tongue:

843. marches: the frontier region of a province; the province itself.
850. saye: a fine cloth of silk and wool.
860. Terracerta: Tere Certaine, possibly Cerdagne, the region about Catalonia.
864. Marsilion's nephew: His name, as we learn in l. 1192, is Adelroth.

"Fair sir and king, I've served you well and long;
Much have I suffered, much labour undergone,
Many fields fought, and many battles won!
First blow at Roland is the reward I want;
With my sharp sword I'll split him through the sconce!
Yea, if I find good favour with Mahond,
I'll set Spain free, unloosing of her bonds
From Gate of Spain to Durstant and beyond.
Charles will lose heart, the French will yield anon,
You shall be quit of wars your whole life long."
He gets the glove from King Marsilion.

70

Marsilion's nephew holds the glove in his fist:
Unto his uncle thus proudly he begins:
"Fair sire and king, you've made me a great gift.
Find me twelve lords, the best that you can pick.
'Gainst the twelve peers our valour for to pit."
The first that answers is Falsaron to wit,
He was own brother unto Marsile the king:
"You and I, nephew, will gladly go to it.
In very deed this battle will we give
To Carlon's rearward that guards his host for him:
The thing is done! by us they'll all be killed."

71

King Corsablis now springs from out the host,
Barbarian born, the magic art he knows.
Like a brave man thus valiantly he spoke:
"No coward I, no, not for all God's gold!"

. . .

Malprimis of Brigale comes spurring bold,
He'll run afoot swifter than steed can go;
With a loud voice before Marsile he boasts:
"I'll bear my body with you to Roncevaux:
If I find Roland I'll fight till he's laid low."

72

From Balaguet there cometh an Emir;
His form is noble, his eyes are bold and clear,
When on his horse he's mounted in career
He bears him bravely armed in his battle-gear,
And for his courage he's famous far and near;
Were he but Christian, right knightly he'd appear.
Before Marsile he cries for all to hear:
"To Roncevaux," saith he, "my course I'll steer;
If I find Roland, then death shall be his weird,

870. first blow at Roland (le colp de Roland): The privilege of striking the first blow in the battle was much sought after. In l. 3200 we find Malpramis, the son of the Emir Baligant, similarly demanding of his father the honor (le coup) in the battle with Charlemagne. The commander in chief bestows the honor by handing over his glove in token (l. 877).

892–893. A few lines seem to have been omitted here, completing Corsablis's speech of defiance.

906. weird: doom.

And Oliver's, and all of the Twelve Peers!
The French shall die the death in shame and tears.
King Charlemayn, the dotard old and blear,
Will soon be sick of waging warfare here!
Spain shall be ours in peace this many a year!"
The King Marsile pours thanks into his ears.

73

Comes an Almanzor, a lord of Moriane,
There's no worse villain in all the land of Spain.
Before Marsilion his bragging boast he makes:
"To Roncevaux I'll lead my people straight,
Full twenty thousand with spear and lance arrayed.
If I meet Roland I'll kill him, by my faith!
No day shall dawn but Carlon shall bewail."

74

And next there comes Turgis of Tortelosa;
A count he is, and the whole city owneth;
A right ill will to Christian men he showeth.
Before Marsile with the rest he enrolls him.
He tells the King: "Fear not for any foeman!
Mahound's worth more than St Peter the Roman;
Serve him; the field is ours and ours the trophy!
To Roncevaux I go to meet with Roland;
There shall he die; he shall have help of no man.
See here my sword, how long it is and noble;
'Gainst Durendal I'll measure it right boldly;
Which shall prevail you'll not be long in knowing.
The French shall die if they dare to oppose us;
Carlon the old shall be grieving and groaning;
Crown nevermore shall he wear from that moment."

75

And Escremiz of Valterne is the next;
He owns that fief, and he's a Saracen;
Before Marsile he shouts amid the press:
"To Ronceval I go to stoop their crests.
If I find Roland, there shall he lose his head,
And Oliver, who's captain of the rest;
The whole Twelve Peers are all marked out for death.
The French shall die and France shall be bereft.
Few men of worth to Carlon shall be left."

76

Next comes a Paynim, called Estorgan by name, Estramarin his comrade with him came;
Foul felons both and knavish traitors they.
Then said Marsile: "My lords, draw near, I pray;
Through Roncevaux you mean to force your way,
And lead my troops, and lend us your best aid."
And they reply: "Command, and we obey.
Both Oliver and Roland we'll assail,

Of the Twelve Peers none shall survive the fray.
Sharp are our swords and goodly are the blades,
All in hot blood we'll dye them red this day;
The French shall die, and Carlon shall bewail.
A gift we'll make you of the home of their race;
Come with us, King, and see how goes the game,
And as a gift we'll give you Charlemayn."

77

Then comes at speed Margaris of Seville,
Who holds his land as far as Cazmarin.
Ladies all love him, so beautiful he is,
She that beholds him has a smile on her lips,
Will she or nill she, she laughs for very bliss,
And there's no Paynim his match for chivalry.
He joins the throng and cries unto the King Loudest of all: "Never you fear a whit!
In Roncevaux this Roland I'll go kill,
Nor Oliver shall any longer live;
All the Twelve Peers we'll cut in little bits.
Lo! here my sword with golden pummel gilt!
Th' Emir of Primes gave it me for a gift,
I swear I'll dye it vermilion to the hilt.
The French shall die and France in shame shall sit.
Old greybeard Charles shall never live, I think,
One day but what he'll rage and weep for this.
France can be ours in a year if we will;
In Saint-Denis we'll eat and sleep our fill."
The Paynim King makes deep salaam to him.

78

And last there comes Chernubles of Munigre;
His unshorn hair hangs trailing to his feet.
He for his sport can shoulder if he please
More weight than four stout sumpter-mules can heave.
He dwells in regions wherein, so 'tis believed,
Sun never shines nor springs one blade of wheat,
No rain can fall, no dew is ever seen,
There, every stone is black as black can be,
And some folk say it's the abode of fiends.
Chernubles saith: "My sword's girt in the sheath;
In Roncevaux red blood shall dye it deep.
Should Roland cross my path, that doughty chief,
And I not smite him, never put faith in me!
To this my blade his Durendal shall yield,
The French shall die, and France be left bereaved."
This said, the whole Twelve Champions are convened;
One hundred thousand stout Saracens they lead.
Each one afire with zeal to do great deeds.
Beneath a pine-grove they arm them for the field.

977. Saint Denis: a town near Paris with a famous abbey, founded by Dagobert in 626, the burial place of the kings of France.

79

Now are the Paynims in Sarsen hauberks dight
Whereof the most with triple mail are lined;
Good Saragossa helms they lace on tight,
Swords of Viana steel gird on their thighs;
Spears of Valence they have, and shields full fine,
Their gonfalons are scarlet, blue, and white.
They leave their mules, their palfreys leave behind,
And mount their steeds; in serried ranks they ride.
Fair was the day, the sun shone clear and bright,
No piece of harness but glittered in the light.
A thousand trumpets ring out for more delight.
Great is the noise; it reaches the French lines.
Quoth Oliver: "I think, companion mine,
We'll need this day with Saracens to fight."
Roland replies: "I hope to God you're right!
Here must we stand to serve on the King's side.
Men for their lords great hardship must abide,
Fierce heat and cold endure in every clime,
Lose for his sake, if need be, skin and hide.
Look to it now! Let each man stoutly smite!
No shameful songs be sung for our despite!
Paynims are wrong, Christians are in the right!
Ill tales of me shall no man tell, say I!"

80

Oliver's climbed upon a hilly crest,
Looks to his right along a grassy cleft,
And sees the Paynims and how they ride addressed.
To his companion Roland he calls and says:
"I see from Spain a tumult and a press—
Many bright hauberks, and many a shining helm!
A day of wrath, they'll make it for our French.
Ganelon knew it, false heart and traitor fell;
When to the Emperor he named us for this stead!"
Quoth Roland: "Silence, Count Oliver, my friend!
He is my stepsire, I will have no word said."

81

Oliver's climbed a hill above the plain,
Whence he can look on all the land of Spain,
And see how vast the Saracen array;
All those bright helms with gold and jewels gay,
And all those shields, those coats of burnished mail;
And all those lances from which the pennons wave;
Even their squadrons defy all estimate,
He cannot count them, their numbers are so great;
Stout as he is, he's mightily dismayed.
He hastens down as swiftly as he may,
Comes to the French and tells them all his tale.

82

Quoth Oliver: "The Paynim strength I've seen; Never on earth has such a hosting been:

A hundred thousand in van ride under shield
Their helmets laced, their hauberks all agleam,
Their spears upright, with heads of shining steel.
You'll have such battle as ne'er was fought on field.
My lords of France, God give you strength at need!
Save you stand fast, this field we cannot keep."
The French all say: "Foul shame it were to flee!
We're yours till death; no man of us will yield."

83

Quoth Oliver: "Huge are the Paynim hordes,
And of our French the numbers seem but small.
Companion Roland, I pray you sound your horn,
That Charles may hear and fetch back all his force."
Roland replies: "Madman were I and more,
And in fair France my fame would suffer scorn.
I'll smite great strokes with Durendal my sword,
I'll dye it red high as the hilt with gore.
This pass the Paynims reached on a luckless morn;
I swear to you death is their doom therefor."

84

"Companion Roland, your Olifant now sound!
King Charles will hear and turn his armies round;
He'll succour us with all his kingly power."
Roland replies: "May never God allow
That I should cast dishonour on my house
Or on fair France bring any ill renown!
Rather will I with Durendal strike out,
With this good sword, here on my baldrick bound;
From point to hilt you'll see the blood run down.
Woe worth the Paynims that e'er they made this rout!
I pledge my faith, we'll smite them dead on ground."

85

"Companion Roland, your Olifant now blow;
Charles in the passes will hear it as he goes,
Trust me, the French will all return right so."
"Now God forbid," Roland makes answer wroth,
"That living man should say he saw me go Blowing of horns for any Paynim foe!
Ne'er shall my kindred be put to such reproach.
When I shall stand in this great clash of hosts
I'll strike a thousand and then sev'n hundred strokes,
Blood-red the steel of Durendal shall flow.
Stout are the French, they will do battle bold,
These men of Spain shall die and have no hope."

1063. Olifant: The word (which is a form of "elephant") means (a) "ivory," (b) "a horn made of ivory," and is used specifically, almost as a proper name, to denote Roland's horn, made of an elephant's tusk, and aborned with gold and jewels about the rim.

86

Quoth Oliver: "Herein I see no blame:
I have beheld the Saracens of Spain;
They cover all the mountains and the vales,
They spread across the hillsides and the plains;
Great is the might these foreigners display,
And ours appears a very small array."
"I thirst the more," quoth Roland, "for the fray.
God and His angels forbid it now, I pray,
That e'er by me fair France should be disfamed!
I'd rather die than thus be put to shame;
If the King loves us it's for our valour's sake."

87

Roland is fierce and Oliver is wise
And both for valour may bear away the prize.
Once horsed and armed the quarrel to decide,
For dread of death the field they'll never fly.
The counts are brave, their words are stern and high.
Now the false Paynims with wondrous fury ride.
Quoth Oliver: "Look, Roland, they're in sight.
Charles is far off, and these are very nigh;
You would not sound your Olifant for pride;
Had we the Emperor we should have been all right.
To Gate of Spain turn now and lift your eyes,
See for yourself the rear-guard's woeful plight.
Who fights this day will never more see fight."
Roland replies: "Speak no such foul despite!
Curst be the breast whose heart knows cowardice!
Here in our place we'll stand and here abide:
Buffets and blows be ours to take and strike!"

88

When Roland sees that battle there must be Leopard nor lion ne'er grew so fierce as he.
He calls the French, bids Oliver give heed:
"Sir friend and comrade, such words you shall not speak!
When the King gave us the French to serve this need
These twenty thousand he chose to do the deed;
And well he knew not one would flinch or flee.
Men must endure much hardship for their liege,
And bear for him great cold and burning heat,
Suffer sharp wounds and let their bodies bleed.
Smite with your lance and I with my good steel,
My Durendal the Emperor gave to me:
And if I die, who gets it may agree
That he who bore it, a right good knight was he."

89

Then to their side comes the Archbishop Turpin, Riding his horse and up the hillside spurring.

He calls the French and preaches them a sermon:
"Barons, my lords, Charles picked us for this purpose;
We must be ready to die in our King's service.
Christendom needs you, so help us to preserve it.
Battle you'll have, of that you may be certain,
Here come the Paynims—your own eyes have observed them.
Now beat your breasts and ask God for His mercy:
I will absolve you and set your souls in surety.
If you should die, blest martyrdom's your guerdon;
You'll sit on high in Paradise eternal."
The French alight and all kneel down in worship;
God's shrift and blessing the Archbishop conferreth,
And for their penance he bids them all strike firmly.

90

The French rise up and on their feet stand close;
All of their sins are shriven and made whole,
And the Archbishop God's blessing has bestowed.
Then on swift steeds they leap to saddle-bow.
Armed with the arms prescribed by knightly code;
All are now ready into the field to go.
Count Roland said to Oliver right so:
"Sir my companion, too true the word you spoke,
That all of us by Ganelon were sold.
He's ta'en his wage of wealth and goods and gold.
The Emperor's vengeance I think will not be slow!
Marsile the King has bargained for our bones:
He'll need the sword to fetch his purchase home."

91

Through Gate of Spain Roland goes riding past
On Veillantif, his swiftly-running barb;
Well it becomes him to go equipped in arms,
Bravely he goes, and tosses up his lance,
High in the sky he lifts the lancehead far,
A milk-white pennon is fixed above the shaft
Whose falling fringes whip his hands on the haft.
Nobly he bears him, with open face he laughs;
And his companion behind him follows hard;
The Frenchmen all acclaim him their strong guard.
On Saracens he throws a haughty glance
But meek and mild looks on the men of France,
To whom he speaks out of a courteous heart:
"Now, my lord barons, at walking pace—advance!
Looking for trouble these Paynims ride at large—
A fine rich booty we'll have ere this day's past;
Never French king beheld the like by half."
E'en as he speaks, their battles join and charge.

92

Quoth Oliver: "I have no more to say:
To sound your horn for help you would not deign,

So here you are, you've not got Charlemayn;
Little he knows, brave heart! he's not to blame.
Nor those with him, nowise in fault are they.
Ride forward then and do the best you may!
Barons my lords, hold firm amid the fray!
Now for God's sake be resolute, I pray,
To strike hard blows, to give them and to take.
King Carlon's war-cry forget not to proclaim!"
A mighty shout the Frenchmen give straightway;
Whoso had heard the cry "Mountjoy" they raise
He would remember its valiance all his days.
They charge—Lord God, was ever sight so brave?
They spur their steeds to make the greater haste,
They fall afighting—there is no other way—
The Saracens join battle undismayed;
Paynims and Franks are fighting face to face.

93

Now Adelroth, (he was King Marsile's nephew),
Before the host comes first of all his fellows;
With evil words the French he thus addresses:
"Villainous Franks, with us you have to reckon!
You've been betrayed by him that should protect you,
Your king lacked wit who in the passes left you.
Fair France will lose her honour in this venture;
From Carlon's body the right arm will be severed."
When Roland hears him, God! but his rage is reckless!
He spurs his horse, gives full rein to his mettle,
His blow he launches with all his mightiest effort;
The shield he shatters, and the hauberk he rendeth,
He splits the breast and batters in the breast bone,
Through the man's back drives out the backbone bended,
And soul and all forth on the spear-point fetches;
Clean through he thrusts him, forth of the saddle wrenching,
And flings him dead a lance-length from his destrier;
Into two pieces he has broken his neckbone.
No less for that he speaks to him and tells him:
"Out on thee, churl! no lack-wit is the Emperor,
He is none such, nor loved he treason ever;
Right well he did who in the passes left us,
Neither shall France lose honour by this venture.
First blood to us! Go to it, gallant Frenchmen!
Right's on our side, and wrong is with these wretches!"

94

A duke was there, he was named Falsaron,
Brother was he to King Marsilion,

1185. Mountjoy: A mountjoy (montjoie) was (according to Littré) a mound or cairn of stones set up to mark the site of a victory. The old French war cry, "Montjoie St.-Denis!" or, briefly, "Montjoie!" derived from the cairn set up at St.-Denis on the site of the saint's martyrdom (his spiritual victory). Others derive "Montjoie" from the Hill of Rama, called "Mons Gaudii," from which pilgrims obtained their first view of Jerusalem.

Abiram's land and Dathan's did he own;
Under the sky was no worse villain known;
Between the eyes his brow was broad of bone,
A full half-foot is measured, I suppose.
His nephew's death he bitterly bemoans;
Forth of the press he gallops out alone,
The Paynim war-cry he utters as he goes,
And on the French an evil taunt bestows:
"Fair France this day shall find her honour flown!"
Oliver's heard him, great wrath within him grows,
Into his horse he strikes his spurs of gold,
Right baronly he rides to smite the foe.
He breaks the shield, he cleaves the hauberk close,
Clean through his breast drives lance and pennon both,
A spear's length flings him dead from the saddle-bow;
Looks down and sees the infidel lie low
And thus upbraids him in a right haughty tone:
"Churl, for your threats I do not care a groat!
French lords, strike on! we'll have them all o'erthrown."
King Carlon's war-cry, "Mountjoy!" he shouts full bold.

95

A king was there, his name was Corsablis,
From a far land he came, from Barbary;
The Saracens he calls, and thus he speaks:
"Well are we placed this field of arms to keep;
For of these Franks the number is but weak,
And we may well despise the few we see.
Charles cannot come to help them in their need,
This is the day their deaths are all decreed!"
Archbishop Turpin has listened to his speech,
And hates him worse than any man that breathes.
His golden spurs he strikes into his steed,
And rides against him right valiant for the deed.
He breaks the buckler, he's split the hauberk's steel,
Into his breast driven the lance head deep,
He spits him through, on high his body heaves,
And hurls him dead a spear's length o'er the lea.
Earthward he looks and sees him at his feet,
But yet to chide him he none the less proceeds:
"Vile infidel, you lied between your teeth!
Charles my good lord to help us will not cease,
Nor have our French the least desire to flee.
These friends of yours stock-still we're like to leave;
Here's news for you—you'll die, and there you'll be.
Frenchmen, strike home! forget not your high breed!
This first good stroke is ours, God's gramercy!"
He shouts "Mountjoy!" to hearten all the field.

96

And Gerin strikes Malprimis of Brigale;
No penny-piece the stubborn shield avails;
The crystal boss he splinters all in twain,
That half the buckler falls down upon the plain:

Through to the flesh he cleaves the hauberk-mail,
Through to the heart he drives the good spear straight;
The paynim falls flat down with all his weight.
Then Satan comes and hales his soul away.

97

Gerier his friend on the Emir runs in,
Shatters the shield and bursts the byrny-rings,
Clean through the guts the trusty spear he swings,
Thrusts it well in, then out at back with it;
A whole spear's length on field the body flings:
Quoth Oliver: "We're doing well with this!"

98

Samson the Duke on the Almanzor runs:
Through gilded shield and painted flowers he thrusts;
Nought for defence avails the hauberk tough,
He splits his heart, his liver, and his lung,
And strikes him dead, weep any or weep none.
Cries the Archbishop: "This feat was knightly done!"

99

And Anseïs gives rein to his good steed,
He runs on Turgis of Tortelose at speed;
Under the boss of gold he cleaves the shield,
And of the hauberk the double mail unseams,
Into his body strikes home the head of steel,
Through to his back he drives the point out clean,
A full spear's length he flings him dead on field.
Quoth Roland: "Lo! that was a valiant feat!"

100

And Engelier the Gascon of Bordeaux
Spurs his good steed, slacks rein and lets him go;
With Escrimiz, Valterna's lord, he's closed,
Off from his neck the splintered buckler broke.
The hauberk's ventail he's shattered with the stroke.
He splits his throat between the collar-bones,
A full spear's length dead from the saddle throws;
Then says to him: "The devil take thy soul!"

101

And Othon strikes a Paynim, Estorgant,
Full in mid-chief he smites the shield point-blank,
So that the white splits and the scarlet cracks;
The skirt of mail he's riven through and smashed,
Into his body the cleaving spear he rams;
From his swift steed he hurls him dead on land,
"And now," says he, "find comfort if you can!"

102

Then Berenger drives at Estramarin,
He cleaves the shield, and the good hauberk splits,
On his stout spear the trunk of him he spits

And flings him dead 'mid thousand Sarrasins.
Of the Twelve Peers ten are already killed,
Two and no more are left of them who live;
These are Chernubles and the Count Margaris.

103

Now Margaris is a right valiant peer,
Buxom and strong, nimble and fleet and fierce.
He spurs his horse to strike at Olivere;
He splits the shield, the golden boss he sheers,
Along his ribs the glancing spear-point veers,
But by God's grace his body is not pierced;
Nor is he thrown, though the shock breaks the spear.
Past him the Paynim is borne in full career,
Rallying his men he sounds his bugle clear.

104

Great is the battle and crowded the mellay,
Nor does Count Roland stint of his strokes this day;
While the shaft holds he wields his spear amain—
Fifteen great blows ere it splinters and breaks.
Then his bare brand, his Durendal, he takes;
Against Chernubles he spurs his steed in haste,
Splits through the helm with carbuncles ablaze,
Through the steel coif, and through scalp and through brain
'Twixt the two eyes he cleaves him through the face;
Through the bright byrny close-set with rings of mail,
Right through the body, through the fork and the reins,
Down through the saddle with its beaten gold plates,
Through to the horse he drives the cleaving blade,
Seeking no joint through the chine carves his way,
Flings horse and man dead on the grassy plain.
"Foul befall, felon, that e'er you sought this fray!
Mahound," quoth he, "shall never bring you aid.
Villains like you seek victory in vain."

105

The County Roland throughout the field goes riding;
With Durendal, good sword, he stabs and slices,
The toll he takes of Saracens is frightful.
Would you had seen him, dead man on dead man piling,
Seen the bright blood about his pathway lying!
Bloody his hauberk and both his arms with fighting,
His good horse bloody from crest to withers likewise;
Oliver too doth never cease from striking,
And the Twelve Peers are not a whit behindhand,
And all the French are hammering and smiting;
The Paynims fall, some dead and others dying.
Quoth the Archbishop: "Right blessèd be our knighthood";
He shouts "Mountjoy!" war-cry of Charles the mighty.

1312. the Twelve Peers: i.e., the Saracen Peers enumerated in ll. 882–994.

106

And Oliver goes riding through the press;
His spear is broken, only the shaft is left.
Against a Paynim, Malun, he rides addrest,
Smashes the shield with flowers and gold bedecked,
Both of his eyes he smites out of his head,
So that his brains around his feet are spread,
And flings the corpse amid sev'n hundred dead.
Turgis he's slain, and slain Esturgot next,
Till to the grips the spear-shaft splits in shreds.
Roland cries out: "What are you doing, friend?
I'd give no groat for sticks in such a stead!
Here iron avails, and steel and nothing else.
Where is your sword that Hauteclaire is y-clept,
With its gold hilts and pummel crystal-gemmed?"
"I've had no time to draw," Oliver said,
"I've been so busy with striking right and left."

107

Dan Oliver has drawn his goodly brand,
As his friend Roland so urgently demands;
Now will he prove him a stout knight of his hands!
He smites a Paynim, Justin of Val Ferrat;
Clean through the middle the skull of him he cracks,
The saffron byrny splits, and his breast and back,
And saddle, brave with gems and golden bands,
And through the spine the horse in sunder hacks,
And dead on field flings all before him flat.
"I'll call you brother," quoth Roland, "after that!
'Tis for such strokes our Emperor loves a man."
The shout "Mountjoy!" goes up on every hand.

108

Gerin the Count bestrides his steed Sorel, Gerier his comrade on Passëcerf is set;
Eagerly both loose rein and spur ahead
And go to strike a Paynim, Timozel,
One on the shield, the other on the chest.
Both spears at once are broken in his breast,
Flat in the fallow straightway they fling him dead—
I do not know, I never have heard tell,
Which of the two was the more swift and snell.
[And Engelier, Knight of Bordeaux, he next Slew Esprevere, that son was to Burel.]
Archbishop Turpin has o'erthrown Siglorel,
The sorcerer, who'd once been down to Hell,

1367. y-clept: named.
1371. Dan (Dominus): lord.
1376. saffron: burnished with a yellow varnish made from bismuth oxide.
1391. snell: speedy.
1392–1393. These two lines have been telescoped in the text, and are thus emended by most editors.

With Jupiter for guide, by magic spells.
Quoth Turpin then: "Ear-marked was he for death!"
Roland replies: "The churl has made an end.
Oliver, brother, such strokes delight me well!"

109

Fiercer and still more fierce the battle grows;
Both French and Paynims deal wondrous heavy strokes,
Some in attacking, and some in parrying blows.
How many spears are bloodied there and broke!
What gonfalons, what banners rent and strown!
How many French in flower of youth laid low,
Whom wives and mothers shall never more behold,
Nor those of France who wait them on the road!
King Charlemayn must weep and wail for woe;
What help in that? he cannot save his folk.
Ill did Count Guènes serve Carlon, when he rode
To Saragossa and all his people sold;
Thereby he lost life and limbs of his own
When at Aix after they judged him to the rope,
And of his kin thirty were hanged also,
Who ne'er had thought such death should be their dole.

110

Fierce is the battle and wondrous grim the fight.
Both Oliver and Roland boldly smite,
Thousands of strokes the stout Archbishop strikes,
The whole Twelve Peers are not a whit behind,
And the French ranks lay on with all their might.
Heaped by the hundred thousands of Paynims lie,
None can escape unless he turns and flies,
Will he or nill he, there must he leave his life.
There France must lose the noblest of her knights,
They'll see no more their kindred and their sires,
Nor Charles, who scans the pass with anxious eyes.
Throughout all France terrific tempests rise,
Thunder is heard, the stormy winds blow high,
Unmeasured rain and hail fall from the sky,
While thick and fast flashes the levin bright,
And true it is the earth quakes far and wide.
Far as from Saintes to Michael-of-the-Tide,
From Besançon to Wissant Port, you'd find
There's not a house but the walls crack and rive.
Right at high noon a darkness falls like night,
Save for the lightning there's not a gleam of light;
None that beholds it but is dismayed for fright,
And many say: "This is the latter time,
The world is ending, and the Great Doom is nigh."

1396. Jupiter: like Apollo, the classical Jove has been demoted to the status of demon.

They speak not true, they cannot read the signs:
'Tis Roland's death calls forth this mighty cry.

111

The French have fought with valour and success;
By scores and thousands lie Paynim corpses spread,
Of hundred thousand scarce two will fight again.
Quoth the Archbishop: "Right valiant are our men,
The like of these hath no lord under heav'n.
Thus it is written in the Gestes of the French:
Our Emperor's power was never rivalled yet."
They search the field for their maimed and their dead,
With grief and sorrow the eyes of them are wet,
With love and pity for their kindred and friends.
Now falls upon them Marsile with all his strength.

112

The King Marsile comes riding up a gorge
With all his army about him in great force;
He has assembled twenty huge battle-hordes.
Such flash of helms with gems and gold adorned!
Such shields, such byrnies with burnished saffron wrought!
Sev'n hundred trumpets are sounding the assault;
Through all the country the noise of them goes forth.
"Brother," quoth Roland, "friend Oliver, sweet lord,
It is our death false Ganelon has sworn;
The treason's plain, it can be hid no more;
A right great vengeance the Emperor will let fall.
But we must bide a fearful pass of war.
No man has ever beheld the like before.
I shall lay on with Durendal my sword,
You, comrade, wield the great Hauteclaire of yours.
In lands how many have we those weapons borne!
Battles how many victoriously fought!
Ne'er shall base ballad be sung of them in hall!"

113

Marsile beholds his slaughtered chivalry.
He bids his trumpets and horns sound instantly
And then sets forward with his great company.
Then first rides out a Saracen, Abisme,
In all that host was none more vile than he,
With evil vice and crimes he's dyed full deep,
In Mary's Child, God's Son, he's no belief,
And black he is as melted pitch to see.
Better he loves murder and treachery
Than all the gold that is in Galicie
None ever saw him in mirth or jollity;

1447. the Gestes of the French: the chronicle, to which the poet from time to time refers, and from which he claims to derive his information.

But bold he is and rash to a degree,
And for that reason he's loved by King Marsile.
He bears a dragon to rally his meinie.
The good Archbishop observes him, much displeased,
He'd like to hit him on sight, that's how he feels,
And to himself he says quite quietly:
"This Sarsen looks right heretic to me.
'Twere best by far to go and kill the beast;
I never loved cowards nor coward deeds."

114

Th'Archbishop opens the battle up anew;
He rides a charger that from Grossayle he took (That was a king in Denmark, whom he slew).
A steed he is swiftly-running and smooth,
Flat in the knee and hollow in the hoof,
Short in the thigh and ample in the croup,
Long in the flank and the back well set up,
White of his tail and yellow of his plume,
Small of his ears and his head tawny-hued;
Here is a horse no courser could outdo.
Him the Archbishop, of his valour right good,
Spurs on Abisme, and none shall stay his mood.
He rides to strike him on his target of proof
Wondrous with topaz and amethyst to boot,
With carbuncle ablaze, and beryl blue (Emir Galafe gave it him for a boon Whom in Val Metas a devil gave it to.)
Turpin lays on, nor spares; I tell you true,
After he hit it it was not worth a sou!
From flank to flank he spits his body through,
And flings him dead wherever he finds room.
The French all cry. "A valiant blow and shrewd!
Right strong to save is our Archbishop's crook!"

115

Now can the French count up the Paynim might
They see it filling the plains from side to side.
They urge on Roland and Oliver likewise
And the Twelve Peers to flee for all their lives;
To whom straightway the Prelate speaks his mind:
"Barons, my lords, these shameful thoughts put by;
By God I charge you, hold fast and do not fly,
Lest brave men sing ill songs in your despite.
Better it were to perish in the fight.
Soon, very soon, we all are marked to die,
None of us here will see to-morrow's light;
One thing there is I promise you outright:
To you stand open the gates of Paradise,
There with the holy sweet Innocents to bide."

1484. meinie: household.

His words so fill them with courage and delight
There's none among them but shouts "Mountjoy" on high.

116

A Saracen, of Saragossa Town
Was there, the lord of half that city round—
Climborin namely, that traitor false and foul
Which took the oath of Ganelon the Count
And then for friendship kissed him upon the mouth
And with his helm and carbuncle endowed;
Our Fatherland he swore he'd disrenown,
And from the Emperor would snatch away the crown.
Now he comes riding on Barbëmouche his mount—Fleeter was never swallow nor falcon found—Slacks rein, spurs hard its mettle to arouse,
On Engelier the Gascon forward bounds.
Buckler nor byrny avails against him now,
Into the midriff lance-point and pennon plough,
From breast to back the shaft runs through and out,
A whole spear's length he hurls him dead on ground.
"Fit for destruction is all this gear!" he shouts;
"Paynims, strike hard! carve your way through the rout!"
"God!" say the French, "one of our best is down!"

117

Count Roland calls to Oliver his friend:
"Fair sir, companion, see, Engelier is dead;
No better man had we for knightliness."
The Count replies: "God give me fair revenge!"
In his steed's flanks the golden spurs he sets,
He grasps Hauteclaire, whose steel is all dyed red,
He deals the Paynim a mighty stroke and dread,
Twists out the blade, down falls the Saracen;
The Adversary bears off his soul to Hell.
Then he goes on, slays Duke Alfayen next,
From Escababa he hews away the head,
And seven Arabs unhorses then pell-mell:
That lot at least will never fight again.
"My friend is angry," the County Roland said:
"Fighter for fighter he matches me right well;
'Tis for such strokes King Carlon loves us best!"
Aloud he cries: "Strike on, my valiant men!"

118

Elsewhere, behold a Paynim, Valdabron,
Was godfather to King Marsilion;
He owns a navy four hundred dromonds strong,
And to his service no seaman but is bond.
He captured Salem by fraud in times bygone,

1557. the Adversary: Satan.
1568. dromond(s): a large and very swift medieval sailing ship, used both for war and commerce.

And sacked the Temple of good King Solomon, Murdering there the Patriarch by the font.
He took the oath of County Ganelon,
And sword and mangons gave him as pledge thereon.
He rides a horse that he calls Gramimond,
Never of speed was peregrine more prompt.
With the sharp spur he urges it headlong;
The great Duke Samson straightway he falls upon.
He splits the shield, he bursts the habergeon,
Drives through his body spear-head and gonfalon, Flings him from saddle a full spear's length along:
"Paynims!" he cries, "we'll beat them yet! Lay on!"
"God!" say the French, "there's a brave baron gone!"

119

When the Count Roland sees Samson thus laid low
Well may you guess how he is grieved of soul.
He spurs his horse and speeds to smite the foe
With Durendal, more worth than finest gold.
By might and main the Baron deals the stroke
Full on the helm that is all gemmed with gold;
The skull he splits, byrny and breast are broke,
Cloven the saddle, that is all gemmed with gold;
Through the beast's back deep down the weapon goes;
Like it or leave it, he has destroyed them both.
The Paynims say: "This is a bitter blow!"
"I love you not," quoth Roland, "by my troth; Yours is the outrage, yours is the lying boast!"

120

An African there was of Afric, too,
Was called Malquiant, the son of King Malcude;
Harnessed he is in gold from head to foot,
None in the sun so glitters to the view,
He rides a horse that he calls Saut-Perdu;
No steed could rival the swiftness of its hoofs.
He strikes Anseïs in mid-shield square and true,
He shears away the scarlet and the blue,
Rips the mailed skirt of the hauberk of proof,
Into the body drives the steel and the wood.
The Count falls dead, his days have met their doom.
The French all say: "Brave lord, alack for you!"

121

Archbishop Turpin goes riding through the field;
Ne'er was mass sung by any tonsured priest
That of his body could do such valiant deeds!
He hails the Paynim: "God send the worst to thee!
Thou hast slain one for whom my whole heart grieves."
Into a gallop he urges his good steed,
He strikes him hard on his Toledo shield,
And lays him dead upon the grassy green.

122

There was a Paynim, and Grandoyne was he called,
King Capuel's son, from Cappadocia's shores,
Mounted on Marmor, for so he names his horse,
Swifter of speed than any bird that soars.
He slacks the rein and he goes spurring forth,
And runs to strike Gerin with all his force.
From off his neck he splits the red shield shorn,
From off his body he rips the byrny torn,
Into his heart the pennon blue he's borne,
And down he flings him dead on a rocky tor.
Gerin his comrade he smites down afterward,
Berenger next, Guy of St Antoine fall;
And then he strikes the mighty duke Astorge, (Envers-on-Rhône and Valence called him lord),
And lays him dead; for joy the Paynims roar;
The French all say: "What loss we have to mourn!"

123

The County Roland grips fast his blood-red blade;
Well has he heard how the French are dismayed;
His heart grieves so, 'tis like to split in twain.
In hails the Paynim: "God send thee all His plagues!
Thou has slain one for whom I'll make thee pay!"
He spurs his horse that gladly runs apace;
Let win who may, they're at it, face to face.

124

The Prince Grandoyne was a good knight and gallant,
Strong of his hands and valorous in battle;
Athwart him now comes Roland the great captain:
He'd never met him, but he knew him instanter.
By his proud aspect, and by his noble stature,
His haughty looks, and his bearing and manner.
He cannot help it, a mortal fear unmans him;
Fain would he fly, but what's the good? he cannot.
The Count assails him with such ferocious valour
That to the nasal the whole helmet is shattered,
Cloven the nose and the teeth and the palate,
The jaz'rain hauberk and the breastbone and backbone,
Both silver bows from off the golden saddle;
Horseman and horse clean asunder he slashes,
Lifeless he leaves them and the pieces past patching.
The men of Spain fall a-wailing for sadness:
The French all cry: "What strokes! and what a champion!"

125

Fierce is the battle and marvellous and great.
The Frenchmen ply their burnished spears amain.
There had you seen how many men in pain,
How many wounded and bleeding there and slain!

1651. jazerain: a kind of chain mail made in Algiers.

Heaped up pell-mell they lie, on back or face.
The Saracens cannot endure the strain;
Will they or nill they they flee across the plain,
And the French forces with all their might give chase.

126

Wondrous the battle, and it grows faster yet;
The French fight on with rage and fury fell,
They lop off wrists, hew ribs and spines to shreds,
They cleave the harness through to the living flesh;
On the green ground the blood runs clear and red.
[The Paynims say: "We cannot stand the stress,]
French Fatherland, be curst of Máhomet!
Your sons are bravest of all the sons of men."
There's none of them but cries: "Marsile to help!
Ride, ride, O King, for we are hard bested."

127

Roland the Count calls out to Olivere:
"Fair sir, companion, confess that for this gear
Our lord Archbishop quits him like any peer;
Earth cannot match him beneath the heavens' sphere,
Well does he know to handle lance and spear."
The Count replies: "Let's aid him now and here!"
At this the French lay on the lustier,
Hard are their strokes, the fight is very fierce,
And for the Christians the losses are severe.
Who then had seen Roland and Olivere
Smite with their swords and through all the press pierce!
And the Archbishop goes thrusting with his spear.
Of those they slew the numbers are writ clear
In many charters and tales of chroniclers:
More than four thousand as in the Geste appears.
Four great assaults they've borne with right good cheer;
Then comes a fifth, doleful and dread and drear.
All the French knighthood has fallen in career;
Sixty alone by God's grace persevere;
These ere they die will sell their bodies dear.

128

When County Roland sees all his brave men down,
To Oliver his friend he cries aloud:
"For God's sake, comrade, fair sir, what think you now?
See what good knights lie here upon the ground!
Well may we pity this fair sweet France of ours,
Thus left so barren of all her knighthood's flower.
Why aren't you here, O friend and Emperour?
Oliver, brother, what way is to be found?
How send him news of what is come about?"
Oliver said: "And how should I know how?
I'd rather die than we should lose renown."

129

"I'll sound," quoth Roland, "my Olifant straightway;
When Carlon hears, passing through Gate of Spain,
I pledge my word, the French will turn again."
Quoth Oliver: "It would be foul disdain,
And to your kindred the reproach would be great:
All their lives long they'd not live down the shame.
When I desired you, why then you said me nay;
If now you do it, of men you'll get no praise.
Blow if you will—such conduct is not brave.
Nay, but how deep in blood your arms are bathed!"
The Count replies: "I've struck good blows this day."

130

Said Roland then: "Full grievous is this fight.
I'll sound my horn, and Charles will hear the cry."
Quoth Oliver: " 'Twould ill beseem a knight.
I asked you, comrade, and you refused, for pride.
Had Charles been here, then all would have gone right;
He's not to blame, nor the men at his side.
Now by my beard (quoth he) if e'er mine eyes
Again behold my sister Aude the bright, Between her arms never you think to lie."

131

Quoth Roland: "Why so angry with me, friend?"
And he: "Companion, you got us in this mess.
There is wise valour, and there is recklessness:
Prudence is worth more than fool hardiness.
Through your o'erweening you have destroyed the French;
Ne'er shall we do service to Charles again.
Had you but given some heed to what I said,
My lord had come, the battle had gone well,
And King Marsile had been captured or dead.
Your prowess, Roland, is a curse on our heads.
No more from us will Charlemayn have help,
Whose like till Doomsday shall not be seen of men.
Now you will die, and fair France will be shent;
Our loyal friendship is here brought to an end;
A bitter parting we'll have ere this sun set."

132

When the Archbishop thus hears them in dispute,
With his gold spurs he pricks his steed anew,
Draws near to them and utters this rebuke:
"Lord Oliver, and you, Lord Roland, too,
Let's have no quarrel, o'God's name, 'twixt you two.
It will not save us to sound the horn, that's true;
Nevertheless, 'twere better so to do.

1738. shent: put to shame.

Let the king come; his vengeance will be rude;
None shall to Spain ride home with merry news.
After, our French will light them down on foot,
Seek out our bodies and limbs in sunder hewn,
Lay us on biers borne upon sumpter-mules,
And weep for us with grief right pitiful;
In the church-close we shall have burial due,
And not be food for dogs and swine and wolves."
Quoth Roland, "Sir, your words are right and good."

133

Roland has set Olifant to his lips, Firmly he holds it and blows it with a will.
High are the mountains, the blast is long and shrill,
Thirty great leagues the sound went echoing.
King Carlon heard it and all who rode with him.
"Lo, now, our men are fighting," quoth the King.
Guènes retorts: "If any man said this Except yourself, it were a lie, methinks."

134

The County Roland with pain and anguish winds
His Olifant, and blows with all his might.
Blood from his mouth comes spurting scarlet-bright
He's burst the veins of his temples outright.
From hand and horn the call goes shrilling high:
King Carlon hears it who through the passes rides,
Duke Naimon hears, and all the French beside.
Quoth Charles: "I hear the horn of Roland cry!
He'd never sound it but in the thick of fight."
"There is no battle," Count Ganelon replies;
"You're growing old, your hair is sere and white,
When you speak thus, you're talking like a child.
Full well you know Roland's o'erweening pride;
'Tis strange that God endures him so long time!
Took he not Noples against your orders quite?
The Paynims made a sally from inside,
And there gave battle to Roland the great knight;
So he swilled down the field—a brave device
To keep the bloodstains from coming to your eyes!
For one small hare he'll blow from morn till night;
Now to the Peers he's showing-off in style.
Who dare attack him? No man beneath the sky!
Ride on, ride on! Why loiter here the while?
Our Fathers' land lies distant many a mile."

135

Count Roland's mouth with running blood is red;
He's burst asunder the temples of his head;
He sounds his horn in anguish and distress.
King Carlon hears, and so do all the French.

Then said the King: "This horn is long of breath."
" 'Tis blown," quoth Naimon, "with all a brave man's strength;
Battle there is, and that I know full well.
He that would stay you is but a traitor fell.
To arms! let sound your battle-cry to heav'n!
Make haste to bring your gallant household help!
You hear how Roland makes desperate lament!"

136

The Emperor Charles lets sound his horns aloft.
The French light down and arm themselves anon
With helm and hauberk and gilded swords girt on;
Goodly their shields, their lances stiff and strong,
Scarlet and white and blue the gonfalons.
Straightway to horse the warrior lords have got;
Swift through the passes they spur and never stop.
Each unto other they speak and make response:
"Might we reach Roland ere he were dead and gone, We'ld strike good strokes beside him in the throng."
What use is that? They have delayed too long.

137

Vespers draws on and shining is the day;
Against the sun glitters their armed array,
Hauberk and helm flash back a mighty blaze,
So many shields their painted flowers display,
Such store of spears with gilded pennons gay!
The Emperor rides right wrathful on his way.
And all the French in anger and dismay;
There is not one but weeps for very rage;
For Roland's sake they're grievously afraid.
The King arrests Count Ganelon straightway;
He's turned him over to the cooks in his train;
The master-cook he calls, Besgun by name:
"Guard me him well, as fits a man so base,
For all my house this villain has betrayed!"
Besgun takes charge, with five-score kitchen knaves,
The best and worst that serve in that estate.
They pluck the beard from off his chin and face,
With four sound thumps each gives him a good baste,
With sticks and faggots they pound him and they paste,
And round his neck they fasten a strong chain,
Right well they chain him like a bear in a cage;
Now on a pack-horse they've hoisted him in shame;
Till Carlon want him 'tis they will keep him safe.

138

Huge are the hills and shadowy and high,
Deep in the vales the living streams run by.
The trumpets sound before them and behind,
All with one voice to Olifant reply.

In wrath of heart the Emperor Carlon rides,
And all the French in sorrow and in ire;
There's none but grieves and weeps from out his eyes;
They all pray God to safeguard Roland's life
Till they may come to battle by his side;
Once they are with him they'll make it a great fight.
What use is that? their prayers are empty quite,
Too long they've lingered, they cannot come in time.

139

King Charlemayn rides on in anger grim,
Over his byrny flows the white beard of him;
All the French barons beside him spur full swift;
There's none of them but is with fury filled
Not to be aiding Roland the Paladin
Now that he's fighting the Spanish Sarrasins.
He's hurt so sore, I fear he cannot live.
God! and what men, those sixty with him still!
Better had never nor captain nor yet king.

140

Roland surveys the mountains and the fells;
How many French he sees there lying dead!
Like a good knight he makes them this lament:
"Barons, my lords, may God of His largesse
Bring all your souls to Paradise the blest,
Amid bright flowers to make their hallowed beds!
I never saw braver or truer men.
So long you served me unceasingly and well,
So many lands conquered for Carlon's realm!
The Emperor bred you alas! to what sad end!
O dearest land, fair nursery of the French,
By what hard hap art thou this day bereft!
Barons of France, for me you go to death,
Nought can I give you of safeguard or defence;
Now aid you God, who ne'er failed any yet!
Oliver, brother, you shall not lack my help.
Though none should slay me I'll die of grief no less;
Sweet sir, companion, let's go and fight afresh!"

141

The County Roland returns into the field
And like a warrior his Durendal he wields;
Faldron de Puy through the midriff he cleaves
With four-and-twenty besides, of great esteem.
Never on vengeance was any man so keen.
E'en as the deer before the deerhound flees
So before Roland the Paynims show their heels.
Quoth the Archbishop: "Well done, well done indeed!
Valour like this becomes a knight of breed
That bears his arms and sits a goodly steed;

Forward and fierce in battle should he be,
Else he's not worth a single penny-piece.
Best he turn monk in monastery meek
And for our sins pray daily on his knees."
Quoth Roland: "Strike, spare none of them," saith he.
At this the French renew the fight with speed;
Therein the Christians endure great loss and grief.

142

When it is known no prisoners will be made
Men fight back fiercely, and stubborn is the fray;
Therefore the French grow very lions for rage.
Here comes Marsile, e'en as a baron brave,
Riding a horse, and Gaignun is its name.
Full upon Bevon he rides and spurs amain,
That held all Beaune and Dijon for domain.
The shield he shatters, and the hauberk he breaks,
And lays him dead, he need not strike again.
And Ivon next and Ivor too, his mate,
And Gerard too of Roussillon he slays.
Roland the Count, who is not far away,
Cries to the Paynim: "God damn your soul, I say!
These my companions by treason you have slain!
Ere we go hence a bitter price you'll pay,
And you shall learn the name of my good blade!"
He rides to strike him, e'en as a baron brave;
From his sword-arm he shears the hand away.
And Jurfaret the Fair he next waylays,
Marsilion's son, and slices off his pate.
The Paynims cry: "Mahound! Mahound to aid!
Venge us on Carlon, all you gods of our faith!
Into our land he's sent this evil race!
Come life come death they'll never quit the place."
Then one to other cries: "Fly then! fly in haste!"
An hundred thousand have fled the field straightway;
They'll not return, call after them who may.

143

What help is that? Marsile has taken flight,
Yet there remains his uncle Marganice,
That governs Carthage, Alfrere and Garamile,
And Ethiope, a land accursed and vile.
In his command are all the Negro tribes;
Thick are their noses, their ears are very wide;
Full fifty thousand are gathered in their lines,
Boldly and fast and furiously they ride,
Yelling aloud the Paynim battle-cry.
Then Roland said: "Here are we doomed to die;
Full well, I know we cannot long survive.
Fail not for shame, right dear to sell your lives.
Lift up, my lords, your burnished blades and fight!

Come life, come death, the foe shall pay the price, Lest we should bring fair France into despite!
When on this field Carlon my lord sets eyes
He'll see what toll we've taken of their might:
Fifteen dead Paynims for each of us he'll find;
Nor fail to bless us for this our great emprise."

144

When Roland looks on these accursed tribesmen—
As black as ink from head to foot their hides are,
With nothing white about them but their grinders—
Then said the Count: " 'Tis true beyond denial, Right well I know it, this day shall death betide us.
I'll to the throng; Frenchmen, fight on beside me!"
Quoth Oliver: "The devil take the hindmost!"
The French hear this and once more fall a-fighting.

145

When Paynims see how few the French are grown
They plume themselves, puffed up with pride and hope:
"Now to the Emperor," they say, "his crimes come home!"
Marganice comes, riding a sorrel colt;
He spurs him hard with rowels all of gold,
And from behind deals Oliver a blow;
Deep in his back the burnished mail is broke,
That the spear's point stands forth at his breast bone.
He saith to him: "You've suffered a sore stroke;
Charlemayn sent you to the pass for your woe.
Foul wrong he did us, 'tis good he lose his boast:
I've well requited our loss on you alone."

146

Oliver feels that he is hurt to death;
He grasps his sword Hauteclaire the keen of edge,
Smites Marganice on his high golden helm,
Shearing away the flowers and crystal gems,
Down to the teeth clean splits him through the head,
Shakes loose the blade and flings him down and dead;
Then saith: "Foul fall you, accursèd Paynim wretch!
Charles has had losses, so much I will confess:
But ne'er shall you, back to the land you left,
To dame or damsel return to boast yourself
That e'er you spoiled me to the tune of two pence,
Or made your profit of me or other men."
This done, to Roland he cries aloud for help.

147

Oliver feels he's wounded mortally;
His thirst for vengeance can never glutted be.
Amid the press he strikes right valiantly;
He breaks asunder the spear-shaft and the shield,
Splits chines and saddles and lops off hands and feet.

1935. emprise: enterprise, feat of arms.

Whoso had seen him hew Paynims piece from piece, Throw one on other their bodies down in heaps,
Might well remember that flower of knightly deeds!
And Carlon's war-cry he fails not to repeat,
But still "Mountjoy!" goes shouting loud and clear.
He calls to Roland his comrade and his peer:
"Sir, my companion, draw nigh and stand with me:
We must this day be parted to our grief."

148

Oliver's face, when Roland on him looks,
Is grey and ghastly, discoloured, wan with wounds,
His bright blood sprays his body head to foot;
Down to the ground it runs from him in pools.
"God!" says the Count, "I know not what to do!
Fair sir, companion, woe worth your mighty mood!—
Ne'er shall be seen a man to equal you.
Alas, fair France! what valiant men and true
Must thou bewail this day, cast down and doomed!
Bitter the loss the Emperor has to rue!"
So much he says, and in the saddle swoons.

149

See Roland now swooning in saddle laid,
And Oliver that unto death is maimed;
He's bled so much that his eyes are all glazed,
Or far or near he can see nothing straight,
Nor recognize a single living shape;
So when he comes to where his comrade waits,
On the gold helm he smites at him amain,
Down to the nasal he splits the jewelled plates,
Only his head is not touched by the blade.
Then Roland, stricken, lifts his eyes to his face, Asking him low and mildly as he may:
"Sir, my companion, did you mean it that way?
Look, I am Roland, that loved you all my days;
You never sent me challenge or battle-gage."
Quoth Oliver: "I cannot see you plain;
I know your voice; may God see you and save.
And I have struck you; pardon it me, I pray."
Roland replies: "I have taken no scathe;
I pardon you, myself and in God's name."
Then each to other bows courteous in his place.
With such great love thus is their parting made.

150

Oliver feels the coming pangs of death;
Both of his eyes are turning in his head,
Now he is blind wholly, and wholly deaf.

2005. challenge or battle-gage: Roland wonders whether Oliver is still angry with him, but cannot believe that he would bear arms against him without having sent him a formal challenge, accompanied by the usual token of defiance.

He lights from horse and to his knees he gets
And makes confession aloud, and beats his breast,
Then clasps his hands and lifts them up to Heav'n;
In Paradise he prays God give him rest,
And France the Fair and Carlon prays Him bless,
And his companion Roland above all men.
His heart-strings crack, he stoops his knightly helm,
And sinks to earth, and lies there all his length.
Dead is the Count, his days have reached their end.
The valiant Roland weeps for him and laments,
No man on earth felt ever such distress.

151

When Roland sees his friend and comrade die,
And on the ground face down beholds him lie,
With tender words he bids him thus goodbye:
"Sir, my companion, woe worth your valiant might!
Long years and days have we lived side by side,
Ne'er didst thou wrong me nor suffer wrong of mine.
Now thou art dead I grieve to be alive."
Having thus said, the Marquis swoons outright
On his steed's back, that Veillantif is hight;
He's kept from falling by the gold stirrups bright;
Go as he may, then hold him still upright.

152

Or ever Roland comes to himself again
And has recovered and rallied from his faint, Fearful disaster his fortunes have sustained;
All of the French are lost to him and slain;
Sole, the Archbishop and Walter Hum remain.
Walter has come down from the heights again;
Well has he striven against the men of Spain,
His men are dead, mown down by Paynim blades;
Will he or nill he, he flees towards the vale,
And upon Roland he cries aloud for aid:
"Where art thou, where, great county, warrior brave?
While thou wast there I never was dismayed.
Walter am I, who Maëlgut o'ercame, Nephew am I to Droön white with age;
Thou for my valour wast wont to love me aye!
My lance is shattered, my shield is split in twain,
Battered and broken is my hauberk of mail,
A spear has pierced me [through the midst of my reins;]
Death is upon me, yet dear I made them pay."
Lo! at that word Roland hears him and wakes;
He spurs his horse and comes to him in haste.

153

Roland is filled with grief and anger sore;
In the thick press he now renews his war.

2035. marquis: The title means "lord of the marches" (see note on l. 843). Roland was Lord of the Marches of Brittany.

Of those of Spain he's overthrown a score,
And Walter six, the Archbishop five more.
The Paynims say: "These men are worst of all!
Let none escape alive; look to it, lords!
Who fears the onset, let shame be his reward!
Who lets these go, may he be put to scorn!
Then once again the hue and cry breaks forth;
From every side pour in the Paynim hordes.

154

The County Roland is mighty of his mood,
Walter de Hum well-famed for knightlihood,
And the Archbishop a warrior tried and proved;
Betwixt their valours there's not a pin to choose.
In the thick press they smite the Moorish crew.
A thousand Paynims dismount to fight on foot,
And forty thousand horsemen they have, to boot,
Yet 'gainst these three, my troth! they fear to move.
They hurl against them their lances from aloof,
Javelins, jereeds, darts, shafts and spears they loose.
In the first shock brave Walter meets his doom.
Turpin of Rheims has his shield split in two,
His helm is broken, his head has ta'en a wound,
His hauberk's pierced, the mail-rings burst and strewn,
By four sharp spears his breast is stricken through,
Killed under him his horse rolls neck and croup;
Th'Archbishop's down, woe worth the bitter dule.

155

Turpin of Rheims, finding himself o'erset,
With four sharp lance-heads stuck fast within his breast,
Quickly leaps up, brave lord, and stands erect.
He looks on Roland and runs to him and says
Only one word: "I am not beaten yet!
True man failed never while life in him was left."
He draws Almace, his steel-bright brand keen-edged;
A thousand strokes he strikes amid the press.
Soon Charles shall see he spared no foe he met,
For all about him he'll find four hundred men,
Some wounded, some clean through the body cleft,
And some of them made shorter by the head.
So tells the Geste; so he that fought there tells:
The worthy Giles, whom God with marvels blessed,
In Laön minster thus-wise the charter penned;
Who knows not this knows nought of what befel.

156

The County Roland fights bravely as he may,
But his whole body in heat and sweat is bathed,
And all his head is racked with grievous pain
From that great blast which brake his temples' veins.

2086. dule: grief.
2100. the worthy Giles: St. Giles, who had a hermitage in Provence, and became the hero of many legends.

Fain would he know if Charles is bringing aid;
His Olifant he grasps, and blows full faint.
The Emperor halts, hearing the feeble strain:
"My lords," quoth he, "this tells a woeful tale;
Roland my nephew is lost to us this day,
That call proclaims his breath is nigh to fail.
Whoso would reach him must ride with desperate haste Sound through the host! bid every trumpet play!"
Full sixty thousand so loud their clarions bray
The hills resound, the valleys ring again.
The Paynims hear, no lust to laugh have they:
"We'll soon have Charles to reckon with," they say.

157

The Paynims say: "The Emperor's turned about;
Of those of France hark how the trumpets sound!
If Carlon comes, we shall have rack and rout,
If Roland lives, once more he'll war us down,
We shall not keep one foot of Spanish ground."
Straightway four hundred helmed warriors rally round,
The finest fighters that in the field are found;
A fearful onslaught they'll make upon the Count;
Truly Lord Roland has got his work cut out.

158

Whenas Count Roland sees their assault begin,
Right fierce he makes him, and strong and menacing;
While life is in him he'll never quail or quit.
He sits his horse that is named Veillantif,
Into his flanks the golden spurs he pricks
And sets upon them where most the press is thick.
The Lord Archbishop, brave Turpin, rides with him.
Paynim to paynim cries: "Comrade, go to it!
Have we not heard the Frankish trumpets ring?
Charles is returning, the great, the mighty king!"

159

The County Roland ne'er loved a recreant,
Nor a false heart, nor yet a braggart jack,
Nor knight that was not a good man of his hands.
He cried to Turpin, the Churchman militant,
"Sir, you're on foot, I'm on my horse's back;
For love of you here will I make my stand,
And side by side we'll take both good and bad.
I'll not desert you for any mortal man.
Go we together these Paynims to attack;
The mightiest blows are those of Durendal."
Quoth the Archbishop: " 'Twere shame our strokes to slack; Carlon is coming, our vengeance shall not lack."

160

The Paynims say: "Why were we ever born?
Woe worth the while! our day of doom has dawned.

Now have we lost our peerage and our lords,
The mighty Carlon comes on with all his force,
Of those of France we hear the shrilling horns,
The cry "Mountjoy!" sounds fearfully abroad.
So grim of mood is Roland in his wrath
No man alive can put him to the sword.
Let fly at him, and then give up the war."
So they let fly; spears, lances they outpour,
Darts and jereeds and feathered shafts galore.
The shield of Roland is pierced and split and scored,
The mail-rings riven, and all his hauberk torn,
Yet in his body he is not touched at all,
Though under him, with thirty wounds and more,
His Veillantif is stricken dead and falls.
The Paynims flee, abandoning the war;
Count Roland's left amid the field, unhorsed.

161

In wrath and grief away the Paynims fly;
Backward to Spain with headlong haste they hie.
The County Roland cannot pursue their flight,
Veillantif's lost, he has no steed to ride;
Will he or nill he, he must on foot abide,
He's turned to aid Archbishop Turpin's plight,
And from his head the gilded helm untied,
Stripped off the hauberk of subtle rings and bright,
And all to pieces has cut the bliaut fine
Wherewith to bandage his wounds that gape so wide.
Then to his breast he clasps and lifts him light
And gently lays him upon the green hill-side,
With fair soft speech entreating on this wise:
"Ah, noble sir, pray give me leave awhile;
These friends of ours, we loved so well in life,
We must not leave them thus lying where they died.
I will go seek them, find, and identify,
And lay them here together in your sight."
"Go and return," the Bishop makes reply;
"Thanks be to God, this field is yours and mine."

162

Roland departs and through the field is gone;
Alone he searches the valleys and high rocks.
[And there he finds Ivor, and there Ivon], Gerier and Gerin, the good companions,
[And Engelier whom Gascony begot];
And he has found Berenger and Oton,
And after finds Anseïs and Samson,
And finds Gerard the Old, of Roussillon.
He lifts them up, brave baron, one by one,
To the Archbishop he carries them anon,
And by his knees ranges them all along.
The Bishop weeps, he cannot stint thereof;

He lifts his hand and gives them benison,
And after saith: "Alack, brave champions!
May your souls rest with the all-glorious God
In Paradise, amid the rose-blossoms.
I too am dying and sorrow for my lot,
Who the great Emperor no more may look upon."

163

Roland once more unto the field repairs,
And has sought out his comrade Oliver.
Close to his breast he lifts him, and with care
As best he may to the Archbishop bears
And on his shield lays with the others there;
The Bishop signs and shrives them all with prayer.
With tears renewed their sorrow is declared,
And Roland saith: "Fair fellow Oliver,
You were own son unto Duke Renier
That held the marches of the Vale of Runers.
To shatter shield or break lance anywhere,
And from their seat proud men to overbear,
And cheer the brave with words of counsel fair,
And bring the cruel to ruin and despair,
No knight on earth was valiant as you were."

164

The County Roland, seeing his peers lie dead,
And Oliver, who was his dearest friend,
Begins to weep for ruth and tenderness;
Out of his cheeks the colour all has fled,
He cannot stand, he is so deep distressed,
He swoons to earth, he cannot help himself.
"Alas, for pity, sweet lord!" the Bishop saith.

165

When the Archbishop saw Roland faint and fallen,
So sad was he, he never had been more so;
He reaches out; he's taken Roland's horn up.
In Ronceval there runs a stream of water;
Fain would he go there and fetch a little for him.
With feeble steps he turns him thither, falt'ring;
He is so weak, that he cannot go forward,
For loss of blood he has no strength to call on.
Ere one might cover but a rood's length in walking
His heart has failed him, he has fallen face-foremost;
The pangs of death have seized him with great torment.

166

The County Roland has rallied from his faint,
Gets to his feet, though he's in grievous pain,
And looks about him over hill, over vale.
Beyond his comrades, upon the grass-green plain,
There he beholds the noble baron laid,

The great Archbishop, vice-gerent of God's name.
He beats his breast with eyes devoutly raised,
With folded hands lifted to Heaven he prays
That God will give him in Paradise a place.
Turpin is dead that fought for Charlemayn;
In mighty battles, and in preaching right brave,
Still against Paynims a champion of the Faith;
Blest mote he be, the Lord God give him grace!

167

The County Roland sees the Archbishop lie;
He sees his bowels gush forth out of his side
And on his brow the brain laid bare to sight.
Midst of his breast where the key-bones divide,
Crosswise he lays his comely hands and white,
And thus laments him as native use requires:
"Ah, debonair, thou good and noble knight!
Now I commend thee to the great Lord of might,
Servant more willing than thee He shall not find.
Since the Apostles no prophet was thy like,
For to maintain the Faith, and win mankind.
May thy soul meet no hindrance in her flight!
May Heaven's gate to her stand open wide!"

168

Now Roland feels that he is at death's door;
Out of his ears the brain is running forth.
Now for his peers he prays God call them all,
And for himself St Gabriel's aid implores;
Then in each hand he takes, lest shame befall,
His Olifant and Durendal his sword.
Far as a quarrel flies from a cross-bow drawn,
Toward land of Spain he goes, to a wide lawn,
And climbs a mound where grows a fair tree tall,
And marble stones beneath it stand by four.
Face downward there on the green grass he falls,
And swoons away, for he is at death's door.

169

High are the hills and very high the trees are;
Four stones there are set there, of marble gleaming.
The County Roland lies senseless on the greensward.
A Saracen is there, watching him keenly;
He has feigned death, and lies among his people,
And has smeared blood upon his breast and features.
Now he gets up and runs towards him fleetly;
Strong was he, comely and of valour exceeding.
Now in his rage and in his overweening
He falls on Roland, his arms and body seizing;
He saith one word: "Now Carlon's nephew's beaten.

2274. marble stones: probably posts such as were used to mark a frontier.

I'll take his sword, to Araby I'll reive it."
But as he draws it Roland comes to, and feels him.

170

Roland has felt his good sword being stol'n;
Opens his eyes and speaks this word alone:
"Thou'rt none of ours, in so far as I know."
He takes his horn, of which he kept fast hold,
And smites the helm, which was all gemmed with gold;
He breaks the steel and the scalp and the bone,
And from his head batters his eyes out both,
And dead on ground he lays the villain low;
Then saith: "False Paynim, and how wast thou so bold, Foully or fairly, to seize upon me so?
A fool he'll think thee who hears this story told.
Lo, now! the mouth of my Olifant's broke;
Fallen is all the crystal and the gold."

171

Now Roland feels his sight grow dim and weak;
With his last strength he struggles to his feet;
All the red blood has faded from his cheeks.
A grey stone stands before him at his knee:
Ten strokes thereon he strikes, with rage and grief;
It grides, but yet nor breaks nor chips the steel.
"Ah!" cries the Count, "St Mary succour me!
Alack the Day, Durendal, good and keen!
Now I am dying, I cannot fend for thee.
How many battles I've won with you in field!
With you I've conquered so many goodly fiefs
That Carlon holds, the lord with the white beard!
Let none e'er wield you that from the foe would flee—
You that were wielded so long by a good liege!
The like of you blest France shall never see."

172

Count Roland smites the sardin stone amain.
The steel grides loud, but neither breaks nor bates.
Now when he sees that it will nowise break
Thus to himself he maketh his complaint:
"Ah, Durendal! so bright, so brave, so gay!
How dost thou glitter and shine in the sun's rays!
When Charles was keeping the vales of Moriane,
God by an angel sent to him and ordained
He should bestow thee on some count-capitayne.
On me he girt thee, the noble Charlemayn.
With this I won him Anjou and all Bretayn,
With this I won him Poitou, and conquered Maine;
With this I won him Normandy's fair terrain,
And with it won Provence and Acquitaine,
And Lombardy and all the land Romayne,

2288. reive: steal away.

Bavaria too, and the whole Flemish state,
And Burgundy and all Apulia gained;
Constantinople in the King's hand I laid;
In Saxony he speaks and is obeyed;
With this I won Scotland, [Ireland and Wales,]
And England, where he set up his domain;
What lands and countries I've conquered by its aid,
For Charles to keep whose beard is white as may!
Now am I grieved and troubled for my blade;
Should Paynims get it, 'twere worse than all death's pains.
Dear God forbid it should put France to shame!"

173

Count Roland smites upon the marble stone;
I cannot tell you how he hewed it and smote;
Yet the blade breaks not nor splinters, though it groans;
Upward to heaven it rebounds from the blow.
When the Count sees it never will be broke,
Then to himself right softly he makes moan:
"Ah, Durendal, fair, hallowed, and devote,
What store of relics lie in thy hilt of gold!
St Peter's tooth, St Basil's blood, it holds,
Hair of my lord St Denis, there enclosed,
Likewise a piece of Blessed Mary's robe;
To Paynim hands 'twere sin to let you go;
You should be served by Christian men alone,
Ne'er may you fall to any coward soul!
Many wide lands I conquered by your strokes
For Charles to keep whose beard is white as snow, Whereby right rich and mighty is his throne."

174

Now Roland feels death press upon him hard;
It's creeping down from his head to his heart.
Under a pine-tree he hastens him apart,
There stretches him face down on the green grass,
And lays beneath him his sword and Olifant.
He's turned his head to where the Paynims are,
And this he doth for the French and for Charles,
Since fain is he that they should say, brave heart,
That he has died a conquerer at the last.
He beats his breast full many a time and fast,
Gives, with his glove, his sins into God's charge.

175

Now Roland feels his time is at an end;
On the steep hill-side, toward Spain he's turned his head,
And with one hand he beats upon his breast;
Saith: "Mea culpa; Thy mercy, Lord, I beg
For all the sins, both the great and the less,

2337. The text is corrupt; but either Ireland or Wales is certainly intended, and possibly both.

That e'er I did since first I drew my breath Unto this day when I'm struck down by death."
His right-hand glove he unto God extends;
Angels from Heaven now to his side descend.

176

The County Roland lay down beneath a pine;
To land of Spain he's turned him as he lies,
And many things begins to call to mind:
All the broad lands he conquered in his time,
And fairest France, and the men of his line,
And Charles his lord, who bred him from a child:
He cannot help but weep for them and sigh.
Yet of himself he is mindful betimes;
He beats his breast and on God's mercy cries:
"Father most true, in whom there is no lie,
Who didst from death St Lazarus make to rise,
And bring out Daniel safe from the lions' might,
Save Thou my soul from danger and despite
Of all the sins I did in all my life."
His right-hand glove he's tendered unto Christ,
And from his hand Gabriel accepts the sign.
Straightway his head upon his arm declines;
With folded hands he makes an end and dies.
God sent to him His Angel Cherubine,
And great St Michael of Peril-by-the-Tide;
St. Gabriel too was with them at his side;
The County's soul they bear to Paradise.

2396–97. the sign: the glove is offered and accepted in token of Roland's surrender to God of the life which he holds as a fief from Him.

2399. Cherubine: "Cherubin" seems to be used by the poet as the name of an individual angel.

Aucassin and Nicolette (Aucassin et Nicolete)*

I

He who wants to hear good rhyme
Of the sport in ancient time
Of two children, young and sweet,
Aucassin and Nicolette,
Of the pains that he endured,
Of the noble deeds he did
For his love with clearest face.
Lovely the song, sweet the tale,
Courteous and well-disposed.

* Translated by Edward Francis Moyer and Carey DeWitt Eldridge.

Copyright, 1937, by Robert Linker. Reprinted by permission.

No man can be so oppressed,
So cast down and comfortless,
Burdened down with heaviness,
Who will not be, hearing this,
Cured, restored to joyfulness,
It is so sweet.

II

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

That Count Bougars de Valence was making war on Count Garin de Beaucaire, so great and so marvelous and so mortal, that not a single day dawned that he was not at the gates and at the walls and at the barriers of the town with a hundred knights and ten thousand soldiers on foot and on horse; and he burned his land and wasted his country and killed his men.

Count Garin de Beaucaire was old and frail and had outlived his time. He had no heir, neither son nor daughter, except a single boy, who was such as I shall tell you.

Aucassin was the name of the lad. Handsome he was and shapely and large and well formed in legs and feet and in body and in arms. His hair was blond and tightly curled, and his eyes were gray and laughing, and his face clear and slender, and his nose high and well placed. He was so endowed with good points that there was in him nothing bad, or that was not good. But he was so overtaken by love which conquers all, that he didn't want to be a knight, or to take arms, or go into the tourney, or do anything at all which he ought to have done.

His father and his mother used to say to him, "Son, take up your arms, get on your horse, defend your land, and aid your men. If they see you among them, they will defend better their bodies and their goods, and your land and mine."

"Father," said Aucassin, "what are you talking about now? Never may God give me anything I ask of him, if as a knight I mount my horse, or go into the fray or battle, there where I may strike a knight or others strike me, if you do not give me Nicolette, my sweet love, whom I love so much."

"Son," said the father, "that could not be. You let Nicolette alone since she is a slave-girl who was brought from a foreign land. The viscount of this town bought her from the Saracens and brought her to this town. And he has reared her and baptized her and has made her his god-daughter. So will he give her one of these days to some young man who will earn bread for her with honor. You have nothing to do with all this. If you wish to have a wife, I will give you the daughter of a king or of a count. There is no man in France so rich that if you wish for his daughter you shall not have her."

"Look here, Father," said Aucassin, "where is there such high honor on the earth that if Nicolette, my very sweet love, had it, it wouldn't be well placed in her? If she were Empress of Constantinople or of Germany, or Queen of France or of England, it would be little enough for her, so noble she is, and courtly, and of good manner, and the acme of all good qualities."

III

Now it is sung

Aucassin lived in Beaucaire;
Well-built was his castle there.
Nicolette, of form so fair,
From her no man could tear him;
His father tried to scare him,
And his mother threatened him,
"Scamp, what do you want to do?
Nicolette is trim and gay
But from Carthage cast away;
From the pagans she was bought.
Since you want to take a wife,
Take a wife of high degree."
"Mother, those wives don't please me.
Nicolette is debonair,
Form so sweet and face so clear;
My heart jumps when she is near.
Why can't I enjoy her love?
It is too sweet."

IV

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Count Garin de Beaucaire saw that he would not be able to turn his son away from the love of Nicolette, he went to the viscount of the town, who was in his service; so did he speak to him.

"Sir Count, get rid of Nicolette, your god-daughter. Cursed be the land from which she was brought to this country! For because of her, I lose Aucassin, who does not want to become a knight, or do any of the things he ought to do. And know well that if I could have her, I would burn her in a fire, and you might well have great fear for yourself."

"Sire," said the Viscount, "much does it trouble me that he goes and comes and that he speaks to her. I bought her with my money; so have I reared her and baptized her and made her my god-daughter. And I would have given her to some young man who would have earned bread for her with honor. With this your son, Aucassin, would have had nothing to do. But since it is your will and your pleasure, I will send her to such a land and to such a country that never again will he set eyes upon her."

"Take care that you do it," said Count Garin, "for great evil may come to you from it."

Each went his own way. Now the Viscount was a very, very rich man, and he had a rich palace looking on a garden. In a room in it he had Nicolette placed, high in the tower, and an old woman with her for company and to take care of her. And he had bread and meat and wine brought there and whatever they might need. Then he had the door sealed up so that none might be able, in any way, to go in or come out, except that, opening on the garden, there was one window, quite small, through which there came to them a little fresh air.

V

Now it is sung

Nicolette in prison put;
She's in a vaulted chamber Fashioned with the greatest skill
And marvelously painted.
On the marble window frame
There the wretched maiden leans.
Now her hair was blond as grain,
And her eyebrows were well shaped,
Clear and slender was her face,
Never was there fairer seen.
Toward the forest she looked out
And saw the roses swelling,
Heard the birds which twittered there;
Then the orphan maid cried out,
"Wretched captive, woe is me!
Why am I in prison put?
Aucassin, my youthful lord,
I am still your own sweetheart
And by you I'm not abhorred.
For you I'm a prisoner
Within this vaulted chamber.
Now my life is very hard;
But, by God, sweet Mary's son,
I will not stay longer here
If I can get out."

VI

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Nicolette was in prison, just as you have heard and understood, in the chamber. The cry and the rumor went through all the land and through all the country that Nicolette was lost. Some said that she had fled out of the country, and others said that Count Garin de Beaucaire had had her murdered. Whoever else had joy of it, Aucassin was not glad. He went to the viscount of the town, so did he address him:

"Sir Viscount, what have you done with Nicolette, my very sweet love, for there is nothing in all the world that I love more? Have you stolen her away from me? Know well that if I die of it, payment will be demanded of you; and that will be very right, for you will have slain me with your two hands, for you have taken from me the thing which I love most in this world."

"Fair lord," said the Viscount, "now stay out of this. Nicolette is a captive whom I brought from a strange land, so did I buy her with my wealth from the Saracens. And I have reared her and baptized her and made her my god-daughter; so have I nourished her. And I should have given her one of these days to a young man who should earn bread for her with honor. With this you have nothing to do. Instead, take the daughter of a king or a count. Moreover, what would you think to have gained if you had made her your mistress and put her in your bed? Little indeed would you have won, for all the days of the world your soul would be in Hell because of it, for into Paradise you could never enter."

"What would I be doing in Paradise? I don't want to enter there, but only to have Nicolette, my very sweet love, whom I love so much. For to Paradise go only such people as I shall tell you of: the old priests, the old cripples and maimed ones who, all night and all day, drag themselves before the altars and in the old crypts, and those who wear old worn-out clothes and are dressed in tattered rags, who are naked and without shoes and stockings, and dying of hunger and thirst and of cold and of misery. These go to Paradise. I have nothing to do with them. But to Hell I wish indeed to go; for to Hell go the handsome clerics, and the fine knights who have died in the tourneys and in great wars, and the good soldiers and the brave men; with them I do wish to go. There, also, go the fair and courteous ladies who have two or three lovers besides their husbands. And there go the gold and silver and miniver and gray furs. There, also, go the harpers and the jongleurs, and the kings of the world. With them do I wish to go—provided that I have Nicolette, my very sweet love, with me."

"Surely," said the Viscount, "your speaking gets you nowhere, for you shall never see her. And if you were to speak to her and your father knew it, he would burn both me and her in a fire, and you might well fear for yourself."

"That's what worries me," said Aucassin, and filled with grief he left the viscount.

VII

Now it is sung

Aucassin has turned away
Very sad and all downcast;
For his love with clearest face
No one now can comfort him,
Neither give him good advice.
Toward the palace has he gone;
He has mounted up the steps.
In a chamber has he come,
So did he begin to weep
And to sigh in deepest grief,
Lamenting his lost sweetheart.
"Nicolette, how sweet you were,
Sweet to come and sweet to go,
Sweet to play and sweet to say,
Sweet to tease and sweet to please,
Sweet to kiss and sweet to squeeze.
I for you am all cast down
And am so badly treated
That I think I'll leave this life, Sister, sweet love."

VIII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

While Aucassin was in his chamber mourning for Nicolette his love, Count Bougars de Valence, who had his war to maintain, was in no way forgetting it. He had sent forward his horsemen and foot soldiers, and he then directed himself toward the castle to assail it. And a cry arose and a disturbance, and the knights and the soldiers armed themselves and ran to the gates and to the walls to defend the castle, and the bourgeois went up the passage-ways in the walls and threw down rocks and sharpened stakes. While the assault was great and in full swing, the Count Garin de Beaucaire came to the chamber where Aucassin was grieving and mourning Nicolette, his very sweet love, whom he loved so much.

"Ha! Son," said he, "how very weak and wretched you are, that you watch while they assault the best and strongest of all castles. And know that if you lose it, you are disinherited. Come on, Son, take up your arms, and mount your horse and defend your land, and aid your men, and go into the battle. You need never strike a man there, nor let another strike you; yet if they see you among them, they will defend better their goods and their bodies and your land and mine. You are so big and so strong that you can easily do it, and you ought to do it."

"Father," said Aucassin, "what are you talking about now? May God give me nothing of what I ask of him if I play the knight or mount on a horse or go into the battle, where I may strike some knights, or be struck by others, unless you give me Nicolette, my sweet love, whom I love so much."

"Son," said the father, "that can't be done; rather would I suffer that I should be entirely dispossessed and that I should lose all that I have than that you should ever have her for your wife or for your bride."

He turned away, and when Aucassin saw him about to go, he called him back.

"Father," said Aucassin, "come back, I will make a good bargain with you."

"Such as what, my fine son?"

"I will take up arms and go into the battle on your promise that, if God brings me back safe and sound, you will let me see Nicolette, my sweet love, long enough to have two or three words with her, and that I may kiss her one single time."

"I grant it," said the father.

He gave him his word, and Aucassin was glad.

IX

Now it is sung

Aucassin a kiss will have
If he should return alive;
For a hundred thousand marks
He would not be half so glad.
He demanded armor bright;
Servants clothed him as a knight.
Double hauberk he put on,
Laced his helmet on his head,
Girt his sword with golden hilt,
And on his charger mounted.
Then he took his shield and spear,
Cast a glance down at his feet.
In his stirrups well they sat;
High he holds his head aloft.
He remembers his sweet love.
Forward then he spurs his horse;
Willingly he takes his course.
Right up to the gate he goes To the battle.

X

Now they tell and relate

Aucassin was armed and on his horse, as you have heard and understood. God, how becoming the shield was at his neck and the helmet on his head and the belt of his sword on his left hip. The lad was big and strong and handsome and noble and well turned out, and the horse which he rode, quick and rapid; and the lad had ridden him straight through the middle of the gate.

Now don't you believe that he was thinking of taking oxen or cows or goats, or that he would strike some knight or another strike him. Nothing like that! Not once did it occur to him. But he thought so much of Nicolette, his sweet love, that he forgot the reins and all that he had to do. And the horse that had felt the spurs carried him into the thick of the battle and hurled him right into the midst of his enemies. They grabbed him from all sides; so did they take him. And they relieved him of his shield and lance; so did they quickly lead him away a prisoner. And they went along, already considering what death they would make him die.

And when Aucassin heard them:

"Ah, God," said he, "sweet creature! Are these my mortal enemies who are holding me here, and who now will cut off my head? And after my head is cut off, never will I speak to Nicolette, my sweet love, whom I love so much. Yet I have here a good sword, and I'm riding a good fresh war-horse. If now I don't defend myself for her sake, never may God help her if she loves me any more."

The lad was big and strong, and the horse on which he sat was lively. And he snatched his sword and began to strike right and left and cut through helmets and nose-pieces and fists and arms and made a slaughter round about him, like the wild boar when the dogs attack him in the forest. And so did he strike down ten knights and wound seven, and rode quickly out of the thick of things. So did he come galloping back, sword in hand.

The Count Bougars de Valence heard them say that they were going to hang Aucassin, his enemy, and he came to that place, and Aucassin did not mistake him. He took his sword in hand and whacked down on the helmet so that it went down over his head. He was so stunned that he fell onto the ground. And Aucassin put out his hand, took him and led him along by the nose-guard of his helmet, and handed him over to his father.

"Father," said Aucassin, "look, here is your enemy who for so long has made war on you and done harm; this war has lasted for twenty years and never could it be ended by anyone."

"Fair son," said the father, "you ought to do these youthful deeds and not chase after foolishness."

"Father," said Aucassin, "don't you go making sermons to me, but keep your promises to me."

"Bah! What promises, fair son?"

"What, Father, have you forgotten them? By my head, whoever else forgets them, I don't want to forget them, so close I hold them to my heart. Didn't you make an agreement with me that if I took up arms and went into battle and if God brought me back safe and sound, you would let me see Nicolette, my sweet love, long enough to have two or three words with her? And didn't you make an agreement that I might kiss her one time? I want you to keep this promise to me."

"I?" said the father. "May God never aid me if I keep faith with you in this. And if she were here now, I would burn her in a fire, and you, yourself, might well be afraid."

"Is this your last word?" asked Aucassin.

"So help me God," said the father, "yes!"

"Well," said Aucassin, "very, very much do I grieve when a man of your age is a liar."

"Count de Valence," said Aucassin, "I took you a prisoner."

"You surely did, sir," said the count.

"Give me your hand on it," said Aucassin.

"Willingly, sir." And he put his hand in his.

"Now swear to me," said Aucassin, "that, any day as long as you live, should you be able to do dishonor or destruction to my father, either in his person or his property, you won't fail to do it.

"Sir, for God's sake," said he, "don't mock me, but set a ransom on me. You will not be able to ask of me gold, or silver, horses or palfreys, miniver or gray fur, or hounds or birds, that I will not give you."

"What?" said Aucassin. "Don't you know that I have taken you prisoner?"

"Oh yes, sir," said the Count Bougars.

"If you do not swear it to me," said Aucassin, "may God never help me if I do not send your head flying now."

"In the name of God," he said, "I'll swear to whatever you please."

So he swore, and Aucassin made him mount on a horse, and he mounted another and led him back until he was in safety.

XI

Now it is sung

Now when sees the Count Garin
That his offspring Aucassin Cannot tear himself away
From the clear-faced Nicolette,
In a cell he had him set,
In a prison underground,
Which was made of marble dark.
Now when Aucassin came there
He was sadder than before.

If you wish, you now may hear
What lamenting he began:
"Nicolette, sweet fleur-le-lis,
Sweet love with the clearest face,
Sweeter than a bunch of grapes,
Sweeter than the wine bowl's sop.
One time I saw a pilgrim
Who was born in Limousin,
With the palsy nearly dead;
Thus he lay upon his bed.
A sick man he was indeed,
Stricken with a dread disease.
When you passed before his bed,
Then you lifted up your skirt,
And your coat with ermine lined,
Your chemise of linen white,
Until he could see your leg.
Straightway was the pilgrim cured
More than he had ever been.
Then he jumped up from his bed;
To his country he returned,
Safe and sound, completely cured.
O sweet love, sweet fleur-de-lis,
Sweet to kiss, sweet to embrace,
Sweet to come and sweet to go,
Sweet to say and sweet to play,
Sweet to please and sweet to squeeze,
No man could ever hate you.
Yet for your sake I am here
In this prison underground
Where I make a dismal end.
Now I ought to kill myself
For you, my love."

XII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Aucassin was put in prison, as you have heard and understood, and Nicolette was elsewhere in her chamber. This was in the summertime, in the month of May, when the days are hot and long and clear and the nights still and serene.

Nicolette lay one night in her bed, and she saw the moon shine clear through a window, and she heard the nightingale singing in the garden; so did she recall Aucassin, her love whom she loved to much. She began to reflect about Count Garin de Beaucaire, who hated her to death. So did she think that she would remain there no longer; for, if she were discovered and Count Garin heard about it, he would make her die an evil death. She perceived that the old woman who was with her was sleeping. She got up and put on a good chemise of cloth of silk that she had, and she took her bed-clothes and towels, and tied them one to another and made a cord as long as she could. This she tied to the pillar of the window; so did she slide down into the garden. She took the front of her dress with one hand and the back with the other and raised it close about her, because of the dew which she saw heavy upon the grass, and so she made off down the garden.

She had blond hair tightly curled, and eyes gray and laughing, and a slender face, and a nose high and well placed, and lips redder than the cherry or the rose in the summertime, and teeth small and white. And she had firm little breasts which raised up her gown as if they were two walnuts, and she was so slender in the waist that you could have circled it with your two hands. And the blossoms of daisies which she broke with the toes of her feet and which were lying upon her instep were completely black beside her feet and legs, so very, very white was the maiden.

She came to the postern and unlocked it. So did she pass out into the streets of Beaucaire, under cover of the shadows, for the moon was shining very clear. And she wandered about until she came to the tower where her lover was. The tower was cracked from place to place. And Nicolette squatted down against one of the buttresses and wrapped her cloak about her. She stuck her head in through a crevice of the tower, which was old and ancient. So did she hear Aucassin, who, inside, was weeping and wailing loudly and regretting his sweet love, whom he loved so much. And when she had listened enough to him, she began to speak.

XIII

Now it is sung

Nicolette with clearest face
Was leaning on a buttress.
Aucassin she heard to weep
And lament his sweetheart lost.
Now she speaks and says her thought.
"Aucassin, my noble lord,
Gentle, high-born, honored youth,
What's the use of all these sighs,
This weeping and lamenting?
For you can never have me;
Your father and your family
All hate me and detest me.
For you I'd sail the high seas

And go to other countries."
From her hair she cut a lock
And threw it in his dungeon.
Noble Aucassin took it
And did it a great homage.
He kissed it and embraced it
And stuck it in his bosom,
Then began again to weep
All for his love.

XIV

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Aucassin heard Nicolette say that she wished to go away to another country, in him there was nothing but anger.

"Fair sweet love," said he, "you shall not go away, for then you would be the death of me. And the first one who saw you, and who would be able to do it, would take you immediately and put you into his bed, and so would he make you his mistress. And once you had lain in a man's bed—if it wasn't mine—don't think that I would wait until I had found a knife with which I could pierce my heart and kill myself. No, indeed, I wouldn't wait that long, but I would rush about until I saw a wall or a dark stone, and I would dash my head against it so hard that I would make my eyes pop out and brain myself completely. For I would much prefer to die such a death than to know that you were in a man's bed—if it wasn't mine."

"Ah!" said she. "I don't think that you love me as much as you say. But I love you more than you love me."

"Look here," said Aucassin, "fair sweet love, it couldn't be that you should love me as much as I love you. Woman can't love man as much as man loves woman, for the love of a woman is in her eye, and in the nipple of her breast, and in the toe of her foot, but the love of a man is planted in the heart where it can't escape."

While Aucassin and Nicolette were talking there, the guardsmen of the town were coming down the street. They had their swords drawn beneath their cloaks, for Count Garin had commanded them that if they were able to take her, they should kill her. And the watchman who was on the tower saw them coming and heard them going along talking about Nicolette and threatening to kill her.

"God," said he, "what a great pity for so fair a girl, if they should kill her. And it would be a very great charity if I could tell her, in some way they wouldn't perceive, that she should be on her guard. For if they kill her, then Aucassin, my young lord, will die, and that will be a great loss."

XV

Now it is sung

The watchman was a gallant,
Knowing, proud and courteous man.
So did he begin a song
Which was sweet and ran along.
"Maiden of the noble heart,
Body fair and full of grace,
Thou hast blond and shining hair,
Grayish eyes and smiling face.
Well do I see by thy air,
Thou hast spoken to thy love,
Who now for thee dying is.
Listen while I tell thee this:
From seducers guard thyself;
They are looking for thee here,
Bearing swords beneath their cloaks.
Terribly they'll threaten thee;
Soon much evil will they do
If thou guard not well."

XVI

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

"Ah," said Nicolette, "may the souls of your father and mother be in blessed repose, since so fairly and courteously you have told me about them. If it please God, I will guard myself well from them, and God help me do it."

She wrapped her cloak about her in the shadow of the buttress until they had passed beyond. Then she took leave of Aucassin and went on until she came to the wall of the castle. The wall was in pieces and had been boarded up, and she climbed up on this and made her way along until she was between the wall and the moat. And she looked down and saw that the moat was very deep and very steep, and she was very, very much afraid.

"Oh God," said she, "sweet creature! If I let myself fall, I'll break my neck, and if I remain here, they will take me tomorrow, and they will burn me in a fire. I would much prefer that I die here than that all the folk should stare at me tomorrow under marvelous circumstances."

She made the sign of the cross above her head and let herself slide down into the moat. And when she came to the bottom, her beautiful feet and her beautiful hands, which had never learned that things might wound them, were bruised and torn, and the blood flowed from them in at least a dozen places; but nevertheless she felt neither hurt nor pain because of the great fear which she had. And though getting in had been much trouble, getting out was even more. She thought to herself that it would never do any good to remain there. She found a sharpened stake which those within had thrown down in defense of the castle, and placing one foot before the other, she mounted up with great difficulty until she came to the top.

Now there was a forest, about two crossbow shots away, which stretched for at least thirty leagues in length and in breadth, and there were savage beasts in it—also serpents. She was afraid that if she entered there, these might kill her; and, on the other hand, she reflected, if they found her there, they would lead her back to the town to burn her.

XVII

Now it is sung

Nicolette with clearest face
Up the moat has made her way.
Then began she to lament
And in Jesus' name to pray:
"Father, King of Majesty,
I do not know where to go.
If I go into the woods,
There the wolves will eat me sure,
The wild boars and the lions,
Of which there are a-plenty.
If I wait the daylight clear
So that they could find me here,
They will light their fires of wood
And my body will be burned.
But, by God of Majesty,
I would very much prefer
That even wolves should eat me,
Or wild boars or the lions,
Than go into the city.
I will not go."

XVIII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Nicolette lamented as you have heard. She commended herself to God and wandered on until she came into the forest. She didn't dare to enter very deep into it because of the savage beasts and because of the serpents; so she crawled into a thick bush. Sleep seized her, and she slept until the next morning at seven-thirty when the shepherds came out of the town and drove their beasts between the wood and the river. There they drew aside to a very beautiful spring which was at the edge of the forest, and spread out a cape and set their bread upon it. And while they were eating, Nicolette was awakened by the cries of the birds and of the shepherds; so did she hurry toward them.

"Fair children," said she, "may the Mother of God aid you."

"God bless you!" said the one of them who was more talkative than the others.

"Fair children," said she, "do you know Aucassin, the son of Count Garin de Beaucaire?"

"Yes, we know him well."

"So may God aid you, fair children," she said. "Tell him that there is a beast in this forest, and that he is to come to hunt for it; and if he could catch it, he would not give one leg of it for one hundred marks of gold, not for five hundred, nor for any amount."

And they looked at her, and so did they see her so beautiful that they were all astonished.

"I should tell him that?" said he who was more talkative than the others. "Damned be the one who would ever talk about it, or who would ever tell him! It's a phantom that you're talking about, for there is no beast in the forest so valuable, neither stag nor lion nor wild boar, that one of his legs would be worth more than a shilling or two at the most, and you speak of such a great value! Damned be the one who believes you, or whoever shall tell it to him! You are some fairy, and we have no desire for your company, so you keep on your way."

"Ah, fair children," she said, "you will do this. The beast has such medicine that Aucassin will be cured of his illness. And I have five sous here in my purse; take them—if you will tell him. And he ought to hunt it within three days; and if, within three days, he doesn't find it, he never will be cured of his illness."

"By faith," said he, "we will take the money, and if he comes here, we will tell him; but we'll never go to look for him."

"It's up to God," said she.

Then she took leave of the shepherds, and so did she go on her way.

XIX

Now it is sung

Nicolette with clearest face
Has parted from the shepherds.
So she's taken up her way
Right into the leafy wood,
Following an abandoned path
Until she met a highway
Where seven roads divided
Which went through the country-side.

Then the thought came to her head
How she could prove her lover,
If he loved her as he said.
So she took the iris-flower
And green grass from a thicket
And some branches thick with leaves.
So she made a leafy hut;
Prettier was there never seen.
By the truthful God she swore
That if Aucassin came there
And did not for love of her Rest in it a little while Never would he be her love
Nor she be his.

XX

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Nicolette had made a hut, as you have heard and understood, very pretty and attractive, for she had decorated it well inside and outside with flowers and with leaves. Then she lay down close by the hut in a thick bush to know what Aucassin would do.

And the cry and rumor went through all the land and through all the country that Nicolette was lost. Some said that she had run away, and others said that Count Garin had had her murdered. Whoever may have had joy from it, Aucassin wasn't at all happy about it. And Count Garin, his father, had him taken out of prison. So did he send for the knights and the ladies, and he had made a great rich feast, with which he thought to comfort Aucassin, his son.

Although the feast was most complete, Aucassin stood leaning on a post all sad and all limp. Whoever had joy, Aucassin was in no mood for it; for he saw nothing at all there of the thing he loved. A knight looked at him and came up to him; so did he speak to him.

"Aucassin," said he, "I have been sick with the same illness that you have. I will give you some good advice, if you wish to believe me."

"Sir," said Aucassin, "many thanks. I would appreciate some good advice."

"Get on a horse," said he, "and ride along the forest to cheer yourself up. And you will see the flowers and the plants, and you will hear the little birds sing. By some chance you may hear some word for which you will be better."

"Sir," said Aucassin, "Thanks very much. That's what I'll do."

He slipped out of the hall and went down the stairs and came to the stable where his horse was. He had the saddle and bridle put on. He put his foot in the stirrup and mounted and went out of the castle. And he wandered until he came to the forest and rode along until he reached the spring and found the shepherds just at mid-afternoon. They had spread out a cape on the grass, and they were eating their bread and making very merry.

XXI

Now it is sung

Now the shepherds gather round,
Little Martin and Esmy,
Little Frulin and Johnny,
Little Robin and Aubrey.
"Little shepherd boys," said one,
"God help little Aucassin;
He is a fine young fellow.
And the girl with form so small
And curly hair so yellow.
Bright her face, her eye so gray,
She gave us little pennies
With which we'll buy little cakes,
Little knives and little sheaths,
Little flutes and little horns,
Little crooks and little pipes.
May God help her."

XXII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Aucassin heard the shepherds, he recalled Nicolette, his very sweet love, whom he loved so much, and thought that she had been there. He pricked his horse with the spurs, and so did he come up to the shepherds.

"Fair children, may God aid you!"

"God bless you!" said the one who was more talkative than the others.

"Fair children," said he, "repeat the song that you were singing just now."

"We will not say it," said the one who was more talkative than the others. "Damned now be the one who will sing it for you, fair sir."

"Fair children," said Aucassin, "don't you know me?"

"Yes, we know very well that you are Aucassin, our young lord, but we don't belong to you, but rather to the count."

"Fair children, you will do this, I pray you."

"Oh, for God's sake!" said he. "Why should I sing for you if it doesn't suit me? When there is no man so rich in this country, except Count Garin in person, who, if he found my oxen, or my cows, or my sheep in his fields, or even in his grain, would risk having his eyes put out, for daring to chase them from it? And why should I sing for you if it doesn't suit me?"

"God aid you, fair children, if you will do it, and take ten sous which I have here in my purse."

"Sir, we will take the money, but I will not sing it for you, for I have sworn it, but I will tell it to you if you wish."

"It's up to God," said Aucassin, "I would rather have it told than nothing."

"Sir, we were here a little while ago, between six and nine this morning, eating our bread by this spring, as we are now, and a maiden came here, the most beautiful in the world, so that we believed her to be a fairy, and this whole wood was made bright by her. And she gave us so much of what she had that we made a promise to her, that if you came here, we would tell you that you should go and hunt in this forest, where there is a beast which, if you should be able to catch it, you would never give up one of its legs for five hundred marks of silver, or for any price. For the beast has such a medicine that, if you could catch it, you would be cured of your illness. And you must take it within three days, and if you haven't caught it, you will never see it again. Now hunt it, if you will; or if you will, leave it, for I have fully acquitted myself towards her."

"Fair children," said Aucassin, "you have told me enough about it, and God let me find it!"

XXIII

Now it is sung

Aucassin has heard the words
Of his love with form so fair.
Much they struck him to the core.
Soon he leaves the shepherd boys
And in the deep woods enters.
His war-horse ambled quickly,
At a gallop carried him.
Now he speaks and says three words:
"Nicolette, of form so fair,
In this woods for you I've come.
I'm not hunting stag or boar;
Your tracks I am following.
Your gray eyes and your sweet form,
Your soft speech and gentle laugh
Unto death my heart do wound.
If it please the Father, God,
Then shall I see you again.
Sister, sweet love."

XXIV

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Aucassin went through the forest from path to path, and his war horse carried him along at a great speed. Don't think that the briars and thorns spared him. Nothing of the sort! Rather they ripped up his clothes so that one could scarcely have made a knot out of the biggest pieces. And blood ran from his arms and his sides and his legs in forty places—or thirty, so that after the lad one might follow the traces of blood which fell on the grass. But he thought so much about Nicolette, his sweet love, that he felt neither pain nor unhappiness. And he went all day through the forest in such a way that he never did get news of her. And when he saw evening approaching, he began to weep because he couldn't find her.

He was riding along an old path all covered with leaves, when he looked before him, in the middle of the path; so did he see a yokel such as I shall tell you. Great he was, and marvelous and ugly and hideous; and he had a great bushy head blacker than charcoal, and he had more than a hand's breath between his two eyes, and he had great cheeks and a huge flat nose, and wide nostrils and thick lips redder than roast beef, and big teeth, yellow and ugly. And he wore leggings and shoes of cow-hide, cross-laced with willow bark to above the knee. He was wearing a cape unfinished inside and out, and he was leaning on a big club.

Aucassin hurried toward him and was very frightened when he got a good look at him.

"Fair brother, God help you!"

"God help you," said he.

"God help you. What are you doing here?"

"What's it to you?" said he.

"Nothing," said Aucassin, "I don't ask you except with good reason."

"But why are you crying," said he, "and making such a to-do? Surely, if I were as rich a man as you are, all the world wouldn't make me cry."

"What! do you know me?" said Aucassin.

"Sure, I know well that you are Aucassin, the son of the count, and if you will tell me why you are crying, I will tell you what I am doing here."

"Surely," said Aucassin, "I will tell you very gladly. I came this morning to hunt in the forest, and I had a white greyhound, the most beautiful in the world, and I have lost it. That's why I'm crying."

"To hear," said he, "by the heart that the Lord had in his belly, that you were crying over a stinking dog? May he be badly damned who shall ever take any account of you, when there is no man in this land so rich, that if your father asked him for ten or fifteen or twenty, he would not have given them only too willingly and have been only too glad. But I ought to cry and wail."

"And for what reason, brother?"

"Sir, I'll tell you. I was in the hire of a rich farmer, and I drove his plough, a four-ox one. Now three days ago there came to me a great accident by which I lost the best one of my oxen, Roget, the best of my team. So now I am looking for him, and I haven't eaten or drunk for the last three days. And I don't dare go to the town, for they would put me in prison since I don't have the money to pay for it. Of all the wealth in the world, I have nothing more valuable than what you see on my body. I have a poor old mother, and she had nothing more valuable than an old mattress, and they have taken it right out from under her back, so that she lies on the bare straw now. I am much more worried about her than about myself, for money comes and goes. If I have lost now, I will gain it another time; so shall I pay for my ox when I can, nor will I ever cry about it. And you were crying over a filthy dog—may anyone who ever takes any account of you be damned forever!"

"You certainly are a good comfort, fair brother, and may you be blessed! And what was your ox worth?"

"Sir, twenty sous they are asking me for it, and I can't get a single sou knocked off."

"Now take," said Aucassin, "the twenty which I have in my purse, and pay for your ox."

"Sir," said he, "thanks very much, and may God let you find what you are seeking."

He parted from him, and Aucassin rode on. The night was fair and still, and he wandered along until he came to the place where the seven roads forked. So did he look before him, and he saw the hut that Nicolette had built, which was hung outside and inside and on top and in front with flowers and was so beautiful that it could not be more so. When Aucassin saw it, he stopped all of a sudden, and the rays of the moon were shining in it.

"Oh, God," said Aucassin, "Nicolette, my sweet love, was here, and she made this with her own beautiful hands. Because of her sweetness and for love of her, I will get down now and stretch out there for the rest of the night."

Now the horse was big and tall, and Aucassin took his foot out of the stirrup to get down. He was thinking so much about Nicolette, his very sweet love, that he fell so hard on a stone that his shoulder flew out of place. He felt himself badly hurt, but he forced himself along as best he could, and tied the horse with his other hand to a thornbush; then he turned on his side so that he crawled into the hut. He looked up through a hole in the hut, and he saw the stars in the sky. He saw one brighter than the others, and he began to say.

XXV

Now it is sung

"I can see you, little star,
Which the moon draws after her.
Nicolette is with you there,
My sweet love with golden hair.
I think God wants to have her
So that all the evening light
Can by her be made more bright.
At the risk of falling down
Would that I were up with you;
I would kiss you willingly.
Though I were a monarch's son,
You would worthy be of me.
Sister, sweet love."

XXVI

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Nicolette heard Aucassin, she came to him, for she was not far off. She came into the hut; so did she throw her arms around his neck, kissed him, and embraced him.

"Fair sweet love, it's good to find you!"

"And you, fair sweet love, it's good to find you!"

They kissed each other and embraced; so was their joy beautiful.

"Ah, sweet love," said Aucassin, "just now I hurt my shoulder, and now I feel neither pain nor grief since I have you."

She felt him carefully and found that he had his shoulder out of place. She handled it and pulled it about so with her white hands that, as God who loves lovers willed it, it came back into place; and then she took some flowers and fresh grass and green leaves, and she bound it up with the tail of her chemise, and he was completely cured.

"Aucassin," said she, "fair sweet love, take counsel what you will do. If your father has this forest searched tomorrow, whatever may become of you, they will kill me."

"Surely, fair sweet love, I should be very sad over it; but if I am able, they shall never get hold of you."

He mounted on his horse, and took his love up in front of him, kissing and embracing her; so did they set off to the open fields.

XXVII

Now it is sung

Aucassin, the fair, the blond,
The gentle and the loving,
Out of that deep woods has gone
With his love between his arms,
His saddle-bow before him.
He kissed her eyes and forehead,
Kissed her mouth and then her chin;
Then did Nicolette begin,
"Aucassin, sweet handsome love,
To what country shall we go?"
"My sweet love, how should I know?
I do not care where we go
In the woods or on the roads
So long as I am with you."
They passed the hills and valleys,
The villages and cities,
And at dawn they reached the sea
And dismounted on the sand
Near the seashore.

XXVIII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Aucassin had dismounted, both he and his love, as you have heard and understood. He held his horse by the reins, and his love by the hand, and so did they begin to go along the shore. And Aucassin looked toward the sea and saw a ship of merchants who were sailing near the coast.

He hailed them and they came to him, and he made such terms with them that they took them into their ship. And when they were on the high seas, a storm arose, great and marvelous, which drove them from land to land, until they arrived in a strange country and entered into the port of the Castle of Torelore. Then they asked whose land it was, and they told them that it was the land of the King of Torelore. Then they asked what sort of a man he was, and if he had a war, and they told him, "Yes, a great one."

He took leave of the merchants, and they commended him to God. He mounted on his horse, his sword girded on, and his love in front of him, and wandered until he came to the castle. He asked where the king was, and they told him that he was lying in bed with child.

"And where is his wife, then?"

And they told him that she was with the army, and that she had taken away with her everybody in the country. Aucassin heard it, and it seemed to him a great marvel. He came up to the palace and dismounted—both he and his love; and she held the horse, and he went up into the palace, his sword girded on, and wandered about until he came into the room where the king was lying.

XXIX

Now it is sung

In the room came Aucassin
The courteous and the noble.
He came straight up to the bed
On which the king was lying.
Right in front of him he stopped
And spoke; listen what he said:
"Fool, what are you doing here?"
Said the king, "I am with child.
When my month shall be fulfilled
And I shall be well again,
I shall then be churched at mass
As my ancestors have done;
Then from carrying on great war
With my enemies again,
I shall never stop."

XXX

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Aucassin heard the king speak thus, he took all the bed clothes which were upon him and threw them around the room. He saw just in back of him a big stick. He took it, turned about, and he struck him and beat him so much that he almost killed him.

"Ah, fair sir," said the king, "what do you want of me? Have you gone crazy that you beat me in my own house?"

"By God's heart," said Aucassin, "evil son of a slut, I will kill you, if you do not swear to me that never again shall a man in your land be brought to bed with child."

He swore it, and when he had heard him swear it:

"Sir," said Aucassin, "now lead me there where your wife is with the army."

"Sir, willingly," said the king.

He mounted on his horse, and Aucassin mounted on his, and Nicolette remained in the chambers of the queen. And the king and Aucassin rode along until they came to the place where the queen was, and they found there a battle of rotted wild apples, and of eggs and of fresh cheeses; and Aucassin began to look at them, and he was very, very much astonished indeed.

XXXI

Now it is sung

Aucassin had stopped and now,
Elbow on his saddle-bow,
He begins to marvel at
This violent battlefield,
For both sides had brought with them
Cheeses quite fresh from the vats,
With wood apples rotted soft,
And some large field mushrooms too.
He who most stirs up the fords
Is proclaimed the lord of lords.
Aucassin the valiant knight Stared at them with all his might
And began to laugh.

XXXII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Aucassin saw this marvel, he came to the king; so did he speak to him.

"Sir," said Aucassin, "are these your enemies?"

"Yes, sir," said the king.

"And would you like me to avenge you on them?"

"Yes," said he, "if you like."

And Aucassin put his hand on his sword, so did he rush among them and began to strike right and left and killed many of them. When the king saw that he was killing them, he took him by the bridle and said:

"Ah, fair sir, don't kill them like this."

"What?" said Aucassin, "don't you want me to avenge you?"

"Sir," said the king, "you have done too much. It is not our custom to kill each other."

The enemy turned and fled, and the king and Aucassin returned to the castle of Torelore. And the people of the country told the king that he should cast Aucassin out of the land and detain Nicolette as a wife for his son since she seemed, indeed, to be a woman of high lineage. Nicolette heard it, and was not at all glad about it, and she began to say:

XXXIII

Now it is sung

"O, sir king of Torelore,"
Said the lovely Nicolette,
"Your folk take me for a fool;

When my love embraces me
And feels me plump and tender,
Then am I in such a state
That neither songs nor dances,
Fiddle, harp, nor viol gay,
Nor the pleasures of the play
Are worth a thing."

XXXIV

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Aucassin was in the castle of Torelore, and Nicolette, his love; and he had great delight and great ease that he had with him Nicolette, his sweet love, whom he loved so much. And while he was in such ease and in such delight, a fleet of the Saracens came by sea and assailed the castle; so did they take it by force. And they took all the treasure and led the men and women away captive. They took Nicolette and Aucassin, and they bound Aucassin's hands and his feet, and they threw him into one ship and Nicolette into another. And there arose a storm on the sea, which separated them.

The ship in which Aucassin was went skimming over the sea until it arrived at the Castle of Beaucaire. The people of the country ran to the wreckage, and they found Aucassin, and so did they recognize him. When those of Beaucaire saw their young lord, they made great joy over it, for Aucassin had lived in the castle of Torelore for three full years, and his father and mother were dead. They led him to the Castle of Beaucaire; so did they all become his men, and he held his land in peace.

XXXV

Now it is sung

Aucassin has gone away
To his city of Beaucaire.
All the country and the realm
He now held in greatest calm, Swore by God of Majesty
That he much more regretted
Nicolette with clearest face
Than all of his relations
Though they all were dead and gone.
"Sweetheart with the clearest face,
I don't know where you may be.
God has never made that place
Either on the land or sea
Where if I thought to find you
I would not look."

XXXVI

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

Now we will leave off about Aucassin and talk of Nicolette. The ship in which Nicolette was belonged to the king of Carthage, and he was her father, and she had twelve brothers, all princes and kings. When they saw Nicolette so beautiful, they offered her very, very great honors and made a feast for her, and often did they ask her who she was, for indeed she seemed to be a very noble lady and of high lineage. But she didn't know how to tell them who she was, for she had been stolen away as a little child. They sailed along until they arrived below the city of Carthage; and when Nicolette saw the walls of the castle and the country, she recognized that she had been brought up there and stolen from there as a little child. But she was not so small a child that she didn't know very well that she had been the daughter of the king of Carthage, and that she had been brought up in the city.

XXXVII

Now it is sung

Nicolette, high-born and wise,
Now has landed on the shore,
Saw the buildings and the walls
And the castle and the halls.
Seeing which, she cried, "Alas,
I am of a high descent,
Daughter to the Carthage king
And cousin to the emir!
Savage people hold me here.
Aucassin, well-born and wise,
Honorable, noble lord,
Your sweet love so urges me,
Speaks to me and troubles me,
God the Spirit grant me this:
That you hold me in your arms,
Once again my forehead kiss,
Kiss my mouth and kiss my face,
My sweet young lord."

XXXVIII

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When the king of Carthage heard Nicolette speak in that way, he threw his arms around her neck.

"Fair sweet love," said he, "tell me who you are; don't you be afraid of me."

"Sir," said she, "I am the daughter of the king of Carthage, and I was stolen as a little child, fully fifteen years ago."

When he heard her speak thus, he knew well that she was speaking the truth; so did he make a very great holiday for her, and led her into the palace with great honor as the daughter of a king. For a husband he wished to give her a king of the pagans, but she had no desire to get married. She was there three or four full days. She reflected by what device she would be able to search for Aucassin. She bought herself a viol and learned to play it, until they wanted one day to marry her off to a rich pagan king. And she slipped out that night and came to the seaport; so did she take shelter with a poor woman on the shore. And she took an herb and smeared her head and face with it so that she was all black and stained. And she had a coat made and a cloak and a shirt and underbreeches, and rigged herself out in the guise of a jongleur. So she took her viol and came up to a sailor, and she made such terms with him that he took her aboard his ship. They raised their sails, and so did they sail away over the high seas until they arrived at the land of Provence. And Nicolette started out and took her viol; so did she go along playing through the country until she came to the Castle of Beaucaire, there where Aucassin was.

XXXIX

Now it is sung

At Beaucaire beneath the tower
There was Aucassin one day
Seated on a stone stairway.
Round him were his barons proud.
He saw the grass and flowers
And heard the small birds singing
And remembered of his love,
For the noble Nicolette,
Whom he'd loved so many days.
He gives way to sighs and tears.
Look, below is Nicolette
With her viol and her bow.
Now she speaks and tells her tale,
"Listen to me, noble lords,
Those above and those below,
Would you like to hear a song
Of a proud lord, Aucassin,
Of the noble Nicolette,
How their love endured so long,
How he sought her in the wood;
At Torelore in prison
The pagans one day put them.

Naught of Aucassin we know,
But the noble Nicolette
At Carthage is in prison.
Now her father loves her well
Who is lord of all that realm.
As bride they wish to give her
To a wretched pagan king.
Nicolette won't think of it,
For she loves a fair young lord
By the name of Aucassin.
Well she swears by God's own name
That she will never marry
If she cannot have the one Whom she so loves."

XL

Now they tell and relate and continue the tale

When Aucassin heard Nicolette speak thus, he was very glad, and he drew her aside and asked her:

"Fair sweet friend," said Aucassin, "do you know anything of this Nicolette of whom you have just sung?"

"Sir, yes," said she, "I know of her as the most noble creature, and the most gentle and the most wise that was ever born. She is the daughter of the King of Carthage, who took her when Aucassin was taken; so did he lead her into the city of Carthage until he had learned indeed that she was his daughter. He made a great festival; and he wished each day to give her for a husband one of the most exalted kings in all Spain, but she would rather let herself be hanged or burned than take any one of them, however rich he might be."

"Ah, fair sweet friend," said Count Aucassin, "if you would go back to that land and tell her to come here to speak to me, I would give you as much of my wealth as you would dare demand or take. And know that for love of her, I have no desire to take a wife however high her lineage may be, but only to wait for her. For I will have no wife if it isn't she. And if I had known where to find her, I would not be looking for her now."

"Sir," said she, "if you would do this, I would go and seek her for you and for her, whom I love very much."

He swore it to her, and then he had her given twenty pounds. She started to leave him, and he wept for the sweetness of Nicolette. When she saw him weeping:

"Sir," she said, "don't be dismayed, for in a little time I will have her brought into this town; so you will see her."

And when Aucassin heard her, he was very, very glad. And she went away from him; so did she go through the town to the house of the Viscountess, for the Viscount, her god-father, was dead.

There she stayed, and she talked to her until she had revealed her plan, and the Viscountess had recognized her and knew indeed that it was Nicolette whom she had reared. So did she have her washed and bathed, and she stayed there eight full days. Then she took an herb which is called Clarity and smeared herself with it. So was she as beautiful as she had ever been at any day. And she dressed herself in rich cloth of silk, of which the lady had much.

She sat in her chamber upon a quilt of stitched silk cloth, and she called the lady and told her that she should go for Aucassin, her love. She did it; and when she came to the palace, she found Aucassin who was weeping and regretting Nicolette his love because she delayed so long, and the lady called him and said to him:

"Aucassin, don't cry any more, but come along with me, and I will show you the thing that you love most in all the world, for it is Nicolette, your sweet love, who has come from distant lands to find you."

And Aucassin was overjoyed!

XLI

Now it is sung

Now when Aucassin had heard
Of his love with clearest face,
How she had come to this land,
Glad was he, never more so.
With the lady has he gone;
Straight to that house did he ride.
There they entered in a room
Where Nicolette was sitting.
When she saw her lover there,
Glad was she, never more so.
Up she jumped and ran to him.
And when Aucassin saw her,
With both arms stretched out to her,
He embraced her tenderly
While he kissed her eyes and face.
All that night they left them thus.
In the morning, the next day,
Aucassin made her his wife.
Lady of Beaucaire she was;
Then they lived for many days
And much pleasure did they have.
Now has Aucassin his joy
And Nicolette hers likewise.
Our chantefable takes its end.
I cannot tell you more.

DANTE ALIGHIERI

(1265–1321)

The Divine Comedy (La divina commedia)*

Hell (Inferno)

CANTO I

Halfway through his life, Dante the Pilgrim wakes to find himself lost in a dark wood. Terrified at being alone in so dismal a valley, he wanders until he comes to a hill bathed in sunlight, and his fear begins to leave him. But when he starts to climb the hill his path is blocked by three fierce beasts: first a Leopard, then a Lion, and finally a She-Wolf. They fill him with fear and drive him back down to the sunless wood. At that moment the figure of a man appears before him; it is the shade of Virgil, and the Pilgrim begs for help. Virgil tells him that he cannot overcome the beasts which obstruct his path; they must remain until a "Greyhound" comes who will drive them back to Hell. Rather by another path will the Pilgrim reach the sunlight, and Virgil promises to guide him on that path through Hell and Purgatory, at which time another spirit, more fit than Virgil, will lead him to Paradise. The Pilgrim begs Virgil to lead on, and the Guide starts ahead. The Pilgrim follows.

Midway along the journey of our life
I woke to find myself in some dark woods, for I had wandered off from the straight path.
How hard it is to tell what it was like,
this wood of wilderness, savage and stubborn
(the thought of it brings back all my old fears),

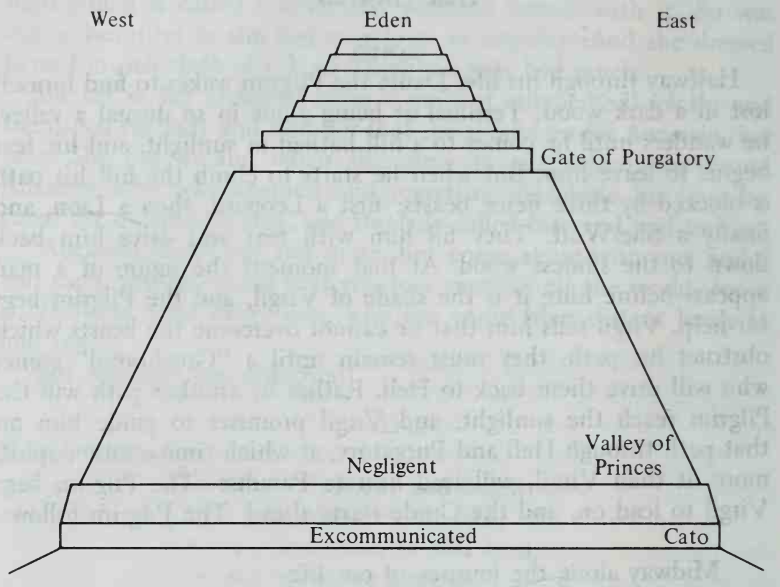
* Abridged. Written in the early fourteenth century. Inferno (complete), from Dante's Inferno, translated with notes and commentary by Mark Musa, copyright, 1971, by Indiana University Press, Bloomington and London. Reprinted by permission of Indiana University Press. Purgatorio and Paradiso translated, with headnotes, by Lawrence Binyon; the footnotes are by C. H. Grandgent, from La divina commedia di Dante Alighieri, edited and annotated by C. H. Grandgent, copyright, 1933, by D. C. Heath and Company, Boston. Reprinted with the permission of the translator's wife and the Society of Authors, and by special permission of D. C. Heath and Company, Boston.

1-10. The reader must be careful from the beginning to distinguish between the two uses of the first person singular in the Divine Comedy: one designating Dante the Pilgrim, the other Dante the Poet. The first is a character in a story invented by the second. The events are represented as having taken place in the past; the writing of the poem and the memories of these events are represented as taking place in the poet's present. We find references to both past and present, and to both pilgrim and poet in line 10: "How I entered there I cannot truly say."

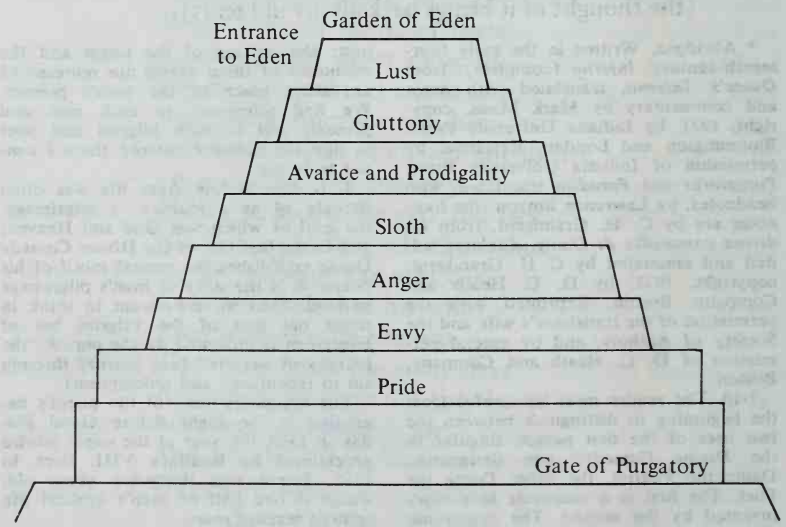
1. In the Middle Ages life was often thought of as a journey, a pilgrimage, the goal of which was God and Heaven; and in the first line of the Divine Comedy Dante establishes the central motif of his poem—it is the story of man's pilgrimage to God. That we are meant to think in terms not just of the Pilgrim but of Everyman is indicated by the phrase "the journey of our life" (our journey through sin to repentance and redemption).

The imaginary date of the poem's beginning is the night before Good Friday in 1300, the year of the papal jubilee proclaimed by Boniface VIII. Born in 1265, Dante was thirty-five years old, which is one half of man's biblical life span of seventy years.

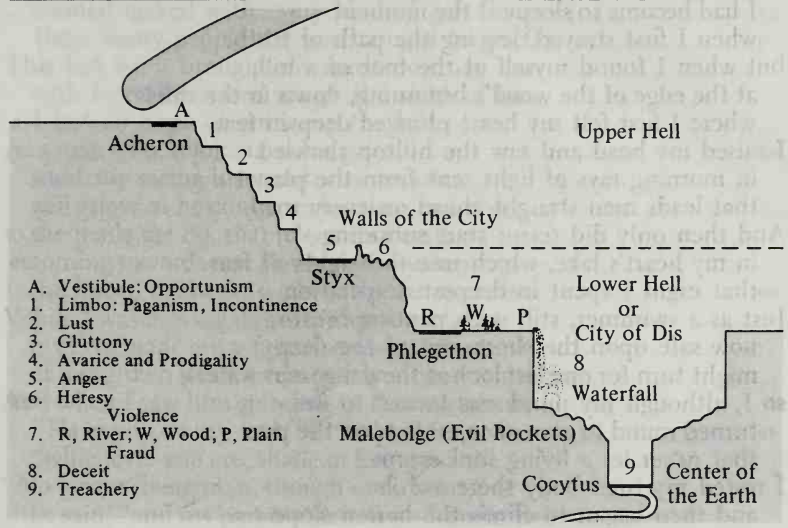
Island of Purgatory



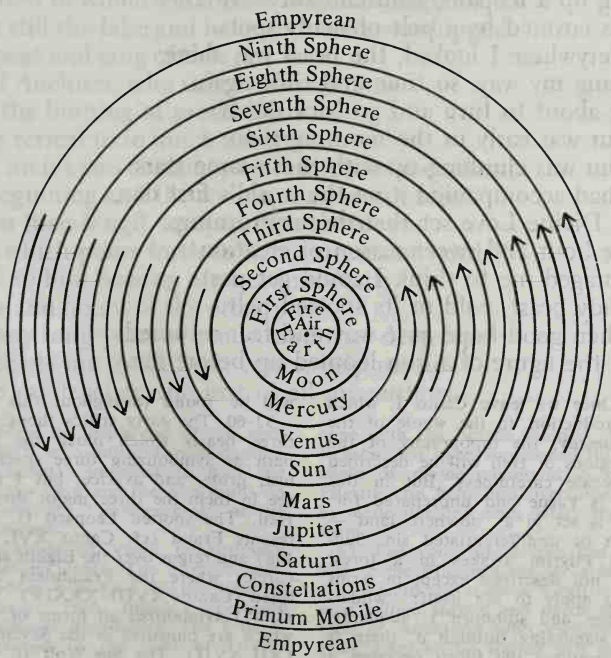
Eden and Purgatory



The Slope of Hell



The Heavenly Spheres



a bitter place! Death could scarce be bitterer.
But if I would show the good that came of it
I must talk about things other than the good.
How I entered there I cannot truly say,
I had become so sleepy at the moment when I first strayed, leaving the path of truth;
but when I found myself at the foot of a hill,
at the edge of the wood's beginning, down in the valley,
where I first felt my heart plunged deep in fear,
I raised my head and saw the hilltop shawled in morning rays of light sent from the planet that leads men straight ahead on every road.
And then only did terror start subsiding in my heart's lake, which rose to heights of fear that night I spent in deepest desperation.
Just as a swimmer, still with panting breath,
now safe upon the shore, out of the deep,
might turn for one last look at the dangerous waters,
so I, although my mind was turned to flee, turned round to gaze once more upon the pass that never let a living soul escape.
I rested my tired body there awhile and then began to climb the barren slope
(I dragged my stronger foot and limped along).
Beyond the point the slope begins to rise sprang up a leopard, trim and very swift!
It was covered by a pelt of many spots.
And, everywhere I looked, the beast was there blocking my way, so time and time again
I was about to turn and go back down.
The hour was early in the morning then,
the sun was climbing up with those same stars that had accompanied it on the world's first day, the day Divine Love set their beauty turning;
so the hour and sweet season of creation encouraged me to think I could get past that gaudy beast, wild in its spotted pelt, but then good hope gave way and fear returned when the figure of a lion loomed up before me,

13–15. Once we leave Canto I, which is the introduction to the whole of the Divine Comedy, the topography of the various regions of Hell will be described with elaborate carefulness. But in this canto all is vague and unprepared for; the scene is set in a "nowhere land"—the region of undifferentiated sin. Suddenly the Pilgrim awakes in a forest (which is not described except in terms that could apply to Sin itself: "wilderness, savage and stubborn"); suddenly, as he is wandering through it, there is a hill—whereupon the forest becomes a valley. Other suggestions of this dream-like atmosphere (which, under the circumstances, must be that of a nightmare) will be found throughout this canto.

32–60. The early critics thought of the three beasts which block the Pilgrim's path as symbolizing three specific sins: lust, pride, and avarice; but I prefer to see in them the three major divisions of Hell. The spotted Leopard (l. 32) represents Fraud (cf. Canto XVI, ll. 106–108) and reigns over the Eighth and Ninth Circles where the Fraudulent are punished (Cantos XVIII–XXXIV). The Lion (l. 45) symbolizes all forms of Violence which are punished in the Seventh Circle (XII–XVII). The She-Wolf (l. 49) represents the different types of Concupiscence or Incontinence which are punished in Circles Two to Five (V–VIII).

and he was coming straight toward me, it seemed,
with head raised high, and furious with hunger—
the air around him seemed to fear his presence.
And now a she-wolf came, that in her leanness seemed racked with every kind of greediness (how many people she has brought to grief!).
This last beast brought my spirit down so low with fear that seized me at the sight of her,
I lost all hope of going up the hill.
As a man who, rejoicing in his gains, suddenly seeing his gain turn into loss,
will grieve as he compares his then and now,
so she made me do, that relentless beast;
coming towards me, slowly, step by step,
she forced me back to where the sun is mute.
While I was moving down to that low place,
my eyes made out a figure coming toward me of one grown weak, perhaps from too much silence.
And when I saw him standing in this wasteland,
"Have pity on my soul," I cried to him,
"whichever you are, shade or living man!"
"No longer living man, though once I was,"
he said, "and my parents were from Lombardy, both of them were Mantuans by birth.
I was born, though somewhat late, sub Julio,
and lived in Rome when good Augustus reigned,
when still the false and lying gods were worshipped.
I was a poet and sang of that just man, son of Anchises, who sailed off from Troy
after the burning of proud Ilium.
But why retreat to so much misery?
Why aren't you climbing up this joyous mountain,
the beginning and the source of all man's bliss?"
"Are you then Virgil, are you then that fount from which pours forth so rich a stream of words?"
I said to him bowing my head modestly.
"O light and honor of the other poets, may my long years of study, and that deep love that made me search your verses, help me now!
You are my teacher, the first of all my authors,

46–50. Note the triple use of the verb seem (which is a faithful reproduction of the original), intended to blur the figures of the Lion and the She-Wolf—in harmony with the "nowhereness" of the moral landscape.

